
The Broadview Anthology of British Literature

THE RENAISSANCE AND THE EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

THIRD EDITION

The Broadview Anthology of
BRITISH LITERATURE

Volume 2
The Renaissance and the Early Seventeenth Century
Third Edition

The Broadview Anthology of British Literature

The Medieval Period
The Renaissance and the Early Seventeenth Century
The Restoration and the Eighteenth Century
The Age of Romanticism
The Victorian Era
The Twentieth Century and Beyond

The Broadview Anthology of

BRITISH LITERATURE

Volume 2

The Renaissance and the Early Seventeenth Century

Third Edition

GENERAL EDITORS

Joseph Black, University of Massachusetts
Leonard Conolly, Trent University
Kate Flint, University of Southern California
Isobel Grundy, University of Alberta
Don LePan, Broadview Press
Roy Liuzza, University of Tennessee
Jerome J. McGann, University of Virginia
Anne Lake Prescott, Barnard College
Barry V. Qualls, Rutgers University
Claire Waters, University of California, Davis

broadview press

BROADVIEW PRESS — www.broadviewpress.com
Peterborough, Ontario, Canada

Founded in 1985, Broadview Press remains a wholly independent publishing house. Broadview's focus is on academic publishing; our titles are accessible to university and college students as well as scholars and general readers. With over 600 titles in print, Broadview has become a leading international publisher in the humanities, with world-wide distribution. Broadview is committed to environmentally responsible publishing and fair business practices.

© 2016 Broadview Press
Reprinted with corrections 2017

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, kept in an information storage and retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or otherwise, except as expressly permitted by the applicable copyright laws or through written permission from the publisher.

LIBRARY AND ARCHIVES CANADA CATALOGUING IN PUBLICATION

The Broadview anthology of British literature / general editors, Joseph Black (University of Massachusetts), Leonard Conolly (Trent University), Kate Flint (University of Southern California), Isobel Grundy (University of Alberta), Don LePan (Broadview Press), Roy Liuzza (University of Tennessee), Jerome J. McGann (University of Virginia), Anne Lake Prescott (Barnard College), Barry V. Qualls (Rutgers University), Claire Waters (University of California, Davis). – Third edition.

(Broadview anthology of British literature)
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
Contents: Volume 1. The medieval period – Volume 2. The Renaissance and the early seventeenth century.
ISBN 978-1-55481-290-5 (v. 2: paperback)

1. English literature. I. Black, Joseph, 1962–, editor II. Title: British literature. III. Series: Broadview anthology of British literature (Series)

PR1109.B772 2014 820.8 C2014-907235-X

Broadview Press handles its own distribution in North America
PO Box 1243, Peterborough, Ontario K9J 7H5, Canada
555 Riverwalk Parkway, Tonawanda, NY 14150, USA
Tel: (705) 743-8990; Fax: (705) 743-8353
email: customerservice@broadviewpress.com

Distribution is handled by Eurospan Group in the UK, Europe, Central Asia, Middle East, Africa, India, Southeast Asia, Central America, South America, and the Caribbean. Distribution is handled by Footprint Books in Australia and New Zealand.

Broadview Press acknowledges the financial support of the Government of Canada through the Canada Book Fund for our publishing activities.

Canadä

Typeset by Kathryn Brownsey
Cover design by Lisa Brawn

PRINTED IN CANADA

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS AND WRITERS

MANAGING EDITOR	Don LePan
ASSISTANT MANAGING EDITOR	Laura Buzzard
DEVELOPMENTAL EDITORS	Laura Buzzard, Jennifer McCue
EDITORIAL COORDINATOR	Jennifer McCue
GENERAL ACADEMIC AND TEXTUAL EDITORS	Laura Cardiff, Colleen Franklin, Morgan Rooney
DESIGN COORDINATOR	Kathryn Brownsey

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

Katherine O. Acheson
Suzy Anger
Phanuel Antwi
Melissa Bachynski
Robert Barrett
Gisele Baxter
Donald Beecher
Sandra Bell
Emily Bernhard Jackson
Joseph Black
Carol Blessing
Robert Boenig
Sarika Bose
Matthieu Boyd
Benjamin Bruch
Laura Buzzard
Michael Calabrese
Laura Cardiff
Lisa Celovsky
Noel Chevalier
Mita Choudhury
Youngjin Chung
Massimo Ciavolella
Anna Clark
Elisha Cohn
Thomas J. Collins
Leonard Conolly
Darryl Domingo
Annmarie Drury
Dianne Dugaw
Siân Echard
Rose Eckert-Jantzie
Warren Edminster
Rachel Eisendrath
Garrett Epp
Michael Faletra
Emily Farrell
Christina Fawcett
Christina Fitzgerald
Adrienne Fitzpatrick
Andrew Fleck
Melissa Free
Maura Giles Watson
Stephen Glosecki
Amanda Goldrick-Jones
Katie Gramich
Erik Gray
John Greenwood
Isobel Grundy
Stephen Guy-Bray
Douglas Hayes
Peter C. Herman
Heather Hill-Vasquez
John Holmes
Diane Jakacki
Eleanor Johnson
Ian Johnston
Susan Kattwinkel
Michael Keefer
Amy King
David Klausner
Scott Kleinman
Chris Koenig-Woodyard
Gary Kuchar
Roger P. Kuin
Lydia K. Lake
Wendy Lee
Don LePan
Ruth Lexton
Roy Liuzza
Kirsten Lodge
Marie Loughlin
D.L. Macdonald
Hugh Magennis
Anne McWhir
Tobias Menely
Britt Mize
Alexander Mueller
Ian Munro
Sarah Neville
Meghan Nieman
David Oakleaf
Maureen Okun
Philip S. Palmer
Virginia Philipson
Jude Polsky
Anne Lake Prescott
Joyce Rappaport
Joseph Rezek
Shelby Richardson
Terry Robinson
Herbert Rosengarten
Jason Rudy
Janice Schroeder
Chester Scoville
John T. Sebastian
Kelly Stage
Emily Steiner
Ashley Streeter
Martha Stoddard-Holmes
Julie Sutherland
David Swain
Carol Symes
Andrew Taylor
Peggy Thompson
Jane Tolmie
Rebecca Totaro
David Townsend
Yevgeniya Traps
Melissa Valiska Gregory
Martine van Elk
Fred Waage
Andrea Walkden
Craig Walker
Claire Waters
David Watt
William Weaver

Vivienne Westbrook
David Williams
Adrienne Williams Boyarin
James Winny

Contributing Writers

Laura Cardiff
Jude Polsky
Victoria Abboud
Jane Beal
Jennifer Beauvais
Rachel Bennett
Emily Bernhard Jackson
Rebecca Blasco
Matthieu Boyd
Julie Brennan
Andrew Bretz
Laura Buzzard
Emily Cargan
Darryl Domingo
Adrienne Eastwood
Wendy Eberle-Sinatra
Zachary Edwards
Peter Enman
Emily Farrell
Christina Fawcett
Joanne Findon
Jane Grove
Camille Isaacs
Erik Isford
John Geddert
Shoshannah Jones Square
Stephanie King
Chris Koenig-Woodyard
Gabrielle L'Archeveque
Don LePan
Anna Lepine
John McIntyre
Carrie Nartkler
Byron Nelson
Robin Norris
Kenna Olsen
Kendra O'Neal Smith
Laura Pellerine
Virginia Philipson
Nora Ruddock
Jason Rudy
Anne Salo
Janice Schroeder
Carrie Shanafelt
Nicole Shukin
Helena Snopek
James Soderholm
Anne Sorbie
Martha Stoddard-Holmes
Jenna Stook
Ashley Streeter
Alexandria Stuart
Candace Taylor
Yevgeniya Traps
David Van Belle Deirdra Wadden
Shari Watling
Matthew Williams
Bj Wray
Nicole Zylstra

Layout and Typesetting

Kathryn Brownsey
Susan Chamberlain

Illustration Formatting and Assistance

Cheryl Baldwin
Lisa Brawn
Eileen Eckert

Production Coordinators

Tara Lowes
Tara Trueman

Permissions Coordinators

Merilee Atos
Chris Griffin
Emily Cargan
Amy Nimegeer
Jennifer Elsayed

Proofreaders

Jennifer Bingham
Judith Earnshaw
Anne Hodgetts
Joe Davies
Martin Boyne
Rose Eckert-Jantzie
Amy Neufeld
Lucy Conolly
Lynn Fraser
Lynn Neufeld

Editorial Advisors

Rachel Ablow, University at Buffalo, SUNY
Phanuel Antwi, University of British Columbia
Dabney Bankert, James Madison University
Stephen C. Behrendt, University of Nebraska
Sumangala Bhattacharya, Pitzer College
Kim Blank, University of Victoria
Rita Bode, Trent University
Andrew Bretz, Wilfred Laurier University

David Brewer, Ohio State University
Susan Brown, University of Guelph
Catherine Burroughs, Wells College
Elizabeth Campbell, Oregon State University
William Christmas, San Francisco State University
Nancy Cirillo, University of Illinois, Chicago
Joanne Cordón, University of Connecticut
David Cowart, University of South Carolina
Alex Dick, University of British Columbia
Len Diepeveen, Dalhousie University
Daniel Fischlin, University of Guelph
Robert Forman, St. John's University
Peter Francev, Victor Valley College
Mark Fulk, Buffalo State College, SUNY
Julia Garrett, University of Wisconsin
Barbara Gates, University of Delaware
Dawn Goode, James Madison University
Chris Gordon-Craig, University of Alberta
Natalie Grinnell, Wofford College
Stephen Guy-Bray, University of British Columbia
Tassie Gwilliam, University of Miami
Elizabeth Hodgson, University of British Columbia
John Holmes, University of Reading
Romana Huk, University of Notre Dame
Michael Keefer, University of Guelph
Gordon Kipling, University of California, Los Angeles
Emily Kugler, University of California, San Diego
Sarah Landreth, University of Ottawa
William Liston, Ball State University
Paula Loscocco, Lehman College
Kathleen Lundeen, Western Washington University
Peter Mallios, University of Maryland
Carl G. Martin, Norwich University
Martin McKinsey, University of New Hampshire
Rod Michell, Thompson Rivers University
Byron Nelson, West Virginia University
Robin Norris, Carleton College
Michael North, University of California, Los Angeles
Lesley Peterson, University of North Alabama
John Pollock, San Jose State University
Joseph Rezek, Boston University
Jason Rudy, University of Maryland
Andrew Scheil, University of Minnesota
Carol Senf, Georgia Tech
Ken Simpson, Thompson Rivers University
Sharon Smulders, Mount Royal University
Goran Stanivukovic, St. Mary's University
Marni Stanley, Vancouver Island University
Tim Stretton, St. Mary's University
Nicholas Watson, Harvard University
Kevin Whetter, Acadia University
Julian Yates, University of Delaware

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2022 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/broadviewantholo0002unse

CONTENTS

Please note that the full Broadview Anthology of British Literature includes material found both in the bound-book volumes and in the anthology's website component located at sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline.

PREFACE xxxv

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS xliii

INTRODUCTION TO THE RENAISSANCE AND THE EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY xlvii
- Humanism xlix
- Scientific Inquiry l
- The Reformation in England lii
- Wales, Scotland, Ireland lvii
- Edward VI, Mary I, and Elizabeth I lx
- Elizabeth I and Gender lx
- Homoeroticism and Cross-Dressing lxiv
- Economy and Society in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries lxvi
- "The Round Earth's Imagined Corners" lxxv
- The Stuarts and the Civil Wars lxxvii
- Literary Genres lxxxii
- Literature in Prose and the Development of Print Culture lxxxii
- Poetry lxxxix
- The Drama xcii
- The English Language in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries xcvi

HISTORY OF THE LANGUAGE AND OF PRINT CULTURE xcix

JOHN SKELTON 1
- The Tunning of Elinour Rumming 2
- To Mistress Isabell Pennell 11
- To Mistress Margaret Hussey (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
- Philip Sparrow (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

SIR THOMAS MORE 12
- Utopia: The Best State of a Commonwealth and the New Island of Utopia 13
  - Thomas More to Peter Giles 18
  - Book 1 20
  - Book 2 36
    - Chapter 1 36
    - Chapter 2: The Cities, and Especially Amaurote 38
    - Chapter 3: The System of Local Government 39
    - Chapter 4: Crafts and Occupations 40

            Chapter 5: Their Dealings with One Another 42
            Chapter 6: Traveling 45
            Chapter 7: Slavery 54
            Chapter 8: Warfare 58
            Chapter 9: The Religions in Utopia 62
        IN CONTEXT: Illustration of Utopia 69
        IN CONTEXT: Utopian Language 70
        IN CONTEXT: Poems in the Utopian Tongue 71 from A Dialogue of Comfort Against Tribulation (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
        Part 2, Chapter 14
        Part 2, Chapter 16
        Part 3, Chapter 10
        Response to Luther
    The "Tower Correspondence" (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
        To Margaret Roper (April/May 1534)
        To Margaret Roper (May 1534)
        To Margaret Roper (2 or 3 May 1535)
        To Margaret Roper (3 June 1535)
        To Margaret Roper (5 July 1535)
    IN CONTEXT: Thomas More (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
        Erasmus's Description of More
        Roper's Description of More's Death

WILLIAM TYNDALE 73
    Tyndale's English Bible, King James Bible, Geneva Bible, Douay-Rheims Bible 76
        Genesis: Chapter 1 76
        Matthew: Chapter 5 80

CONTEXTS: RELIGION AND DEVOTIONAL LIFE 87
    The Martyrdom of Anne Askew 88
        from Anne Askew, "The First Examination of Anne Askew" 89
        from John Foxe, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days 90
        Anonymous, "I Am a Woman Poor and Blind" 91
    from Thomas Cranmer, The Book of Common Prayer 93
        The Solemnization of Matrimony 93
        The Order for the Burial of the Dead 95
    John Foxe 96
        from John Foxe, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days 96
            The Benefit and Invention of Printing 96
            Bishop Ridley and Bishop Latimer 97
    from Lady Margaret Hoby, Diaries 103
    from Owen Felltham, Resolves 105
    Jews and Christians 107
        from Richard Morison, A Remedy for Sedition 109
        from Samuel Usque, Consolation for the Tribulations of Israel 110

from Christopher Marlowe, The Jew of Malta 111
from Act 2, Scene 3 111
from Thomas Lodge, Wit's Misery, and the World's Madness 112
from Edward Coke, The Institutes of the Laws of England, Part 2 112

SIR THOMAS WYATT 113
Sonnets 114
10 ("The long love that in my thought doth harbour") 114
29 ("The pillar perished is whereto I leant") 114
31 ("Farewell, Love, and all thy laws forever") 114
Epigrams 115
38 ("Alas, madam, for stealing of a kiss") 115
48 ("Vulcan begat me; Minerva me taught") 115
60 ("Tagus, farewell, that westward with thy streams") 115
Ballads 115
80 ("They flee from me that sometime did me seek") 115
94 ("Blame not my lute, for he must sound") 116
Songs 116
109 ("My lute, awake! Perform the last") 116
123 ("Who list his wealth and ease retain") 117
Epistolary Satires 117
149 ("Mine own John Poyns, since ye delight to know") 117
IN CONTEXT: Epistolary Advice 119

JOHN FOXE (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from John Foxe, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days

HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF SURREY 122
Love, that Doth Reign and Live within My Thought 123
Set Me Whereas the Sun Doth Parch the Green 123
Alas! So All Things Now Do Hold Their Peace 124
So Cruel Prison How Could Betide 124
Wyatt Resteth Here 125
from Certain Books of Virgil's Aeneis: Book 2 125

THE ELIZABETHAN SONNET AND LYRIC 127
The Continental Background 128
Francesco Petrarch 128
from Rime Sparse 128
134 ("Pace non trovo et non ò da far guerra") 128
134 ("I find no peace and all my war is done") 128
140 ("Amor, che nel penser mio vive et regna") 129
140 ("Love, that doth reign and live within my thought") 129
189 ("Passa la nave mia colma d'oblio") 129
189 ("My galley chargèd with forgetfulness") 129

        190 ("Una candida cerva sopra l'erba") 130
        190 ("Whoso list to hunt, I know where is a hind") 130
Gaspara Stampa 130
    132 ("Quando io dimando nel mio pianto Amore") 130
    132 ("When in my weeping I inquire of Love") 130
Joachim Du Bellay 131
    from L'Olive augmentée 131
        113 ("Si nostre vie est moins qu'une journée") 131
        113 ("If this, our life, be less than but a day") 131
    from Les Regrets 131
        31 ("Heureux qui, comme Ulysse, a fait un beau voyage") 131
        31 ("Blest he who like Ulysses voyaged fair and wide") 131
Pierre de Ronsard 132
    ("Je vouldroy bien richement jaunissant") 132
    ("I would in rich and golden coloured rain") 132
    ("Quand vous serez bien vielle, au soir à la chandelle") 133
    ("When you are very old, by candle's flame") 133
Anne Lock 133
    from A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner 133
        ("Long have I heard, and yet I hear the sounds") 133
        ("Look on me, Lord: though trembling I beknowe") 133
Henry Lock (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
    Sonnet 21 (The Merchant and the Pearl)
    "To the Honorable Lady, the Lady Rich"
Samuel Daniel 134
    from Delia 134
        6 ("Fair is my love, and cruel as she's fair") 134
        28 ("Raising my hopes on hills of high desire") 134
        33 ("When men shall find thy flower, thy glory pass") 134
Michael Drayton 134
    from Idea 134
        6 ("How many paltry, foolish, painted things") 134
        61 ("Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part") 134
        63 ("Truce, gentle Love, a parley now I crave") 135
William Shakespeare 135
    from Romeo and Juliet (Act 1, Scene 5) 135
Sir John Davies 135
    from Gulling Sonnets 135
        3 ("What eagle can behold her sun-bright eye") 135
John Davies of Hereford 135
    from The Scourge of Villany 135
        ("If there were, oh! an Hellespont of cream") 136
Richard Barnfield 136
    from Cynthia 136
        14 ("Here, hold this glove [this milk-white cheverel glove]") 136

        17 ("Cherry-lipped Adonis in his snowy shape") 136
    George Gascoigne 136
        Gascoigne's Lullaby 136
    Anonymous 137
        Ode ("Absence, hear thou my protestation") 137

ANNE LOCK
    A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner [complete] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

LITERATURE IN IRELAND, GAELIC SCOTLAND, AND WALES 138
  Ireland and Gaelic Scotland 140
    Gofraidh Fionn Ó Dálaigh 140 from "To Domhnall" 140
    Isabel, Countess of Argyll 142
        There's a Young Man in Pursuit of Me / Atá Fleasgach Ar Mo Thí 143
        Woe to the One Whose Sickness Is Love / Is Mairg Dá Ngalar An Grádh . . 143
    Anonymous 144
        Lament for MacGregor of Glenstrae, who was beheaded in 1570 144
    Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn 145
        from "The Battle of Drumleene" 146
        Enniskillen 147
        A Satire 150
    Geoffrey Keating 151
        O Woman Full of Wiles 151
        Bear with Thee, O Letter, My Blessing 152
        On the Miseries of Ireland 152 from History of Ireland 153
    Dáibhí Ó Bruadair 154
        Gone Are All the Noble Poets 154
        After the Death of the Poets 154
    Geoffrey O'Donoghue of the Glens 154
        This caps all their tricks, this statute from overseas 155
    IN CONTEXT: English Invasions of Ireland (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Edmund Spenser, A View of The Present State of Ireland from Oliver Cromwell, Letter to the English Parliament (17 September 1649) from Father Thomas Quinn, Letter to the Vatican (28 August, 1656)
  Wales 155
    Dafydd ap Gwilym 155
        The Skylark 155
        The Gull 156
        Trouble at an Inn 157
        Morfudd Like the Sun 158
        The Mirror 159
        The Ruin 159
        The Poet and the Grey Friar 160

- Tudur Penyllyn 161
  - Conversation between a Welshman and an Englishwoman / Ymddiddan Rhwyng Cymro a Saesnes 161
- ? Gwerful Mechain 163
  - To the Vagina 163
  - To Her Husband, for Beating Her 163
  - White Flour, Earthflesh, Cold Fleece 164
  - Christ's Suffering (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
- ? Elis Gruffydd 164
  - from Chronicle 164
    - The Story of Gwion Bach, Who Became Taliesin (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
    - Llywelyn and the Fool 164
- Siôn Cent 165
  - from The Illusion of the World / Hud a Lliw y Byd 166

THE CORNISH Ordinalia (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
- Noah and the Ark
  - Origo Mundi, lines 917–1258
- The Crucifixion
  - Passio Christi, lines 2504–3030
- The Death of Pilate
  - Ressurexio Domini, lines 1587–2044

BALDASSARE CASTIGLIONE/THOMAS HOBY 167
- from The Courtier 168
  - from Book 1 168
  - from Book 1 [additional material] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
  - from Book 3 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
  - from Book 4 169
  - from Book 4 [additional material] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

LADY JANE GREY 183
- Letters 184
  - Lady Jane Grey to Her Father, 9 February 1554 184
  - A Letter Written by the Lady Jane to Her Sister Lady Katherine 184
- A Certain Prayer of the Lady Jane in the Time of Her Trouble 185
- Certain Pretty Verses Written by the Said Lady Jane with a Pin 186
- IN CONTEXT: Lady Jane Grey 187
  - from John Foxe, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days 187

THOMAS DELONEY (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
- Jack of Newbury

EDMUND SPENSER 191
from The Faerie Queene 192
Book 1 194
from Book 2 277
from Canto 12 277
from Book 3 284
Canto 6 284
Canto 11 291
Canto 12 300
from Book 5 306
Canto 2 306
Letter to Sir Walter Ralegh on The Faerie Queene 313
IN CONTEXT: The Redcrosse Knight 317
IN CONTEXT: Christian Armor 317 from Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, 6.11–17 (Geneva Bible) 317 from Desiderius Erasmus, Enchiridion militis Christiani [Handbook of the Christian Soldier] 318
IN CONTEXT: Spirituality and The Faerie Queene 319
Heading to the Song of Solomon (Geneva Bible) 319 from The Shepheardes Calender (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Amoretti 320
1 ("Happy ye leaves when as those lilly hands") 320
3 ("The soverayne beauty which I doo admyre") 320
6 ("Be nought dismayd that her unmovèd mind") 320
15 ("Ye tradefull Merchants, that with weary toyle") 320
22 ("This holy season fit to fast and pray") 320
26 ("Sweet is the Rose, but growes upon a brere") 321
34 ("Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde") 321
37 ("What guyle is this, that those her golden tresses") 321
54 ("Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay") 321
64 ("Comming to kisse her lyps, [such grace I found]") 321
67 ("Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace") 322
68 ("Most glorious Lord of lyfe that on this day") 322
69 ("The famous warriors of the anticke world") 322
70 ("Fresh spring the herald of loves mighty king") 322
74 ("Most happy letters fram'd by skilfull trade") 322
75 ("One day I wrote her name upon the strand") 323
80 ("After so long a race as I have run") 323
82 ("Joy of my life, full oft for loving you") 323
89 ("Lyke as the Culver on the barèd bough") 323
Epithalamion 324

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY 330
  from Astrophil and Stella 332
    1 ("Loving in truth, and fain in verse my love to show") 332
    2 ("Not at first sight, nor with a dribbèd shot") 332
    7 ("When Nature made her chief work, Stella's eyes") 332
    18 ("With what sharp checks I in myself am shent") 332
    20 ("Fly, fly, my friends, I have my death wound; fly!") 332
    21 ("Your words, my friend [right healthful caustics] blame") 333
    22 ("In highest way of heav'n the Sun did ride") 333
    23 ("The curious wits seeing dull pensiveness") 333
    24 ("Rich fools there be, whose base and filthy heart") 333
    25 ("The wisest scholar of the wight most wise") 334
    26 ("Though dusty wits dare scorn astrology") 334
    27 ("Because I oft in dark abstracted guise") 334
    31 ("With how sad steps, oh Moon, thou climb'st the skies") 334
    34 ("Come, let me write. 'And to what end?' To ease") 334
    39 ("Come, Sleep! O Sleep, the certain knot of peace") 334
    41 ("Having this day my horse, my hand, my lance") 335
    45 ("Stella oft sees the very face of woe") 335
    47 ("What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?") 335
    48 ("Soul's joy, bend not those morning stars from me") 335
    49 ("I on my horse, and Love on me doth try") 335
    50 ("Stella, the fulness of my thoughts of thee") 336
    51 ("Pardon mine ears, both I and they do pray") 336
    52 ("A strife is grown between Virtue and Love") 336
    53 ("In martial sports I had my cunning tried") 336
    54 ("Because I breathe not love to every one") 337
    55 ("Muses, I oft invoked your holy aid") 337
    61 ("Oft with true sighs, oft with uncallèd tears") 337
    69 ("O joy too high for my low style to show!") 337
    71 ("Who will in fairest book of Nature know") 337
    94 ("Grief find the words, for thou hast made my brain") 338
    95 ("Yet Sighs, dear Sighs, indeed true friends you are") 338
    96 ("Thought, with good cause thou lik'st so well the Night") 338
    97 ("Dian, that fain would cheer her friend the Night") 338
    98 ("Ah bed, the field where joy's peace some do see") 338
    99 ("When far-spent night persuades each mortal eye") 339
    100 ("Oh tears, no tears, but rain from Beauty's skies") 339
    101 ("Stella is sick, and in that sickbed lies") 339
    102 ("Where be those roses gone, which sweetened so our eyes?") 339
    103 ("Oh happy Thames, that didst my Stella bear") 340
    104 ("Envious wits, what hath been mine offence") 340
    105 ("Unhappy sight, and hath she vanished by") 340
    106 ("Oh absent presence, Stella is not here") 340
    107 ("Stella, since thou so right a princess art") 340

30 A

108 ("When Sorrow [using mine own fire's might]") 341
The Defence of Poesy 341
IN CONTEXT: The Abuse of Poesy 370 from Plato, The Republic, from Book 2 370
from Stephen Gosson, The School of Abuse 372
from The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia 373
from Book 1 375
from Chapter 1 375
from Chapter 2 376
from Chapter 5 377
from Chapter 12 381
IN CONTEXT: An Emblem Honoring Sir Philip Sidney 388
from Geffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblems 388

MARY SIDNEY HERBERT, COUNTESS OF PEMBROKE 390
To the Angel Spirit of the Most Excellent Sir Philip Sidney 391
from The Psalms of David 392
Psalm 52: Quid Gloriaris? 392
Psalm 58: Si Vere Utique 393
Psalm 74: Ut Quid, Deus 393
Psalm 120: Ad Dominum 395
Even now that care (To the Thrice-Sacred Queen Elizabeth) 396

ELIZABETH I, QUEEN OF ENGLAND 398
Written on a Wall at Woodstock 399
Written in Her French Psalter 400
The Doubt of Future Foes 400
On Monsieur's Departure 400
Poems Exchanged between Sir Walter Ralegh and Elizabeth I 400
[Ralegh to Elizabeth] 401
[Elizabeth to Ralegh] 401
When I Was Fair and Young 401
To Our Most Noble and Virtuous Queen Katherine 402
The answer to the Queen's Highness to the petitions proponed unto her by the Lower House concerning her marriage (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Letters to the Duke of Anjou (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Speech to the House of Commons, 28 January 1563 403
from Speech to a Parliamentary Delegation, 5 November 1566 405
IN CONTEXT: Elizabeth and Marriage (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Letter to Elizabeth I from William Cecil, Lord Burghley Regarding Her Proposed Marriage from Speech to Parliament, 29 March 1586 407

ading -

In Context: Elizabeth and Catholicism (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
    Pope Pius V, The Bull of Excommunication Against Elizabeth
Elizabeth and Mary, Queen of Scots 408
    from Letter from Elizabeth I to Mary, Queen of Scots, 24 February 1567 408
    Letter from Elizabeth I to Mary, Queen of Scots, 12 October 1586 409
    Letter from Mary, Queen of Scots to Henry III, 8 February 1587 409
    Letter from Elizabeth I to James VI, 14 February 1587 410
To the Troops at Tilbury 411
In Context: The Speech at Tilbury (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
    Thomas Deloney, "The Queen's Visiting of the Camp at Tilbury"
Two Letters from Elizabeth to Catherine de Bourbon 411
Letter from Elizabeth I to Essex in Ireland, 19 July 1599 412
In Context: Tyrone's Rebellion (The Nine Years' War) (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
The Golden Speech 414
In Context: The Defeat of the Spanish Armada 417

Contexts: Culture: A Portfolio 419
Music 419
    from Izaak Walton, The Compleat Angler 420
Painting 420
    from Nicholas Hilliard, A Treatise Concerning the Art of Limning 421
    from A Letter to F.P. Verney from the Countess of Sussex 421
    Oliver Cromwell, Instructions to His Painter, as Reported by George Vertue, Notebooks 421
Games and Pastimes 422
    Selected Illustrations 422
Food and Drink 424
    from An Anonymous Venetian Official Traveling in England, A Relation, or Rather a True Account, of the Island of England 425
    from Fynes Moryson, Itinerary 425
    Selected Illustrations 426
    from Sarah Longe, Mrs. Sarah Longe Her Receipt Book 426
    from William Harrison, Chronologie 426
Children and Education 426
    Selected Illustrations 427
The Supernatural and the Miraculous 429
    from Reginald Scot, The Discovery of Witchcraft 430 from George Gifford, A Discourse of the Subtle Practices of Devils by Witches and Sorcerers 430
    from Joseph Hall, Characters of Virtues and Vices 431
    from Sir John Harington, "Account of an Audience with King James I," as recorded in Nugae Antiquae 431
    Anonymous Broadsheet, "The Form and Shape of a Monstrous Child" 432

Crime 432
  Selected Illustration 433 from "A True Report of the Late Horrible Murder Committed by William Sherwood" 433
Print and Manuscript Culture 434
  Selected Illustrations 434
Emblems 440
  from Geffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblems 440

MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS 443
  Sonnet to Elizabeth 445
    ("A single thought that haunts me, day and night" / "Une seul penser qui me profite le jour et la nuit") 445
  Sonnets to Bothwell 445
    ("O gods, have of me compassion" / "O Dieux ayez de moy compassion") 445
    ("In his hands and in his full power" / "Entre ses mains & en son plein pouvoir") 445
    ("And now she begins to see" / "Et maintenant elle commence à voir") 446
    ("You believe her [alas] I perceive it too well" / "Vous la croyez, las! trop je l'apperçoy") 446
  Letters 447
    from Letter Two 447
    Letter Three 448
    Letter Four 449
    Letter Seven 450
    Letter Eight 450

KING JAMES VI (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
  A Sonnet on Tycho Brahe
  An Epitaph on Sir Philip Sidney from A Speech to the Lords and Commons from A Counterblast to Tobacco

AEMILIA LANYER 451
  To the Virtuous Reader 452
  Salve Deus Rex Judæorum [complete text] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
  from Salve Deus Rex Judæorum 453
    "Invocation" 453
    "Eve's Apology in Defense of Women" 453
  The Description of Cooke-ham 454
  To the Doubtful Reader 457

SIR WALTER RALEGH 458
  A Vision upon this Conceit of the Fairy Queen 459
  Sir Walter Ralegh to His Son 459

The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd 460
The Lie 460
Nature that Washed Her Hands in Milk 461
The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself 462 from The Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana 462 Part 1, Preface 462 from Part 1 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Part 2
    from Part 4
    from Part 5 463
Letter to His Wife 468

CONTEXTS: OTHER LANDS, OTHER CULTURES 470 from Sir John Hawkins, "Account of His third voyage" 471 from Anthony Jenkinson, "The Voyage of Master Anthony Jenkinson" 472 from Michel de Montaigne, "Of Cannibals" 475 from William Shakespeare, The Tempest 477
    from Act 1, Scene 2 477
    from Act 2, Scene 1 478
Elizabethan Adventurers 479
    Selected Portraits 479
The English in Virginia, the Powhatans in London 481 from Arthur Barlow, "The first voyage made to the coasts of America" 482
    Michael Drayton, "To the Virginian Voyage" 484
    from John Smith, General History of Virginia and the Summer Isles 485 from John Rolfe, "Letter to Sir Thomas Dale" 488
    from John Smith, General History of Virginia and the Summer Isles 488
Newfoundland "With Good Clothes On" 489 from Richard Whitbourne, A Discourse and Discovery of Newfoundland 489
    Robert Hayman, "To My Very Good Friend Mr. John Poynts" 490 from "The Royal Charter for Incorporating the Hudson's Bay Company" 490 from Mary Rowlandson, A Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson 492

GEORGE PEELE (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
    The Old Wives' Tale

Thomas Kyd 500
    The Spanish Tragedy 501

FRANCIS BACON 556
    from Essays 558
        Of Truth 558
        Of Death 559
        Of Revenge 561

Of Simulation and Dissimulation 561
Of Marriage and Single Life 563
Of Love 564
Of Travel 565
Of Plantations 566
Of Masks and Triumphs 568
Of Studies (1597 version, original spelling) 569
Of Studies (1625 version, modernized) 569 from Novum Organum (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from The New Atlantis (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

Robert Southwell 571
The Nativity of Christ 572
His Circumcision 572
Christ's Bloody Sweat 573
Lewd Love Is Loss 573
A Vale of Tears 574
The Burning Babe 575
Mary Magdalen's Complaint at Christ's Death 576

Christopher Marlowe 577
Hero and Leander 578
The Passionate Shepherd to His Love 591
The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus ("A" Text) 592
In Context: Dr. Faustus 621 from Anonymous, The History of the Damnable Life, and Deserved Death of Dr. John Faustus 621 from Henricus Cornelius Agrippa, De Occulta Philosophia (Of Occult Philosophy) 624
In Context: Dr. Faustus, the "B" Text (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
[Note to instructors: Dr. Faustus the B Text as well as several other Marlowe plays are among over 400 available editions from Broadview, any one of which may be packaged together with this anthology volume at no extra cost to the student.]

Contexts: Tudor and Stuart Humor 626
Jest Collections 628
from Anonymous, A Hundred Merry Tales 628 from Anonymous, Tales and Quick Answers (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Anthony Copley, Wits, Fits, and Fancies 628 from T.D. and G.W., Jests to Make You Merry 629 from John Taylor, Wit and Mirth (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Anonymous, A Banquet of Jests 630

Jest Biographies 631 from Walter Smith, Twelve Marry Jests of the Widow Edith (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Anonymous, Merry Tales Made by Master Skelton 631 from Anonymous, Merry and Conceited Jests of George Peele 631 from Anonymous, Tarlton's Jests 632 from Anonymous, The Life of Long Meg of Westminster 633
Jests by Elite Writers 634
  from Sir Thomas More, A Dialogue Concerning Heresies 634 from Sir Thomas More, The Confutation of Tyndale's Answer 635 from Sir Thomas More, A Dialogue of Comfort Against Tribulation 635 from Thomas Wilson, The Art of Rhetoric 635 from Baldassare Castiglione, translated by Thomas Hoby, The Courtier of Count Baldessar Castilio 638 from Francis Bacon, Apophthegmes New and Old 640 from Thomas Nash, Quaternio, or A Fourfold Way to a Happy Life 640
Ballads 641
  The Mad-Merry Pranks of Robin Good-fellow 641
  The Cucking of a Scold 644
  A New Medley, or A Mess of All-together (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

William Shakespeare 647
  Venus and Adonis 651
  In Context: Venus and Adonis 671 from Ovid, Metamorphoses 671
    Henry Peacham, "Adonis Killed by a Boar" 673
  Sonnets 675
    1 ("From fairest creatures we desire increase") 676
    2 ("When forty winters shall besiege thy brow") 676
    12 ("When I do count the clock that tells the time") 676
    15 ("When I consider everything that grows") 677
    16 ("But wherefore do not you a mightier way") 677
    18 ("Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?") 677
    19 ("Devouring time, blunt thou the lion's paws") 677
    20 ("A woman's face with nature's own hand painted") 678
    23 ("As an unperfect actor on the stage") 678
    29 ("When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes") 678
    30 ("When to the sessions of sweet silent thought") 678
    33 ("Full many a glorious morning have I seen") 679
    35 ("No more be grieved at that which thou hast done") 679
    36 ("Let me confess that we two must be twain") 679
    55 ("Not marble, nor the gilded monuments") 679
    60 ("Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore") 680
    64 ("When I have seen by time's fell hand defaced") 680
    65 ("Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea") 680

71 ("No longer mourn for me when I am dead") 680
73 ("That time of year thou mayst in me behold") 680
74 ("But be contented when that fell arrest") 681
80 ("O how I faint when I of you do write") 681
87 ("Farewell—thou art too dear for my possessing") 681
93 ("So shall I live supposing thou art true") 681
94 ("They that have power to hurt and will do none") 682
97 ("How like a winter hath my absence been") 682
98 ("From you have I been absent in the spring") 682
105 ("Let not my love be called idolatry") 682
106 ("When in the chronicle of wasted time") 683
109 ("O never say that I was false of heart") 683
110 ("Alas, 'tis true, I have gone here and there") 683
116 ("Let me not to the marriage of true minds") 683
117 ("Accuse me thus: that I have scanted all") 684
127 ("In the old age black was not counted fair") 684
128 ("How oft when thou, my music, music play'st") 684
129 ("Th'expense of spirit in a waste of shame") 684
130 ("My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun") 685
135 ("Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will"), ... 685
136 ("If thy soul check thee that I come so near") 685
138 ("When my love swears that she is made of truth") 685
143 ("Lo, as a careful housewife runs to catch") 685
144 ("Two loves I have, of comfort and despair") 686
146 ("Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth") 686
147 ("My love is as a fever, longing still") 686
153 ("Cupid laid by his brand, and fell asleep") 687
154 ("The little love-god lying once asleep") 687
Twelfth Night (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
In Context: Performance and Sources (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
In Context: Gender and Sexuality
In Context: Theater and Society
In Context: Music and the Passions
In Context: Dueling
A Midsummer Night's Dream (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
The Merchant of Venice (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
In Context: Sources and Context
In Context: Jews and Christians
In Context: Revenge
In Context: Commercial Life: Of Venice, Merchants, Usurers, and Debtors
In Context: Friendship and Love between Men
In Context: Women, Family, and Obedience
King Lear (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
In Context: Facsimile Pages
In Context: King Lear: Sources and Analogues

IN CONTEXT: King Lear: Seventeenth-Century Reception History
[Note to instructors: King Lear, Twelfth Night, and The Merchant of Venice are among over 400 available editions from Broadview, any one of which may be packaged together with this anthology volume at no extra cost to the student.]

CONTEXTS: THE THEATER IN SHAKESPEARE'S TIME (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
The Swan Theater, sketch
Titus Andronicus in Performance
The Plot of The Seven Deadly Sins
Early Editions of Shakespeare's Plays

THOMAS CAMPION (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from A Book of Ayres
3 ("I care not for these ladies")
5 ("My love hath vow'd he will forsake me")
6 ("When to her lute Corrina sings")
8 ("It fell on a summer's day")
21 ("Come, let us sound with melody the praises")
The Writer to his Book from Observations in the Art of English Poesy
The First Chapter, Entreating of Numbers in General
The Second Chapter, Declaring the Unaptness of Rhyme in Poesy
The Third Chapter, Of Our English Numbers in General
The English Sapphic

THOMAS NASHE (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
The Choice of Valentines, Or the Merry Ballad of Nash His Dildo
The Unfortunate Traveller

ISABELLA WHITNEY 690
Is. W. to Her Unconstant Lover 691
The Admonition by the Author to All Young Gentlewomen, and to All Other Kinds of Maids Being in Love 693
A Careful Complaint by the Unfortunate Author 695
In Answer to Comfort Her, by Showing His Haps to Be Harder 696
A Reply to the Same 696
The Manner of Her Will 697
The Manner of Her Will, and What She Left to London and All Those in It at Her Departing 698

CONTEXTS: "UNCONSTANT WOMEN," "EXCELLENT WOMEN":
A ~~SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY DEBATE~~ 703 from John Donne, Paradoxes and Problems 704 from Paradox 1: "A Defense of Women's Inconstancy" 704
Paradox 6: "That it is Possible to Find Some Virtue in Some Women" 705 Problem 6: "Why Hath the Common Opinion Afforded Women Souls?" 705 from Joseph Swetnam, The Arraignment of Lewd, Idle, Froward, and Unconstant Women 706

  from Chapter 2 706
from Rachel Speght, A Muzzle for Melastomus 707 from Ester Sowernam, Ester Hath Hanged Haman: An Answer to a Lewd Pamphlet, Entitled The Arraignment of Women 710
  Chapter 2 710
  Chapter 4 711
  Chapter 6 711
  Chapter 7 712
  Chapter 8 712
from Owen Felltham, Resolves 714
  "Of Woman" 714

BEN JONSON 716
To the Reader 718
To My Book 718
On Something that Walks Somewhere 718
To William Camden 719
On My First Daughter 719
To John Donne 719
On My First Son 719
On Lucy, Countess of Bedford 720
Inviting a Friend to Supper 720
To Penshurst 721
Song: To Celia 722
To the Memory of My Beloved, The Author, Mr. William Shakespeare, And What He Hath Left Us 723
Ode to Himself 724
My Picture Left in Scotland 725
To the Immortal Memory and Friendship of That Noble Pair, Sir Lucius Cary and Sir H. Morison 725
Karolin's Song 727
Hymn to Cynthia 727
Clerimont's Song 728
The Masque of Blackness (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Volpone: or, The Fox 728
IN CONTEXT: Sources for Volpone 790 from Aesop, Fables 790 from Thomas Wilson, Art of Rhetoric 790 from Horace, Satires 790
    2.5.48–63 790 from Lucian, Gallus 791 from Juvenal, Satires 792
    Satire 10, 2.188–241; 2.434–56 792

IN CONTEXT: Venice: Mountebanks and Courtesans 794 from Thomas Coryate, Coryat's Crudities 794 Pleasure Reconciled to Virtue (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Timber, or, Discoveries (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Conversations with William Drummond of Hawthornden (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

THOMAS DEKKER 796
The Shoemaker's Holiday (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from "The Wonderful Year" 798
Additional Selections from Thomas Dekker's Plague Pamphlets (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from "News from Graves-end: Sent to Nobody" from "The Raven's Almanac"

THOMAS MIDDLETON AND THOMAS DEKKER (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
The Roaring Girl

JOHN DONNE 807
from Songs and Sonnets 809
The Good-Morrow 809
Song ("Go, and catch a falling star") 809
Woman's Constancy 809
The Sun Rising 810
The Canonization 810
Song ("Sweetest love, I do not go") 811
Air and Angels 812
Break of Day 812
The Anniversary 812
Twicknam Garden 813
A Valediction: of Weeping 813
The Flea 814
A Nocturnal upon St. Lucy's Day, Being the Shortest Day 814
The Bait 815
The Apparition 815
A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning 816
The Ecstasy 816
The Relic 817
from Elegies 818
1: Jealousy 818
8: The Comparison 818
19: To His Mistress Going to Bed 819
from Satires 820
3 ("Kind pity chokes my spleen; brave scorn forbids") 820

from Verse Letters 822
  To Sir Henry Wotton 822
  An Anatomy of the World: The First Anniversary 823 from Holy Sonnets 829
  2 ("As due by many titles I resign") 829
  5 ("I am a little world made cunningly") 829
  6 ("This is my play's last scene, here heavens appoint") 829
  7 ("At the round earth's imagined corners, blow") 830
  9 ("If poisonous minerals, and if that tree") 830
  10 ("Death be not proud, though some have called thee") 830
  13 ("What if this present were the world's last night?") 830
  14 ("Batter my heart, three personed God; for you") 832
  18 ("Show me, dear Christ, Thy spouse, so bright and clear") 832
  19 ("Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one") 832
Good Friday, 1613. Riding Westward 833
A Hymn to God the Father 833
Hymn to God, My God, in My Sickness 834 from Devotions 835
  Meditation 17 835

THOMAS CORYATE (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
  from Coryat's Crudities

ROBERT BURTON (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from The Anatomy of Melancholy

JOHN WEBSTER 836
  The Duchess of Malfi 837

JOHN SMITH (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from The General History of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles from The Third Book from Chapter 1 [Voyage to Virginia and first weeks there] from Chapter 2: What Happened Till the First Supply from Chapter 8: Captain Smith's Journey to Pamunkey from The Fourth Book
      John Smith's Relation to Queen Anne of Pocahontas [Smith's Farewell to Virginia] from The Sixth Book
      The Description of New England

WAHUNSONACOCK (POWHATAN) (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
  [Discourse of Peace and War] (from John Smith, General History of Virginia)
    Book 3, Chapter 8

ELIZABETH CARY (VISCOUNTESS FALKLAND) (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from The Tragedy of Mariam
[Note to instructors: The complete Tragedy of Mariam is among over 400 available editions from Broadview, any one of which may be packaged together with this anthology volume at no extra cost to the student.]

LADY MARY WROTH 889
from Pamphilia to Amphilanthus 890
1 ("When night's black mantle could most darkness prove") 890
6 ("My pain, still smothered in my grieved breast") 890
7 ("Love leave to urge, thou know'st thou hast the hand") 891
13 ("Dear, famish not what you your self gave food") 891
14 ("Am I thus conquered? have I lost the powers") 891
15 ("Truly poor Night thou welcome art to me") 891
22 ("Like to the Indians, scorched with the sun") 891
23 ("When every one to pleasing pastime hies") 892
35 ("False hope which feeds but to destroy, and spill") 892
Song [Love, a child, is ever crying] 892
A Crown of Sonnets Dedicated to Love 892
77 ("In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?") 892
78 ("Is to leave all, and take the thread of love") 893
79 ("His flames are joys, his bands true lovers' might") 893
80 ("And be in his brave court a glorious light") 893
81 ("And burn, yet burning you will love the smart") 893
82 ("He may our prophet, and our tutor prove") 893
83 ("How blest be they, then, who his favours prove") 894
84 ("He that shuns love, doth love himself the less") 894
85 ("But where they may return with honour's grace") 894
86 ("Be from the court of Love, and Reason torn") 894
87 ("Unprofitably pleasing, and unsound") 894
88 ("Be giv'n to him who triumphs in his right") 895
89 ("Free from all fogs, but shining fair, and clear") 895
90 ("Except my heart, which you bestowed before") 895
Railing Rhymes Returned upon the Author by Mistress Mary Wroth 895
IN CONTEXT: The Occasion of "Railing Rhymes" 896
Edward Denny, Baron of Waltham, "To Pamphilia from the Father-in-Law of Seralius" 896

THOMAS HOBBES 897
from Leviathan; Or the Matter, Form, & Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil 898
The Introduction 898
Chapter 13: Of the Natural Condition of Mankind as Concerning Their Felicity and Misery 899

JOHN WINTHROP (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
  A Model of Christian Charity

WILLIAM BRADFORD (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Of Plymouth Plantation

CONTEXTS: GOVERNANCE, OBEDIENCE, DOMINION (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from The Distaff Gospels
  from The Gospel of Dame Ysengrine du Glay from Thomas Elyot, The Book Named The Governor from Part 1: The signification of a public weal, and why it is called in Latin Respublica from Part 2: That one sovereign governor ought to be in a public weal, and what damage hath happened by lacking one sovereign governor from Henry VIII and Thomas Cromwell, Acts Presented to Parliament from the Preamble to the Act in Restraint of Appeals, 1533 from The Act of Supremacy (1534) from John Ponet, A Short Treatise of Political Power from Richard Hooker, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity Images of Elizabethan Authority from James I (James VI of Scotland), The True Law of Free Monarchies from Robert Filmer, Observations Concerning the Original of Government, Upon Mr. Hobbes's Leviathan, etc. from Margaret Fell, "Women's Speaking Justified, Proved, and Allowed of by the Scriptures"

ANNE CLIFFORD (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
  from The Knole Diary 1603
    1616 (May)
    1617 (January)

ROBERT HERRICK 902
  The Argument of His Book 903
  Delight in Disorder 903
  His Farewell to Sack 904
  Corinna's Going A-Maying 905
  To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time 906
  The Hock-Cart, or Harvest Home 906
  Upon Julia's Clothes 907

GEORGE HERBERT 908
  The Altar 909
  Redemption 909
  Easter Wings 910

Affliction (1) 911
Prayer (1) 912
The Temper (1) 912
Jordan (1) 912
Church-Monuments 913
The Windows 913
Denial 914
Vanity (1) 914
Virtue 915
The Pearl 915
Man 916
Jordan (2) 916
Time 917
The Bunch of Grapes 917
The Collar 918
The Pulley 918
The Flower 919
Discipline 919
Death 920
Love (3) 920
from A Priest to the Temple, or The Country Parson (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

THOMAS BROWNE (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Religio Medici

ROGER WILLIAMS (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from A Key into the Language of America
Chapter 16: Of the Earth, and the fruits thereof
Chapter 20: Of their nakedness and clothing
Chapter 21: Of their religion, the soul, etc.
Chapter 23: Of marriage
Chapter 29: Of their war, etc.
from The Bloody Tenet of Persecution
A Letter to the Town of Providence
Testimony of Roger Williams relative to his first coming into the Narragansett country

ANNE BRADSTREET (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Prologue
An Elegy Upon that Honourable and Renowned Knight, Sir Philip Sidney, who was ultimately slain at the Seige of Zutphen, Anno 1586
Contemplations
The Author to Her Book
Before the Birth of One of Her Children
To My Dear and Loving Husband
A Letter to Her Husband, Absent upon Public Employment

In Memory of My Dear Grand-Child, Elizabeth Bradstreet, Who Deceased August, 1665 Being a Year and Half Old
In Memory of My Dear Grand-Child Anne Bradstreet, Who Deceased June 20, 1669, Being Three Years and Seven Months Old
On My Dear Grand-Child Simon Bradstreet, Who Died on 16 November, 1669, Being but a Month and One Day Old
Some Verses upon the Burning of Our House July 10th, 1666 from Meditations Divine and Moral

ANDREW MARVELL 921
The Coronet 922
Bermudas 923
A Dialogue between the Soul and Body 923
The Nymph Complaining for the Death of Her Fawn 924
To His Coy Mistress 926
The Picture of Little T.C. in a Prospect of Flowers 927
The Mower against Gardens 927
Damon the Mower 928
The Garden 930
An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland 931

MARGARET CAVENDISH 934
The Poetess's Hasty Resolution 936
An Excuse for so Much Writ Upon My Verses 936
A World Made by Atoms 936
The Four Principal Figured Atoms Make the Four Elements, as Square, Round, Long, and Sharp 937
What Atoms Make a Palsy, or Apoplexy 937
All Things Are Governed by Atoms 937
The Motion of the Blood 938
Of Many Worlds in this World 938
A World in an Earring 938
A Dialogue betwixt the Body and the Mind 939
A Dialogue between an Oak, and a Man Cutting Him Down 940
A Dialogue betwixt Peace, and War 942
Earth's Complaint 943
The Hunting of the Hare 943
Nature's Cook 944
A Woman Drest by Age 945
Of the Theme of Love 945
IN CONTEXT: Lucretius and Atomism (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Lucretius, On the Nature of Things
        from Book 1
        from Book 2

Katherine Philips 946
  A Married State 947
  Upon the Double Murder of King Charles 948
  On the Third of September, 1651 948
  To My Excellent Lucasia, on Our Friendship 949
  Friendship's Mystery, To My Dearest Lucasia 949
  On the Death of My First and Dearest Child, Hector Philips 950
  Friendship in Emblem, or the Seal, To My Dearest Lucasia 950

Royalist and "Cavalier" Poetry 952
  Thomas Carew 952
    The Spring 952
    A Song 953
    An Elegy upon the Death of the Dean of Paul's, Dr. John Donne 953
  Sir John Suckling 954
    Song 954
    A Ballad. Upon a Wedding 955
    "Out upon it, I have loved" 957
  Richard Lovelace 958
    To Lucasta, Going to the Wars 958
    To Althea, From Prison (Song) 958
  William Strode 958
    On Westwell Downs 958
    On a Gentlewoman Walking in the Snow 959
  Thomas Randolph 959
    Upon the Loss of His Little Finger 959
  Richard Corbett 960
    Upon Fairford Windows 960
  Edmund Waller 960
    Go, Lovely Rose! 960
  Abraham Cowley 961
    Of Wit 961
  Henry Vaughan 962
    Regeneration 962
    The World 963
  Richard Crashaw 964
    Saint Mary Magdalene or, The Weeper 964

Izaak Walton (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
  The Compleat Angler, or, The Contemplative Man's Recreation
    Chapter 1: A Conference betwixt an Angler, a Falconer, and a Hunter, each Commending His Recreation

JOHN MILTON 968
L'Allegro 970
Il Penseroso 973
Lycidas 976
Sonnets 979
7 ("How soon hath Time the subtle thief of youth") 979
16: To the Lord General Cromwell 980
18: On the Late Massacre in Piedmont 980
19 ("When I consider how my light is spent") 980
23 ("Methought I saw my late espoused saint") 981 from Areopagitica: A Speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, to the Parliament of England 981 from Paradise Lost 990
The Verse 992
Argument to Book 1 992
Book 1 992
Argument to Book 2 1005
Book 2 1005
Argument to Book 3 1019
from Book 3 1020
Argument to Book 4 1025
Book 4 1025
Argument to Book 5 1039
from Book 5 1039
Argument to Book 6 1040
Argument to Book 7 1041
from Book 7 1041
Argument to Book 8 1041
from Book 8 1042
Argument to Book 9 1046
Book 9 1046
Argument to Book 10 1061
Book 10 1061
Argument to Book 11 1076
Argument to Book 12 1076
from Book 12 1076
IN CONTEXT: Illustrating Paradise Lost 1079
Samson Agonistes 1082
IN CONTEXT: The Biblical Version of the Samson Story 1108

CONTEXTS: LEVELLERS, DIGGERS, RANTERS, AND COVENANTERS 1113
Information from the Scottish Nation 1116
The Putney Debates (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
William Walwyn, The Bloody Project 1117

from Abiezer Coppe, A Fiery Flying Roll 1125
  The Preface 1125
  from A Second Fiery Flying Roll 1126
    Chapter 3 1126
Gerrard Winstanley, A Declaration from the Poor Oppressed People of England 1128
The Diggers' Song 1132

CONTEXTS: CIVIL WAR (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Queen Henrietta Maria, "The Queen's Letter Sent to the King's Most Excellent Majesty from Holland"
Statement of Charles I to the High Court
The Death Warrant of Charles I from Oliver Cromwell, Letters from Ireland
  For the Honorable William Lenthal, 17 September 1649 from Eikon Basilike
  4: Upon the Insolency of the Tumults
  12: Upon the Rebellion, and Troubles in Ireland
  19: Upon the various events of the War; Victories, and Defeats from John Milton, Eikonoklastes
  12: Upon the Rebellion in Ireland from Lucy Hutchinson, Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson from Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, The History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England
  [The Character of Cromwell—A Royalist Appraisal] from Gerrard Winstanley, "A New Year's Gift Sent to Parliament and Army"

APPENDICES

READING POETRY 1134

MAPS 1154

MONARCHS AND PRIME MINISTERS 1158

GLOSSARY OF TERMS 1163

TEXTS AND CONTEXTS: CHRONOLOGICAL CHART (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
BIBLIOGRAPHY (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

PERMISSIONS ACKNOWLEDGMENTS 1186

INDEX OF FIRST LINES 1189

INDEX OF AUTHORS AND TITLES 1194

PREFACE

A FRESH APPROACH

The publication of the first edition of this anthology in 2006 was widely hailed as an exciting achievement, with many academics concluding that its comprehensiveness, its consistency, its visual appeal, and its fresh approach made the Broadview the "new standard" in anthologies of British literature. We have also been taking a fresh approach in issuing new editions of the anthology's volumes. Rather than publishing new editions of each of the six volumes simultaneously, we are publishing new editions of the individual volumes at the rate of approximately one per year. Each volume thus appears in a new edition roughly every six years. We recognize that our two main competitors have in recent years made it a practice to issue new editions much more frequently than that, but our feeling is that it is better to allow several years to elapse between editions—not least of all, as a new edition may represent a considerable inconvenience to academics teaching from the anthology. (The approach also has real practical advantages for a smaller publisher such as Broadview; rather than gearing up for a massive process of revision every few years and then gearing down again in the wake of publication, we can proceed at a steady pace with the work of updating and revising.)

The third edition of this volume features a great deal of new material. Newly prepared, for example, is a substantial selection from Baldassare Castiglione's The Courtier (Il Cortegiano), presented in Thomas Hoby's influential early modern English translation. Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy is another major addition. Also new to the anthology are excerpts from The Wonderful Year, Thomas Dekker's pamphlet chronicling the plague that struck London in the year of Elizabeth I's death. We have considerably expanded our representation of Elizabeth I's own writings and speeches, as well as providing several more cantos from Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene and adding selections from Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia. We have broadened our coverage, too, to include substantial selections of Irish, Gaelic Scottish, and Welsh literature. (Perhaps most notable of the numerous authors in this section are two extraordinary Welsh poets, Dafydd ap Gwilym and Gwerful Mechain.) Mary Sidney Herbert's writings now appear in the bound book instead of on the companion website. And Margaret Cavendish, whose work has always appeared in the third volume of the anthology, is now featured in this volume as well. This edition also offers new contextual materials: Ian Munro has prepared a sampling of "Tudor and Stuart Humor," and a section providing context on "Levellers, Diggers, Ranters, and Covenanters" has been prepared by Joseph Black. New materials on emblem books and on manuscript culture have also been added to the "Culture: A Portfolio" contexts section.

Cuts, of course, have been necessary to make room for this new material. To this end, we have removed Shakespeare's King Lear from the bound book—a decision made in recognition of the fact that those who wish to teach a Shakespeare play will always be likely to prefer a selection other than the one or two choices provided in an anthology. King Lear, Twelfth Night, and The Merchant of Venice remain available as part of the anthology's online component; for those who prefer their Shakespeare in bound-book form, we also offer those three in bound-book "BABL Editions"—as well as offering stand-alone editions of several other Shakespeare plays in ISE/Broadview editions. (As with all Broadview editions, any one of these may be bundled together with the anthology in a shrink-wrapped package, at no extra charge to the student.) Our hope is that by taking this approach we will be able to provide instructors with a Shakespeare play (or plays) that they would really like to teach, without taking up space in the anthology with plays that they have no interest in teaching.

One advantage to the anthology's website component is that it can be updated continually; a range of additions to the website are planned in association with this new edition. New for this volume, for example, is

Thomas Deloney's subversive prose narrative Jack of Newbury, in an edition by Peter C. Herman. Among other major additions, Diane Jakacki has edited Thomas Dekker's popular play The Shoemaker's Holiday, while Carol Blessing has prepared the complete text of Aemilia Lanyer's Salve Deus Rex Judeaorum.

We are also expanding our selection of transatlantic material. The inclusion of writers such as John Smith, William Bradford, and Anne Bradstreet on the website component opens up the possibility of using The Broadview Anthology for courses with a transatlantic focus.

As before, Joseph Black and Anne Lake Prescott have taken the lead in preparing the material for this volume—both in making the selections and in much of the hands-on editorial work. But; again as with the first edition, many people outside the General Editors group have also made important contributions to the preparation of the material. For this volume, apart from the contributors mentioned above, particular thanks should go to Matthieu Boyd, Rachel Eisendrath, Lydia K. Lake, Phil Palmer, Joseph Rezek, Martha Stoddard-Holmes, Rebecca Totaro, and David Townsend.

Enlisting the help of a substantial number of people is entirely consistent with the approach we have followed from the start with The Broadview Anthology. Rather than dividing up the vast amount of work entailed in preparing such a large anthology among a relatively small number of academics, and asking each of them to handle on their own the work of choosing, annotating, and preparing introductions to texts in their own areas of specialization, we chose to involve a large number of contributors in the process (as the pages following the title page to this volume attest), and to encourage a high degree of collaboration at every level. First and foremost are the distinguished academics who serve as our General Editors for the project, but in all there have literally been hundreds of people involved at various stages in researching, drafting headnotes or annotations, reviewing material, editing material, and carrying out the work of designing and typesetting the texts and other materials. That approach allowed us to draw on a diverse range of talent, and to prepare the first edition of a large anthology with extraordinary efficiency. It has also facilitated the maintenance of a high degree of consistency. Material has been reviewed and revised in-house at Broadview, by outside editors, by a variety of academics with an extraordinarily diverse range of backgrounds and academic specialities, and by our team of General Editors for the project as a whole. The aim has been not only to ensure accuracy but also to make sure that the same standards be applied throughout the anthology to matters such as coverage provided in introductions, level of annotation, tone of writing, and student accessibility.

As with the first and second editions, several core principles have guided the selection of texts for this volume. We have endeavored to provide a selection that is broadly representative, while also being mindful of the importance of choosing texts that have the capacity to engage readers' interest today. We have for the most part made it a policy to include long works in their entirety or not at all; readers will find complete in The Broadview Anthology works such as Utopia, "Beachy Head," Lady Susan, The History of Mary Prince, and In Memoriam that are often excerpted in (or omitted from) other anthologies. Where editions of works are available separately in our acclaimed Broadview Editions series, we have often decided to omit them from the anthology, on the grounds that those wishing to teach one or more such works may easily do so in a combination package with the anthology.

Any discussion of what is distinctive about The Broadview Anthology of British Literature must focus above all on the contents. In every volume of the anthology there is material that is distinctive and fresh—including not only selections by lesser-known writers but also less familiar selections from canonical writers. The anthology takes a fresh approach too to a great many canonical texts. The first volume of the anthology includes not only Roy Liuzza's translation of Beowulf (widely acclaimed as the most engaging and reliable translation available), but also new translations by Liuzza of many other works of Old English poetry and prose. Unique to the first volume of this anthology are a new verse translation of Judith by Stephen Glosecki, and new translations by Claire Waters of several of the Lais of Marie de France. And so on through all six volumes.

In a number of these cases the distinctive form of the anthology facilitates the presentation of content in an engaging and practical fashion. Notably, the adoption of a two-column format allows for some translations (the Marie de France Lais, the James Winny translation of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, poetry in Old Irish and other Celtic languages) to be presented in parallel column format alongside the original texts, allowing readers to experience something of the flavor of the original, while providing convenient access to an accessible translation. Similarly, passages from four translations of the Bible are laid out parallel to each other for ready comparison.

The large trim-size, two-column format also allows for greater flexibility in the presentation of visual materials. Throughout our intent is to make this an anthology that is fully alive to the connections between literary and visual culture, from the discussion of the CHI-RHO page of the Lindisfarne Gospels in the first volume of the anthology (and the accompanying color illustration) to the inclusion in Volume 6 of a number of selections (including Graham Greene's "The Basement Room," Tom Stoppard's "Professional Foul," and several skits from "Monty Python's Flying Circus") that may be discussed in connection with film or television versions. Along the way appear several full-page illustrations from the Ellesmere manuscript of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales and illustrations to a wide variety of other works, from Robinson Crusoe and Gulliver's Travels to The Adventure of the Speckled Band and The Road to Wigan Pier.

CONTEXTUAL MATERIALS

Visual materials are also an important component of the background materials that form an important part of the anthology. These materials are presented in two ways. Several "Contexts" sections on particular topics or themes appear in each volume of the anthology, presented independent of any particular text or author. These include broadly based groupings of material on such topics as "Religion and Spiritual Life," "Print Culture," "India and the Orient," "The Abolition of Slavery," "The New Art of Photography," and "The End of Empire." The groups of "In Context" materials each relate to a particular text or author. They range from the genealogical tables provided as a supplement to Beowulf; to materials on "The Eighteenth-Century Sexual Imagination" (presented in conjunction with Haywood's Fantomina); to a selection of materials relating to the Peterloo massacre (presented in conjunction with Percy Shelley's "The Mask of Anarchy"); to materials on "'The Vilest Scramble for Loot' in Central Africa" (presented in conjunction with Conrad's "An Outpost of Progress"). For the most part these contextual materials are, as the word suggests, included with a view to setting texts in their broader literary, historical, and cultural contexts; in some cases, however, the materials included in "Contexts" sections are themselves literary works of a high order. The autobiographical account by Eliza M. of nineteenth-century life in Cape Town, for example (included in the section in Volume 5 on "Race and Empire"), is as remarkable for its literary qualities as it is for the light it sheds on the realities of colonial life. In the inclusion of texts such as these, as well as in other ways, the anthology aims to encourage readers to explore the boundaries of the literary and the non-literary, and the issue of what constitutes a "literary text."

WOMEN'S PLACE

A central element of the broadening of the canon of British literature in recent generations has of course been a great increase in the attention paid to texts by women writers. As one might expect from a publisher that has played an important role in making neglected works by women writers widely available, this anthology reflects the broadening of the canon quantitatively, by including a substantially larger number of women writers than have earlier anthologies of British literature. But it also reflects this broadening in other ways. In many anthologies of literature (anthologies of British literature, to be sure, but also anthologies of literature of a variety of other sorts) women writers are set somewhat apart, referenced in introductions and headnotes only in relation to issues of gender, and treated as important only for the fact of their being women writers. The Broadview Anthology strenuously resists such segregation; while women writers are of course discussed in relation to gender issues, their texts are also presented and discussed alongside those by men in a wide variety of other contexts, including seventeenth-century religious and political controversies, the abolitionist movement, and World War I pacifism. Texts by women writers are front and center in the discussion of the development of realism in nineteenth-century fiction. And when it comes to the twentieth century, both Virginia Woolf and Dorothy Richardson are included alongside James Joyce as practitioners of groundbreaking modernist narrative techniques.

"BRITISH," "ENGLISH," "IRISH," "SCOTTISH," "WELSH," "OTHER"

The broadening of English Studies, in conjunction with the expansion and subsequent contraction of British power and influence around the world, has considerably complicated the issue of exactly how inclusive anthologies should be. In several respects this anthology (like its two main competitors) is significantly more inclusive than its title suggests, including a number of non-British writers whose works connect in important ways with the traditions of British literature. We endeavor to portray the fluid and multilingual reality of the medieval period through the inclusion not only of works in Old and Middle English but also of works in Latin, in French, in Irish, in Welsh, and in Scots. This approach extends into the early modern period with the inclusion of works from the literatures of Ireland, Gaelic Scotland, and Wales.

In later periods the word "British" becomes deeply problematic in different respects, but on balance we have preferred it to the only obvious alternative, "English." There are several objections to the latter in this context. Perhaps most obviously, "English" excludes authors or texts not only from Ireland but also from Scotland and from Wales, both of which retain to this day cultures quite distinct from that of the English. "English literature," of course, may also be taken to mean "literature written in English," but since the anthology does not cover all literature written in English (most obviously in excluding American literature), the ambiguity would not in this case be helpful.

The inclusion of Irish writers presents a related but even more tangled set of issues. At the beginning of the period covered by the six volumes of this anthology we find works, such as the Book of Kells, that may have been created in what is now England, in what is now Scotland, in what is now Ireland—or in some combination of these. Through most of the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries almost the whole of Ireland was under British control—but for the most part unwillingly. In the period covered in the last of the six volumes Ireland was partitioned, with Northern Ireland becoming a part of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland declared independent of Britain on 6 December 1921. Less than two months earlier, James Joyce had completed Ulysses, which was first published as a complete work the following year (in Paris, not in Britain). It would be obviously absurd to regard Joyce as a British writer up to just before the publication of Ulysses, and an Irish writer thereafter. And arguably he and other Irish writers should never be regarded as British, whatever the politics of the day. If on no other grounds than their overwhelming influence on and connection to the body of literature written in the British Isles, however, we have included Irish writers—among them Swift, Sheridan, Wilde, Shaw, Beckett, Bowen, Muldoon, and Heaney as well as Joyce—throughout this anthology. We have also endeavored to give a real sense in the introductions to the six volumes of the anthology, in the headnotes to individual authors, and in the annotations to the texts themselves, of the ways in which the histories and the cultures of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, much as they interact with one another, are also distinct.

Also included in this anthology are texts by writers from areas that are far removed geographically from the British Isles but that are or have been British possessions. Writers such as Mary Rowlandson, Olaudah Equiano, and Phillis Wheatley are included, as they spent all or most of their lives living in what were then British colonial possessions. Writers who came of age in an independent United States, on the other hand, are not included, unless (like T.S. Eliot) they subsequently put down roots in Britain and became important British literary figures. Substantial grey areas, of course, surround such issues. One might well argue, for example, that Henry James merits inclusion in an anthology of British literature, or that W.H. Auden and Thom Gunn are more American poets than British ones. But the chosen subject matter of James's work has traditionally been considered to mark him as having remained an American writer, despite having spent almost two-thirds of his life in England. And both Auden and Gunn so clearly made a mark in Britain before crossing the Atlantic that it would seem odd to exclude them from these pages on the grounds of their having lived the greater part of their adult lives in America. One of our competitors includes Sylvia Plath in their anthology of British literature; Plath lived in England for only five of her thirty years, though, and her poetry is generally agreed to have more in common with the traditions of Lowell, Merwin, and Sexton than with the currents of British poetry in the 1950s and '60s.

As a broad principle, we have been open to the inclusion of twentieth and twenty-first century work in English not only by writers from the British Isles but also by writers from British possessions overseas, and by writers from countries that were once British possessions and have remained a part of the British Commonwealth. In such cases we have often chosen selections that relate in one way or another to the tradition of British literature and the British colonial legacy. Of the Judith Wright poems included here, several relate to her coming to terms with the British colonial legacy in Australia; similarly, both the Margaret Atwood and the Alice Munro selections include work in which these Canadian authors attempt to recreate imaginatively the experience of British emigrants to Canada in the nineteenth century; the Chinua Achebe story in the anthology concerns the divide between British colonial culture and traditional Nigerian culture; and so on. For convenience we have also grouped most of the post-World War II non-British authors together, following the "Contexts: The End of Empire" section. (For the most part, the table of contents for the anthology is arranged chronologically according to the birthdate of each author.)

THE HISTORY OF LANGUAGE, AND OF PRINT CULTURE

Among the liveliest discussions we had at meetings of our General Editors were those concerning the issue of whether or not to bring spelling and punctuation into accord with present-day practice. We finally decided that, in the interests of making the anthology accessible to the introductory student, we should in most cases bring spelling and punctuation in line with present-day practice. An important exception has been made for works in which modernizing spelling and punctuation would alter the meaning or the aural and metrical qualities. In practice this means that works before the late sixteenth century tend to be presented either in their original form or in translation, whereas later texts tend to have spelling and punctuation modernized. But where spelling and punctuation choices in later texts are known (or believed on reliable authority) to represent conscious choice on the part of the author rather than simply the common practice of the time, we have in those cases, too, made an exception and retained the original spelling and punctuation. (Among these are texts by Edmund Spenser; by William Cowper; by William Blake, John Clare, and several other poets of the Romantic era; by George Bernard Shaw; and by contemporary figures such as Linton Kwesi Johnson.)

Beyond this, we all agreed that we should provide for readers a real sense of the development of the language and of print culture. To that end we have included in each volume examples of texts in their original form—in some cases through the use of pages shown in facsimile, in others by providing short passages in which spelling and punctuation have not been modernized. A list of these appears near the beginning of each volume of the anthology.

We have also included a section of the history of the language as part of the introduction to each volume. And throughout the anthology we include materials—visual as well as textual—relating to the history of print culture.

A DYNAMIC AND FLEXIBLE ANTHOLOGY

Almost all major book publishing projects nowadays are accompanied by an adjunct website, and most large-scale anthologies are accompanied by websites that provide additional background materials in electronic form. The website component of this anthology, on the other hand, is precisely that—a component of the anthology itself. The notion of a website of this sort grew organically out of the process of trying to winnow down the contents of the first edition of the anthology to a manageable level—the point at which all the material to be included would fit within the covers of bound books that would not be overwhelmingly heavy. And we simply could not do it. After we had made a very substantial round of cuts we were still faced with a table of contents in which each volume was at least 200 or 300 pages longer than our agreed-upon maximum. Our solution was not to try to cut anything more, but rather to select a range of material to be made available in a website component of the anthology. This material is in every way produced according to the same high standards of the material in the bound books; the editorial standards, the procedures for annotation, the author introductions, and the page design and layout—all are the same. The texts on the web, in short, are not "extra" materials; they are an integral part of the full anthology. In accordance with that principle, we have been careful to include a wide range of texts by lesser-known writers within the bound books, and a number of texts by canonical writers within the web component of the anthology.

The latter may be used in a variety of ways. Most obviously, readings from the web component are available to any purchaser of the book. Instructors who adopt The Broadview Anthology of British Literature as a course text are also granted permission to reproduce any web material for which Broadview holds copyright in a supplementary coursepack. An alternative for instructors who want to "create their own" anthology is to visit the "Custom Texts" page on the Broadview website or contact the publisher directly; Broadview can make available to students through their university bookstore a custom-made coursepack with precisely the desired materials included. Other options are available too. Volumes of the anthology itself may of course be shrink-wrapped together at special prices in any desired combination. They may also be combined in a shrink-wrapped package with one of the over 300 volumes in the Broadview Editions series, at no additional cost to the student (or with more than one volume for a modest additional charge).

We anticipate that over the years the web-based component of the anthology will continue to grow—every year there will be a greater choice of web-based texts in the anthology. But we never foresee a day when the web will be the only option; we expect physical books always to remain central to Broadview's approach to publishing.

THE BROADVIEW LIST

One of the reasons we were able to bring a project of this sort to fruition in such a relatively short time was that we were able to draw on the resources of the full Broadview list: the many titles in the Broadview Editions series, and also the considerable range of other Broadview anthologies. As the contributors' pages and the permissions acknowledgments pages indicate, a number of Broadview authors have acted as contributing editors to this volume, providing material from other volumes that has been adapted to suit the needs of the present anthology; we gratefully acknowledge their contribution.

As it has turned out, the number of cases where we have been able to draw on the resources of the Broadview list in the full sense, using in these pages texts and annotations in very much the same form in which they appear elsewhere, has been relatively small; whether because of an issue such as the level of textual modernization or one of style of annotation, we have more often than not ended up deciding that the requirements of this anthology were such that we could not use material from another Broadview source as-is. But even in these cases we often owe a debt of gratitude to the many academics who have edited outstanding editions and anthologies for Broadview. For even where we have not drawn directly from them, we have often been inspired by them—inspired to think of a wider range of texts as possibilities than we might otherwise have done, inspired to think of contextual materials in places where we might otherwise not have looked, inspired by the freshness of approach that so many of these titles exemplify.

EDITORIAL PROCEDURES AND CONVENTIONS, APPARATUS

The in-house set of editorial guidelines for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature runs to over 40 pages, covering everything from conventions for the spacing of marginal notes, to the use of small caps for the abbreviations CE and BCE, to the approach we have adopted to references in author headnotes to name changes. Perhaps the most important core principle in the introductions to the various volumes, in the headnotes for each author, in the introductions in "Contexts" sections, and in annotations throughout the anthology, is to endeavor to provide a sufficient amount of information to enable students to read and interpret these texts, but without making evaluative judgments or imposing particular interpretations. In practice that is all a good deal more challenging than it sounds; it is often extremely difficult to describe why a particular author is considered to be important without using language that verges on the interpretive or the evaluative. But it is a fine line that we have all agreed is worth trying to walk; we hope that readers will find that the anthology achieves an appropriate balance.

ANNOTATION: It is also often difficult to make judgments as to where it is appropriate to provide an explanatory annotation for a word or phrase. Our policy has been to annotate where we feel it likely that most first- or second-year students are likely to have difficulty understanding the denotative meaning. (We have made it a practice not to provide notes discussing connotative meanings.) But in practice the vocabularies and levels of verbal facility of first- and second-year students may vary enormously, both from institution to institution and within any given college or university class. On the whole, we provide somewhat more annotation than our competitors, and somewhat less interpretation. Again, we hope that readers will find that the anthology has struck an appropriate balance.

THE ETHICS AND POLITICS OF ANNOTATION: On one issue regarding annotation we have felt that principles are involved that go beyond the pedagogical. Most anthologies of British literature allow many words or phrases of a racist, sexist, anti-Semitic, or homophobic nature either to pass entirely without comment, or to be glossed with apologist comments that leave the impression that such comments were excusable in the past, and may even be unobjectionable in the present. Where derogatory comments about Jewish people and money-lending are concerned, for example, anthologies often leave the impression that money-lending was a pretty unsavory practice that Jewish people entered by choice; it has been all too rare to provide readers with any sense of the degree to which English society consistently discriminated against Jews, expelling them entirely for several centuries, requiring them to wear physical marks identifying their Jewish status, prohibiting them from entering most professions, and so on. The Broadview Anthology endeavors in such cases, first of all, not to allow such words and phrases to pass without comment; and second, to gloss without glossing over.

DATES: We make it a practice to include the date when a work was first made public, whether publication in print or, in the case of dramatic works, made public through the first performance of the play. Where that date is known to differ substantially from the date of composition, a note to this effect is included in parentheses. With medieval works, where there is no equivalent to the "publication" of later eras, where texts often vary greatly from one manuscript copy to another, and where knowledge as to date of original composition is usually imprecise, the date that appears at the end of each work is an estimate of the date of the work's origin in the written form included in the anthology. Earlier oral or written versions are of course in some cases real possibilities.

TEXTS: Where translations appear in this anthology, a note at the bottom of the first page indicates what translation is being used. Similar notes also address overall textual issues where choice of copy text is particularly significant. Reliable editions of most works are listed in the bibliography for the anthology, which is included as part of the website component rather than in the bound books, to facilitate ready revision. (In addition to information as to reliable editions, the bibliography provides for each author and for each of the six periods select lists of important or useful historical and critical works.) Copyright information for texts not in the public domain, however, is provided within the bound books in a section listing Permissions Acknowledgments.

INTRODUCTIONS: In addition to the introductory headnotes for each author included in the anthology, each "Contexts" section includes a substantial introduction, and each volume includes an introduction to the period as a whole. These introductions to the six volumes of the anthology endeavor to provide a sense not only of the broad picture of literary developments in the period, but also of the historical, social, and political background, and of the cultural climate. Readers should be cautioned that, while there is inevitably some overlap between information presented here and information presented in the author headnotes, an effort has been made to avoid such repetition as much as possible; the general introduction to each period should thus be read in conjunction with the author headnotes. The general introductions aim not only to provide an overview of ways in which texts and authors included in these pages may connect with one another, but also to give readers a sense of connection with a range of other writers and texts of the period.

READING POETRY: For much of the glossary and for the "Reading Poetry" section that appears as part of the appendices to each volume we have drawn on the superb material prepared by Herbert Rosengarten and Amanda Goldrick-Jones for The Broadview Anthology of Poetry; this section provides a concise but comprehensive introduction to the study of poetry. It includes discussions of diction, imagery, poetic figures, and various poetic forms, as well as offering an introduction to prosody.

MAPS: Also appearing within each of the bound books are maps especially prepared for this anthology, including, for each volume, a map of Britain showing towns and features of relevance during the pertinent period; a map showing the counties of Britain and of Ireland; maps both of the London area and of the inner city; and world maps indicating the locations of some of the significant places referenced in the anthology, and for later volumes showing the extent of Britain's overseas territories.

GLOSSARY: Some other anthologies of British literature include both glossaries of terms and essays introducing students to various political and religious categories in British history. Similar information is included in The Broadview Anthology of British Literature, but we have adopted a more integrated approach, including political and religious terms along with literary ones in a convenient general glossary. While we recognize that looking online for information of this sort is often the student's first resort (and we recognize too the value of searching the web for the wealth of background reference information available there), we also recognize that information culled from the Internet is often far from reliable; it is our intent, through this glossary, through our introductions and headnotes, and through the wealth of accessible annotation in the anthology, to provide as part of the anthology a reliable core of information in the most convenient and accessible form possible.

OTHER MATERIALS: A chart of Monarchs and Prime Ministers is also provided within these pages. A range of other adjunct materials may be accessed through The Broadview Anthology of British Literature website. "Texts and Contexts" charts for each volume provide a convenient parallel reference guide to the dates of literary texts and historical developments. "Money in Britain" provides a thumbnail sketch of the world of pounds, shillings, and pence, together with a handy guide to estimating the current equivalents of monetary values from earlier eras. And the website offers, too, a variety of aids for the student and the instructor. An up-to-date list of these appears on the site.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The names of those on the Editorial Board that shaped this anthology appear on the title page, and those of the many who contributed directly to the writing, editing, and production of the project on the following two pages. Special acknowledgment for this new edition should go to Developmental Editor Jennifer McCue, who has been instrumental in tying together all the vast threads of this project and in making it a reality; to Senior Editor Laura Buzzard, who has led the way in drafting introductory materials and annotations for the new material, and done so with great skill and unfailing grace; to Kathryn Brownsey, who has been responsible for design and typesetting, and has continued to do a superb job and to maintain her good spirits even when faced with near-impossible demands; to Joe Davies, for the range of his general knowledge as well as for his keen eye as our primary proofreader for the entire project; to Merilee Atos, who has done superb work on the vast job of clearing permissions for the anthology; and to Leslie Dema, Nora Ruddock, and Christine Handley, who have ably and enthusiastically taken the lead with marketing matters.

The academic general editors and all of us in-house at Broadview owe an enormous debt of gratitude to the hundreds of academics who have offered assistance at various stages of this project. In particular we would like to express our appreciation and our thanks to the following:

Rachel Ablow, University of Rochester
Katherine Acheson, University of Waterloo
Kenet Adamson, Southwestern Community College
Bryan Alexander, Middlebury College
Sharon Alker, Whitman College
James Allard, Brock University
Ella Allen, St. Thomas University
Rosemary Allen, Georgetown College
Laurel Amtower, San Diego State University
Robert Anderson, Oakland University
Christopher Armitage, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
Clinton Atchley, Henderson State University
Gerry Baillargeon, University of Victoria
John Baird, University of Toronto
William Baker, Northern Illinois University
Karen Bamford, Mount Allison University
John Batchelor, University of Newcastle
Lynn Batten, University of California, Los Angeles
Stephen Behrendt, University of Nebraska
Alexandra Bennett, Northern Illinois University
John Beynon, California State University, Fresno
Daniel Bivona, Arizona State University
Robert E. Bjork, Arizona State University
John Black, Moravian College
Scott Black, Villanova University
Rita Bode, Trent University
Robert Boenig, Texas A & M University
Matthew Borushko, Stonehill College
Rick Bowers, University of Alberta
Patricia Brace, Columbus State University
David Brewer, Ohio State University
William Brewer, Appalachian State University
Susan Brown, University of Guelph
Sylvia Brown, University of Alberta
Sheila Burgar, University of Victoria
Catherine Burroughs, Wells College
Rebecca Bushnell, University of Pennsylvania
Michael Calabrese, California State University
Elizabeth Campbell, Oregon State University
Gregory Castle, Arizona State University
Cynthia Caywood, University of San Diego

Jane Chance, Rice University
Ranita Chatterjee, California State University, Northridge
William Christmas, San Francisco State University
Nancy Cirillo, University of Illinois, Chicago
Eric Clarke, University of Pittsburgh
Jeanne Clegg, University of Aquila, Italy
Thomas J. Collins, University of Western Ontario
Thomas L. Cooksey, Armstrong Atlantic State University
Kevin Cope, Louisiana State University
David Cowart, University of South Carolina
Catherine Craft-Fairchild, University of St. Thomas
Roger Davis, Red Deer College
Carol Davison, University of Windsor
Alexander Dick, University of British Columbia
Len Diepeveen, Dalhousie University
Mary Dockray-Miller, Lesley College
James Doelman, Brescia University College, University of Western Ontario
Frank Donoghue, Ohio State University
Chris Downs, Saint James School
Alfred Drake, Chapman University
Ian Duncan, University of California, Berkeley
Julie Early, University of Alabama, Huntsville
Roxanne Eberle, University of Georgia
Siân Echard, University of British Columbia
Garrett Epp, University of Alberta
Joshua Eyler, Columbus State University
Ruth Feingold, St. Mary's College, Maryland
Dino Franco Felluga, Perdue University
Joanne Findon, Trent University
Larry Fink, Hardin Simmons University
Daniel Fischlin, University of Guelph
Christina Fitzgerald, University of Toledo
Verlyn Flieger, University of Maryland
Robert Forman, St. John's University
Allyson Foster, Hunter College
Lorcan Fox, University of British Columbia
Roberta Frank, Yale University
Jeff Franklin, University of Colorado, Denver
Maria Frawley, George Washington University
Mark Fulk, Buffalo State College
Constance Fulmer, Pepperdine University
Christine Gallant, Georgia State University
Andrew Galloway, Cornell University
Michael Gamer, University of Pennsylvania
Barbara Gates, University of Delaware
Jonathan C. Glance, Mercer University
Susan Patterson Glover, Laurentian University
Daniel Gonzalez, University of New Orleans
Jan Gorak, University of Denver
Chris Gordon-Craig, University of Alberta
Ann-Barbara Graff, Georgia Tech University
Bruce Graver, Providence College
Mary Griffin, Kwantlen University College
Michael Griffin, formerly of Southern Illinois University
George C. Grinnell, University of British Columbia, Okanagan
Elisabeth Gruner, University of Richmond
Bonnie Gunzenhauser, Roosevelt University
Kevin Gustafson, University of Texas at Arlington
Stephen Guy-Bray, University of British Columbia
Ruth Haber, Worcester State College
Dorothy Hadfield, University of Guelph
Margaret Hadley, University of Calgary
Robert Hampson, Royal Holloway University of London
Carol Hanes, Howard College
Michael Hanly, Washington State University
Lila Harper, Central Washington State University
Joseph Harris, Harvard University
Katherine Harris, San Jose State University
Anthony Harrison, North Carolina State University
John Hart, Motlow State Community College
Douglas Hayes, Lakehead University
Jennifer Hellwarth, Allegheny University
David Herman, Ohio State University
Peter Herman, San Diego State University
Kathy Hickock, Iowa State University
John Hill, US Naval Academy
Thomas Hill, Cornell University
Elizabeth Hodgson, University of British Columbia
Jim Hood, Guilford College
Joseph Hornsby, University of Alabama
Scott Howard, University of Denver
Jennifer Hughes, Averett University
Sylvia Hunt, Georgian College
Tara Hyland-Russell, St. Mary's College
Catherine Innes-Parker, University of Prince Edward Island

Jacqueline Jenkins, University of Calgary
John Johansen, University of Alberta
Gordon Johnston, Trent University
Richard Juang, Susquehanna University
Michael Keefer, University of Guelph
Sarah Keefer, Trent University
Lloyd Kermode, California State University, Long Beach
Brandon Kershner, University of Florida
Jon Kertzer, University of Calgary
Waqas Khwaja, Agnes State College
Helen Killoran, Ohio University
Gordon Kipling, University of California, Los Angeles
Anne Klinck, University of New Brunswick
Elizabeth Kraft, University of Georgia
Mary Kramer, University of Massachusetts, Lowell
Wai-Leung Kwok, San Francisco State University
Marilyn Lantz, East Mississippi Community College
Kate Lawson, University of Waterloo
Linda Leeds, Bellevue Community College
Mary Elizabeth Leighton, University of Victoria
Eric Lindstrom, University of Vermont
William Liston, Ball State University
Sharon Locy, Loyola Marymount University
Ross MacKay, Malaspina University-College
Peter Mallios, University of Maryland
Arnold Markley, Penn State University
Louis Markos, Houston Baptist University
Nick Mason, Brigham Young University
Pamela McCallum, University of Calgary
Patricia McCormack, Itawamba Community College
Kristen McDermott, Central Michigan University
John McGowan, University of North Carolina
Brian McHale, Ohio State University
Jim McKeown, McLennan Community College
Thomas McLean, University of Otago, New Zealand
Susan McNeill-Bindon, University of Alberta
Jodie Medd, Carleton University
Rod Michell, Thompson Rivers University
David Miller, Mississippi College
Kitty Millett, San Francisco State University
Britt Mize, Texas A&M University
Richard Moll, University of Western Ontario
Amy L. Montz, Texas A&M University
Monique Morgan, McGill University
John Morillo, North Carolina State University
Lucy Morrison, Salisbury University
Lorri Nandrea, University of Wisconsin-Steven's Point
Mara Narain, Texas Christian University
Byron Nelson, West Virginia University
Carolyn Nelson, West Virginia University
Claudia Nelson, Southwest Texas State University
Holly Faith Nelson, Trinity Western University
John Niles, University of Wisconsin, Madison
Michael North, University of California, Los Angeles
Mary Anne Nunn, Central Connecticut State University
David Oakleaf, University of Calgary
Tamara O'Callaghan, Northern Kentucky University
Karen Odden, Assistant Editor for Victorian Literature and Culture (formerly of University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee)
Erika Olbricht, Pepperdine University
Patrick O'Malley, Georgetown University
Patricia O'Neill, Hamilton College
Delilah Orr, Fort Lewis College
John Pagano, Barnard College
Kirsten Parkinson, Hiram College
Diana Patterson, Mount Royal College
Cynthia Patton, Emporia State University
Russell Perkin, St. Mary's University
Marjorie G. Perloff, Stanford University
Jim Persoon, Grand Valley State University
John Peters, University of North Texas
Todd Pettigrew, Cape Breton University
Alexander Pettit, University of North Texas
Jennifer Phegley, The University of Missouri, Kansas City
John Pollock, San Jose State University
Mary Poovey, New York University
Gautam Premnath, University of Massachusetts, Boston
Regina Psaki, University of Oregon
Laura Quinney, Brandeis University
Katherine Quinsey, University of Windsor
Tilottama Rajan, University of Western Ontario
Geoff Rector, University of Ottawa
Margaret Reeves, Atkinson College, York University
Cedric Reverand, University of Wyoming
Gerry Richman, Suffolk University
John Rickard, Bucknell University
Michelle Risdon, Lake Tahoe Community College

David Robinson, University of Arizona
Solveig C. Robinson, Pacific Lutheran University
Laura Rotunno, Pennsylvania State University, Altoona
Brian Rourke, New Mexico State University
Christopher Rovee, Louisiana State University
Nicholas Ruddick, University of Regina
Jason Rudy, University of Maryland
Donelle Ruwe, Northern Arizona University
Michelle Sauer, Minot State University
SueAnn Schatz, Lock Haven University of Pennsylvania
Dan Schierenbeck, Central Missouri State University
Norbert Schürer, California State University, Long Beach
Debora B. Schwartz, California Polytechnic University
Janelle A. Schwartz, Loyola University
John T. Sebastian, Loyola University
David Seed, University of Liverpool
Karen Selesky, University College of the Fraser Valley
Carol Senf, Georgia Tech University
Sharon Setzer, North Carolina State University
Lynn Shakinovsky, Wilfred Laurier University
John Sider, Westmont College
Judith Slagle, East Tennessee State University
Johanna Smith, University of Texas at Arlington
Sharon Smulders, Mount Royal College
Jason Snart, College of DuPage
Malinda Snow, Georgia State University
Goran Stanivukovic, St. Mary's University
Thomas Steffler, Carleton University
Richard Stein, University of Oregon
Eric Sterling, Auburn University Montgomery
James Stokes, University of Wisconsin, Stevens Point
Mary-Ann Stouck, Simon Fraser University
Nathaniel Strout, Hamilton College
Brad Sullivan, Western New England College
Lisa Surridge, University of Victoria
Joyce A. Sutphen, Gustavus Adolphus College
Beth Sutton-Ramspeck, Ohio State University
Nanora Sweet, University of Missouri, St. Louis
Dana Symons, Simon Fraser University
Andrew Taylor, University of Ottawa
Elizabeth Teare, University of Dayton
Doug Thorpe, University of Saskatchewan
Jane Toswell, University of Western Ontario
Kim Trainor, University of British Columbia
Herbert Tucker, University of Virginia
John Tucker, University of Victoria
Mark Turner, King's College, University of London
Eleanor Ty, Wilfrid Laurier University
Deborah Tyler-Bennett, Loughborough University
Kirsten Uszkalo, University of Alberta
Lisa Vargo, University of Saskatchewan
Gina Luria Walker, The New School, New York City
Kim Walker, Victoria University of Wellington
Miriam Wallace, New College of Florida
Orrin Wang, University of Maryland
Hayden Ward, West Virginia State University
David Watt, University of Manitoba
Ruth Wehlau, Queen's University
Lynn Wells, University of Regina
Dan White, University of Toronto at Mississauga
Patricia Whiting, Carleton University
Thomas Willard, University of Arizona
Tara Williams, Oregon State University
Chris Willis, Birkbeck University of London
Lisa Wilson, SUNY College at Potsdam
Ed Wiltse, Nazareth College
Anne Windholz, Augustana College
Susan Wolfson, Princeton University
Kenneth Womack, Pennsylvania State University
Gillen Wood, University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign
Carolyn Woodward, University of New Mexico
Julia Wright, Wilfrid Laurier University
Julian Yates, University of Delaware
Arlene Young, University of Manitoba
Lisa Zeitz, University of Western Ontario

THE RENAISSANCE AND THE EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

The term "Renaissance" has turned out to be a good deal less stable than was once assumed. The word "Rinascenza" (Italian: "rebirth"), from which "Renaissance" derives, was coined by the Italian historian Giorgio Vasari in 1550 to refer to what Vasari saw as having taken place in Italy over the previous two centuries: a rebirth of the ideas and the aesthetic values associated with the classical cultures of ancient Greece and Rome, after a thousand-year-long era in which civilization had gone into eclipse. By the time of Vasari it had already become conventional to think of that thousand-year period as the "Middle Ages" (or, using the Latinized form of the same phrase, the "medieval period").[1] Subsequently the habit developed of seeing the Renaissance as being followed by another discrete era, the Reformation, a period characterized above all by the challenge presented by Protestantism to the authority of the Church of Rome.

Recent generations of scholarship have done much to destabilize this conceptual framework. Medievalists have located a variety of "renaissances" in, for example, the ninth and the twelfth centuries, and have thoroughly debunked the idea that the supposed "dark ages" were lacking intellectual or cultural life. Scholars have also distinguished among the later renaissances of the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries: a renaissance in Italy that began in the early fourteenth century (with the writings of Dante and Petrarch and the paintings of Giotto) and reached its full flowering in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries (the age of Machiavelli, of Leonardo da Vinci, and of Michelangelo); a renaissance that occurred in northern Europe in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, especially in the Low Countries but also manifesting itself in France and in England (among the leading figures of this renaissance were the great Humanist thinkers Desiderius Erasmus and Sir Thomas More, and the painters Jan van Eyck and Hans Holbein); and a renaissance that occurred in England toward the end of the sixteenth century in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth I (the age of Edmund Spenser, Sir Philip Sidney, and Christopher Marlowe as well as Shakespeare). Other scholars, though, have questioned whether or not England ever experienced anything that can properly be termed a "Renaissance."

At a minimum, then, the phenomena associated with "the Renaissance" extended over a considerable stretch of time and across much of Europe. But they were not isolated from one another, sharing a tendency to focus on human concerns in new ways (and, in the visual arts, to depict the human form in persuasively realistic if often idealized representations). Historically too, the various renaissances were connected by a variety of direct links, many of them stemming from royal initiatives. The French King Francis I (1494–1547) lent vibrant support to new ideas from Italy and brought to France such renowned Italian artists as Andrea del Sarto and Leonardo da Vinci. In England, Henry VII (1457–1509) and his mother, Margaret, encouraged the "new learning" and brought to England the great Dutch scholar Erasmus; promoted men such as Thomas More, the scholar John Colet and Bishop John Fisher, who championed better education and classical learning; patronized William Caxton (who in 1476 had set up the first printing press in England); and founded two colleges at Cambridge University.

It was on this foundation that Henry's son, Henry VIII, built his fully developed Renaissance court. The prevailing image of Henry VIII is that of the figure he became in the 1530s and '40s, adding pound upon pound as he accumulated wife after wife. The young Henry—trim and lively, a sporting monarch and a man of culture, the "golden boy" peer of Francis I of France and Charles V, the Holy Roman Emperor—is a very different figure. Under the young Henry an international culture flourished in which leading continental humanist thinkers and great artists—the Dutch painter Hans Holbein most prominent among them—were persuaded to spend substantial amounts of time in England.

---

[1] The earliest recorded expression of the idea of a "Middle Age" between the classical world and the modern one appears in the writing of Flavio Biondo around 1439. Petrarch, writing in the 1330s, is thought to have been the first to characterize what we now term the medieval period as an age of darkness (one which he believed himself still inhabiting).

Artist unknown, Henry VIII, c. 1509.

Hans Holbein, Henry VIII, 1536.

This manifestation of English Renaissance culture in the early sixteenth century was followed near the end of the century by an extraordinary cultural flowering of a different character—the Elizabethan Renaissance. This Renaissance followed the Protestant Reformation, and in consequence took on a different religious coloring from that of the Christian humanism so central to the Italian Renaissance and the early Northern Renaissance, which took shape before Martin Luther launched the Protestant Reformation in 1517. The word "Renaissance" is commonly applied to sixteenth-century and early seventeenth-century English culture, but many historians and even literary historians now prefer to term the era between about 1600 and some time in the eighteenth century the "early modern period."

Here, as elsewhere, it is important to distinguish among the constituent parts of the British Isles. A later section of this introduction discusses developments in these areas more fully—as does the introduction to the "Literature in Ireland, Gaelic Scotland, and Wales" section found in this volume. Ireland, Scotland, and Wales each remained largely independent of English political control throughout much of the period covered by this volume, and each also retained strongly independent literary and cultural traditions through the period—though the greatest periods of cultural flourishing in Ireland, Scotland, and Wales during the late medieval and early modern eras came far earlier than they did in England.

Regardless of whether or not we term it a "renaissance," the period between 1500 and 1660 in England saw massive political, social, and religious change, change intimately connected to developments on the continent. The period begins and ends with a country exhausted by war: in 1500 memories of a long series of wars fought over the right of succession to the English throne (the "Wars of the Roses") were still fresh, and in 1660 the return of Charles II from exile marked the end of the republican Commonwealth established after civil wars that had brought tumult to England, Scotland, and Ireland. Over these 160 years the national church—the foundation of the country's devotional practices and beliefs—changed its entire orientation at least four times and was subject to constant debate and evolution. Centuries-old rites and traditions in the countryside, which still resonated strongly throughout society in the early sixteenth century, began to disappear and even to become objects of nostalgia. The world of maypoles and of Morris dancing, of hobbyhorses and bonfires, was bitterly opposed as "pagan" or "papist" by more radical reformers, and while such traditional pastimes were supported by the early Stuart monarchs, they were a thing of the past by the end of the period.

A la louenge de dieu de la vierge marie souueraine et de tous les saints et sain tes de paradis a ceste histoi re este escripte de la passiō de Jhesus nostre sauueur ¶ Et pour auoi

Manuscript illustration of the presentation of a book to a king from The Vaux Passional (early sixteenth century). This recently rediscovered image depicts an enthroned king, assumed to be Henry VII, receiving a manuscript emblazoned with the royal arms of England. The two girls to the left of the throne, probably 13-year-old Princess Margaret and 7-year-old Princess Mary, are kneeling beside the fireplace wearing black headdresses. Behind the girls, a young boy can be seen with his head down on an empty bed. The figure is thought to be 11-year-old Prince Henry (future King Henry VIII) mourning the loss of his mother, Elizabeth of York; both he and his father grieved very intensely after Elizabeth died suddenly in 1503. It is likely that the manuscript, which contains an account of Christ's passion and a poem titled "The Mirror of Death," was presented in connection with the death of the queen. (The Vaux Passional [Peniarth MS 482D], f.9r. Reproduced by permission of Llyfrgell Genedlaethol Cmyru / National Library of Wales.)

Artist unknown, Henry VIII at the Opening of Parliament, 1523. In this watercolor drawing the king is seated below the royal coat of arms, wearing his crown and holding the scepter, his feet resting on a cushion. To his right (i.e., to the left of the picture) are Archbishop Warham of Canterbury and Cardinal Wolsey. Before him two earls hold the cap of maintenance and the sword of state. Dukes wear coronets; other peers of the realm wear hats; to the left nine bishops (in red) and seventeen black abbots wear their miters.

Anonymous, Edward VI and the Pope: An Allegory of the Reformation, c. 1569. In this painting, the dying Henry VIII gestures toward his heir, the young Edward VI. The weight of Edward's throne presses on the neck of a pope, who wears ribbons reading "IDOLATRY" and "SUPERSTICION" and is labeled with the words "FEYNED HOLINE[SS]" and "POPS" (i.e., "popes"); on his chest is written "ALL FLESHE IS GRASSE" (a phrase from Isaiah 40.6, alluding to the impermanence of the physical body). On top of the pope's head, an open book reads "THE WORDE OF THE LORD ENDURETH FOREVER." Next to the pope, a pair of monks stride toward the edge of the image, each pulling a chain attached to the bottom of the platform Edward sits upon. On the opposite side of the work is a small scene depicting the demolition of religious idols. Under it, several members of the Regency Council that governed on Edward's behalf sit at the table. Standing next to the child king is Edward Seymour, 1st Duke of Somerset, who was first to lead the council as Lord Protector of the Realm. The painting is not entirely finished; there are several blank squares that were likely intended to contain smaller anti-Catholic scenes similar to that depicting the destruction of the idols.

This painting was long assumed to date from the time of Edward VI; it is now more widely believed to have been painted more than a decade later, during the reign of Elizabeth I, as a reassertion of English Protestantism following Mary I's brief Catholic reign.

Artist unknown, Queen Elizabeth I.

Artist unknown, William Cecil, Lord Burghley, c. 1585. Burghley was for many years Queen Elizabeth's most trusted and powerful civil servant.

Artist unknown, Lady Jane Dudley (née Grey), c. 1550.

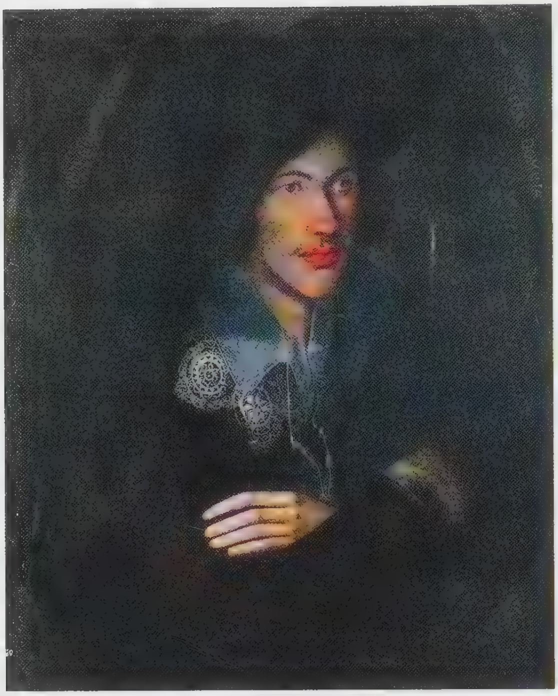
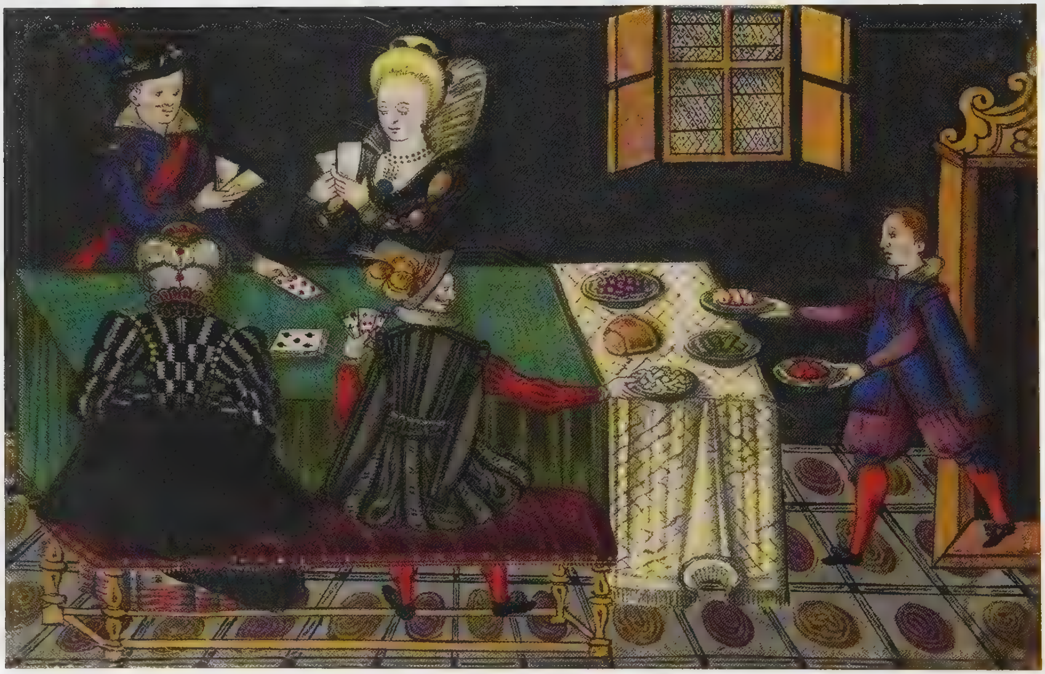
Whyt freres
Brid well
Blak freres
Benams Castle
Brokenwarf
Queene hyve
Thre Crane
Stillards
Parys Gardeyn
The Bowll bayting
The Beare bayting

Detail from Londinum Feracissimi Angliae Regni Metropolis, the bird's eye view of London in Georg Braun's atlas Orbis Terrarum, c. 1574. The view is believed to show London as it was c. 1558. An image of the full map appears in the general introduction to this volume.

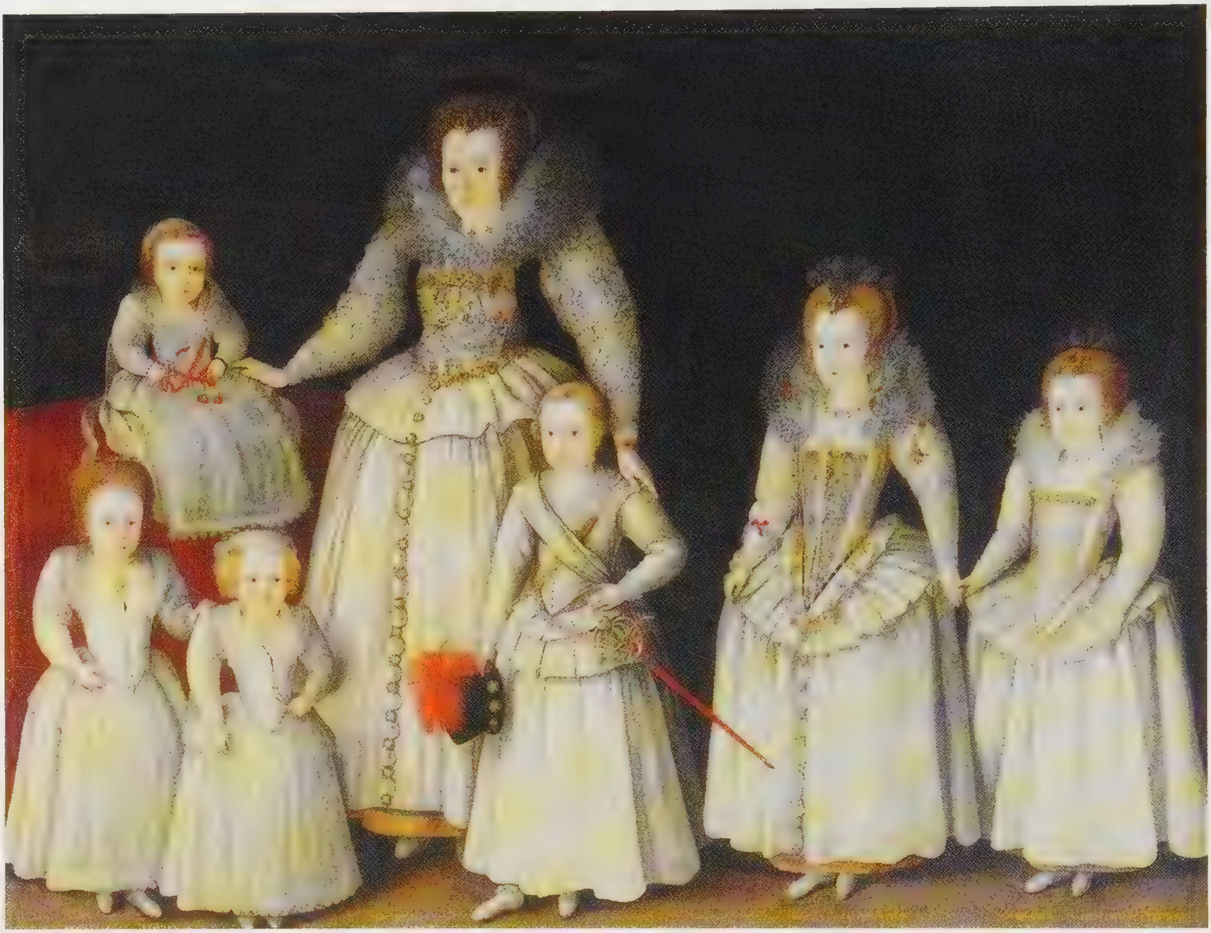


Anonymous, John Donne (c. 1595).



Artist unknown, untitled watercolor depicting food being served during a game of cards, early seventeenth century (Folger Shakespeare Library). A companion watercolor image is reproduced in the "Culture: A Portfolio" section elsewhere in this volume.

Isaac Oliver, Portrait of a Young Man, c. 1590–95. This miniature portrait of an unidentified man is one of the most famous Renaissance paintings. The full length miniature, first developed by Oliver in the 1580s, allowed the artist to depict a background to the figure and to hint at narrative elements. Here, for example, we see the young man's melancholy expression, his one discarded glove, and his isolated position on a rock overlooking an unidentified garden background, where two figures are walking. Horace Walpole suggested in the eighteenth century that the young man depicted here could be statesman and poet Sir Philip Sidney; however, no evidence has been found to support this theory.



Marcus Gheerarerts the Younger, portrait of Barbara Gamage Sidney, Countess of Leicester, and her children (1596). Barbara Gamage Sidney, sister-in-law to the poet Sir Philip Sidney, is depicted here with her two sons and four daughters. Robert Sidney, Barbara's husband, is absent from the family portrait. Each of the mother's hands touches one of her young sons, and her daughters appear in pairs on either side of the painting; the eldest, Mary Sidney, grew up to achieve fame as the poet and prose writer Lady Mary Wroth.

In a poem dedicated to Penshurst, the Sidneys' estate, Ben Jonson commends Barbara Sidney as "noble, fruitful, [and] chaste" and praises the education of her children: "Each morn and even they are taught to pray / With the whole household, and may every day / Read in their virtuous parents' noble parts / The mysteries of manners, arms, and arts."

?Robert Peake, Elizabeth I in Procession (c. 1600). The queen made a habit of showing herself to her subjects in this fashion throughout her reign. (Stapleton Collection)

Attributed to David des Granges, The Salstonstall Family, 1630s. The painting anachronistically shows Sir Richard Salsonstall together with both his first wife (who died in childbirth) and his second wife (shown at right holding her child), as well as his two children.

Anthony Van Dyck, Charles I on Horseback with Seigneur de St. Antoine, 1633. De St. Antoine was the king's riding master. This portrait was widely admired in its time; one contemporary commented that, "if our eyes alone were to be believed they would boldly assert that the king himself is alive in the portrait."

Samuel Cooper, Oliver Cromwell, 1649. This, the earliest portrait of Cromwell known to exist, dates from the year in which Charles I was executed.

Medieval ideals of chivalry were kept alive (or resurrected) largely for political and social purposes even as a developing moneyed economy was refashioning the world. A succession of monarchs established munificent (if sometimes rough-hewn) court cultures, and a vibrant street life in London and other towns was a vital part of English culture. The English language, though still widely thought inferior to Latin, experienced exuberant growth. Scientific investigations of a recognizably "modern" sort were beginning to be carried out toward the end of the period, even as belief in demons, witches, and astrology increased, as did a more recondite belief in alchemy. For many years a woman reigned as monarch, and in literature a common conceit had it that male lovers were slaves to the females they adored; yet the actual status of women probably did not improve over this period. How did this jumble coalesce in English literature? Let us begin by looking more closely at Renaissance humanism and at the Protestant Reformation.

HUMANISM

Nowadays the word humanist is often used to imply a "secular" opposition to religion in general and Christianity in particular. The opposite is the case with Renaissance humanism, particularly north of Italy. Humanists were distinguished from other scholars not by exclusive focus on human or secular texts, but rather by their focus on secular writings, particularly classical ones, as well as on religious texts and thought. Thus Erasmus produced books on Greco-Roman culture and editions of the New Testament in the original Greek and of works by patristic writers. In one key particular, humanism was in accord with Protestant thought: Erasmus and many other humanists supported making the Bible available in the vernacular. But—as attested by Thomas More's willingness to die rather than approve England's separation from the Roman Catholic Church—humanists tended to be more willing than Luther or, later, Calvin to remain connected to Roman Catholic tradition. (Erasmus, for example, favored reform within the Catholic Church but opposed a full Protestant Reformation.)

The recovery and reappraisal of works from classical Greece and Rome was central to Renaissance humanism—as it had been to medieval scholasticism centuries earlier. The recovery of texts by the scholastics, however, had stressed applying classical learning to theological ends, emphasized Aristotle's works, and tended to treat classical writings as authoritative. For Renaissance humanists, classical writings were of interest for many purposes: the epic poems of Homer and Virgil and the erotic poems of Ovid were of as much interest as the writings of the philosophers. And many humanists felt little obligation to demonstrate that a seemingly new idea in fact accorded with ancient authority. Renaissance humanism was often prepared to break new ground, and to acknowledge breaking it.

Of the Greek philosophers, Plato, rather than Aristotle, came to the fore. Of particular importance was the Platonic concept of ideal forms—the notion that for every physical object, metaphysical concept, and ethical principle there is an ideal abstract form that in fact is more "real" than its manifestations in the actual or material world. It is not difficult to see how Platonic "ideas" could be harmonized with Christian ideals, and many humanist thinkers endeavored to do just that.[1] But Platonic philosophy also lent force to the sometime humanist impulse, particularly in Italy, to celebrate humanity itself, if not without reference to a Creator then with unprecedented emphasis on human potential and free will. A groundbreaking text here was the Oration on the Dignity of Man (1486) by the Florentine writer Pico della Mirandola. As Pico saw it, > upon man, at the moment of his creation, God bestowed seeds pregnant with all possibilities, the germs of every form of life. Whichever of these a man shall cultivate, the same will mature and bear fruit in him. If vegetative, he will become a plant; if sensual, he will become brutish; if rational, he will reveal himself as a heavenly being; if intellectual, he will be an angel and the son of God.... Who then will not look with awe upon this our chameleon?

Northern humanists such as Erasmus and More were less optimistic about human nature, but nevertheless the contrast between Pico's confidence and the emphasis on the inherent sinfulness of man (and even more of woman) in both medieval Christianity and the theology of the French Protestant John Calvin (1509–64) could hardly be more marked. It is in the writings of the humanists that we see the possibility of imagining human society as a body independent of the workings of God. The supreme English example is More's Utopia, which imagines, although with a countering irony and ambivalence, the transformation of a culture through fundamentally different but entirely human-made social structures and practices.

---

[1] Some writers (e.g., Spenser and Rabelais) welcomed Platonism's vision of a world of ideas to which we can rise but also stressed God's descent to the world of flesh.

Though scholars differ as to its extent and influence, most agree that Renaissance humanism helped transform sixteenth-century English literature. The poems of Thomas Wyatt, a member of Henry VIII's court who introduced the Petrarchan sonnet to English literature, show the impact of Renaissance humanism, as do prose works such as Sir Thomas Elyot's The Book of the Governor (1531) and Roger Ascham's The Schoolmaster (1570). Renaissance humanism is also generally agreed to have contributed to a new exuberance and a new richness in the English language, despite its occasional tendency toward philological pedantry and a sometimes uncomprehending prejudice against medieval scholastic philosophy. One contribution was the introduction of yet more tropes of classical rhetoric into English and an increased attention to English as a language worth study and further polish. According to Ascham, the study of Latin, "wisely brought into schools, truly taught, and constantly used," would "work a true choice [in] placing of words, a right ordering of sentences, and easy understanding of the tongue, a readiness to speak, a facility to write, a true judgement both of his own and other men's doings, what tongue soever he doth use." (Ascham is here practicing what he preaches, using several of the figures of classical rhetoric in the construction of his long and elaborately balanced sentence.)

Humanists such as Erasmus wrote primarily in Latin, but their rhetorical impulse and linguistic exuberance spilled over into the vernacular. Under the influence of Joachim Du Bellay, who had defended French in similar terms, Richard Mulcaster (Edmund Spenser's teacher) asked some pointed questions and gave impassioned answers:

> Is it not indeed a marvellous bondage, to become servants to one tongue for learning's sake the most of our time, with loss of most time, whereas we may have the very same treasure in our own tongue, with the gain of more time? Our own bearing the joyful title of our liberty and freedom, the Latin tongue remembering us of our thraldom and bondage? I love Rome, but London better; I favour Italy, but England more; I honour the Latin, but I worship the English.

Like much else about this period, the extent to which "Renaissance humanism" is a useful concept is subject to debate. Earlier notions of Renaissance humanism often assumed a top-down view of the period in which coherent intellectual movements were prime moving forces of socio-economic as well as political and cultural change. Recent scholars doubt that such movements in intellectual history are often quite so unified and coherent, believing that bottom-up change driven by socio-economic or religious forces may have at least as great an impact. Nevertheless, "Renaissance humanism" remains central to any discussion of the period.

SCIENTIFIC INQUIRY

Science and technology had not been dead in the Middle Ages, as witness developments in, for example, optics. It is the early modern period, however, that saw the start of what was later to be called, with a little exaggeration, "the scientific revolution." And yet the story of scientific development in early modern Europe is one of twists and paradox, not least because the Renaissance saw an increased, not a decreased, interest and belief in astrology, alchemy, and demonology. These fields of exploration are now called "pseudo-sciences," but the observations they entailed and the technology they encouraged, futile though the sciences themselves turned out to be, contributed to what we would call real science. Even the great Isaac Newton believed in the occult. Did Renaissance humanism play a part? Humanist fascination with ancient texts doubtless aided in the recovery or fresh understanding of scientific works by such classical authorities as Aristotle, Euclid, Hippocrates, and Galen (the latter two edited by Rabelais). Even more important was the increased use of Arabic numerals and that mathematically crucial concept, zero (realized in India and perfected by the Arabs).

Although he failed to understand the necessity of mathematics to his dreams of scientific progress, Sir Francis Bacon (1561–1626) was a key figure in formulating new approaches. As his essays demonstrate, Bacon's interests were wide. His Novum Organum (1620) was a plan to base scientific endeavor and an understanding of the cosmos more on objective observation and less on armchair theory or the consensus of the past. As Bacon put it, "man, custodian and interpreter of Nature, performs and understands so much as he has collected concerning the order of nature by observation or reason; nor do his powers or his knowledge extend farther." Among those who put into practice the inductive approach advocated by Bacon was William Harvey (1578–1657), an English physician who, through experiment and observation, determined how blood circulates in the human body. As Harvey observed in his De Motu Cordis et Sanguinis,[1] On the Motions of the Heart and Blood (1628):

> Almost all anatomists, physicians, and philosophers, up to the present time, have supposed with Galen that the object of the pulse was the same as that of respiration.... But as the structure and movements of the heart differ from those of the lungs, and the motions of the arteries from those of the chest, so seems it likely ... that the pulsations and uses of the heart, likewise of the arteries, will differ in many respects from the heavings and uses of the chest and lungs.

What Harvey did for the human body, the astronomers Copernicus, Galileo, and Kepler did for the universe. Galileo provided further proof of the Copernican theory that the cosmos does not revolve around the earth, and Kepler showed that the earth's path is an ellipse (although he continued to believe that the planets make beautiful harmony and tried to work out the musical notation involved). As the poet John Donne put it in his Anatomy of the World, if with some exaggeration, the "new philosophy," by which he meant the new natural science, "calls all in doubt":

> The sun is lost, and the earth, and no man's wit,
> Can well direct him where to look for it.

The lines are often quoted, but in truth some welcomed the new astronomy: in the older system, the Earth was at the center of the universe, but that center was a dark, dirty, and unmusical place, unlike the fiery and harmonious planets and stars.

Much as discoveries such as those of Harvey and Galileo affected the intellectual constructs through which people viewed each other and the world, some things remained unchanged from the late-medieval to the Renaissance period. One of these, challenged but persistent, was the habit of thought according to which the macrocosm was made up of four elements—earth, water, air, and fire—and the microcosm of the individual human was made up of four "humors," each with a physical association. Thus a sanguine humor or temperament was associated with blood, a choleric or angry temperament was associated with one sort of bile, a melancholic temperament was associated with a different sort of bile, and a phlegmatic temperament was associated with water. (Melancholia, which often meant what we would call neurosis and which was often thought to be linked to high intelligence and creativity, came in for particular attention in the Jacobean era: Jaques in Shakespeare's As You Like It is a paradigm of the type. And, in a different genre, Robert Burton's The Anatomy of Melancholy [1621] is a full and entertaining treatise on the subject.) Ideally, all four humors would be balanced. The domination of one humor could be the subject of a medical diagnosis—or of literary satire. Ben Jonson in such plays as Everyman in His Humour and Everyman out of His Humour was the most notable among many Elizabethan and Jacobean writers to make the "humors" of human individuals the subject of comedy. Such ways of thinking persisted into the late seventeenth century. As so often with scientific or technological developments, there was a lag between a discovery and its general acceptance.

---

[1] Like Bacon and like almost all authors of scientific work until the late seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Harvey wrote in Latin.

THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND

The Protestant Reformation was in part about power: would the Roman Catholic Church retain power to act as an intermediary between Christians and God, power to define the nature of God, power to control all aspects of worship, power over the legitimacy of marriage and of children, and in many cases vast power over lands and financial resources, including the power to impose tithes and taxes? For centuries the Church of Rome had exerted supreme authority in all these areas.

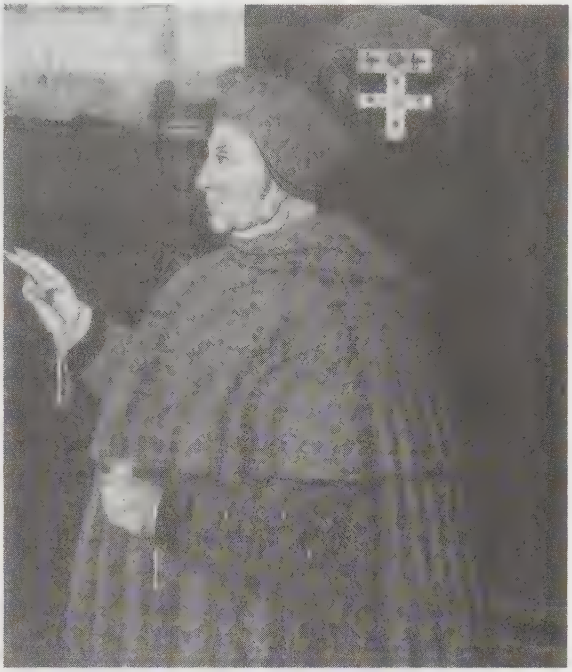
The spark that set off the Reformation was a challenge put forward by Martin Luther on 31 October 1517 to the long-standing Church practice of selling "indulgences"—certificates granting absolution for sins. Luther saw the practice as a flagrant abuse of Church authority that discouraged people from confessing their sins in a spirit of true repentance. According to tradition, Luther nailed his Ninety-Five Theses—a substantial document in which he set out his arguments—to the door of the castle church in Wittenberg. Thanks to the new printing technology, the Theses were translated and distributed throughout Europe within two months, and within a year Luther was condemned by the Pope as a heretic.

Before long, the controversy set off by Luther had widened as much conceptually as it had geographically. Luther's protest broadened into a wide-ranging call for reforms in the Church, including the elimination of perceived abuses such as the sale of indulgences as well as a new emphasis on making the Word of God, the Bible—for Luther the one true authority—available directly to all in the vernacular, a new focus on faith alone as the key to salvation, and a denial that human beings have free will (only with grace, he said, and not from the exertion of will, can people choose the good). In 1529, the Diet (or Assembly) of Speyer passed a comprehensive condemnation of Luther and his followers, but a minority of delegates delivered a Protestatio—the origin of the term "Protestant" that has come to be applied to the various new churches that sprang up across Europe in opposition to the Church of Rome, and that assumed leading roles in Germany, Holland, and England.

In England, controversies over the use or abuse of power by the Catholic Church were substantially complicated by the fact that this power was exercised from afar, from Italy; even in the Middle Ages such power had been resented in England, and in the early sixteenth century an increased resentment against traditional doctrines and practices can be attributed in part to their origin in Rome (or so said Reformers, for Catholics claimed to have derived them from Scripture, from continued revelation, or from the broader consensus of Christendom). And once the Reformation in England was an established fact, national feeling sometimes played a significant role in fanning the flames of religious hatred. As early as the 1540s, some Protestants had advanced the claim that the Pope was the embodiment of Antichrist, and such sentiment grew when in 1580 Pope Pius V pronounced that assassinating Elizabeth I of England would not constitute a mortal sin. It should nevertheless be remembered, as a number of recent scholars have stressed, that of the large minority of English men and women who remained Catholic and did not move to the continent, most remained loyal to both their faith and their monarch.

In attempting to sort out the causes of the Reformation, what weight should we give to the issue that sparked Luther's rebellion—what many perceived as corruption in the Church, and in particular the sale of indulgences? It is now generally accepted that the degree of corruption in the late-medieval church was exaggerated both at the time and by most later historians; its true extent is still debated. We do know that in the late-medieval period many, including many loyal Catholics, accused the institutional Roman Catholic Church of abandoning its own ideals of concern for the poor, chastity for priests, and Gospel simplicity. Simony—the practice of buying and selling spiritual offices for temporal benefits—was widespread, as other such abuses were said, not always unjustly, to be. But there were other questions being asked. Should the clergy act as intermediaries in interpreting the Bible for the laity? Or should everyone, even the humble, be allowed to read and interpret the Bible (perhaps even actively encouraged to do so)? Is administering the sacraments and presiding over other rites the most important function of the clergy? (And how many sacraments are there? Catholics said seven; Protestants said only two: baptism and holy communion.) Or is preaching and spreading the word of God the central obligation of a clergyman? Is the sacrament of Confession (the confessing of one's sins to a priest) essential to salvation? Or should confession, no longer a sacrament, be between an individual and God? Is the substance, although not the appearance (the "accidents"), of bread and wine literally transformed during the sacrament of the Eucharist into the body and the blood of Christ by a process called "transubstantiation" that re-enacts Christ's sacrifice? Or are Lutherans right to say that God is "really" but not physically present in the bread and wine? Calvinists (and the Church of England) called the sacrament of the Eucharist a "sign"—connecting signifier to signified so as to make it more than a mere reminder—of God's spiritual presence and His connection to the believer. Not true, said some more radical Protestants, Communion is merely a memorial. Others, even more radical, thought it best to dispense with the ceremony altogether.

There were yet more questions. Are church hierarchies necessary to the carrying out of God's will? Or do they exist only for convenience? Is salvation dependent on good works performed, on sins not committed, and on remaining in communion with God? Or is it dependent purely on one's faith in God, a faith that may in turn be acquired only at God's pleasure? Might the salvation of "the elect" even be predestined by God? Is it a sign of appropriate respect to honor the Virgin Mary and the saints as well as the divinity through splendid displays of devotion? Or does that risk idolatry? (Protestants accused Catholics of actually worshiping saints and of elevating Mary beyond her due as the mother of Christ.) Or does a plain style honor God most fittingly? (In which case elaborate or colorful decoration in churches, let alone beautiful images venerated in themselves, are properly seen as further expressions of idolatry.) Should realism and discretion be exercised in any consideration of measures to "enforce purity" outside the Church? Or is it one's duty as a Christian to pursue purity through restrictions on irresponsible or pleasure-seeking behavior? May we (as King James I was to urge) enjoy a range of traditional practices that probably have pagan roots (maypoles, hobbyhorses, bonfires, bells, Christmas revelry) or must we, as many "Puritans" said, condemn such enjoyments as wicked, even devilish? Divergent answers to such questions separated Catholic from Protestant, and accompanied a number of divisions within Protestantism.



Thomas Wolsey, a butcher's son who became a cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church, and was for many years Lord Chancellor under Henry VIII. Wolsey was as controversial as he was powerful, and his legacy remains controversial today. Widely praised by some for his administrative abilities and his adroitness in foreign affairs, to others he exemplified the corruption of the Church and the dangers of mingling religious office with secular authority. Holding the highest religious position in the land, he was also the King's chief minister, shaping both domestic and foreign policy. He left a lasting legacy in building Hampton Court Palace and founding Cardinal College at Oxford University, but when Henry VIII petitioned the Pope for an annulment of his marriage, Wolsey became caught in the struggle between his two masters. Henry stripped him of his government offices and of most of his property. His servant George Cavendish reported that as he lay dying on his way to what would have doubtless been a trial and execution, he said "If I had served my God as diligently as I have done the King he would not have given me over in my gray hairs."

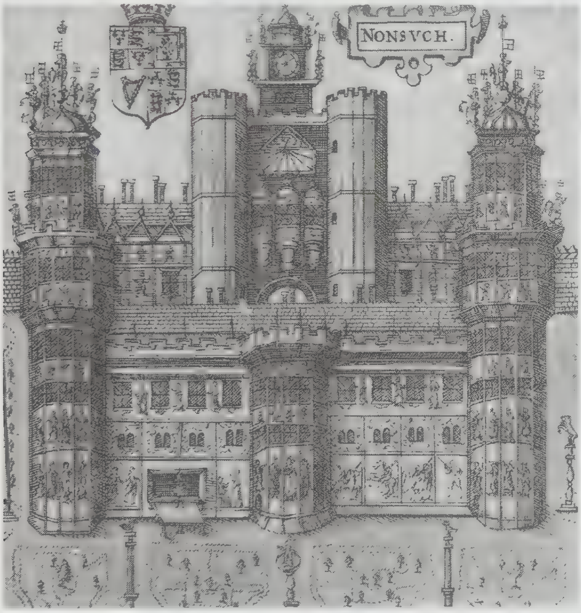
The Reformation came to England through circuitous means. The rejection by Henry VIII of papal supremacy led to a Protestant English Reformation but did not constitute a Protestant Reformation of the Church in England; only under Henry's son, Edward VI, was a more explicit Protestantism, both theological and institutional, established in England, and for reasons quite different from those that had motivated Henry. (Likewise, although some in the England of the 1520s and 1530s shared the varieties of Protestantism that were bringing sweeping change in parts of Europe, such beliefs were not yet widespread or powerful enough to establish the Reformation in England. Even when Elizabeth first began her reign it is possible that a majority of her subjects were still loyal to Rome.) Most immediately, Henry's break with Rome was caused by his desire to end his marriage to Catherine of Aragon and obtain a male heir by marrying Anne Boleyn. There is little doubt that he was in love with Anne, but almost certainly he would not have gone to such lengths to marry her had he not become convinced that Catherine would never give him a son.[1]

The key developments in the break from Rome are as follows. In 1533, after Henry had exerted intense pressure on the English clergy to support his course of action, the marriage of Henry and Catherine was annulled, his marriage to (a pregnant) Anne Boleyn was consecrated, and she became Queen. At that point Pope Clement VII, who had been trying diplomatically to placate Henry without doing any violence to Catholic doctrine (or offending Catherine's nephew, the Holy Roman Emperor), now excommunicated Henry: forbidden to receive Communion, Henry was thereby excluded from salvation. Henry's response was to pass an Act of Succession through Parliament, under which all adult males in England would have to swear that they supported the change in the King's marital arrangements. Henry also decreed that the Bible should be made available in English, and that church services should be in English rather than in Latin, a radical break with the practice of the Church of Rome. Later that year the English Church was formally made independent from Rome, and all adult males were additionally required to swear allegiance to the King in his new capacity as "Supreme Head of the Church in England." Among the few who refused so to swear were Sir Thomas More, author of Utopia and from 1528 to 1532 Henry's Lord Chancellor, and John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester. In 1535 both were convicted of treason for their refusals and executed. Both were canonized by the Catholic Church in 1935.

As so often with Henry, the personal was entangled with the political. In an effort to build support for the break with Rome, he gave preferment to Protestants who not long before had been labeled heretics. This move helped both to buttress his own authority and to undermine Catholic institutions, most significantly the monasteries, bastions of privilege and possessors of immense wealth. Protestants were fervent in their opposition to the monasteries. Whereas monks had originally been venerated as embodiments of the godly life, they had come to be widely suspected (sometimes rightly) of corrupt and immoral behavior; in some parts of the realm, moreover, they were widely unpopular as landlords despite the role of some monasteries and convents in providing basic schooling and medical aid. In 1535, two years after the break with Rome, Henry appointed commissioners to look into these allegations; as he had doubtless intended them to do, the commissioners confirmed the allegations of corruption, and beginning in 1536 Henry ordered the dissolution of monasteries throughout England and annexed the land to the Crown. He thus provided himself with a vast and ongoing source of additional revenue, as well as with the ability to extend his generosity more widely to friends and supporters. Through Thomas Cranmer (Archbishop of Canterbury and hence the Primate of the English Church), Henry also broke with Catholic tradition by arranging for the publication of the first English Bible authorized for public use, the 1539 "Great Bible" of Miles Coverdale. The "dissolution" of the monasteries typically entailed their physical destruction, often to provide stones for the Tudor great houses that the gentry and nobility were beginning to build. "Bare, ruined choirs, where late the sweet birds sang" became a common sight in sixteenth-century England.

---

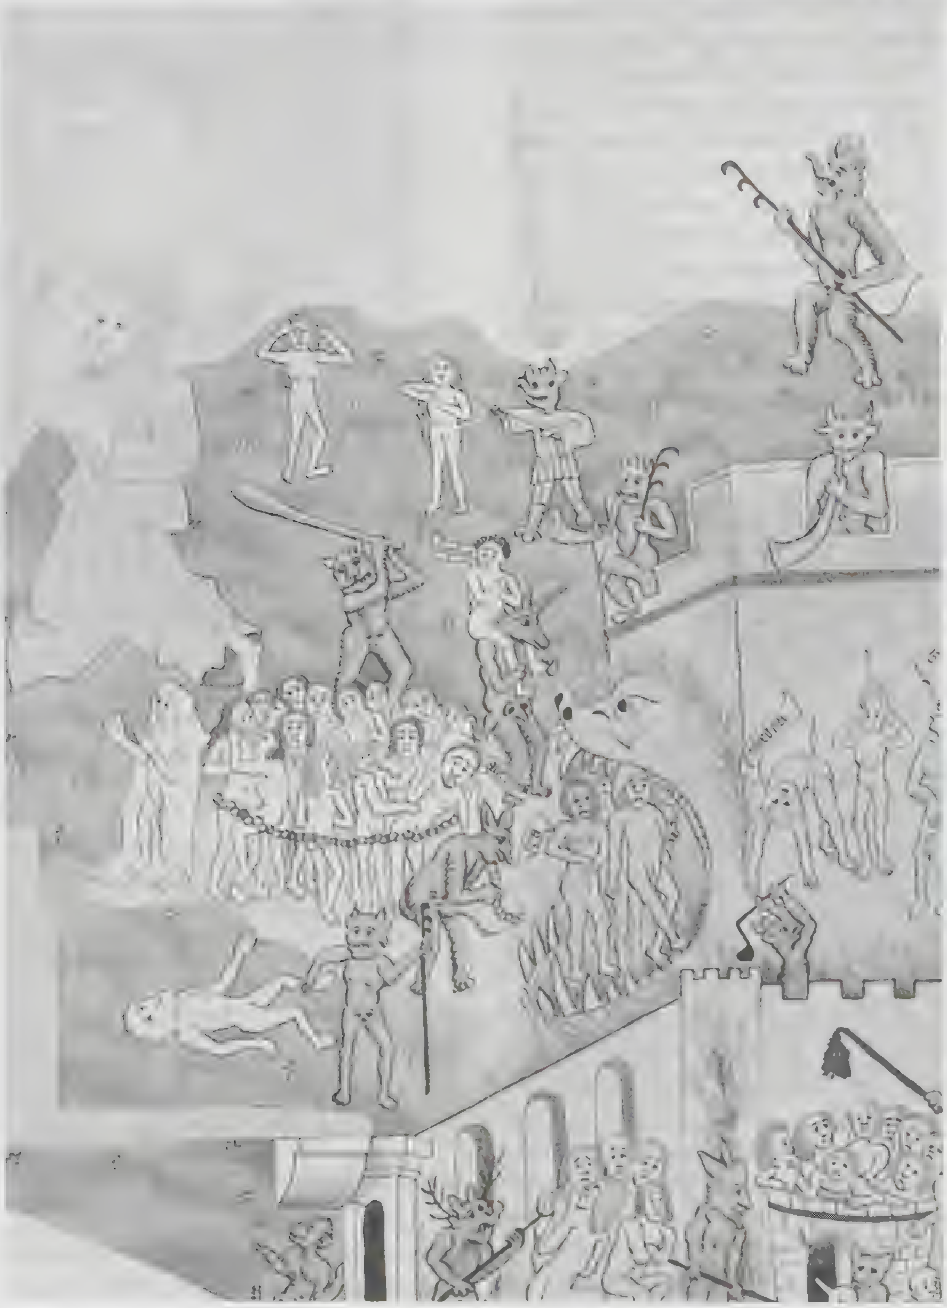
[1] The root of Henry VIII's break with Rome may be traced to the desire of Henry VII to improve his standing with the Spanish monarchy by marrying his son to Catherine of Aragon, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella. Catherine was betrothed to Arthur, Henry's eldest son, in 1488; she was three years old and Arthur a year younger. The two were 15 and 14 respectively when the long-awaited wedding took place in 1501, but within six months Arthur fell sick and died. Henry VII obtained a papal dispensation allowing Catherine to marry Arthur's younger brother Henry; this second marriage for Catherine took place in 1509. She bore several children, but only her daughter Mary survived. Catherine was 42 years old in 1527 when Henry, despairing of her ability to give him a son, and with perhaps some degree of sincerity convinced that his lack of an heir was God's punishment for his living in sin with his deceased brother's wife, began to petition Pope Clement VII to grant him an annulment on the grounds that Catherine's marriage to his brother had made their own union unlawful. Catherine put up strenuous resistance to Henry's petition; she appealed to the Pope herself, insisting that she and Arthur had not consummated their marriage and had therefore never truly been husband and wife. Catherine's nephew was Charles V, the Holy Roman Emperor, whom the Pope had no wish to offend, and the matter was soon at a stale-mate—where it remained for six years, while Pope Clement continued to resist Henry's appeals.



John Speed, vignette of Nonsuch Palace from the map of Surrey in Speed's atlas of Britain, 1616. Nonsuch Palace, the greatest of Henry VIII's edifices and one of the most noted works of Tudor architecture, was begun in 1538, and completed in 1547. It later became a favorite residence of Elizabeth I.

Roger Fenton, Riveaulx Abbey. Riveaulx (located in East Yorkshire), once one of the greatest of English monasteries, had subsequently dwindled in importance, and housed fewer than two dozen monks at the time of the Dissolution. In 1538 the remaining monks were forced to leave, and the abbey and surrounding lands were granted to Thomas Manners, who destroyed many of the buildings but left the shell of the early thirteenth-century church standing.

Throughout his reign, Henry, who probably did not consider himself a "Protestant" in any profound or theological sense, attempted to steer a middle course between Protestant demands for further reform and residual Catholic tradition and theology. But for Henry, steering a middle way did not mean conciliation or consensus; it meant veering between censoring, imprisoning, and even executing greater numbers of one side or of the other. Even in the mid-1530s, as he was counting on Protestant support in building a campaign against the monasteries, Henry was also restricting licenses to preach and curtailing other forms of free religious expression that he thought extremist but which the Protestants demanded.



Wall-painting of the Last Judgment, Stratford Guild Chapel, early sixteenth century. This picture, in which Hell-mouth appears at lower right, is one of a series of wall paintings in the Chapel that were whitewashed over in the later sixteenth century to remove Catholic imagery. The paintings were discovered in 1804, and watercolor copies were published in 1807.

Scholars continue to debate both the manner in which the Reformation came to England and the speed with which it did. Was the Reformation pushed forward primarily by pressure from above—by administrators such as Cranmer? Or was it driven more by pressure from below by a population dissatisfied with the old Church? Was England already Protestant at heart when Mary Tudor began her reign? Or did the Reformation in England remain a work in progress until the 1570s? Just how large was the Catholic minority—and when did it become a minority? Over such issues there is little consensus, although the recent tendency has been to affirm the vitality of the Roman Catholic Church on the eve of Henry's reforms and the continued presence of large numbers of Catholics in officially Protestant England. In any case, the broad outlines of the narrative are clear. For most English people in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, matters of faith were intensely felt realities, not abstract theological questions—even if they could be those too. Although educated lay Christians had long practiced versions of piety that included reciting parts of the Bible, we can get some sense of the freshness and the fervency of the feelings aroused by the increased stress on Bible reading through the words of Queen Elizabeth herself:

> I walk many times into the pleasant fields of the Holy Scriptures, where I pluck up the goodly green herbs of sentences, eat them by reading, chew them up musing, and lay them up at length in the seat of memory … so I may less perceive the bitterness of this miserable life.

It is not difficult to appreciate the aesthetic and cultural importance of religious issues in an age in which everyone was a church-goer (Elizabethan law required it, in part to determine who might be Catholic), in which crucifixes, rosaries, and so on—if now frowned upon by strict Protestants—had long figured in daily life as reminders of Christian doctrine, but in which the practice of reading the Bible had only recently become available to the population at large (if only by hearing it read out loud). The sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries were robustly secular, but they were also passionately religious. Cultures can be both, and it is important not to forget the strength of the religious ferment that extended throughout this period—or the fact that for many of those involved in it, religious matters defined the age and set it off in bold relief from earlier times. Such was the vision of the Protestant reformer John Foxe, whose Acts and Monuments (popularly known as the Book of Martyrs) was one of the most influential and widely read books of the age. Far from seeing the Middle Ages as a lost Age of Faith, Foxe regarded the thousand years before the Reformation as the millennium of Satan's rule prophesied by the Biblical Book of Daniel.

WALES, SCOTLAND, IRELAND

Henry VIII was an international figure beyond his support of Renaissance humanism; he was also a colonizing monarch, if largely confining his efforts to what is now the United Kingdom and northeast France. A continual thread that runs through the history of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is the recurrence of struggles by the Irish, Scots, and Welsh to remain independent—and, in the other direction, the struggle of the English to control them. English power reached an early peak around 1300, when the English were able to exert at least loose control over the greater part of Ireland as well as over Scotland and Wales. In all three areas the English faced continuing resistance, however. Scotland was able to re-establish its position as an independent kingdom; in Ireland, the English control diminished to a relatively small area surrounding Dublin known as "the Pale"; and in Wales, though the Normans had managed to install "English" settlers in many of the more fertile lowland areas, the mountainous regions remained very largely a traditional society that was effectively independent of English rule. When a Welshman, Henry VII, became King of England in 1485, however, administrative control of Wales from London began to harden. The process culminated under Henry VIII with the Acts of Union of 1536–43: the old Welsh areas of lordships were converted into shires on the English model, and the Welsh code of law was brought into conformity with its English counterpart. The traditional Welsh kinship system, under which equal inheritance among all male children was the norm, was replaced by a system of primogeniture, with John Speed, "Map of Ireland Divided into Several Provinces, and then again divided into counties, newly described," from the first atlas of the British Isles, Speed's Theatre of the Empire of Great Britain (1612). The division of Ireland into counties by the English that Speed references in the map's title had begun after the Anglo-Norman invasion centuries earlier, but was not completed until the early seventeenth century.

In most respects the map is, by the standards of the day, reasonably accurate; interestingly, however, the islands are represented as being closer together than is actually the case, with the strait separating north-eastern Ireland from Scotland and the rest of the British Isles represented as being less than half as wide as it is in reality.

The six figures to the bottom left are labeled "The Gentleman of Ireland," "The Gentlewoman of Ireland" (top row); "The Civil Irish Woman" and "The Civil Irish Man" (middle row); and "The Wild Irish Man" and "The Wild Irish Woman" (bottom row). Details of the latter two are shown at left.

land typically held on a freehold basis. Interestingly, though, the Welsh language does not seem to have been threatened during this period, despite English incursions into Welsh custom and culture.

Under Thomas Cromwell, Henry VIII's chief minister in the 1530s, the English attempted the same sort of "reforms" in Ireland that had been imposed in Wales—with much less success. Along with changes to traditional kinship systems, the English attempted to bring about the same religious changes in Ireland that were occurring in England: royal rather than papal supremacy over the Church, the Bible to be read in the vernacular, and the dissolution of the monasteries. These English efforts met with only sporadic success, and Henry did not push the point; it was not until the 1570s, when Elizabeth I's government found itself increasingly threatened by the aggressively expansionist Catholic regime of Philip II in Spain, that a more determined approach was taken toward "stubbornly" Catholic Ireland. Several revolts that had been encouraged by Spain were suppressed, and England resumed its efforts to colonize Irish territories (particularly in the north) that had been abandoned in the early fourteenth century. Ireland continued to be a thorn in the side of the English government, however. In one notable episode, Elizabeth's favorite courtier, Robert Devereux, the Earl of Essex, pressed the Queen for permission to lead an army against an Irish rebellion in 1599 led by the Earl of Tyrone. As had many before him, Essex found Irish resistance stronger than he had expected, was forced to make peace with Tyrone (against the Queen's orders), and returned to London in disgrace. (When he responded to his banishment from court by attempting a coup against the Queen, she suppressed his revolt far more successfully than he had managed to suppress that of Tyrone: Essex was beheaded in 1601.)

The English poet Edmund Spenser spent most of the last twenty years of his life in Ireland, where he had gone in 1580 to take up a position as secretary and aide to the Lord Deputy of Ireland. A View of the Present State of Ireland, published posthumously as well as anonymously but generally attributed to Spenser, gives a sense of the brutal force to which the English often resorted in their efforts to break Irish resistance and colonize the land: relocation of entire communities to make way for English settlers, acts of wanton destruction aimed at intimidating the population, and even the destruction of crops were common. Things did not improve in the seventeenth century. When Irish forces revolted in the early 1640s against English brutality and the expropriation of the best land for newly arrived English colonists, a considerable number of English settlers were killed. In response, Oliver Cromwell led an army into Ireland that more than matched the killing spree of the rebels, who were completely defeated by 1650. (For selections from Spenser's View and also for documents relating to Cromwell's suppression of the Irish, see the website component of the anthology.)The 1652 Act of Settlement decreed that expropriations be continued until two-thirds of all Ireland was owned by Englishmen, and that the majority of the Irish population be settled in a single county. These terms were never fully enacted, but enough was done to ensure that Irish resentment of and resistance to English colonial policies would continue far into the future.

In the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries English and Scottish forces had fought a series of battles, perhaps the most important of which was the English victory at Flodden in 1513, a slaughter that put an end to an early Scottish Renaissance. Despite such defeats Scotland remained an independent kingdom. But as the sixteenth century went on, it was more and more a kingdom with significant internal divisions. Throughout these turbulent times, much of the Highlands of Scotland remained out of the fray: it was a world largely separate from the culture of Edinburgh, but unlike Edinburgh's, a traditional and far less literate clan-based culture. In the Lowland areas (most importantly, the east-west stretch of Lowland in which both Glasgow and Edinburgh are located), English had long been the preferred language, a market economy had taken root, and after 1560 John Knox and his Scottish Presbyterian reformers had assumed a dominant position in society. At this point, as a result of royal marriages, Scotland was technically a province of France; Mary Stuart, Queen of Scotland and Queen Consort of France, had assumed the throne in Scotland and was advancing a claim to be Queen of England too. (Mary resided in France, and—somewhat confusingly for the modern student—was represented in Scotland by her mother, Mary of Guise, who acted as regent.) With French troops entering Scotland it indeed seemed that the English throne might be under threat, but with the assistance of English soldiers and English financing, Knox and the Scots Protestant faction won the day; under the terms of the 1560 Treaty of Edinburgh, French troops left Scotland and Knox's Protestants were left in effective control. Mary, Queen of Scots was allowed to hold the throne in Scotland, but only on the condition that she renounce all claims to that of England. (Mary, a Catholic and cousin to Elizabeth I, in fact never renounced that claim, and remained a thorn in Elizabeth's side until England executed Mary for treason.)

When Mary's son came to the throne as James VI of Scotland, however, and particularly when he also assumed the English throne in 1603 as James I of England, relations between Scotland and England assumed a different footing. James began to press for a full union between the two, but his proposals met with a good deal of resistance (the politics of which are, indirectly, the subject of much of the action of Shakespeare's King Lear [1606]). It was not until 1707 that the process begun by James culminated in the Act of Union joining England and Scotland under one parliament as well as one monarch.

EDWARD VI, MARY I, AND ELIZABETH I

Henry VIII was succeeded in 1547 by his 10-year-old son, Edward (the third of Henry's wives, Jane Seymour, had finally provided him with a male heir). The boy's uncle, Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, acted as Lord Protector. Though Edward's reign was short, it was not uneventful. Edward, his uncle, and other important figures of the time (such as Thomas Cranmer, the Archbishop of Canterbury) were more Protestant than Henry VIII had been, and more influenced by John Calvin. They accelerated the move away from Catholic practices and doctrines that had begun late in Henry's reign.

Edward died in 1553, however, and the move toward Protestantism was thrown into reverse with the accession to the throne of Mary I (not to be confused with the two Marys discussed above, Mary, Queen of Scots and Mary of Guise). Mary, daughter of Henry VIII by Catherine of Aragon, had remained a Roman Catholic and in 1554 married Philip of Spain (later to become Philip II). Among the many controversial measures Mary put into effect were the restoration of the Catholic Mass in Latin, the banning of the newly produced Book of Common Prayer, and the reaffirmation of the authority of the Pope over the Church of England. She earned the grim nickname "Bloody Mary" when she authorized the execution of various Protestant leaders, including Thomas Cranmer at Smithfield, from 1555 to 1558. In all, some 300 men and women were burned at the stake during Mary's reign.[1]

Yet the long-term effect of Mary's rule was to strengthen English Protestantism, and English nationalism as well. The image of the martyrs burnt at Smithfield was etched in the English consciousness through the accounts in John Foxe's Book of Martyrs as a lasting image of the evils of Catholic rule, and when in 1558 Mary managed to lose Calais, England's last remaining possession on the continent, in an ill-judged attempt to defend some of her husband's interests on the other side of the English Channel, the loss united the country against her. She died in November of that same year; as the Elizabethan historian Raphael Holinshed put it shortly thereafter, she had neither "the favor of God, nor the hearts of her subjects, nor the love of her husband." After 25 years of religious turmoil and violence the stage was set for the religious settlement of 1559 and for the long, stable, relatively consistent, and relatively tolerant Protestant reign of Elizabeth I. The stage was set as well for the English to feel an unprecedented sense of confidence and indeed arrogance as to their place in the world; this, said Foxe in his Book of Martyrs, was an "elect nation."

Detail of woodcut illustration showing Thomas Cranmer being burnt at the stake, from the 1563 edition of Foxe's Book of Martyrs.

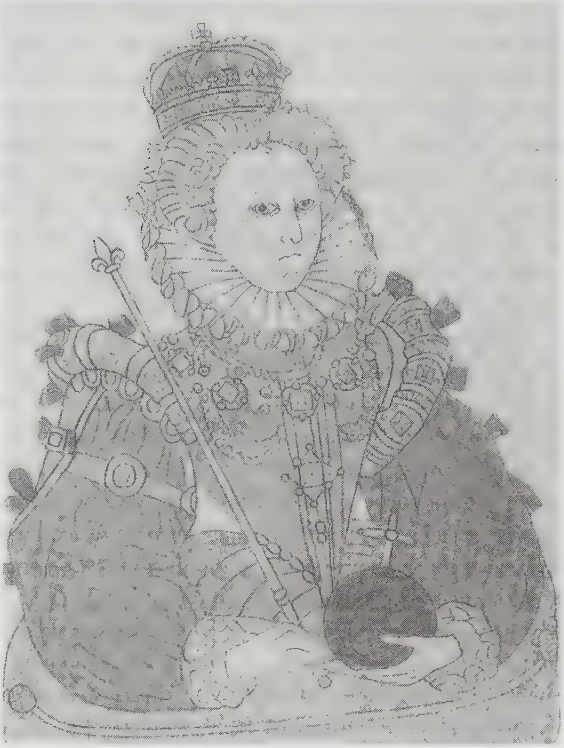
ELIZABETH I AND GENDER

Perhaps the best known gender-related comment of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries is John Knox's 1557 outburst against "this monstrous regiment of women" ("regiment" here means rule). Knox, the Scottish Protestant leader, was at odds not only with Mary, Queen of Scots, and her regent, Mary of Guise (Mary's French mother), but also with Mary I, Queen of England: all of them Catholic, all of them opposed to most of the reforms for which Knox was pressing. (Ironically, Knox was one of the very few to advocate universal education for females as well as for males.) He found the Protestant regime of Elizabeth I, who came to the English throne the next year, considerably less monstrous, but his phrase has retained currency as a memorable expression of the almost universal feeling among men in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that it was far more appropriate for men to rule over women than for a woman to "reign and have empire above men" (in Knox's words). To the extent that a woman was perceived by men to have intelligence or good judgment in matters of state, men tended also to think of her as manly.

---

[1] Appalling as this number is, numbers in some areas of continental Europe were far higher; somewhere in the neighborhood of 6,000 people accused of heresy were burned by Charles V in the Low Countries.

Elizabeth I was a figure who both exemplified conventional notions of gender and stood as the great exception. From the moment she came to the throne in 1558 she ruled with diplomacy, but also with sure-handed authority. Against a background of the violent upheavals of Mary's reign, of many Catholics continuing to hold positions of influence (including control of the House of Lords), of militant Protestants pressing to establish a "perfect school of Christ" throughout the land and controlling the House of Commons, and against threats from abroad (particularly from the powerful Catholic monarchy in Spain), Elizabeth dexterously negotiated a religious settlement that established a stable, relatively moderate Protestant state. She negotiated compromises with Parliament that resulted in the Supremacy Bill of 1559, which established her as "Supreme Governor" of the Church of England (not "Supreme Head," a more controversial title) and reintroduced the Book of Common Prayer. In 1563 she set out the Thirty-nine Articles, the theological foundation of the Church of England, further establishing religious uniformity. It was mandated that there were to be 9,000 parishes (in theory, enabling everyone in England to walk to church), and that a hierarchy would be maintained in the Church so that the world of faith would continue to mirror the world of politics. The Church of England was established as a national church, and attendance was far from voluntary. By the standards of the time, however, Elizabeth was no extremist: while some "heretics" were executed, the relative religious calm of her reign is set in stark relief by comparison to the continent, where over the same period invasion, slaughter, and religious turmoil remained the norm.



Portrait of Elizabeth I, from the manuscript miscellany of Thomas Trevelyon. Trevelyon's collection includes a record of important events of each year, decorative alphabets, and embroidery patterns, as well as a variety of other portraits.

It should not be imagined that the Elizabethan Settlement satisfied everyone. Many, often called "Recusants," felt varying degrees of loyalty to Rome, a loyalty that led some to flee to the continent and others to risk their lives by committing such crimes as hiding Catholic priests or encouraging the Catholic underground press. Many others, on the other hand, felt strongly that the new Church, with its retention of the old hierarchy of bishops and lower clergy, with a liturgy still closely modeled on that of the Catholic Mass, and with many other trappings of the old Church, had been insufficiently purged of Catholic elements. In such feelings were sown the seeds of Puritanism, the movement for greater "purity" of religion that would form one side of the religious debate that reached its zenith under Oliver Cromwell during the civil wars and led some to leave England for the Americas. Under Elizabeth, though, the tenor of such opposition was as yet one of resentment rather than revolution.

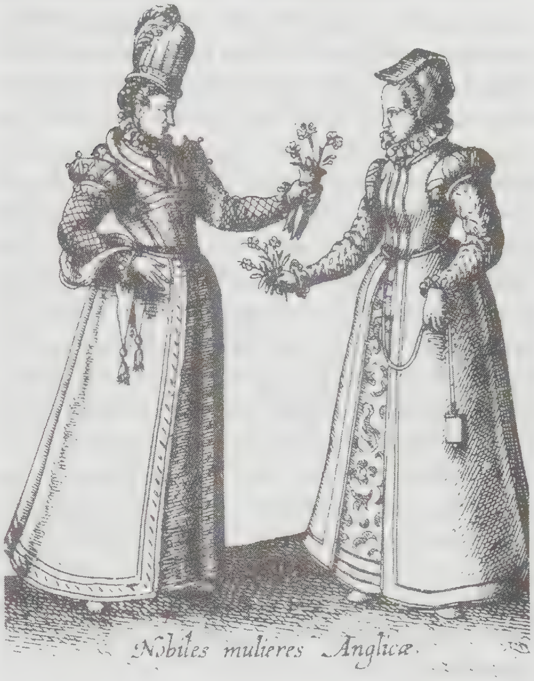
If diplomacy on Elizabeth's part was essential to reach a religious settlement, a willingness to exercise power ruthlessly was sometimes necessary to maintain it. As Elizabeth repeatedly demonstrated (perhaps most dramatically in her reluctant decision to sign the death warrant of her cousin, Mary, Queen of Scots, when evidence seemed to suggest that Mary had been involved in a Catholic plot against her), she was prepared to do whatever was necessary to remain in power and maintain the peace. And when war with Spain became inevitable, she marshaled sufficient financial and military resources to enable her commanders to stave off the threat. After some wavering, she sent troops to France to help Henri IV battle his Catholic enemies, and other troops to help the Netherlands in their revolt against Spain.

Yet for all her sure-handedness in exercising power, Elizabeth contrived to remain throughout her reign an icon of female virtues—although of course stressing the virginal ideal, not the maternal, as Elizabeth never married or had children. In part this was possible through a sleight-of-hand accomplished by lawyers and other advisors who, exploiting the old concept of the "king's two bodies," theorized that the Queen embodied an immortal "body politic" that was without gender and without defect, together with a "body natural" that was entirely human in character. Yet despite some grumblings over her refusal to marry and some evidence of exasperation with her tendency to delay, Elizabeth was for the most part admired, even worshiped, as both a woman and a monarch. She built up around her a glittering court and a culture of courtesy, grace, performance, and display that fostered an extraordinarily productive cultural outpouring, and that glorified (if sometimes with subtle reservations) her own person as the center around which all else revolved. Elizabeth, Edmund Spenser explained in the letter to Sir Walter Ralegh that accompanied The Faerie Queene, was both Belphœbe, a beautiful maiden who represented the Queen as a woman, and Gloriana, who represented the "most excellent and glorious person of our sovereign the queene and her kingdome in Faery land." Elizabeth was thus both a woman and a queen, a virgin queen. Much as she had ample romantic and political opportunity to marry, and much as her advisors pressed her to remember the importance of producing an heir, Elizabeth must have realized that marriage would entail a loss of power, and a loss too of the special aura that had grown up around her. For most women in English society, marriage brought a loss of power: whereas a single woman could act as a legal entity in owning property or being a party to legal agreements, all such rights passed over on marriage to the husband. Elizabeth's situation as monarch was of course different, but even for her, marriage would have brought with it an expectation of submission to male authority.

Nor was it only marriage that would have brought a diminution of authority: for Elizabeth to have openly acknowledged her sexuality in any way other than the virginal would have badly damaged her mystique.

Why did "virgin" resonate so differently in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries than it does today? Some have suggested that the bifurcation in many male minds of opinions concerning woman—a bifurcation that had taken strong hold in the late-medieval period—may have deepened in the sixteenth century. Certainly that was a dichotomy with wide-ranging roots, some of which may be found in Christian traditions of ambivalence toward sex. Along with the growth in the exaltation of the Virgin Mary in the late-medieval period had grown a widespread (albeit far from universal) habit of venerating woman only if in a "pure" or asexual state. Alongside that paradigm had grown its polar opposite, one in which womanhood was associated with temptation, impure sexuality, and fleshly sin. Too often, perhaps, little lay in between. Yet the issue is resistant to easy explanation; the dangers of oversimplification in this area cannot be too strongly stressed. The Reformation in general led to an increased emphasis on the virtues of marriage, and Protestant England in particular vigorously privileged marriage. Throughout the period the Church accepted the reality a marriage could be annulled if a wife refused to have sexual relations with her husband; indeed, outright rejection of the flesh would have been heretical. That said, disgust with the flesh did certainly remain widespread—and some found it easy to project upon the female objects of their lust the disgust or anxiety that their culture had encouraged them to feel not so much about woman per se, but about sexual desire. Such misogynistic projections, all too common in other forms around the globe, remained a staple of English culture in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (and are of course not dead yet). When poets thought of "false love" as Walter Ralegh did, for example, in terms of "a gilded hook that holds a poisoned bait," many found it hard to resist locating the source of the poison in women rather than in their male speakers.[1] Seventeenth-century male writers also not infrequently sexualized religious controversy by reading the religious other as problematically female; Ben Jonson parodies such rhetoric when he has his Puritan character, Tribulation, speak of standing up "against the menstruous cloth and rag of Rome," referring to the deep red vestments worn by the clergy in the Roman Catholic Church. And early seventeenth-century popular pamphlets such as Joseph Swetnam's An Arraignment of Lewd, Idol, Froward, and Unconstant Women (1615) excited considerable controversy over their attacks on women.

What did women think of all this? The literature of the period is overwhelmingly male-authored, but a few female voices found their way into print. Aemilia Lanyer (1569–1645), for example, one of the first women in England to publish her own poems (and to have obtained patronage in the way that was conventional for male poets), put forward in her Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum a bold and cogent denial that Eve was chiefly to blame for the Fall of Man: "Your fault being greater," she asked, "why should you disdain our being your equals, free from tyranny?" Swetnam was also answered directly by Rachel Speght and others, and even figured in a play devoted to his discomfiture. It is probably as unwise to read the texts in this "querelle des femmes" with utter seriousness (some are riotous and hyperbolic in the way of much Renaissance satire) as it would be to dismiss the reality of the issues and the subtle thought that the (often female) defenders of women writers put into their arguments.



Nobiles mulieres Angliæ.

English Noblewomen. Detail of an engraving c. 1582 by Flemish artist Georg Hoefnagel.

In sum, expressions of misogyny in Renaissance England were not always utterly serious and were countered by other voices, both male and female—but misogyny was nevertheless a daily reality. Women, even rich and well-born women, lived with what by modern standards were severe restrictions, legally and socially, on what they could do or be. That so many middle- and upper-class women did manage to write, to learn, to influence political, religious, and cultural life is both a testament to their determination and a reminder that social status was often just as important as gender in determining what a person could or could not do.[2]

---

[1] It should be noted, however, that in many such instances what may look like misogyny in the work of sophisticated poets may be tempered by irony and self-mockery.

[2] The restrictions imposed upon the poor, indeed, were more severe than were gender-based restrictions.

Modern scholarship has extensively explored these issues; in recent years it has also recognized more fully the ways in which sexuality and gender are not entirely essential, but are mediated by the larger culture. For example, recent studies have explored the frequent sixteenth- and seventeenth-century assumption, derived from ancient medical theories, that women are the same as men but, so to speak, inside out and born without enough vital heat to "perfect" them into maleness. And scholars have explored a number of aspects of the history of sexual behavior during the period. It appears, for example, that although sodomy as such was illegal (and loosely defined), the laws against it were not rigorously enforced. Research suggests too that the early modern period was much less anxious than were the next several centuries about the auto-erotic. Thomas Nashe's notorious "Choice of Valentines"—also known as "Nashe's Dildo"—is an important literary example here. (Though Nashe's work was not published at the time, early modern curiosity about masturbation, particularly that by women, is also evident in other literature of the period, both in England and on the continent.)

HOMOEROTICISM AND CROSS-DRESSING

Research of the past generation has also increased our appreciation of the ways in which same-sex desire is mediated by history and by culture, and our awareness of the complexity of the issues involved. In any historical or cultural context it is important to distinguish between homosexuality (a term that did not exist until the late nineteenth century), and homoeroticism, which takes a wide variety of historically and culturally determined forms that might or might not involve the adoption of a specific sexual identity. In reading back into history it is far from easy for the modern reader always to keep in mind the ways in which same-sex desire differs from era to era in its meaning and modes of expression.[1]

That said, one of the most striking developments of English literature of the early modern period is the widespread appearance of same-sex eroticism. Not surprisingly, given the transgressive nature of such love at the time, it does so in an often conflicted or ambiguous fashion, frequently adopting as a model the conventions of male-female love. In Shakespeare's twentieth sonnet, for example—one of the sonnets that first indicates his speaker's love of another man as a central theme—the poet exploits some of the tropes of Petrarchan poetry in contrasting this love with that of "false" women:

> A woman's face with Nature's own hand painted
> Hast thou, the master-mistress of my passion;
> A woman's gentle heart, but not acquainted
> With shifting change, as is false women's fashion;
> An eye more bright than theirs, less false in rolling.

The poem is perhaps the most famous expression of ambiguity in Shakespeare's sonnets, one that both admits and denies simultaneously. The lover imagines his beloved, the "master-mistress of my passion" as once a woman (though less false than women are), but now remade by Nature into a man. Since, says the speaker, Nature has "added one thing [i.e., a penis] to my purpose nothing" and "pricked him out" to be male, women can have the use of his body and the speaker can have his love. At first this seems like a denial that the love in question is homosexual or even homoerotic, but as recent critics have been quick to point out, the puns on "nothing" (slang for vagina) and "prick" (slang for a penis) make the denial look far less certain.

The nature of homoeroticism in literature was not always openly acknowledged by the writers of the time even when it was openly expressed. Of some of his clearly homoerotic sonnets, for example, Richard Barnfield offered utterly implausible denials of the clear sense of his verse, saying that he had merely been trying to write like Virgil. (Imitating the classics proved to be useful in giving homoerotic verse a good cover story, so to speak; by taking as his model Virgil's second eclogue, for instance, Marlowe could make his shepherd's invitation to "Come Live with Me" less certainly addressed to a female "nymph.") But the groundbreaking literary expressions are quite real. In this as in so many other respects, Shakespeare and Marlowe (in this case along with Barnfield, a much lesser poet) were pioneers; they are the first literary figures we know of in the 1590s to write openly and unequivocally homoerotic literature.[1] Marlowe imagines Neptune making a pass at the naked young Leander as he swims the Hellespont in the poem Hero and Leander, and in his play Edward II depicts the King's alienation from his kingdom and his wife in direct consequence of being "love sick for this minion," Lord Gaveston. (In the end Edward is reduced to a despairing hope that he may have "some nook or corner left / To frolic with" his "dearest Gaveston.") Barnfield is more explicit, whatever his odd denials in his prefatory material, about the transgressive nature of the desires being expressed: "If it be sin to love a lovely lad / Oh then sin I."

---

[1] For example, the late fourteenth-century expressions of love by the famous theologian Anselm of Bec (included in the first volume of this anthology) while making no explicit sexual references, are as fervent when addressed to men as they are when addressed to women; these expressions of love may well have been written without sexual intent, but are likely to seem to modern readers highly charged with eroticism.

We have only minimal evidence as to whether the homoerotic expressions of feeling by any of these poets extended beyond the literary. In the case of Shakespeare, at least, we know that such expressions did not preclude marriage and children. More generally, we know that "cross-over" activity of several sorts was characteristic of the age. When Marlowe's Gaveston paints an idyllic picture of the world he desires, for example, it is one featuring "men like satyrs grazing on the lawns" but also young men resembling women:

> Sometime a lovely boy in Diane's shape,
> With hair that guilds the water as it glides,
> Crownets of pearl about his naked arms
> And in his sportful hands an olive tree,
> To hide those parts which men delight to see …

The place of female homoeroticism, let alone lesbianism, in sixteenth-century England is largely unclear. What we call "lesbianism" was certainly recognized in the early modern period, although the vocabulary differed from our own (a woman involved with another woman was more often called a "tribade" than "lesbian" or "Sapphic"). In general such love seems to have aroused much less anxiety than did male same-sex love. It did arouse curiosity, but there remained a good deal of ignorance as to the realities of same-sex love; it seems to have been a widespread assumption, for example, that same-sex love amongst women would inevitably entail such sex aids as dildos.

Despite some vague flirtations with the topic by Spenser (a woman falls in love with his armed female knight in Book III of The Faerie Queene, for example) and by Shakespeare (in whose plays the matter of gender and sexuality is complicated by the fact that boy actors took the roles of women, with effects that are not entirely clear from this historical distance), female-female eroticism is much less evident in the literature of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries than is its male counterpart. One of the few extant literary expressions of such feeling is an elegy by John Donne, that perhaps takes as a model some French poems, in which Sappho expresses her homoerotic longing for her friend "Philaenis." Somewhat later in the seventeenth century, however, representations of such desire begin to appear in some profusion, particularly in the visual arts. In literature the most widely discussed seventeenth-century representations of such desire, more ambiguously expressed, appear in Katherine Philips's poems to her "dearest Lucasia." Philips writes that "there's a religion in our love"; it remains uncertain whether such love is homosexual, homoerotic, or the expression of intense female bonding, a celebration of friendship that may seem more sexual to a modern eye than it seemed at the time. (It is wise to remember that powerful declarations of friendship were less likely to be read as homoerotic in early modern times than they are now, whatever the actual psychodynamics involved.)

---

[1] The importance of this aspect of Shakespeare's writing has only relatively recently begun to be fully and openly acknowledged. The 1609 publication of the sonnets excited no comment that has come down to us. Though some eighteenth-century editions of Shakespeare included the sonnets, others omitted them on clearly homophobic grounds. George Stevens, for example, the editor of a multi-volume edition of Shakespeare's works published in 1793, declared that it was "impossible to read this fulsome panegyric, addressed to a male object, without an equal measure of disgust and indignation." In the nineteenth century some (such as Robert Browning) regarded Shakespeare as representing a pinnacle in the history of sonnet writing in English, but others were distressed. Henry Hallam, for example, found it "impossible not to wish that Shakespeare had never written" the sonnets. And as late as 1930 published comments continued to allude with discomfort to the poems' homoeroticism: as Herbert Thurston wrote in that year, "regretfully as we must say it, the sonnets in their plain and obvious meaning point to a plague spot." It is only relatively recently, then, that the homoeroticism of the sonnets has ceased to be regarded as a taint—and that the poems themselves have been accepted unequivocally and universally as central to the Shakespearian canon. Some in the general public, though, are still taken aback to discover that, for example, the sonnet "Let me not to the marriage of true minds admit impediment" does not refer to heterosexual marriage.

A common literary motif throughout the period is the assumption by a protagonist of a cross-gendered disguise. One of the male heroes of Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, for example, assumes a female disguise as an "Amazon" and is even identified as "she" for the greater part of that work. Shakespeare, too, imagines strong and resourceful female figures (played of course by boys) who at some point pretend to be men, such as Viola in Twelfth Night, Rosalind in As You Like It, Portia in The Merchant of Venice, and Helena in All's Well That Ends Well. Evidently such behavior existed occasionally in real life as well, although not so much among the well-born: Moll Cutpurse, the lead character of The Roaring Girl, a popular 1611 comedy by Thomas Dekker and Thomas Middleton, seems to have been modeled on Mary Frith, a woman notorious for (among other things) dressing as a man.

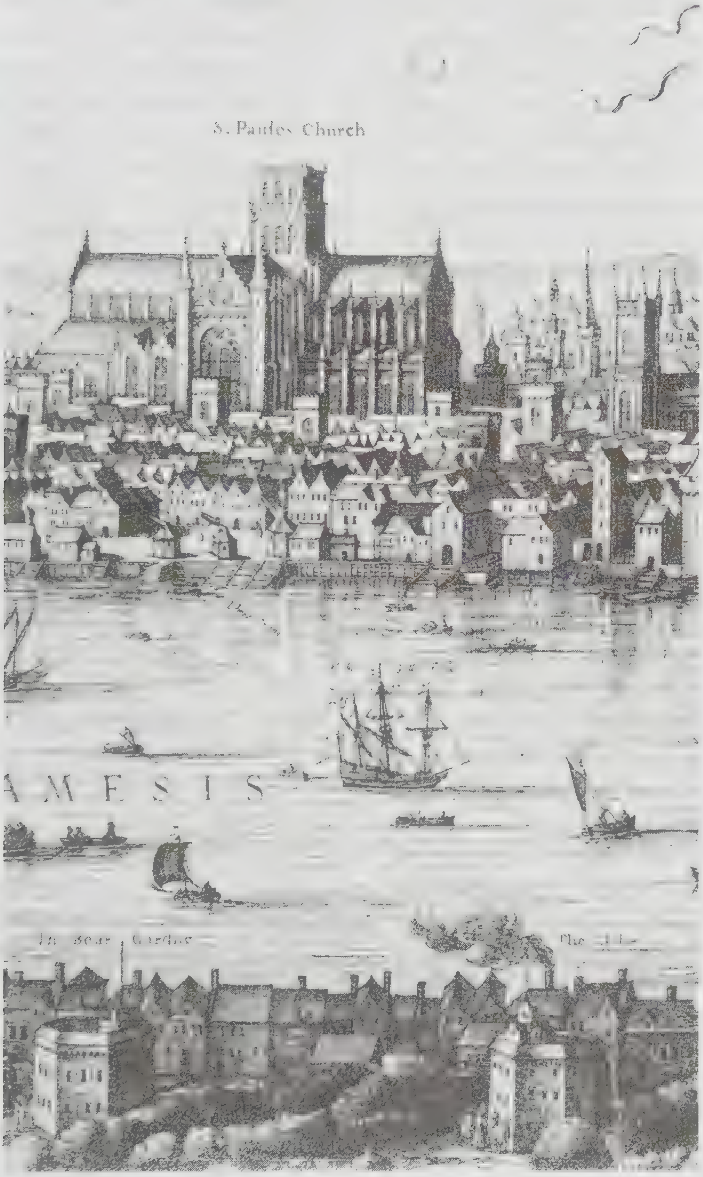
Economy and Society in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries

Economic life in Britain over this period was as paradoxical as it was two centuries later during what we now call the Industrial Revolution. Although there was nothing like the explosion of technology in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, there were revolutionary changes in the economy and in industry—"industry" in the sense of how people worked, at what they worked, how much they worked, and what they received in exchange for their labor. The roots of these changes extend back into the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The Black Death in 1348–49 wiped out at least a third and perhaps as much as half of the population; the best guess is that the population of Britain did not recover to its pre-1348 levels until the seventeenth century. That catastrophic drop in population led to a surplus of grain (or, to be more precise, a surplus in grain-growing capacity) in the rural areas, and to a labor shortage in the towns as well as on the land. Inevitably, many young people were lured to the towns by the prospect of work in one or another of a variety of trades, and despite the best efforts of the authorities, real wages for such work increased significantly through the later Middle Ages. Whereas in the mid-fourteenth century the economy of England had still been overwhelmingly agricultural, with most rents paid "in kind" (in the form of grain or other agricultural goods) rather than in money, by the end of the sixteenth century approximately half the English population relied entirely on money wages.

If some were lured to the towns, others were driven there by a process usually referred to as "enclosure." Under the feudal system, those who worked the land did not own it. As large land holders decided that their fields could be put to use more profitably as grazing land for cattle or, especially, sheep, those lands that had typically been without hedges, fences, or other means of enclosure, and farmed on a largely communal basis by the peasantry, were enclosed, thereby depriving many of their livelihood.[1] John Rous, chaplain to the Earl of Warwick in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, described what happened in such circumstances with chilling concision: "all the inhabitants were expelled." To Rous, the plagues of former times were now being succeeded by a "plague of avarice," and he was far from alone in his outrage; indeed, enclosure was condemned by a chorus of voices in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. When a character in More's Utopia says that nowadays sheep eat men, he captures in one comic and yet horrifying expression the full effect of enclosures. The pace of enclosures in fact slowed considerably in the first half of the sixteenth century (with the exception of a period following the dissolution of the monasteries and the distribution by Henry VIII of many of their lands to his allies among the gentry and nobility). But the growth in population now meant that there was often a surplus of labor in the towns. Real wages for the majority were in decline through most of the sixteenth century, reaching their nadir in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries.

---

[1] Economic matters were of course the primary issues of concern here, but they were not the only ones: in 1514, for example, London apprentices protested the enclosure of open fields outside the city, which they had traditionally used for sports and games, by tearing up the newly planted hedges.

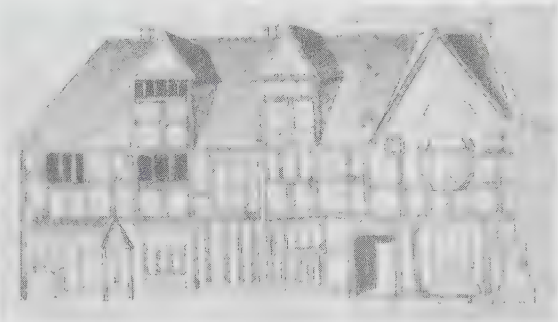


S. Paules Church
AMESIS
The Bear Garden
The Globe

Claes Jansz Visscher, detail from a panoramic view of London (1616). "The Bear Garden" and the Rose Theatre (mislabeled as "The Globe") both appear on the south bank of the Thames.

The practice of enclosure was particularly common in the south of England; a large proportion of the wool from sheep raised on the enclosed pastureland was exported to Flanders, and in particular to Antwerp, center of the cloth industry. By the early sixteenth century the English economy had become to a large degree based on the trade of raw materials—lead, iron, tin, and coal as well as wool and livestock. That pattern now began to change, with considerable growth, particularly in the textile industry. (Many weavers from Flanders had immigrated to England in pursuit of cheaper wool.) Many finished goods were still imported, but towns in both England and Scotland were diversifying and acquiring new economic capabilities. This tendency toward specialization and division of labor often involved entire towns as well as individuals. Thus Newcastle became known for coal production, Coventry and Norwich for textile production, Northampton for leather goods, Glasgow and Perth for various sorts of manufacturing, and Edinburgh for silverware and jewelry. By far the greatest diversification (and the greatest growth) occurred in London, which grew from a population of about 50,000 in 1500, to about 100,000 in 1570, to about 200,000 in 1600, and to 500,000 in 1650, becoming what was probably the largest city in the world.[1] Such growth was a mixed blessing. Despite the "bill of sewers" put forward under the auspices of Thomas More and passed by Parliament in 1531, sanitation could not keep up with population growth, and much of London had a foul smell most of the time. It also became a city largely blackened by soot; the introduction of chimneys in the mid-sixteenth century enabled households and businesses alike to switch from wood fires to coal—a more efficient heat source, but also more polluting.

By comparison, other urban centers, despite their growth, were tiny. In the late sixteenth century Norwich had a population of approximately 13,000; Edinburgh, Dublin, Bristol, and Newcastle each had approximately 10,000; and Glasgow, Exeter, York, Coventry, and Limerick all had about 5,000. The population of England as a whole seems to have risen from something over 2,000,000 in the early sixteenth century, to about 4,000,000 by 1600, to over 5,000,000 in the mid-seventeenth century. Over the same period, the population of Scotland rose from about 600,000 to perhaps 900,000 by 1600; that of Wales went from just under 250,000 to over 400,000; and that of Ireland from around 1,000,000 to around 1,500,000. In England the percentage of the population living in urban areas thus increased from something like 5 percent in 1500 to between 10 and 15 percent in the mid-seventeenth century.

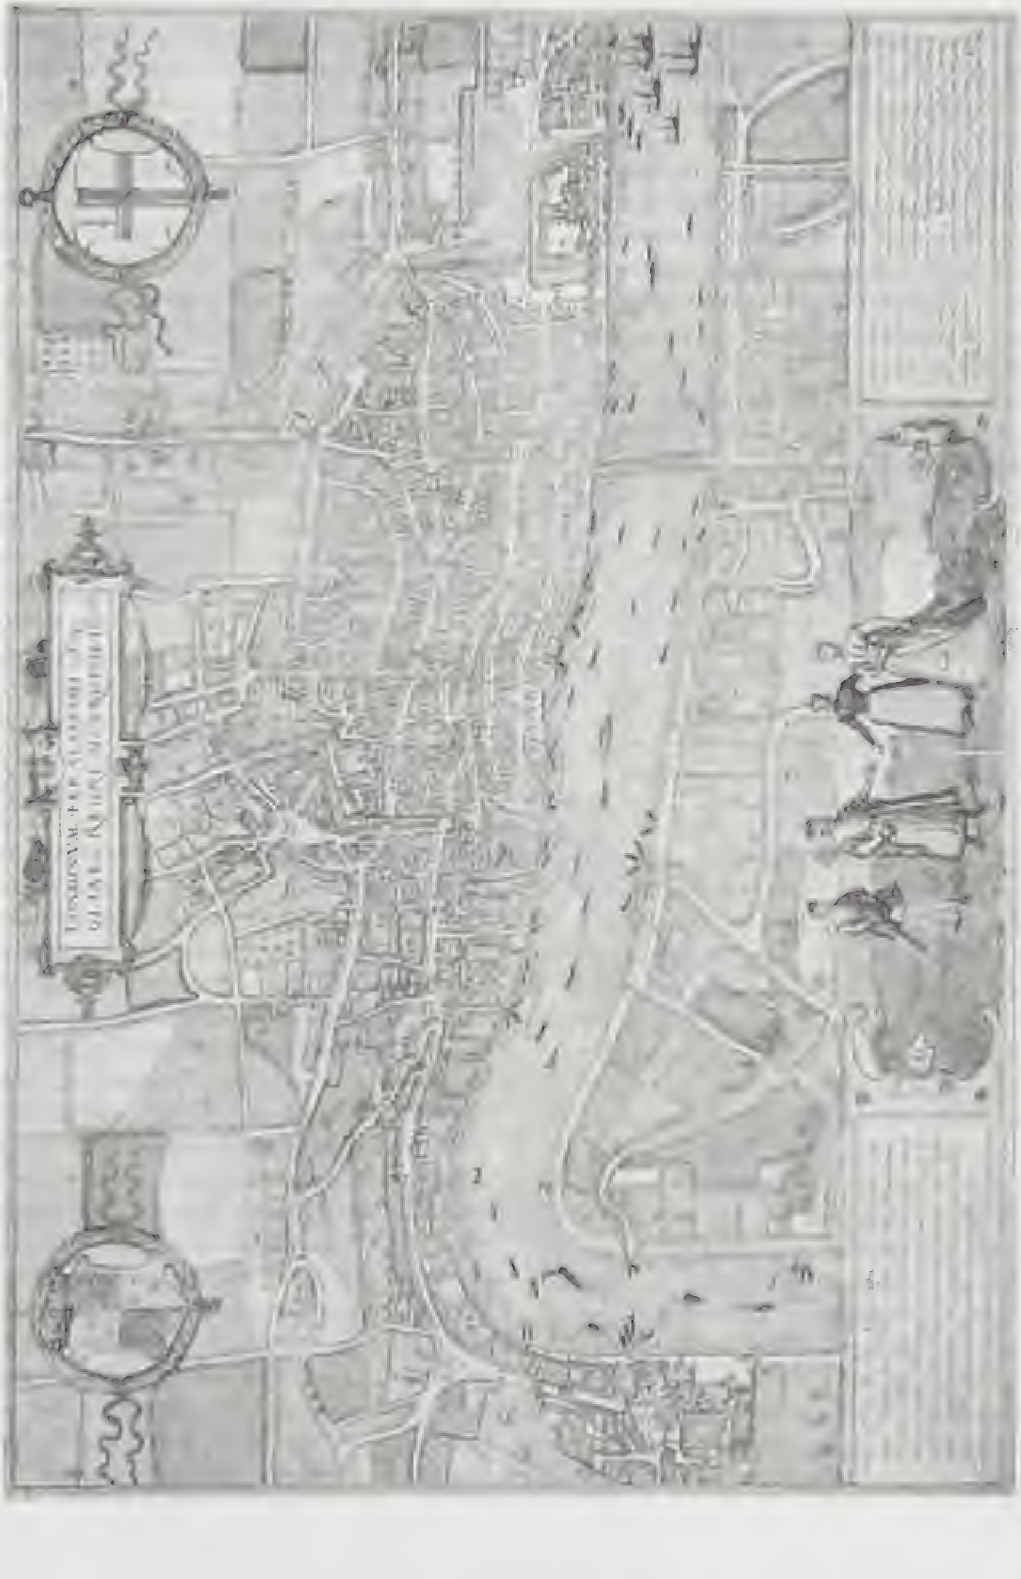


This 1762 watercolor by Richard Greene, one of the earliest representations of the house in Stratford-upon-Avon where Shakespeare was born, provides a clear image of the half-timbered style of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century urban architecture in England.

For city dwellers, even more than for rural folk, life was a perilous business. Roughly half of all those born did not reach adulthood. If one were lucky enough to get through one's teens, one might expect to live until "old age"—but "old age" was typically regarded as beginning at 50. Overall life expectancy with infant mortality taken into account was about 30. As a result of poor sanitation, mortality rates—particularly for infants—were higher in London. And so too was the risk of violence; though the level of violent crime has sometimes been exaggerated, its threat was a real presence, particularly during periods when the population had been swollen even more than usual by impoverished new arrivals, or when a larger than normal number of unemployed apprentices were roaming the streets.

---

[1] The populations of London and of England as a whole were of course still modest by modern standards, and it is unsurprising that so many of the leading figures of the day were acquainted with one another.



LONDINVM FERACISSIMI ANGLIAE REGNI METROPOLIS

Map of London, from "Orbis Terrarum," c. 1574

If a shift of people, of economic activity, and of wealth to the cities was one trend throughout the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a similar shift from the north to the south of England was another. The Wars of the Roses in the fifteenth century had drained the resources of a substantial proportion of the nobility of northern and western England, and the dissolution of the monasteries (which had been widely distributed throughout the realm) in the 1530s further depleted concentrations of wealth in the North and the Midlands. The southern concentration of the wool and textile industries then had the effect of increasing the shift of wealth from north to south. The merchant traders of Kingston upon Hull voiced a complaint of a sort common throughout the north when they blamed London for the decline of their own business:

> Item, by means of the said companies (the government whereof is ruled only in the city of London) all the whole trade of merchandise is in a manner brought to the city of London; whereby all the wealthy chapmen and the best clothiers are drawn to London, and other ports have in a manner no traffic, but falleth to a great decay, the smart where we feel in our port of Kingston upon Hull.

There was likewise a disparity between social and economic developments in England and those in Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. In the Lowlands of Scotland (and in particular the towns of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Perth) the pattern of development was not dissimilar to that of southern England, but in the Scottish Highlands small-scale agriculture continued to be the dominant mode of production, and the families of the nobility were often consumed in blood feuds. In Ireland there was a similar dichotomy, with economic growth and diversification in towns such as Cork, Waterford, and Limerick as well as in Dublin (and in the Pale generally), while other areas remained far less prosperous. During some periods, indeed, the Irish peasantry in the early modern period endured hardships comparable to those of the great famine of the 1840s. In 1582 to 1583 in Munster and again in 1602 to 1603 in Ulster, the English employed starvation as a means of subduing the Irish populace, with tens of thousands of deaths resulting in each case. In the wars of 1641–53 the toll was far worse, particularly following Cromwell's invasion of Ireland in 1649; several hundred thousand of the peasantry were either killed or displaced during this period.

In England, by contrast—much as the lot of the dispossessed and of wage laborers was often desperately unhappy, the economic turmoil of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries also brought to many others a level of prosperity that by the mid-seventeenth century was unprecedented; per capita, England in 1650 was the wealthiest nation in the world. How to explain this extraordinary economic growth? Part of the answer, some have argued, is Protestantism. At the heart of Calvinist belief in predestination and the "community of the elect" lies a widely noted paradox: for all of Luther's and especially Calvin's emphasis on the inherent sinfulness of humanity, the doctrines of predestination and of salvation through faith alone can in practice encourage self-confidence and a focus on the pursuit of prosperity. Not surprisingly, most people preferred to see themselves as elect and, despite warnings of Calvin and others, to read prosperity as a sign of God's approval. As the sociologist Max Weber put it a century ago in his famous analysis of this effect, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, Calvinist theology "in practice means God helps those who help themselves." (To be sure, primarily Catholic lands such as France and Italy also witnessed an increased accumulation and manipulation of capital; one did not need to be a Calvinist to be a smart merchant or a canny investor.)

The impact of Protestantism—especially in its Calvinist and Puritan strains—on economic life was no less powerful as a result of being indirect in its operation. Protestant cultures often showed an aversion to "sloth," and while many did not share a "Puritan" disapproval of traditional sports, games, the theater, and other pastimes, the period saw a substantial reduction in leisure time. Though "vacations" in the modern sense were unknown, it had become customary by the end of the Middle Ages not only to observe Sunday as a day of rest but also to celebrate a very large number of religious holidays (many of them in honor of saints that Protestants rejected)—so much so that some economic historians have calculated that a third of the year's 365 days may for most people have been leisure time in the early sixteenth century. Such was not the case by the late seventeenth century.

A further indirect but powerful influence on economic life was the Protestant emphasis on literacy. The initial motivation here was religious; in this respect Luther and Calvin (and many later Protestants) followed the evangelical (if also humanist) hopes of scholars such as Erasmus, who had declared that he wished that "even the weakest woman should read the Gospel … and I wish that [the books of the New Testament] were translated into all the languages so that they might be read and understood, not only by Scots and Irishmen, but also by Turks and Saracens.… I long that the husbandman should sing portions to himself as he follows the plough, that the weaver should hum them to the tune of his shuttle." But the literacy that was useful to a clearer understanding of the faith was also useful at work—for women as well as for men. Erasmus's dream of the rural husbandman who could read did not become a reality in this period; most of the rural population in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries remained illiterate. But in the towns there was a steady increase in the percentage of the population that could read and write. Thomas More's estimate in the 1530s that half the population could do so was probably high, but by the mid-sixteenth century almost all the aristocracy and landed gentry were literate, and by the early seventeenth century it is likely that more than half the adult population in the towns could read and write, certainly including a high percentage of merchants, shopkeepers, and their wives, who would often assist with bookkeeping. (Significantly, it was through merchant subsidy that the first municipal libraries in England were started, early in the seventeenth century.)

Religious change may have helped to create a climate conducive to economic transformation, but on its own it could neither create nor maintain the actual engines of capitalism. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in England saw these engines—at once exhilarating and appalling in the ferocity of their operation—being forged. At the most fundamental level, capitalism is a series of means of transferring financial resources from those unable or unwilling to use it productively to those who can exploit such resources to create a financial return. Until well into the sixteenth century, the wealthy (like the monarch) tended to store whatever wealth they were not planning to spend in the form of gold in the Tower of London. An important exception was the large stock of gold and silver valuables in the possession of the monasteries. The dissolution of the monasteries in the 1530s—and the distribution of their wealth to various of the nobility and the gentry—substantially increased the available supply of gold and silver, and with it demand for goldsmiths and silversmiths to fashion or refashion precious metal into a variety of forms. Sometime in the early seventeenth century many goldsmiths began as a service to offer to keep supplies of gold in whatever form in their vaults. They soon realized that only a very small percentage of the amounts they were holding for safe keeping would be removed by the owners over the course of any given period; with that in mind they began to lend out the "unused" gold themselves (or, as time went by, use promissory notes in lieu of the gold itself). The precedent for this sort of activity had been set on the continent: the first public bank is thought to have been founded in Venice in 1587, and the Bank of Amsterdam was founded in 1609. The development of banking in England was accelerated by the actions of Charles I in the 1630s. Adamantly refusing to summon Parliament, Charles was thus unable to raise funds to carry on the activities of the government (or of warfare) through what was by then the usual means, by passage of an Act of Parliament. One means to which he resorted in his desperation was simply to appropriate for the Crown gold belonging to others that had been stored in the Tower of London. Not surprisingly, the practice of keeping one's gold in the Tower became much less common thereafter, and the amounts stored with the goldsmiths of London (and thus available to be loaned out) greatly increased. Though the Bank of England itself would not be founded until 1694, in practice something resembling modern banking had by then been present in England for close to a century. Ben Jonson's Volpone (1607), set in Venice but informed very largely by the economic realities of the time in England, gives some sense of the workings of the English economic world, or at least of how they could be satirically imagined, and of the importance of credit to their operation. Early in the play Volpone declares that he rejects the "common way" of earning a living:

> … I use no trade, no venture;
> I ruin no earth with plowshares, Fat no beasts
> To feed the shambles [slaughterhouse]; have no > mills for iron,
> Oil, corn, or men, to grind them into powder;
> I blow no subtle glass, expose no ships
> To threat'nings of the furrow-faced sea;
> I turn no monies in the public bank,
> Nor usurer private.…

That "usurer private" was a well-known practice in the early seventeenth century is evident from a variety of literary sources. In The Warring Girl, for example, Sir Davy Dapper is described as "damned a usurer as ever was among Jews: if he were sure his father's skin would yield him any money, he would, when he dies, flea it off, and sell it to cover drums for children at Bartholomew Fair." Almost always spoken of in derogatory terms, and almost always associated with Jews,[1] moneylending was nevertheless becoming a more and more common practice throughout Christian society—and was thereby facilitating the very substantial economic growth of the seventeenth century.

Economic transformation brought with it massive change to England's class structure, if not always in legal definition then in social reality (to be a gentleman with a right to bear a coat of arms was a legal matter, and only the Crown could create a nobleman no matter what a person's fortune or fame). Much as the physical mobility of the labor force was wrenching and economically unfulfilling for many, for a considerable number of others the turmoil opened possibilities for real if usually limited social mobility. A 1508 legal document gives something of the flavor of what was possible, describing one Thomas Spring of the town of Lavenham in Suffolk as "cloth worker alias yeoman alias gentleman alias merchant." Spring had been accepted into the gentry (with the rank of Esquire) by the time he died, and his son was knighted. Perhaps the fullest literary expression in the late sixteenth century of such aspirations is to be found in the prose fiction of Thomas Deloney. Unlike most of the prose fiction writers from early in the century, Deloney had the benefit neither of a privileged background nor a university education; he was a silk weaver from Norwich who became well known in the early 1590s as a writer of ballads. Between 1596 and 1600 he produced four short works of prose fiction, all of which were extraordinarily popular. Deloney referred to aristocrats as "idle butterflies" and, whereas the norm for aspiring writers was to dedicate works to prominent members of the nobility in the hope of obtaining patronage from them, Deloney dedicated Jack of Newbury "to all famous cloth workers in England":

> Among all manual arts used in this land, none is more famous for desert or more beneficial to the commonwealth than is the most necessary art of clothing; and therefore as the benefit thereof is great, so are the professors of the same to be both loved and maintained.
>
> [… This] excellent commodity … half being and yet is the nourishing of many thousands of poor people. Wherefore to you, most worthy clothiers, do I dedicate this my rude work, which hath raised out of the dust of forgetfulness a most famous and worthy man, whose name was John Winchcomb, alias Jack of Newbury, of whose life and love I have briefly written, and in a plain and humble manner that it may be the better understood of those for whose sake I take pains to compile it. That is, for the well minded clothiers, that herein they may behold the great worship and credit which men of this trade have in former time come unto.

As the dedication suggests, Deloney challenges both literary convention and the significance of social class not by emphasizing the degree to which a wage worker is downtrodden, but by imagining the possibility that he may rise to become like Jack of Newbury who, although no gentleman born (or even a gentleman made), nevertheless "set continually 500 poor people at work to the great benefit of the commonwealth" through his success as a clothier, and who "had the choice of many wives—men's daughters of good credit and widows of great wealth." To his credit, Newbury chooses none of those but rather "one of his own servants, … knowing her careful in her business, faithful in her dealing and an

---

[1] Both during the Middle Ages before the expulsion of the Jews under Edward I, and after Cromwell's decision to re-admit them to England, Jews were barred from seeking employment in most occupations (and from all professions considered respectable); one of the few trades a Jew could legally pursue was that of moneylender.

¶ A briefe content of certaine clauſes of the Statutes of King Henrie the eyght, and Queene Marie, with ſome moderation thereof, and other prouiſions to be obſerued, according to her Maieſties Proclamation

aboue mentioned.

Mens apparell.

None ſhal weare in his apparell

Sylke of the colour Purple, cloth of Golde, or Siluer Tiſſued, nor Furre of Sables. — Vnder the degree of an Earle.

Cloth of Golde, Siluer, or Tinſell Satten.
Sylke, Cloth, Canuas, or any ſtuffe in any apparell, that ſhalbe myxed or imbrodered with any Gold or Siluer. — Vnder the degrée of a Baron.

Woollen clothe made out of the Realme, ſauing in Cappes only.
Veluet: Crymſon, Carnation, or Blewe.
Scarlet cloth.
Furres of: Blacke Jenets. or Luſernes.
Imbroderie, or Taylers worke, hauing Golde, or Siluer, or Pearle therin. Nor any Enamell, Muſke, Ambergrece, Agate, or any other pretious Stone, in Chayne, Button, or Aglet. Nor any Dublet, Jerkin, or other apparel of any ſtuffe perfumed. — Vnder the degree of: A Knight of the order, one of the priuie Counſel, or a Gentleman of the priuie Chamber.

Gownes, Clokes, Capes, or other vppermoſt garments — of Veluet.
Furres of Libardes.
Imbroderie, or Taylers worke like to imbroderie, with Sylke, Bugle, or any other like thing.
Nor any Cappes, Hats, Hatbandes, Capbands, Garters, Bootehoſe, trymmed with — Golde or Syluer.
Or Sylke neather Stockes.
Shertes, Shertbardes: garniſhed, mixte, or wrought with Golde.
Ruffes made or wrought out of Englande, commonly called Cutworke. — Vnder the degree of: A Barons ſonne, a knight, a Gentleman in ordinarie office, attending vpon her Maieſties perſon, or perſons that are aſſeſſed in the laſt ſubſidy books at. CC. li. lands, or fees.

None ſhal weare

Spurres, Swordes,
Rapiers,
Skaynes,
Woodknyues or Hangers.
Buckles of Gyrdles.

Damaſked, vnder the degree of: A Knight of the order. One of the priuie Counſell. A Gentleman of the priuie chamber.
Guylte, vnder the degree of a Knight.
Syluered, vnder the degrees and perſons before mentioned.

From a proclamation by Elizabeth I concerning apparel, 12 February 1580. For each rank separate restrictions on apparel are given, specifying who is allowed to wear particular colors or forms of decorative clothing (“furre of sables,” material “imbroidered with any Gold or Silver,” “Ruffes made or wrought out of England,” etc.).

excellent good housewife." It is telling from a number of angles that Jack of Newbury continued to be enormously popular throughout the seventeenth century.

Much of the social fluidity and economic and social mobility that developed through the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries came despite efforts by the government to control it. The 1563 statutes of artificers (i.e., concerning apprentices) declared the obligation of everyone to "toil" and declared as well the importance of "degree, priority, and place" as part of the natural order laid down by God. Through the second half of the sixteenth and the first half of the seventeenth centuries, however, it no longer seemed natural that dedication to work would act to support the existing system of "degree, priority, and place."

If the aspiring middle class threatened the old social order, so, too, did the increasing number of landless poor. In the face of the substantial increase in "vagrants and beggars" in the towns in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, authorities began to license beggars and to accept some formal responsibility for the poorest members of society. The culmination of this process came in the 1590s, a decade of extraordinary literary achievement, one that saw some of Shakespeare's greatest plays and his sonnets, the plays and poetry of Marlowe, the early plays of Ben Jonson, much of the secular poetry of John Donne, Spenser's The Faerie Queene, and the printing of Philip Sidney's Arcadia, Atrophil and Stella, and The Defense of Poesy. It was also a decade in which the court of Elizabeth I reached its glittering zenith and in which England, fresh from its defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588, experienced the early stages of its growth into a world power. Elizabeth herself was, wrote John Davies in 1596, "our glorious English court's divine image, / As it should be in this our Golden Age." But this decade was also one of the most economically depressed in English history, with poor harvests causing increased prices and further depressing already-low wages for many of the poor; by one calculation living costs in the late 1590s were in the range of five times as high as they had been at the start of the century, and real wages in 1597 less than a third of what they had been a century earlier. Nor were matters helped by the recurrent visitations of plague, by underemployment souring the temper of some university graduates, and by widespread anger among the well-to-do at Elizabeth's seemingly unfair allotment of economic monopolies. In 1598 the Poor Law Act set out provisions for collecting and distributing a "poor rate" to individual parishes so as to alleviate the worst of the suffering, but improvements in the lot of the poor were at best very gradual over the succeeding decades.

To a considerable degree poverty was structural, relating not only to the substantial degree of control exercised by the authorities over wages and prices, but also to the system of apprenticeship. Unlike modern apprentices, apprentices in the guild system as it had grown up through the later Middle Ages and the sixteenth century were not free to leave the work into which their parents had bound them (typically, by paying a fee of several pounds). They were obligated to serve a master for at least seven years and sometimes many more, in exchange for which they received training and very basic room and board, but no payment beyond that. In 1595 apprentices in London rebelled, with crowds taking large quantities of the food they could not afford to buy and destroying the Cheapside Pillories at which many of them had previously been punished for petty offenses.

From about 1600 onwards, however, the old apprenticeship system—and indeed the guild system generally—began to go into decline. The newer (and usually faster-growing) trades tended to be established outside the city boundaries and outside the control of the guilds; apprentices, who made up approximately 15 percent of the London population in 1600, made up no more than 5 percent of its much larger population a century later. Apprentices still made their presence felt through much of the seventeenth century (most notably in the turmoil of the 1640s), but by century's end were no longer a significant force; the age of wage labor for all, however young, was by then well underway.

The spread of forward-looking thought was both a cause and a consequence of the economic dynamism of the seventeenth century. Despite the persistence of old prejudices against moneylending and against Jews (witness Shakespeare's Shylock in The Merchant of Venice or Marlowe's more satirically imagined Barabas in The Jew of Malta), both the lending of money outright and the extension of credit increased fairly steadily through this period, thereby greatly facilitating the expansion of trade and of industry. This expansion of moneylending and credit, it should perhaps be noted, came almost entirely within mainstream Christian society. (Jews had been expelled from England by Edward I in the late thirteenth century, but small numbers returned in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, and in the mid-seventeenth century they were given official sanction to live in England, albeit without all of the rights and privileges enjoyed by Christians.) More and more, habits of thinking into the future were based on calculations of probability rather than on expressions of hope or fear or prophecy. An important indicator of this change was the development in the mid-sixteenth century of insurance. Not until the late seventeenth century, however, were future probabilities calculated for the purpose of insurance in anything like the way they are today; initially, insurance on ships and their cargos (the earliest form of insurance in England) would never be contemplated until a ship was already overdue. Premiums would then be set according to how long overdue the ship was, how dangerous the route was considered to be, and so on.

Although economic change together with higher levels of education and literacy encouraged the spread of rationalist thought, belief in magic and the supernatural barely diminished and in some areas increased (as evidenced, for example, by the proliferation in the seventeenth century of texts on alchemy and astrology). Rationalism and a reliance on supernatural explanations coexisted within most individual minds as well as within society at large. Elizabeth I turned to John Dee for astrological advice, and when the alchemist Cornelius Lannoy could not deliver on his promise to create gold, she made him suffer for his failure. The intellectually lively James I was the author of a treatise on witches (and responsible as well for executing considerable numbers of women alleged to be witches in Scotland). Most people still interpreted unusual occurrences in the heavens as does Gloucester in Shakespeare's King Lear: "these late eclipses in the sun and moon portend no good to us." Modern audiences may find it difficult to take seriously the predictions of the witches in Shakespeare's Macbeth or the doctor's faith in "demonstrations magical" in Marlowe's Doctor Faustus; the skepticism found in Jonson's The Alchemist and the disbelieving scoffs that enliven Reginald Scot's Discoveries of Witchcraft are more in line with modern sensibilities. But most late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century people saw such things differently. Indeed, the power to draw simultaneously on rationalist ways of connecting cause and effect and on traditional supernatural thought is one reason for the remarkable resonance of much Renaissance drama.

"The Round Earth's Imagined Corners"

Recent scholarship has done much to broaden and to destabilize older notions of Britain and her place in the world. Until the late twentieth century, most accounts of the Renaissance and seventeenth century in England were Anglocentric and, whatever the personal convictions of the historian, apt to ignore English Catholicism and to read the English Reformation as a narrative of obvious progress. Such a perspective, moreover, often accompanied a certain triumphalism in which English history—political, economic, or cultural—was a story of steady movement from one high point to another as the influence of various triumphs radiated outward from their London epicenter. It is now more often recognized that England was then—and as part of the United Kingdom is still—a historical and geographical point connected to a myriad of other points around the globe. At the beginning of the period covered by this chapter, England was a small, modestly significant nation on the edge of Europe; by its end, England was Great Britain and a significant world power. But scholars increasingly connect this rise to developments in other countries as much as to developments within Britain itself: in terms of religious, economic, political, and intellectual as well as literary and cultural history, changes in early modern Britain interacted with those in Italy, Holland, France, Germany, and Spain. In addition, Britain in this period began more significantly to interact with the world beyond Europe.

Throughout this period, the government regulated international trade and settlement with the same care as it regulated wages, prices, or religion. It was often only with the blessing or even sponsorship of the Crown that the great sea voyages of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries could take place, whatever the disappointment on the part of some would-be colonizers with sometimes less than enthusiastic royal support for their overseas projects. Despite the moral qualms Elizabeth is reported to have expressed regarding John Hawkins's pioneering ventures in the slave trade beginning in the 1560s, she became an investor in his ventures. For the most part she supported Sir Walter Ralegh's famous voyages of exploration and sometimes of colonization to Virginia, the West Indies, and South America. She also supported the voyages of plunder carried out against the Spaniards by Sir Francis Drake and others and knighted Drake when he returned to England after voyaging around the world from 1577 to 1580. Unlike the Spanish, English adventurers did not manage to claim any colonies rich with gold. But their failure in this respect was surely a blessing in disguise: Spain's preoccupation with adding to its hoard of precious metals almost certainly contributed to the eventual stagnation of its economy and society.

In the seventeenth century, British arrangements for worldwide trade began to be formalized, largely through the creation of state-sanctioned monopolies. The East India Company was granted its charter in 1600, the Hudson's Bay Company in 1670, and the Royal African Company in 1672; these corporations were to play a vital role not only in establishing trade but also in colonizing India and much of northern North America. Arguably, though, the voyage in this period with the greatest impact on world history was one launched in reaction to the religious policies of the Crown—that of the 102 Protestant sectaries (the "Pilgrims") who, despairing at their religious and political prospects in Jacobean England, left first for the religiously tolerant Netherlands and then, in 1620, set sail on the Mayflower for the New World, founding a colony at Plymouth, Massachusetts. From the 1620s onwards, the literature of England should not be considered to be an entity entirely separate from the literature of England's overseas colonies—the inhabitants of which continued for the most part to think of themselves as English throughout the period covered by this volume. (The volume thus includes in its website component a number of writers—from John Smith and William Bradford to John Winthrop and Anne Bradstreet—who have traditionally been covered in surveys of "American Literature" rather than of "British Literature.")

Given this developing engagement with the peoples of the New World, India, and Africa, what of attitudes toward race at this time? From passages such as the following exchange in Ben Jonson's comedy Volpone (1607), we may infer that black Africans were commonly regarded with as much derision as other groups against which there was strong prejudice:

> CORVINO. Has he children?
> MOSCA. Bastards,
> Some dozen or more, that he begot on beggars,
> Gypsies, and Jews, and black-moors, when he was drunk.
> Knew you not that, sir? 'Tis the common fable.

Yet we have no evidence to suggest that there was discomfort with Shakespeare's portrayal of the "blackmoor" Othello as a tragic hero. (In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries there was a considerable reaction against any suggestion that such a hero could be black, but we have no record of such a response in the early seventeenth century.) We have noted that Elizabeth invested in John Hawkins's slaving voyages, but she also is said to have described such activity as "detestable" and prophesied it would prompt the "vengeance of Heaven" upon those who participated in it.

The problem of determining early modern racial attitudes in Britain is further complicated by shifts in the meaning of the word "race" and the use of the word "black" to mean what we would call "brunette" or "dark." In any case, there was to many minds something of the exotic about almost any dark skin: Henry VIII, Elizabeth I, and James I all included a few African servants in their entourages, and a good portion of the nobility seems to have followed their lead in the late sixteenth century. Even if its nature and assumptions were evolving, though, there can be no question that racial prejudice existed during this period. In some cases distinctions appear to have been made based on gradations of color. Some, for example, distinguished "black-moor" from the "white-moor," or drew a tripartite division of black-moor, tawny-moor, and white-moor. Others, however, seem to have used "moor" as synonymous with "black-moor" and, indeed, to have seen all dark skins in very much the same light. Even the native peoples of North America are sometimes described as "black creatures."

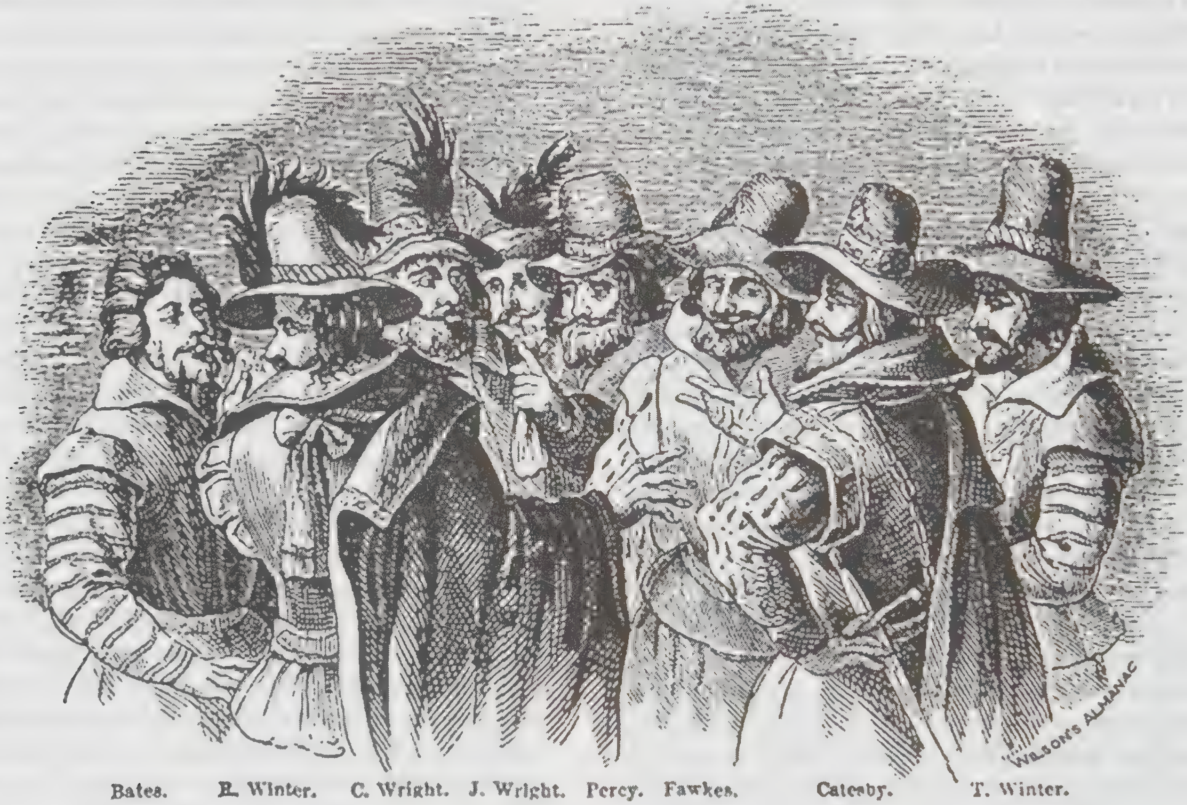
THE STUARTS AND THE CIVIL WARS

Elizabeth's decision to remain unmarried helped her negotiate delicate political and religious balances throughout her reign. But her lack of a direct heir meant that at her death in 1603 the crown passed to her distant cousin, James VI of Scotland, now also James I of England, son of the executed Mary, Queen of Scots. Elizabeth was the last of the Tudors, the royal family that had ruled England since 1485. James was a Stuart, the royal family that would rule through direct succession until the early eighteenth century, and whose descendants wear the English crown today. The accession of James united the crowns of England and Scotland. With Wales already annexed officially to England under Henry VIII, this union with Scotland was celebrated by some as the revival of the ancient, undivided island realm of Britain (though the country did not officially become "Great Britain" until 1707). The shift from England to Britain marked a new phase of the English Renaissance in the early seventeenth century. But this "British factor" also introduced a new set of political, religious, and social tensions that would in a few decades help tear the country apart in civil wars, wars that would eventually usher in the changed political and cultural world of the Restoration and eighteenth century.

James came to the English throne an experienced king: monarch of Scotland in name from the age of one, he had been educated for the role since childhood and had in his own right successfully ruled his fractious northern kingdom since the mid-1580s. His ascent to the throne was in consequence widely welcomed. While the later 1590s had been a period of astonishing cultural accomplishment in England, these years had also been marked by deep frustration with an aging queen increasingly reluctant to make decisions: most members of the English political class looked optimistically to James for a renewal of energy and action. James, however, would not always live up to these expectations. To begin with, any change in monarchs meant a change in the respective political fortunes of the ruling elite. One observer of the London court commented dryly that as soon as James was named King, would-be courtiers began to race north toward Edinburgh, "as if it were nothing else but first come first served, or that preferment were a goal to be got by footmanship." Some members of the Elizabethan court would keep their positions: Robert Cecil, Secretary of State from 1596, continued to hold the same office under James. Some individuals (like Sir Francis Bacon) and families who had not thrived politically under Elizabeth found great success under James. Others saw their power decline or disappear into the hands of Scottish favorites who happily left their estates in impoverished Scotland and descended hungrily on London. James generously shared his good fortune. While the parsimonious Elizabeth had been served by 18 "gentlemen of the privy chamber," James provided for 48, and appointed as well 200 "gentlemen extraordinary." Many had little to offer the country except charm and beauty, good legs and skilled dancing—qualities that could take a courtier far in the Jacobean court. As funds started to dwindle, new money-making schemes flourished, with James in effect selling aristocratic titles (including a new one, the baronetcy) by the score, and knighthoods by the hundreds. The figure of the newly jumped-up knight or minor aristocrat soon appeared as a satirical target on the London stage.

Religious reformers—Presbyterians and Separatists, collectively known as "Puritans" despite their widely differing ideas about church government—were another disappointed constituency. The Scottish Reformation of 1560 had been a Presbyterian Reformation, producing a church government that, officially at least, did not recognize the authority of bishops. While the Scottish episcopate never quite disappeared, its existence from 1560 to about 1610 was always precarious. English Presbyterians consequently hoped that James, up to that point the monarch of a "reformed" national church, would move the Church of England in a more strongly Protestant direction. But when they petitioned James in 1604, he flatly rejected their request for a church with an egalitarian structure along the lines of the Presbyterian Kirk. "No bishop, no king," he replied, voicing the analogical thinking so characteristic of the period: a challenge to hierarchy in the religious sphere threatened the idea of political hierarchy. Within a few decades, he would be proved right: Scottish revolutionaries in the late 1630s and English revolutionaries in the 1640s both abolished episcopacy as soon as they had the power to do so, as a prelude to their attacks on the authority of the Crown.

James did agree to sponsor a new translation of the Bible, a project that resulted in what surely must be one of very few masterpieces ever produced by committee. The King James (or "Authorized") version of 1611 for the most part retained the language of Tyndale's version from the 1530s, but in terms of religious politics it represented an important step forward: it was the product of years of collective negotiation over controversial phrases. This translation would shape literary language for centuries to follow, and retain (with some



Though the proportion of Catholics in early seventeenth-century Britain is thought to have been low, some Catholics still hoped for an overthrow of Protestant rule and a re-establishing of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1605 extremist Catholics, among them one Guy Fawkes, were reported to have been discovered to be plotting acts of terrorism; bombs, officials claimed, had been discovered beneath the House of Lords. Though James at first noted that not "all professing the Romish religion were guilty of the same," he soon made clear that he had no more tolerance for Catholic dissent than he did for the Puritan variety. Many priests suspected of Catholic leanings were stripped of their posts and/or imprisoned. As for Guy Fawkes, James authorized his torture (he confessed after two days on the rack) and his subsequent execution. To this day November 5, the anniversary of the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot, is celebrated with bonfires and merrymaking through much of England. Some scholars claim that evidence for this conspiracy was exaggerated, perhaps even planted, by officials who sought to fan the flames of anti-Catholic sentiment.

revisions) its primacy in the Church of England through to the second half of the twentieth century. But James did not succeed in mollifying the more extreme Puritans, and indeed had no intention of trying to do so. Within a few years, some Separatists (i.e., those calling for a separation of Church and state; Separatists—who were later often called Independents or Congregationalists—denied the legitimacy of any state church) left for the toleration of Amsterdam and Leiden, and in 1620 sailed to the New World to found their colony in Massachusetts. But on the whole the English church was less divided and contentious under James than under Elizabeth, and scholars refer to a broad "Calvinist consensus" in his reign. It was probably not until the 1630s that debates between "Anglican" and "Puritan" once again became a central component of national debates about the powers of church and state.

James's relationship with his House of Commons was complex, and scholars continue to disagree over how to characterize the politics of his reign. In principle, James was an absolutist, and his reign saw the popularization in England of theories of "divine right" monarchy. But in practice, James was a canny negotiator, and seemed to have good instincts for when to push his theoretical claims for absolute power and when to make concessions (see his 1610 speech to Parliament, included in this anthology). Some scholars read this period as marking the beginnings of parliamentary and democratic rebellion that would lead to civil war; others argue that James was on the whole a politically successful monarch, and that the real political challenges developed in reaction to the far less flexible absolutism of his son, Charles I. Certainly, many members of Parliament and the population were exasperated by James's financial extravagances. But they were also exasperated by his refusal to incur the further expense of intervening in the religious wars that devastated Europe after 1618—a decision many saw as particularly irresponsible since James's own daughter, Elizabeth, was Queen of Bohemia and had been compelled to abandon her throne when Bohemia was invaded by a Catholic army. But whatever his motives, James, much like Elizabeth, managed largely to keep Britain out of wars during a period in which warfare consumed Europe. As far as internal politics are concerned, James kept the affairs of his English and Scottish kingdoms quite separate: he had originally favored union between England and Scotland but came to accept that this would be impracticable. But he sowed the seeds of future trouble by his attempts to impose rule on Scotland from afar, and by encouraging mass emigration by English and particularly by Scots (later called the "Scots-Irish") to Ireland, where he authorized them to dispossess local inhabitants of their lands.

With the death of James and the accession of his son Charles I in 1625, cracks began to appear in the political and religious consensus that James had managed to maintain. Charles's court was far more refined than that of his father, and was artistically brilliant: Charles amassed one of the greatest art collections in Europe. But he lacked his father's willingness to compromise. What Charles looked for in his advisors and his people was primarily obedience, and he believed more firmly than his father in the divine right of kings. When Parliament challenged royal prerogatives with the "Petition of Right" (1628), a declaration of the "rights and liberties of the subject," Charles eventually assented—but within a year he in effect shut down Parliament and ruled without it for the next decade. Since Parliament traditionally voted the funds that supported the monarchy, throughout the 1630s Charles was compelled to rely on increasingly resented alternative means of raising money, such as legally dubious taxes. When he was forced by an invading Scottish army to recall Parliament in 1640, he found himself facing a body interested in little but confronting him with the grievances that had accumulated in the previous decade.

Religious reformers who remained discontented with the Elizabethan Settlement and James's "Calvinist consensus" were outraged—and radicalized—by changes in the Church under Charles and William Laud, named Archbishop of Canterbury in 1633. Many were suspicious (possibly legitimately) of Charles's own religious beliefs: his Queen, Henrietta Maria, was a French Catholic, and her personal priests were widely thought to have too much power in the court. While Laud was not looking to reimpose Catholicism on the Church of England, as his enemies maintained, he was very concerned to introduce a greater degree of ritual, ceremony, and uniformity in Church practice, and many people in England saw Laud's "High Church" innovations as at least Catholicizing. When John Milton wrote that he had been prevented from entering the ministry because he was "church-outed by prelates," he was referring to the Laudian Church and its increased emphasis on obedience to hierarchy: to Milton and many others, bishops had become worldly, powerful prelates. Laud himself had been a member of the King's Privy Council since 1628, and many disapproved of this intermingling of religious and secular power.

In the summer of 1637, Charles I and Laud attempted to introduce a revised (Anglican) prayer book for use in Presbyterian Scotland. Many Scots, however, failed to see why an English desire for uniformity of worship meant that they were the ones who needed to change. The new liturgy consequently became a focus of discontent with decades of royal policy. Well-planned riots greeted readings of the new service, followed over the next two years by a chain of events often termed the Scottish Revolution. In 1638, Scots drafted the National Covenant, vowing to withstand innovations and maintain the Presbyterian cause. Charles raised an army to subdue the "Covenanters" by force, but a series of compromises and humiliations for the English culminated in the Scottish occupation of Newcastle in the summer of 1640. These "Bishops' Wars" of 1639–40, named for the perception that they were the result of Laud's Church policies, played a significant role in the buildup to the civil wars that followed.

Charles called Parliament back into session, but found himself compelled to make humiliating concessions: the Scots were not his only subjects with grievances. The King eventually agreed to hand over to Parliament the two men most closely identified with his political and religious policies: his chief advisor, Sir Thomas Wentworth, was tried and executed in 1641, and Archbishop William Laud was imprisoned in 1641 and executed four years later. A 1641 rebellion in Ireland, the third country Charles ruled, further weakened his position. The Irish who had been dispossessed in the wave of emigration begun under James rose against the Protestant usurpers, and killed considerable numbers (though not nearly as many as people in England believed at the time). When Charles asked Parliament for funds to invade Ireland, they feared he in fact planned to form an alliance with Irish Catholics, invade England, and re-establish absolute rule. Mobs of apprentices (who began to be referred to derogatively as "roundheads" in reference to their shorn heads) began to demonstrate for the overthrow of episcopacy. Debates in 1641 over the "Grand Remonstrance," a Parliamentarian manifesto, hardened divisions between those loyal to Parliament and those loyal to the King, now beginning to be called "cavaliers" (originally a term for an armed horseman, but by this time a word with implications of roistering, swaggering gallantry). An attempt by Charles to arrest five members of Parliament in January 1642 backfired, uniting members of both parliamentary Houses, Lords and Commons, against the King. In the turmoil that followed, Charles fled to the north of England, Parliament began to raise its own army. War officially broke out when Charles raised his standard at Nottingham in August 1642.

Anthony Van Dyck, Charles I in Three Positions, 1635–36. Van Dyck's painting was intended to provide an Italian sculptor with the visual information he needed to prepare a bust of the English king in absentia.

The causes of the civil wars of the 1640s continue to be one of the most heatedly debated subjects in British history. Some scholars have argued that the wars were primarily about religion, and that the 1640s were a "puritan" revolution; many contemporaries certainly saw religion as a central issue in the conflict. Others have seen the wars as the inevitable outgrowth of political tensions between king and parliament, or of long-term social or economic factors such as a declining aristocracy or a rising middle class. Other historians have pointed out that the conflict divided families (John Milton's younger brother, Christopher Milton, was a Royalist), a complication for broad social or economic theories. These historians have often focused on shorter-term explanations—the disastrous decisions made by Charles himself, or the sequence of events created by the inherent tensions of having one king ruling three quite different countries. Yet other scholars have seen some combination of ideological and circumstantial factors at work.

The idea that a civil war might break out in their lifetimes, resulting in the execution of the monarch by his own subjects, would probably have been dismissed as ridiculous by most people in England even just a few years earlier. Yet somehow it happened, and over the next decade about 100,000 people died as a result of the war, with many more wounded, in a country with a population of about 5 million. When Milton described the destruction and violence of even heavenly warfare in Paradise Lost, he expected that almost all his readers would have had their lives touched in some way by war.

The "first" civil war raged from 1642 to 1646, ended with the defeat of the Royalist armies and left Parliament, dominated by Presbyterians, in charge. They were supported by the victorious New Model Army, formed in 1645, commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax, and led in battle by a brilliant general named Oliver Cromwell. Many of the more radicalized members of the population resisted the rule of newly empowered Presbyterians, finding them to be as authoritarian as the Laudian bishops they had fought to overthrow. By 1647, the Army had managed to become the dominant power in the country. The Army, Parliament, and King, each distrusting the other two, attempted to negotiate a political and religious settlement. More radical voices began to join the conversation, expressing ideas created by the intellectual hothouse of the previous half-decade, a period in which the most fundamental political and social certainties seemed suddenly open to debate. Groups such as the Levellers argued for universal manhood suffrage, a written constitution, freedom of worship, and equality before the law; soon enough groups such as the Diggers were arguing that property is theft. When the Leveller Colonel Thomas Rainsborough argued that "every man that is to live under a government ought first by his own consent to put himself under that government," he was articulating an idea that would have been almost unthinkable before 1640. The Levellers are widely regarded as founding voices in the development of modern democracy. But they were not allowed to speak for long: a Leveller mutiny in the Army was crushed by Cromwell, the captured king soon afterward escaped, and a "second" civil war (in effect, a series of Royalist uprisings) broke out in 1648, culminating with the recapture, trial, and execution of King Charles in January 1649 by a Parliament purged by the Army of all but its own supporters. In May 1649, England officially became a Commonwealth, though open hostilities only ended after Cromwell, now commander-in-chief, won bloody campaigns in Ireland (1649–50) and against Scottish Royalists (1650–51). (For more on this see the Contexts: Levellers, Diggers, Ranters, and Covenanters section on pages 1113–33.)

Oliver Cromwell was now the most powerful man in Britain and effectively ruler (though in theory the "Rump" Parliament held political control). But "the inglorious arts of peace" (as Andrew Marvell termed them) were not always his strength. Cromwell responded to widespread discontent with the Rump Parliament by forcibly dissolving it and replacing it with one nominated by religious congregations; this Parliament proving a failure, Cromwell gave himself the title of "Lord Protector" in late 1653 and over the next few years ruled increasingly by decree. Had he lived, Cromwell might have retained a strong grip on power for many years. While he can be described as a kind of benevolent despot, he was not a tyrant in the way that he governed England. (His treatment of the Irish is another matter.) He attempted to demilitarize the government, and he introduced a great degree of religious freedom, including the readmission of Jews to England. In 1657 he refused Parliament's offer to make him king, and he died in 1658. Oliver Cromwell continues to be an ambivalent figure in the British cultural imagination: he is both admired and condemned, and his character, his motives, and many of his actions remain surrounded by controversy.

Cromwell's regime could not survive without him: his son Richard assumed power on his father's death, and proved unable to hold the nation together. A period of chaos was finally ended with the restoration of the monarchy in 1660. Charles II was proclaimed king by a new Parliament called by General George Monck, a man who had fought for Charles I in the first civil war, but for Cromwell in Ireland, and who was commander-in-chief of the Cromwellian army in Scotland. But Monck returned to his Royalist beginnings, marched south from Scotland, and took control in London. On May 25th Charles landed at Dover, and four days later he received a tumultuous welcome in the capital. The restored monarchy, however, was a very different thing from that which had operated under Charles I. Never again would Parliament be trifled with: Britain was now a parliamentary monarchy. For a brief period following the death of Charles II in 1685 there was again a crisis of power and religion, as Charles had died with no heir and his brother, the Catholic James II, came to the throne. Anti-Catholic sentiment, however, made it impossible for James to rule long, and the bloodless "Glorious Revolution" of 1688 forced James into exile and restored Protestant rule in the person of the Dutch Protestant William of Orange and his wife Mary (daughter of James II).

LITERARY GENRES

The course of British literature over the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries is marked by the transformation of a number of literary genres, by the creation of others, and by massive changes in the relationships among authors, texts, and readers and audiences. This overview is intended to provide a broad outline of some of the more important changes, and some sense as well of the range of writing within the various genres.

LITERATURE IN PROSE AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF PRINT CULTURE

Arguably the development most important to the literature of this period occurred not in the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries but in the 1450s, with the invention of moveable type and of the printing press by the German craftsman and entrepreneur Johann Gutenberg. In 1476, William Caxton became the first to print books in England, and Caxton was instrumental in the publication of a number of important works of English literature (including Malory's Morte Darthur) using the new technology. But in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries a great deal of writing in England retained an "un-English" character. The most important prose work in this period, Sir Thomas More's Utopia (1516), was first printed not in England but in Flanders (where More had lived and worked for some time the previous year), and was written not in English but in Latin. In this respect at least, Utopia was representative: in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries the majority of books were published in Latin. Even in the late fifteenth century, however, publication in English was more common than is often supposed: of the 90 books printed by Caxton between 1477 and his death in 1491, 74 were in English. And by the second half of the sixteenth century, the movement away from Latin had become much stronger. The Latin edition of Utopia lost currency in England upon the publication of an English translation (by Ralph Robinson) in 1551. John Foxe published an early version of his Book of Martyrs in Latin in 1559; from 1563 onward editions were published only in English. The market for books in Latin diminished over the course of the seventeenth century, aided by the appearance of English translations of most of the important classical and continental texts. The lone category in which a majority of works continued to be written in Latin was that of scientific writing—ironically, as a result of their authors' belief that they would be more accessible to serious readers in centuries to come if they were written in Latin rather than in English.

More's Utopia resonates widely as an expression of the interests of its age. Its tone, at once playful and deeply serious, parallels that of the great work of the northern Renaissance in continental Europe, Erasmus's In Praise of Folly. More's focus on the fundamental nature of government follows on important work by writers of the Italian Renaissance (Niccolò Machiavelli most prominently), and foreshadows the considerable attention that would be paid to this issue in England in the later sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In addition, More's investigation of society on the level of first principles, and his imaginative curiosity about the possibilities offered by a wider world, are deeply characteristic of the Renaissance. Finally, and not least of all, Utopia anticipates the great growth in prose fiction that occurred later in the century.

Utopia gave its name to a new genre defined by subject matter: works presenting an imagined world in such a way as to prompt reflection upon the inadequacies and absurdities of the present world. In this period, works wholly or largely "utopian" in character include Francis Bacon's The New Atlantis and Margaret Cavendish's The Description of a New World, Called the Blazing World. In Bacon's work, European travelers discover Bensalem, an idealized community devoted to scientific pursuits and to enlarging "the bounds of Human Empire" over the natural world. In Cavendish's alternative fantasy, nature is presented in a more unstable fashion: the protagonist discovers a "Blazing World" of extraordinary light, in which the laws of space and time do not apply—a world that evidently cannot be contained by "human empire" or indeed within any system of human thought. In later eras the utopian (and "dystopian") tradition of imagined worlds extends through works such as Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels (1726), in which four separate worlds are imagined; to William Morris's late Victorian anticapitalist utopia, News from Nowhere (1872); to twentieth-century works such as Aldous Huxley's Brave New World (1932) and George Orwell's 1984 (1949) that project the extension of some of the most disturbing social tendencies of their day into horrific imagined futures.

While utopian fiction is defined by its subject matter, the genre of prose fiction as a whole also came into its own in sixteenth-century British literature: a wide variety of prose fiction in English had appeared by the end of the century, aimed at the increasingly wide variety of audiences that the printing press had made possible. At one end of the spectrum are writers who consciously appealed to a popular audience—writers such as Thomas Deloney, whose commoner protagonists and dedication to "all famous cloth workers in England" have already been touched on. Another writer who appealed to a broad public in some of his work was Thomas Nash, whose The Unfortunate Traveler is a work of prose fiction that has proven almost impossible to classify. At once an exuberant satire of the literary and court conventions of the time, it has been variously termed a tragicomedy, a picaresque novel, a pioneering work of travel literature, and a celebration of violence. It is also a work alive with the possibilities and tensions of the new print culture. The tensions between the old court culture and a nascent culture of broad-based literacy emerge in the book's wordplay as well as its storyline: pages are related to printing as well as to princes as Jack Wilton, a humble page, bequeaths to the "pages of the court" certain "pages of his misfortune."

If the popular fiction of Deloney and Nash stands at one end of the spectrum of late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century prose fiction, another is perhaps most clearly exemplified by John Lyly. Lyly had been a young man of fashion at university, and for a time his Euphues (1578) set a fashion too—a fashion that drew attention above all to highly refined and rhetorical prose style. Lyly sets the tone in his dedicatory epistle:

> How so ever the case standeth, I look for no praise for my labor, but pardon for my goodwill; it is the greatest reward that I dare ask, and the least that they can offer. I desire no more, I deserve no less. Should the style nothing delight the dainty ear of the curious sifter, yet will the matter recreate the mind of the courteous reader.

The same style of ornamented sentences, with clauses precisely balanced in supporting or antithetical relationships, is carried through the narrative itself as it tells the story of "a young gentleman of great patrimony, and of so comely a personage, that it was doubted whether he were more bound to nature for the lineaments of his person, or through fortune for the increase of his possessions." This expansive style, which came to be called "Euphuism" after Lyly's title, was for a time very popular, especially among the women at court, where it was reported in 1632 that in the 1590s "the beauty in court who could not parley Euphuism was as little regarded as she which now there speaks not French." Within a few years the style had come to be widely parodied, including by Shakespeare, as for example when Falstaff "elevates" his speech while pretending to be the King addressing Prince Hal in Henry IV, Part 1: "Harry, I do not only marvel where thou spendest thy time, but also how thy art accompanied, for though the chamomile, the more it is trodden on the faster it grows, yet youth, the more it is wasted, the sooner it wears."

What was satirized by Shakespeare (as well as by Nash, Ben Jonson, and others) was not the use of balance or antithesis per se, but rather their excessive and repetitive use, and the habit of using a great many words to say very little. Shakespeare, Nash, Jonson, and virtually every other late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century writer of any significance also employed a great number of rhetorical figures, but aimed more for variety, concision, and pointedness than for abundance of expression. John Donne may command our attention with his colloquial directness of language in lines such as "For God's sake hold your tongue, and let me love," but his poems are filled with parallel structures ("My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears," "With wealth your state, your mind with arts improve") that embody the dichotomies and paradoxes of which he speaks. Ben Jonson may begin his play The Alchemist with a crude verbal slanging match in which one character says to another "I fart at thee," but in speeches throughout the play he also draws substantially on the Renaissance traditions of rhetorical figures ("Your fortunes may make me a man, / As mine have preserved you a woman").

Like so many other sixteenth-century developments, the growth of prose fiction drew substantially on texts from ancient Greece and Rome, and from Renaissance Italy and France. Compilations of short fiction such as William Painter's The Palace of Pleasure (1566) and George Pettie's A Petite Palace of Pettie His Pleasure (1576) began to make translations and adaptations of French and Italian tales of romance and adventure much more widely available, and by the end of the century the genre of prose romance was becoming well established in English. Writers of prose romances often borrowed freely from earlier materials, and their works were in turn borrowed from freely, by dramatists and poets as well as by other writers of prose fiction. Thus, for example, Robert Greene's Pandosto (1588), which drew on an Italian source, provided the story material for Shakespeare's comedy The Winter's Tale, and Thomas Lodge's Rosalinda (1590), a prose fiction that drew on a Middle English romance called Gamely for its story material, provided Shakespeare with material for his comedy As You Like It. There was no shame attached to such borrowing: aesthetic value was located in the way in which one told or retold a tale and combined different elements of story material into a pleasing whole, not in whether one had thought up the stories oneself.

In the 1590s, Greene and Nash, together with George Peele and a few others, constituted a group known as the "university wits." Like Christopher Marlowe and Edmund Spenser, they had attended university on scholarships or with the financial assistance of others, and the three lived something of a precarious existence after leaving Oxford or Cambridge; these were among the earliest English writers to try to earn their living entirely through their writing. Such a goal was still impossible to achieve directly through payments made by printers or publishers; it remained necessary to seek the support of wealthy patrons. That such support was often anything but reliable is evidenced from the dedications to their works. Greene's 17 different books are dedicated to a total of 16 different patrons; Nash's dedication for the first edition of The Unfortunate Traveler to Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, is dropped in subsequent editions; and so on.

A very different writer of prose fiction was Sir Philip Sidney. Sidney's Arcadia (1590, 1593), an engaging and elegantly written pastoral prose romance, drew substantially on continental and classical models, and was instrumental in popularizing in England the genre of heroic Hellenistic prose romance—stories of romance and adventure set in imagined and "timeless" locales, featuring shepherds, damsels, and noblemen in disguise. The work remained immensely popular through the seventeenth century both in England (where it was issued in ten authorized printings) and abroad (where it was translated into French, German, and Dutch). Works inspired by Sidney's Arcadia include Lady Mary Wroth's The Countess of Montgomery's Urania (1621), the first published work of fiction by an Englishwoman, which mixes pastoral narrative with pointed political commentary, and Anna Weems's sequel, A Continuation of Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia (1651), less of a hybrid than Wroth's work, but like hers a romance narrative with some political overtones.

Sidney was a central figure not only in the development of prose romance: he was also a pioneer in the use of the sonnet sequence (though not the first to compose a sonnet sequence in English—that distinction goes to Anne Lock, whose A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner appeared in 1560). As the author of The Defense of Poesy (written 1583), Sidney produced the first extended work of literary theory and criticism in English. Sidney's approach embraced both structural analysis from an aesthetic point of view and moral commentary—though that is to put his design very much in modern terms. In general, neither Sidney nor his contemporaries saw a clear boundary between the moral and the aesthetic: what was considered aesthetically good was considered so in large part for its perceived efficacy in conveying moral principles. The occasion for Sidney's Defense was a rambling and vituperative attack on the stage by Stephen Gosson entitled The School of Abuse (1579), and Sidney's focus is very largely on the drama. In the following decades, his Defense was followed by a number of works focused on other genres, among them George Puttenham's The Arte of English Poesie (1589), noteworthy in particular for its discussion of rhetorical figures, and Thomas Campion's Observations in the Art of English Poesie (1602), a groundbreaking work relating the prosody of classical Greece and Rome to that of English poetry.

Arguably the most important prose writings of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries were religious non-fiction works; certainly these were far and away the most popular. Aside from the Bible itself (first made available in the complete English-language printed edition in 1535 by Miles Coverdale) and such masterpieces of liturgical prose as the Book of Common Prayer, the most popular book in England through most of the sixteenth century was the English translation of The Golden Legend, by the thirteenth-century Italian scholar Jacobus de Voragine, a collection of narratives of the lives of Christian saints organized so as to be read in conjunction with the feast associated with each saint over the course of the year. In the first hundred years after the appearance of the printing press, more than 150 different editions of The Golden Legend appeared across Europe in various languages. William Caxton translated The Golden Legend himself and published it in 1483: "in likewise as gold is most noble above all other metals," he declared in his foreword to the book, "in likewise is this legend Holden most noble above all other works."

In the wake of the Protestant Reformation, the most widely read book aside from the Bible seems to have been for many decades John Foxe's Acts and Monuments, first published in English in 1563. There are significant parallels between this work and The Golden Legend. Whereas the earlier work provided in convenient form the lives of saints of the Roman Catholic Church, many of whom attained cult-like status, Foxe's book performed the same function for Protestant religious figures, especially those martyred at the stake by Henry VIII or by Mary I. By the late sixteenth century these figures had also attained cult-like status, and Foxe's book was repeatedly issued in new editions, each time in an expanded form. In addition to these biographical texts, the genre of the sermon was, in the hands of a John Donne or a Lancelot Andrewes, the site of some of the finest prose of the Renaissance; even works of theology and religious controversy could enter what we now consider the "literary" realm when written by Anglican divines such as Richard Hooker or Jeremy Taylor, or by nonconforming radicals such as the pseudonymous satirist Martin Marprelate.

Throughout this period substantial increases in literacy were accompanied by increases in the number of households that possessed books. In 1560 roughly one in ten English households possessed at least one book; by 1640 this figure had risen to approximately 50 per cent of all households. Not surprisingly, such figures were higher in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries in Protestant nations. In the late sixteenth century there was a higher percentage of households in Germany that possessed books than in any other part of Europe, but by 1640 that distinction belonged to England. If the printing press was one engine for the expansion of literacy, the expansion of formal education was another, and with the considerable increase in the number of schools over the course of the period came a demand for textbooks. Of these there were few, but one above all appears to have been almost universally studied—a Latin grammar text by William Lily (grandfather of John Lyly of Euphues fame). Indeed, it is possible that more copies were printed of this book than of any other during this period save the Bible.

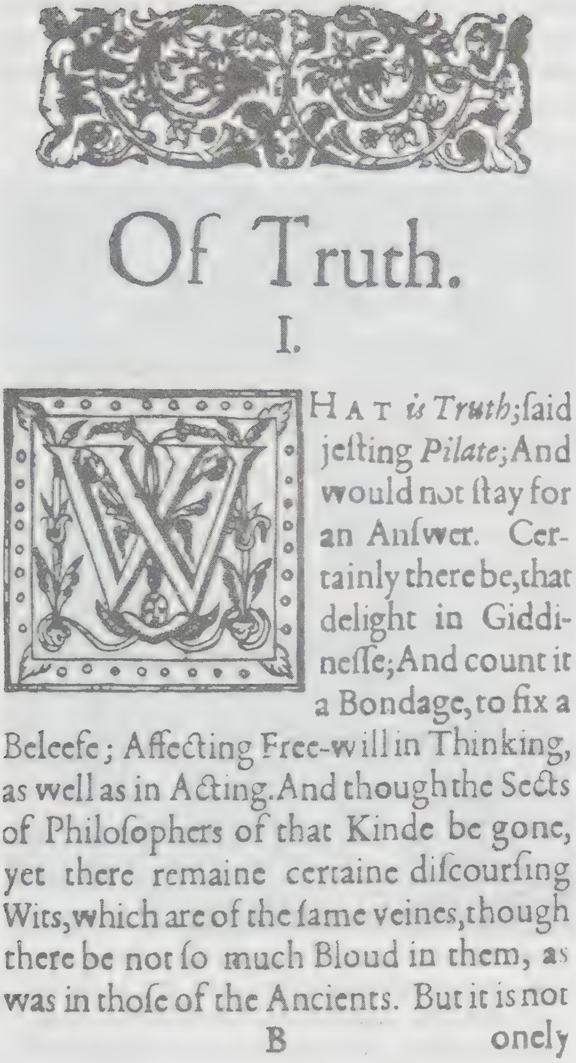
Throughout this period there was also a growing readership for works that celebrated national accomplishment. Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1587) drew on many sources to present a compilation of stories of early Britain, some based on fact, some purely legendary. Holinshed is best known nowadays as the source on which Shakespeare drew for his history plays; in these dramatized versions as well as more directly, the portrait Holinshed sketched of earlier eras exerted a wide influence. Similarly, William Camden's Britannia (1586), a "description of the most flourishing kingdoms, England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the islands adjoining," was immensely popular in its English translation, entitled simply Britain (1610). Like the "Britain" of many Englishmen, that of Camden was overwhelmingly southern English in character; Camden in fact had little to say about Wales, Scotland, or Ireland, and for the purposes of his county-by-county survey did not travel north of Hadrian's Wall. But such works helped to feed a growing sense among the English that England could be more or less equated with "the British Isles" or "Britain." Popular too was Richard Hakluyt's Principal Navigations, Voyages and Discoveries of the English Nation (1589), a unique compilation of more or less accurate accounts of true voyages of English explorers and merchants, combined with accounts based purely on myth and imagination. Nationality was the key criterion for inclusion: "I meddle in this work with the navigations only of our own nation," Hakluyt declares in his preface to the first edition. Ironically enough, "Hakluyt's Voyages," the work's popular title, retained a place in history not so much for the historical accounts it presented but rather for the inspiration it gave Englishmen to embark on the sorts of voyages Hakluyt had only imagined—and in the inspiration it gave Shakespeare for some of the stories in his plays. Furthermore, the kind of writing exemplified by Hakluyt's mariners and merchants, with their straightforward "plain" prose, sustained narratives, and detailed descriptions of the places and people they encountered, would (some scholars argue) eventually contribute as much to the development of the narrative style and strategy of the English novel as the classically inspired romances of Sidney and Lyly.

More's extraordinary vision of human government in Utopia was followed in the sixteenth century by a number of influential non-fiction works on the nature of government—works of political theory, we would call them today. A recurrent focus of such work was the relationship of a monarch and his or her subjects to God and to the body of law. Sir Thomas Elyot's The Book of the Governor (1531) saw a universe ordered by nature in hierarchical fashion:

> … undoubtedly the best governance is by one king or prince.… For who can deny that all thing in heaven and earth is governed by one God, by one perpetual order, by one Providence? One sun ruleth over the day, one moon over the night. And to descend down to the earth … the bees … hath among them one principal bee for their governor, who excelleth all other in greatness.

The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity by Richard Hooker (1593–1614), which aimed in large part to justify the position of the monarch in England as head of the established Church, also appealed to nature, distinguishing between universal natural law ("nature herself teacheth laws and statutes to live by") and "positive" law (the written body of human law that varies from one jurisdiction to another). Hooker saw the position of monarch as consistent with natural law, but he also thought it highly desirable that the monarch should abide by "positive" law, rather than regarding himself as above the law: "where the king doth guide the state, and the law the king, that commonwealth is like a harp or melodious instrument."

The most important writer of non-fiction prose of the age was Francis Bacon, the writer renowned today both for introducing the essay form into English, and for the contribution he made to the development of research based on experimentation and inductive reasoning—popularly termed the "scientific method." Bacon wrote in both Latin and English. Ironically, the works by Bacon that continue to be widely read are the works in English that he considered less significant: his essays; his short



Of Truth.

I.

WHAT is Truth; ſaid jeſting Pilate; And would not ſtay for an Anſwer. Certainly there be, that delight in Giddineſſe; And count it a Bondage, to fix a Beleefe; Affecting Free-will in Thinking, as well as in Acting. And though the Sects of Philoſophers of that Kinde be gone, yet there remaine certaine diſcourſing Wits, which are of the ſame veines, though there be not ſo much Bloud in them, as was in thoſe of the Ancients. But it is not work on the classification of knowledge, The Advancement of Learning; and his unfinished scientific utopian fantasy, The New Atlantis.

B onely

Page from the 1625 edition of Francis Bacon's Essays.

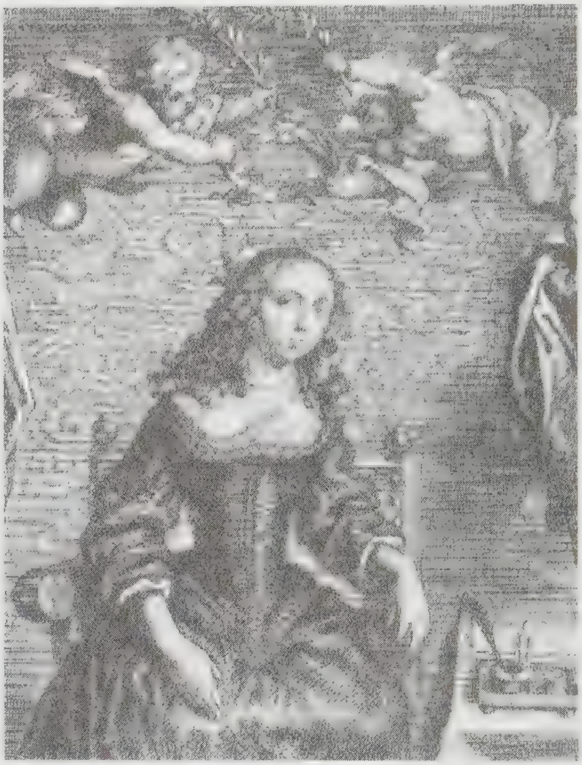
As the religious controversies of the age again became more heated during the Jacobean period and later Interregnum (the period "between kings," 1649–60), so too did the volume of political and religious writing increase. The collapse of censorship laws in the early 1640s led to the appearance of a vast volume of pamphlet literature that represented all points of view; much of this writing was addressed to a popular audience and remains readable for its interest as rhetorical prose as well for its historical influence. Some of the most interesting of these texts are the work of political and religious radicals such as the Levellers, Diggers, Ranters, and later Quakers, in particular writers such as William Wally and Richard Overton. But the era also brought forth a number of more substantial works of prose non-fiction. On the Royalist side perhaps the most influential of these was Eikon Basilica ("The Image of the King") (1649), a self-justifying overview of key events of the war from the point of view of Charles I. Supposedly written by Charles himself, the treatise was almost certainly ghostwritten by the clergyman John Garden, and John Milton would call attention to his own anti-monarchical credentials by responding with Eikonoklastes (1649; his Greek title means "Image Breaker"). Of far greater influence over the course of succeeding centuries was Thomas Hobbes's Leviathan (1651), now recognized as a central document of political philosophy in the Western tradition. Hobbes wrote Leviathan while acting as secretary to a Royalist family, the Cavendishes, who were in exile in Paris during the Interregnum; unsurprisingly in the circumstances, his arguments provide support to the claims of a monarch wishing to exercise absolute sovereignty. But whereas monarchs such as Charles I (and sixteenth-century political theorists such as Elyot and Hooker) had claimed that such power stemmed directly from God, Hobbes saw it as the embodiment of a social contract, under the terms of which the people agree to submit themselves to the authority of a ruler in order to obtain the benefits of social order. By shifting the ground on which arguments for the unfettered authority of rulers were founded, Hobbes's great work in the end had the effect of undermining all claims to a right of absolute rule: if power was ultimately derived from the people, then why should not the people have an ongoing say in how that power was to be exercised, and by whom?

Many of the most important works of prose non-fiction by writers on the Royalist side were not overtly political documents—yet even non-political works were almost inevitably tinged with the controversies of the age. Thomas Browne's 1642–43 work Religion Medici

("The Religion of a Doctor") endeavored to present religion from a personal rather than a polemical point of view, adopting a tolerant and sympathetic attitude toward those of all religious backgrounds, while maintaining a strong attachment to the formal structures and rituals of the Church of England. Izaak Walton's most lasting work of prose non-fiction, The Complete Angler (1653), might seem on the face of it to be even further from political or religious advocacy than Religion Medici. But this treatise on the art of fishing carries with it a running subtext that celebrates the wise, peaceful, open-hearted, and contemplative values of Picador (Latin: the fisher), representing the values of the Church of England, in which each member of the clergy acts as a fisher of souls.

Perhaps the most remarkable of all writers of non-fiction prose in the mid-seventeenth century was Margaret Cavendish, Duchess of Newcastle (of the same family to whom Hobbes acted as secretary)—called "Mad Madge" by some dismissive contemporaries. Cavendish's works are as remarkable for their breadth as they are for originality and for their accomplished writing: her works include scientific and philosophical essays, utopian fantasy, poetry, numerous plays, a biography of her husband, William Cavendish, and A True Relation of My Birth, Breeding and Life (1656), one of the most original and important works of a genre still in its infancy during the seventeenth century—autobiography. For most of the Middle Ages the practice of writing autobiographically (with the exception of some writing in a confessional vein) seems to have virtually disappeared, as indeed did biographical writing, with the exception of the lives of saints or martyrs. It is an important indicator of the increased emphasis on the individual in the Renaissance that the writing of such works, as well as the practice of writing diaries, appears to have grown steadily through the seventeenth century. One important element that contributed to this new focus on interiority and the self was the Protestant insistence on documenting the internal, spiritual life. But as so often in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the new practices were also justified by an appeal to classical models. Cavendish expressed the hope that "my readers will not think me vain for writing my life, since there have been many that have done the like, as Caesar, Ovid, and many more, both men and women, and I know no reason I may not do it as well as they." The confidence as well as the individualism of the age finds no fuller expression than it does in the writings of Margaret Cavendish.



Detail from the frontispiece to Margaret Cavendish's Philosophical and Physical Opinions (1655). According to the poem accompanying the likeness of Cavendish, "studious she is and all alone ... Her library on which she looks, it is her head, her thoughts, her books ... Her own flames do her inspire."

Other members of the nobility on the Royalist side (notably Anne Fanshaw and Anne Halkett) followed Cavendish in writing autobiographically during the Interregnum. And such writing appears to have flourished to some extent too among the revolutionaries; perhaps the most notable examples on that side are the writings of Lucy Hutchinson, who, like Cavendish, balanced a memoir recounting the life of her husband with a separate account of her own life. Anna Trapnel, perhaps best known for her extraordinary religious prophecies, also left a remarkable autobiographical account "of her journey from London into Cornwall" during which she was arrested and interrogated on suspicion of witchcraft. Much non-fiction prose writing among those on the revolutionary side tended to address directly the religious and political issues of the time. James Harrington's The Commonwealth of Oceana (1656), for example, employs the structure of a utopian vision to address the pressing contemporary issue of how a republic may be founded so as to ensure the perpetuation of government that is both representative and fair.

The leading light of revolutionary writing is unquestionably John Milton, whose non-fiction prose includes not only a wide range of essays and tracts in defense of Parliamentary and Puritan causes, but also groundbreaking treatises in defense of divorce and, perhaps, most importantly, Areopagitica (1644), an extended argument for toleration and freedom of expression. It is sometimes difficult for those living in the present-day liberal democracies of the Western world to appreciate fully the degree to which societies such as that of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Britain may operate without any reference to any presumed right of free speech—or, indeed, any reference to any human "rights" at all. Censorship of texts is almost symbiotic in Europe with the invention of the printing press. In England, Henry VIII required that all book publications be approved by the Privy Council, and Elizabeth I instituted a system under which books could not be published without the approval of either the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London. The punishments for those who defied the rules were occasionally extreme: John Stubbs, for example, who had the temerity in 1579 to publish a work warning the Queen against marrying the brother of the King of France, was punished by having one of his hands cut off. King James I banned the publication of pamphlets of news, and these early forms of the newspaper would not appear again until the 1640s. For much of the period a system of registration through the Stationers' Company was in essence a comprehensive system of censorship. Admittedly, enforcement of the rules governing printing had always been erratic, and there are not very many examples of actual censorship of books in this period; it has even been argued that many of the laws governing printing were not imposed upon printers but were in fact requested by them as a means of protecting their economic monopoly. But it was the idea of pre-publication licensing of books that was the particular focus of Milton's arguments in Areopagitica, and his arguments have been turned to again and again over the intervening centuries by those endeavoring to defend freedom of expression.

POETRY

A comparison with medieval poetry reveals the remarkable changes the Renaissance brought to poetic form in English verse. Late-medieval poets used many different verse forms, ranging from alliterative accentual patterns with anywhere from three to six beats in each line, to complex rhyming stanzaic patterns in lyric poems with a dance-like variety of accentual rhythms, to Chaucer's ten-syllable lines, sometimes more loosely organized around stress rather than a strict number of syllables. But strictly accentual-syllabic verse was rare in the medieval English period, whereas from the Renaissance to the early twentieth century it was the dominant poetic form in English.

The late fifteenth- and early sixteenth-century poetry of John Skelton still has one foot in the medieval period, at least as far as meter is concerned. Lines such as the following are written in accentual verse—that is to say, each contains a set number of accented syllables (in this case three), but has no set number of total syllables, and no regular arrangement of stressed and unstressed syllables:

> Then will he rout;
> Then sweetly together we lie,
> As two pigs in a sty.

Only a decade or so after Skelton was writing, other poets—most notably Sir Thomas Wyatt and his contemporary Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey—began to draw on classical and Italian forms of a quite different nature, forms that would dominate English poetry for the next four centuries. Wyatt and Surrey are most often given credit for introducing to English literature the sonnet form that Petrarch and others had established in Italy. Of broader importance was the tradition they established of writing in accentual-syllabic meters. Of these, iambic pentameter was the most frequent choice, whether in sonnets (such as Wyatt's "I find no peace, and all my war is done"), in unrhymed (or "blank") verse of the sort that Surrey was the first to write in English, or in other forms. Iambic tetrameter (i.e., having four "feet" or groups of stressed and unstressed syllables in every line, rather than five) was also common: for example, Surrey's "My friend, the things that do attain." Where Wyatt and Surrey led, others followed; the great outpouring of poetry in the 1580s and 1590s by Sidney, Spenser, Marlowe, Shakespeare, and the rest was entirely an outpouring of accentual-syllabic verse.

Accentual-syllabic meters were structured according to classical principles, with regular patternings of syllables forming poetic "feet," and a set number of feet in every line. But along the way the classical principles were transformed in one crucial respect. Unlike English, classical Greek and Latin are not characterized by large variations in the degree of stress placed on different syllables: there are no distinctions between accented (or stressed) syllables and unaccented (or unstressed) syllables. Distinctions between syllables for the purposes of their arrangement in poetic meter were in ancient times based on duration of sound—some syllables taking a shorter time to say, others a longer time—rather than on degrees of stress. In English, however, where the alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables is fundamental to the natural spoken rhythms of the language, the Greek framework and terminology came to be applied to alternations between stressed and unstressed (or "accented" and "unaccented") syllables rather than long or short syllables. Whereas the Greeks had used the term "iambic" to describe verse in which a syllable that took a short time to say was followed by a syllable that took a long time to say, English verse took an iamb to consist of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable. And so on for trochees (one long syllable followed by one short became one stressed syllable followed by one unstressed); dactyls (one long syllable followed by two short became one stressed syllable followed by two unstressed); anapests (two short followed by one long syllable became two unstressed followed by one stressed syllable); and spondees (two long syllables became two stressed syllables). Regular patterning of what the late sixteenth-century poet, musician, and poetic theorist Thomas Campion referred to as "the heaviness of the syllables" became the ruling principle of English poetic meter.

Borrowing from—and transforming—classical poetic models was a central feature of English poetry throughout the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. From Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender to Milton's "Lucida" and beyond, the pastoral poem, with its conventions of musical shepherds singing songs of love and of sorrow, was a poetic staple. Classical poetic models for satires, for wedding songs (as with Spenser's Epithalamion), for elegies, and for love poetry in lyric form were also widely imitated and adapted. And the two great long poems of the period—Spenser's The Faerie Queene, and Milton's Paradise Lost—so different in some respects, are alike in drawing substantially on classical models.

Just as romance narratives were an important subgenre of late sixteenth-century prose, so too was verse romance important to the poetry of the late sixteenth century. The 1590s opened with the publication of the greatest of all verse romances in English, The Faerie Queene, which Spenser had begun in 1580. No other verse romance of the period attempted anything so ambitious, but a remarkable succession of shorter verse romances appeared over the course of a few years in the late 1580s and early 1590s: Marlowe's Hero and Leander (1598); Lodge's Scylla's Metamorphosis (1589); Daniel's The Complaint of Rosamond (1592); Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis (1593); and Drayton's Endymion and Phoebe (1595). These poems draw heavily on the mythological stories recounted by the Roman poet Ovid in his Metamorphoses, Heroides, and Amores, though in form and tone they all bear a decidedly Elizabethan stamp. They all bear the stamp of the court, as well: these were poems intended for the aristocracy and, indeed, for the monarch herself.

The Renaissance was an age of artifice ("artificial" was during this period used exclusively as a term of praise), and much of the poetry of the 1580s and 1590s is given to imagery that is extravagant in its inventiveness. Some of the extravagance is tongue-in-cheek, as is surely the case with Shakespeare's evident lampooning in his early comedy Love's Labor's Lost of the verbal excess of the character Holofernes, whose "gift" is "a foolish extravagant spirit, full of forms, figures, shapes, objects, ideas, apprehensions, motions, revolutions: these are begot in the ventricle of memory, nourished in the womb of pia mater, and delivered upon the mellowing of occasion." In his poetry of the later 1590s and of the early seventeenth century, Shakespeare tamed his earlier tendency toward extravagant cleverness, though he never abandoned artifice. Much the same may be said of Ben Jonson, who advocated "plain language" and told poets to take care of their style in writing: "Be not winding, or wanton with far-fetched descriptions," he advised.

Many of the most important poets of the early seventeenth century, however, aspired to new heights of inventiveness. Chief among these was John Donne. Donne's early verse in particular often plays in elaborate fashion with extraordinary comparisons. It also twists and turns syntactically, mirroring in its form the surprising paradoxes or contradictions conveyed in the sense of the lines. These sorts of images, drawing extreme comparisons, have come to be known as "conceits." In some cases a conceit may be extended over several lines, or indeed a full poem. So, for example, Donne compares a tear to the globe, and his mistress's body to his "America," his "new-found land." The seventeenth-century poets who have been most often associated with these poetic tendencies—Donne and Abraham Cowley chief among them, with the devotional poets George Herbert, Richard Crashaw, and Henry Vaughan rather more loosely associated—have since the time of Samuel Johnson in the eighteenth century been referred to as "the metaphysical poets." Johnson's unfavorable assessment of such poetry has been rejected by most critics and scholars for the past century or more; T.S. Eliot, in particular, famously praised the metaphysical poets for uniting feeling and intellect in their verse. Yet Johnson captured something of the truth in his description of metaphysical poets as endeavoring "to be singular in their thoughts," and of the ideas produced through the intellectual gymnastics of many metaphysical poems as "often new, but seldom natural." Eventually Donne turned away from extravagance, abandoning much of the sensual content as well as the extreme conceits of his early verse as he turned to religion and to religious poetry, and Herbert made his efforts to suppress his own skills in rhetorical ornamentation a subject of his poetry:

> My thoughts began to burnish, sprout, and swell,
> Curling with metaphors a plain intention,
> Decking the sense, as if it were to sell.

Yet the audacity of the metaphysical poets has left a lasting mark on English literature: the ways of talking about religious faith and about love of God in the language of human physical love and vice versa; the ways of talking to God that Herbert developed; and the extremity of the conceits themselves have all found imitators as well as admirers in subsequent eras.

Lively debates have taken place over the past generation about whether or not the term "metaphysical poetry" in fact conveys something meaningful about a diverse body of work; it is often argued in particular that grouping Herbert with "the metaphysical" brings us no closer to what is unique and interesting about his poetry. So too has it been debated whether the term "cavalier poetry" as an umbrella term to identify a group of poets from later in the seventeenth century conveys much that is meaningful. Certainly there is a common tendency among poets such as Thomas Carew (pronounced "Carey"), Sir John Denham, Robert Herrick, Richard Lovelace, James Shirley, Sir John Suckling, and Edmund Waller toward smooth rhythms and mellifluous sounds. And they are inevitably associated with one another simply by having been on the Royalist side—though only some were given to infusing verse with a strong political or religious content. (The strongest poetic statement on a Royalist theme may well be Katherine Philips's "Upon the Double Murder of King Charles," in which she poses the following question: "He broke God's laws, and therefore he must die, / And what shall then become of thee and I?") The cavalier poets all tend to write frequently of the good life and of love—but there the similarities largely end. Interestingly, though, the love poetry of the cavalier poets—whether the highly charged eroticism of poets such as Carew and Suckling or the more chaste and chivalrous variety of Lovelace—is unequivocally heterosexual. The homoeroticism that infuses so much of the finest poetry of the 1590s, and that was a significant presence in the court of James I in the early seventeenth century, is nowhere evident in the verse of these later poets.

Few seventeenth-century poets, even the most courtly and cavalier, failed to produce at least some devotional poems. In literature as in life, the seventeenth century mixes devotional and secular responses to the world, inextricably intertwining the language of religion with the language of social life and politics. An increasingly important reference point in devotional poetry as the century wore on became the attitude one held toward prelapsarian existence—humankind before the Fall. Whereas Aemilia Lanier, writing in 1611, took the Fall as an occasion for weighing the relative merits of man and woman, Lovelace paints an idyllic version of love before the fall of Adam and Eve:

> No serpent kiss poisoned the taste,
> Each touch was naturally chaste,
> And their mere sense a miracle.

Henry Vaughan, a Royalist who saw himself as a "son of George Herbert," took a more gloomy view, and one that partook only of a male perspective. For Vaughan, writing in 1650, it is impossible to conceive of the prelapsarian state in a tone other than that of melancholy: "He sighed for Eden, and would often say, / 'Ah! what bright days were those!'"

There are fewer Puritan or Parliamentary poets of note than there are Royalist ones, but among them are the two pre-eminent poets of the age: Andrew Marvell and John Milton. Milton, indeed, has often been regarded as towering above not only his contemporaries but also over all other English poets, with the sole exception of Shakespeare. Milton is the supremely paradoxical figure of English literature. He was a devout Christian who more or less abandoned institutionalized religion in favor of a "church of one"; he wrote what remains the great Christian epic poem in English, Paradise Lost—but gave Satan the leading role; he was a Puritan who eschewed plain style for Latinate inversions and epic grandeur. Milton managed to convey perhaps more fully than any other writer in English both prelapsarian innocence in the "heav'n on earth" of Eden and the "guilty shame, dishonest shame" of humans after their Fall.

Like Milton, Marvell supported the "Good Old Cause" of Cromwell and political Republicanism. To the extent that we can be sure about Marvell's thoughts on any subject, however, Marvell appears to have seen Cromwell more as the embodiment of a pure force of nature than as a representative of pure moral and religious values: his "An Oration Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland" is among the most subtly balanced pieces of English political verse of any era. Even more than Milton, however, Marvell was a poet of the garden—a garden in which a sense of the Fall was never far away, but yet one of surpassing beauty and innocence. To the contemplation of such scenes Marvell brought his own unique perspective; rather than focus on prelapsarian pleasure, Marvell imagined the supreme joys to be those of solitary contemplation of the beauties of nature:

> Two Paradises 'twere in one
> To live in Paradise alone.

The Drama

The flowering of drama in England from the late 1580s to the 1620s is widely accepted as the greatest cultural achievement in the history of English literature. The list of important dramatists who flourished during this period includes not only Marlowe, Shakespeare, and Jonson but also Thomas Kyd, John Lyly, George Peele, John Webster, Cyril Tourneur, Francis Beaumont, John Fletcher, Thomas Middleton, John Ford, James Shirley, John Marston, Thomas Dekker, Thomas Heywood, and Philip Massinger. It is an outpouring the more remarkable for there being so few advance signs of its coming. In the middle years of the sixteenth century, the main forms of medieval drama were very much alive: audiences were still watching guild-sponsored biblical plays, allegorical dramas such as Everyman, and various kinds of (generally crude) secular comedy performed by traveling troupes of players or local inhabitants as part of feast-day celebrations. As the forces behind the Protestant Reformation gathered steam, however, a substantial body of opinion became convinced that neither the popular secular drama nor the often irreverent representations of religious material in the biblical plays were proper to be played at all: a key factor in the demise of the biblical plays is thought to have been hostility from those sympathetic to the Protestant Reformation.

As the biblical plays were dying out, the revival of classical literature ushered in by humanism helped give birth to new forms of English drama. The first phase in the introduction of these new models was the translation of classical plays, particularly Roman tragedies by Seneca and Roman comedies by Plautus and Terence. Of the two, it was Roman comedy that first had an impact in England, with English schools and colleges presenting comedies by Plautus or Terence to school audiences (or occasionally to aristocratic ones, by invitation). The earliest known adaptation into English of one of these comedies is Nicholas Udall's Ralph Roister Doister, probably written by Udall during the years when he was the headmaster of Eton, 1534 to 1541. Such performances typically involved scenery painted on canvas stretched out behind the acting area, the canvas often painted so as to represent a street in perspective according to what was believed to be "the manner of the ancients." The play itself is lively, but adds little to its Roman model; it lacks any of the depth that characterizes so much of the drama of the late 1580s to the 1620s.

Of classical models for tragedy the most highly esteemed were the tragedies of Seneca; these began to be performed in Latin on the Italian stage very early in the sixteenth century, and by 1551 are known to have been performed in England at Trinity College, Cambridge. Seneca's tragedies began to be translated into English by Jasper Haywood in the late 1550s, and within 20 years all of Seneca's plays had been translated into English. Ironically, these plays had almost certainly not been acted out fully on the Roman stage: they are filled with set-piece speeches, and are believed by classical scholars to have been recited by a single actor. The Elizabethans, however, took Seneca's plays as a model for lively action, borrowing not only their five-act structure but also their preponderance of long set-piece speeches. Such borrowings were at first very much an upper-class phenomenon: English Senecan plays such as Gorboduc, Jokester, Tancred, and Gismunda were performed in the houses of the nobility or at the Inns of Court on special occasions. To Sir Philip Sidney, endeavoring to apply as a matter of literary theory the rules of classical drama to the English stage, Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville's Gorboduc was particularly deserving of praise. Only the fact of its being "very defections in the circumstances"—in other words, of its not conforming closely enough to the classical ideal of the "unities," in which a play's action occurred in one setting and over a length of time not exceeding one day—prevented Gorboduc from being taken "as an exact model of all tragedies." To later ages, by contrast, it is almost unimaginable that Gorboduc could be a model for anything dramatic. Its long speeches seem static; extraordinary and violent actions are reported but never displayed before the audience; and the play is never structured so as to arouse audience expectations.

How did the most dynamic and open period of theater in the history of the English stage develop so quickly out of such a static and restrictive background? A key moment in this extraordinary development was the decision by a London businessman, James Burbage, to build a playhouse northeast of London—outside the city limits, so as to be outside the regulatory authority of the city, but close enough to enable Londoners to attend performances. But in 1576, "The Theatre," as Burbage rather unimaginatively called the new playhouse, became a model for other theaters such as the Globe and the Swan, the latter two both constructed in Southwark, just across the Thames from London—again, outside the London city limits. Before this time such "professional" actors as there had been belonged to troupes that traveled from town to town, typically performing old plays again and again in different venues. The establishment of permanent theaters in the London area reflected the demographic shifts of the time—not only the rapid growth of population, but also its increasing concentration in and around London. But the presence of these playing spaces had a number of important effects. Perhaps most obviously, they suddenly created a steady and ongoing demand for new plays: if Londoners were to be enticed to the new playhouses, the theater companies could not simply keep playing nothing but old standards. And London audiences were the most literate and the most diverse of any in Britain; though the monarch never deigned to attend performances in such venues, audiences certainly included all other elements of the population. Apprentices and others of scant means would pay a penny to stand on the ground in front of and on both sides of the stage (the members of the audience Hamlet calls "groundlings"). Levels of seating, protected from the elements, rose around on all sides; a covered seat for a performance typically cost two pence. Or a performance could be observed from the privacy of a "lord's room" for sixpence. (In Renaissance London, as in London or New York today, the most expensive seats in the theater were sold for the equivalent of a day's wage for a common laborer.)

A theater soon grew up that differed substantially from both the performances of the traveling troupes and the academic theater that had been imitating Roman models. For this "theater in the round," little or no attempt was made to provide realistic sets or backdrops: most props were handheld. There was a good deal of rapid movement and rapid dialogue, and long set speeches became a rarity. Comic characters and comic scenes were introduced into tragedies (a practice strictly forbidden according to Sidney or the classical theorists). And plays began more and more to depict all strata of society, and to depict women as well as men in leading roles. (Throughout this period, it was considered unseemly for women to appear on the public stage, though they did perform in court masques. In public theaters in England, female roles were played by adolescent boy actors, a practice that provided for multiple opportunities for complex layering in storylines such as those of Shakespeare's Twelfth Night and The Merchant of Venice involving females pretending to be males.)

Playwrights, for their part, were paid a flat fee for their work, typically six pounds per play. Popular plays were performed again and again over many years, but the playwright would receive no additional income from these performances; the incentive for playwrights was thus to produce new work. And produce they did: the 37 plays that Shakespeare is known to have written over the course of approximately 25 years may seem extraordinary by modern standards, but it pales by comparison with the productivity of Thomas Heywood, now best known as the author of the domestic tragedy A Woman Killed with Kindness (1603) and of a defense of the theater, An Apology for Actors (1612). In an address to the reader prefacing The English Traveler (1633), Heywood refers to the "two hundred and twenty plays in which I have had either an entire hand or at least the main finger" (of these, only about 20 survive). In the press to complete more work, collaboration of the sort that Heywood alludes to was frequent. Shakespeare collaborated with other playwrights on at least two projects; Ben Jonson collaborated with Thomas Dekker; Dekker collaborated with Thomas Middleton; Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher usually wrote in collaboration with each other; Philip Massinger collaborated with Dekker and with Nathaniel Field; and so on. In its modes of composition as much as in other respects, then, the Elizabethan drama was fluid and dynamic.

It should not be supposed that classical models were altogether abandoned in this flurry of creative activity; far from it. Comedies of the late 1580s and early 1590s (such as Shakespeare's The Comedy of Errors) were in many ways closely modeled on the comedies of Plautus, and tragedies from the same period (such as Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy, Marlowe's Tamburlaine, and Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus) borrowed extensively from Senecan tragedy. But Shakespeare and other comic dramatists quickly left behind the more formulaic aspects of Plautine comedy. They changed the shape of Senecan tragedy, too; a certain amount of static speechifying was still featured, but now the violence that in Seneca was typically reported as having occurred offstage began to be performed before the eyes of the audience. Audiences remained rapt: The Spanish Tragedy, Tamburlaine, and Titus Andronicus were all enormously popular.

For ten years or more following the establishment of the first permanent theater outside London, most of the plays produced seem to have been fairly crude in their construction. (Since few plays from this period have survived, generalizations must be advanced with caution.) Certainly plays such as those by George Peele from the 1580s and early 1590s, the anonymous Mucedorus (c. 1590)—and for that matter Tamburlaine and Titus Andronicus—are loosely constructed on episodic principles, with nothing to facilitate any sense of awareness in the audience of a concatenation of events unfolding. But by the early 1590s, Marlowe and Shakespeare in particular had refined the craft of playwriting so as to create through their plotting an ongoing sense of the future action as well as of the present. When a character such as Richard III (in the opening scene of Shakespeare's Richard III) expresses his intentions to the audience ("Plots I have laid, inductions dangerous ..."), the speech itself is not dissimilar to the set-piece speeches in Gorboduc. But here the intentions of Richard III are woven into the plot so as to become a driving force behind the play—a play that was performed more frequently than any other on the Elizabethan and Jacobean stage.

The theaters "in the round" outside the city limits were not the only venues for drama in London during this period. Notably, the old monastery at Blackfriars in London had begun as early as the 1550s to be used as a venue for the production of plays, and by the early seventeenth century it was a leading London theater. As a former monastic area it enjoyed, through a legal loophole, the same immunity from regulation and taxation by the city of London that the theaters outside the city limits enjoyed. The Blackfriars stage, though, was indoors, not outdoors like the public theaters; the stage itself was not surrounded by members of the audience on three sides as were the stages in the other theaters; and the audiences themselves were less diverse: there were no groundlings in the audience at private theaters such as Blackfriars and the Royal Court.

Even when outside the jurisdiction of the city, dramatic performances in the Elizabethan and Jacobean age entailed considerable risk. When in 1605 James I was apprised of the satirical treatment accorded the Scottish court in a play by Ben Jonson, John Marston, and George Chapman (Eastward Ho!), he disbanded the company that had mounted the production—even though his wife, Queen Anne, was its patron. Because of the potentially transgressive content of many Elizabethan and Jacobean plays, few were given a local and contemporary setting; even if one wished to convey pointed messages about contemporary politics, it was safer to do so elliptically, by setting the action of a play in Italy and in a vaguely defined past rather than in London in the present.

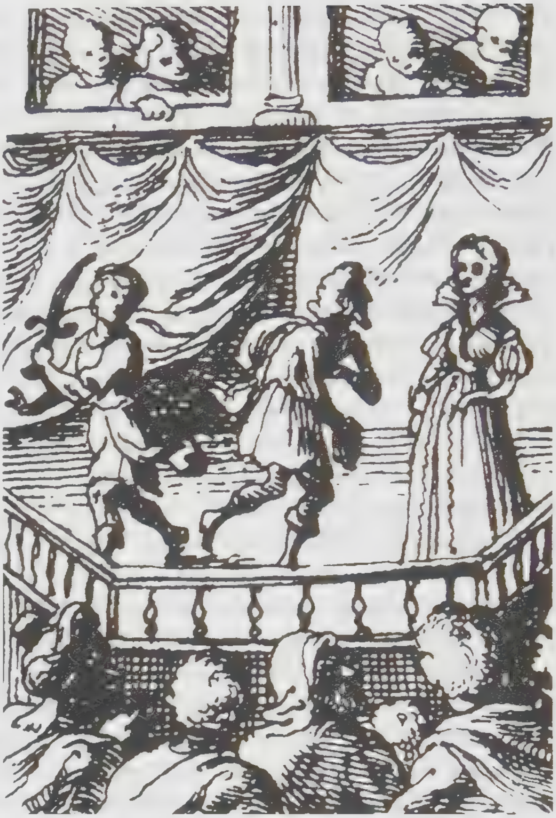
Title page, The Workes of Benjamin Jonson (1616). The publication in 1616 of Jonson's collected works is a landmark in the history of English drama as literature.

The range of the drama in the early years of the seventeenth century is, if anything, even broader than that of the 1590s. This is the era of Shakespeare's great tragedies and of his dark comedies as well as his late romances; of many of Ben Jonson's finest comedies; of a group of violent "revenge tragedies" by Webster and Tourneur; and of a group of "city comedies" concerning London society by Dekker, Middleton, and others. Overall, the tone of the Jacobean drama is darker than that of the Elizabethan stage—the satire more biting, the tragedy more bleak. This is also the era of the masque, a form of court drama that stands in marked contrast to that of "theater in the round." Masques were as much spectacle as drama. They were astonishingly expensive productions performed for the aristocracy by a mixture of professionals and members of the court itself; they typically drew on pastoral or mythological themes; they often involved interaction between performers and spectators; they usually featured elaborate costumes, painted scenery, special effects, and set-piece displays; and they always included a good deal of song, music, and dance.

As the seventeenth century wore on, the theater came more and more frequently under attack by Puritans. Since the late 1580s dramatists had walked a fine line, desiring always to give to those elements of the crowd that were entertained by displays of bawdiness and violence a good deal of what they were looking for, while still insisting that such displays fulfilled a didactic purpose. The description of the action of the domestic tragedy Arden of Faversham (c. 1585–90) gives something of the flavor:

> The lamentable and true tragedy of M. Arden of Faversham of Kent. Who was most wickedly murdered by the means of his disloyal and wanton wife.... Wherein is showed the great malice and dissimulation of a wicked woman, the unsatiable desire of filthy lust and the shameful end of all murderers.

Wickedness, in other words, is shown to be punished, but along the way a good deal of titillation for the audience is provided. The theaters managed to resist the criticisms from the Puritans for more than five decades. But when Charles I was forced from London and the Puritans took control at the onset of the civil war in 1642, the theaters were closed by city officials—at the time, probably for political as much as moral reasons (the first thing all authorities traditionally do in a time of revolution is close the sites where large groups of people can meet together). They remained closed for almost two decades, until the Restoration in 1660. The most remarkable era in the history of the English stage was at an end.



From the frontispiece to William Alabaster, Roxana Tragedia (1632). This is one of the earliest printed representations of an English dramatic performance.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE IN THE SIXTEENTH AND SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES

If the rediscovery of Greek and Latin literature was a central element of the Renaissance in England, the increased currency of the Greek and Latin languages—and of Latin especially—was central to the changes that occurred in the English language in this period. Of the thousands of new English words imported from Greek and Latin, many were words that named new concepts or things for which no English equivalent existed (from area and equilibrium to vacuum). Such words enlarged the expressive capacity of the English language in several directions, increasing the stock of scientific, mathematical, rhetorical, and philosophical terms, and more broadly increasing the capacity of the language to express abstract concepts. (The word "abstraction" itself is first recorded as having been used in 1547.) Many Latin words remained intact as they entered the English language, including antenna, apparatus, cerebellum, militia, and tedium. Others became reshaped, often losing their original suffixes, as with, for example, the Latin words complexus and desperatus. On the other hand, Latin prefixes (among the most common of which are ob-, from; post-, after; pre-, before; and sub-, under) tended more often than not to be retained without alteration. In some cases words with Latin roots that had originally entered the English language in an altered form from the French now had a form closer to the Latin original "restored" in English.

There were also extensive borrowings during this period from the French (e.g., bayonet, muscle), from the Italian (e.g., argosy, squadron), from the Spanish (e.g., cargo, sherry), and from the Dutch (e.g., deck, dock, and yacht). In these borrowings one can see something of the pattern of interaction between Britons and these other nationalities, with borrowings from the Spanish often concerned with warfare, and from the Dutch often concerned with commerce, the sea, and painting (e.g., easel, sketch, and landscape).

Among the educated classes there were always those who resisted or mocked aspects of this "invasion" of foreign words. Thomas Wilson, for example, lamented in his Art of Rhetoric (1553) the use of "inkhorn terms" that were regarded as signs of scholarly affectation. Ralph Lever, responding to the wholesale importation of Latin terms, suggested in 1573 that the existing resources of native English could be adapted in ways that would be preferable to the Latin terms—that endsay, for example, should be preferred to conclusion, saywhat should be preferred to definition, and so on. And Ben Jonson in his play Poetaster mocked the excessive use of real or presumptive foreign imports such as defunct, fatuate, furibund, inflate, prorumpted ("What a noise it made!" comments one character at the mention of this word), strenuous, turgidious, and ventositous. "O terrible windy words," laments one character. "A sign of a windy brain," agrees another. We may safely infer that such satire (like that by Shakespeare in Love's Labour's Lost) had a recognizable referent in real life—that some did indeed use the new coinages in an affected or pompous fashion. But some of the resistance appears to have represented no more than the prejudice that seems inevitable in any age against linguistic change. Just as William Strunk and E.B. White fulminated in the 1950s against the new word finalize, unable to recognize how it might fulfill a useful linguistic function, so Jonson and the others made fun of words such as defunct and strenuous that have ended up taking a permanent (and permanently useful) place in the English language.

The fact that more new words appear in the works of Shakespeare than in those of any other writer from this period has prompted the unjustified assumption that Shakespeare "introduced" more new words to the English language than anyone else. That claim may well be true, but we can of course speak with certainty only of first written occurrences of words and phrases; it is in almost every case entirely possible that a word or phrase had been in common currency for some time before it appears in a piece of writing that has survived. At the very least, however, we may confidently say that Shakespeare was extraordinarily receptive to new coinages, and that his works played a role in helping to shape the changing language during this period. It is noteworthy that among the many words that first appear in English in Shakespeare there are not only a great many borrowings from Latin (e.g., abstemious, arose, assignation) but also a number of words formed by inventive re-combinations of English words, or through part of speech conversions (e.g., gloomy, leapfrog, lonely). In his place in the history of the language as in other respects, Shakespeare stands pre-eminent.

It is worth noting here that many phrases or expressions that we now think of as proverbial also originated in Shakespeare's works. The phrase "vanish into thin air," for example, is used on a daily basis, so much so that it is difficult to recapture a fresh sense of the aptness of the image. Other expressions that make their first appearance in Shakespeare include come full circle, eaten out of house and home, has seen better days, the live-long day, and there's method in his madness.

Though the printing press had been introduced in 1476, the regularization of spelling that one might have expected to follow as a natural consequence of the spread of printing began to happen only very slowly over the course of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Certainly through to the early seventeenth century it remained common for writers to spell the same word in different ways in the same document, and even for individuals to spell their name in different ways at different times. Pronunciation also began to move toward a common standard as London became more and more dominant in English life, but these changes too, occurred slowly; there remained several distinct dialects of English in the mid-seventeenth century. The great vowel shift was virtually complete by the early sixteenth century, as was the change in habits of pronunciation of the final e in many English words; by the end of the fifteenth century that practice had almost entirely died out.

The Renaissance brought several changes in English grammar and syntax. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the –eth third person singular verb ending (e.g., followeth, thinketh) began to die out, though some common contractions of these forms (e.g., hath for haveth, doth for doeth) persisted into the late seventeenth century. There were changes, too, in the formation of pronouns. In the third person plural, the forms they / them / their replaced the old they / hem / hire that we find in Chaucerian English. And the second person you replaced the old ye during this period. With second person pronouns, however, the situation is complicated by changes in usage involving the second person pronoun thou (and its object form thee). These forms were used when one was addressing another in a more familiar or less respectful fashion, whether because of the circumstances or because of the relative social standing of the individuals in conversation. (A child or an animal would also typically be addressed as thou.) In less familiar and more respectful contexts you would be used. (The distinction here resembles that still existing in languages such as French, in which one may choose when addressing an individual between the more familiar tu and the more formal vous, which also serves as the second person plural form.) The use of the familiar thou and thee began to die out early in the sixteenth century, and by the seventeenth century you was used almost universally as the second person pronoun in all circumstances.

Finally, there were significant changes during the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries in the formation of negatives and interrogatives, and in the use of do as an auxiliary verb. Instead of saying we went not or asking know you her? it became common to say we did not go and to ask do you know her? The use of do as an auxiliary spread quickly, and indeed for much of the early modern period came to be used in ways that have since died out; in the sixteenth century the forms I think and I do think were used interchangeably where now (unless we wish to add emphasis) we would use only the former.

HISTORY OF THE LANGUAGE AND OF PRINT CULTURE

In an effort to provide for readers a direct sense of the development of the language and of print culture, examples of texts in their original form (and of illustrations) have been provided in each volume. A list of these within the present volume, arranged chronologically, appears below. John Foxe's 1570 comments on "The benefit and invention of printing" appear on pages 96–97.

Margaret Cavendish, Philosophical and Physical Opinions, 1655, frontispiece (detail), LXXXVIII.

Ben Jonson, The Workes of Benjamin Jonson, title page, 1616 edition, p. XCV.

William Tyndale, page from Tyndale's New Testament, 1526, p. 86.

John Foxe, Acts and Monuments, woodcut illustrations, 1563 edition, pp. LX, 91, 101; title page, 1641 edition, p. 102.

A Discovery of Six Women Preachers, c. 1641, cover of pamphlet, p. 106.

Anonymous, Desecration of the Host, woodcut from Representation of a Miracle of the Body of Christ, c. 1500, p. 108.

Thomas Coryate, Coryat's Crudities, title page (detail), 1611 edition, p. 111.

Baldassare Castiglione, The Courtier (first English edition), 1561, title page, p. 168.

Edmund Spenser, The Faerie Queene, illustration of the Redcrosse Knight, 1590 edition, p. 317; The Shepheardes Calender (Website), original spelling and punctuation.

Sir Philip Sidney, The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, title page, 1593 edition, p. 374.

Anonymous, "Sketch of the Trial of Mary, Queen of Scots," 1586, p. 409.

John Dowland, Firste Book of Songs or Ayres, 1597, p. 419.

Advertisement for Parthenia, a collection of songs by William Byrd and others, c. 1611, p. 420.

The Assize of Bread, London, 1600, p. 426.

Hornbook from the early seventeenth century, p. 427.

John Baidon, New Book Containing All Sorts of Hands, woodcut, 1611 edition, p. 427.

Anonymous, "A Petty School," woodcut, early seventeenth century, p. 427.

Geffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblems and Other Devices, 1586, title page, p. 440; emblems, pp. 441–442.

The Noble Art of Venerie, or Hunting; The Book of Falconry, or Hawking; The Famous Game of Chess-Play, title pages, pp. 423–24.

John Melton, Astrologaster, 1620 title page, p. 429.

True and Wonderfull: A Discourse Relating a Strange and Monstrous Serpent (or Dragon) Lately Discovered, 1614, title page, p. 432.

Thomas Dekker, The Belman of London, 1608, title page, p. 433.

Anthony Fitzherbert, The Book of Husbandry, c. 1523, title page, p. 434.

Henry Stuart, Lord Darnly, Devonshire Manuscript, c. 1562, p. 57, p. 435.

John Scottowe, An Alphabet of Ornamental Capitals, 1592, p. 436.

King James Bible, 1611, title page, p. 75; New Testament, 1611, title page, p. 437.

William Browne, "On the Countess of Pembroke" in Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, 1627, p. 438.

Three poems about Sir Philip Sidney in Sir Philip Sidney, Arcadia, 1627, p. 439.

Sir Walter Ralegh, Letter to His Wife, 1603, original spelling and punctuation, p. 468–69.

Mary Rowlandson, A True History of the Capitivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson, title page, 1682 edition, p. 497.

Thomas Kyd, The Spanish Tragedie, title page, 1615 edition, p. 502.

Sir Francis Bacon, "Of Truth," opening page, from 1625 edition of Essays, p. LXXXVII; title page, 1613 and 1625 editions of Essays, p. 558; "Of Studies," original spelling and punctuation, p. 569.

Christopher Marlowe, Dr. Faustus, title pages of 1604 and 1616 editions, p. 625.

Anonymous, Tarlton's Jests, title page of 1628 edition, p. 626.

George Peele, Merry and Conceited Jests of George Peele, title page, 1607 edition, p. 632.

Anonymous, pages from "The mad-merry prankes of Robbin Good-fellow," early seventeenth century, p. 643.

Anonymous, "The Cucking of a Scould," woodcut image, c. 1630, p. 646.

Henry Peacham, Manuscript Emblems, "Adonis Killed by a Boar," 1612, p. 674.

William Shakespeare, Sonnets, facsimile reproductions of pages from 1609 edition, pp. 688–89; title pages of quarto editions of Romeo and Juliet, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and King Lear (website); title page and facing pages from 1623 Folio edition of the plays (website).

Thomas Dekker, A Rod for Runaways, woodcut, 1625 edition, p. 806.

John Donne, Sonnet 10 ("Batter my Heart, three-personed God; for you"), c. 1620–23, in St. Paul's Cathedral Library MS 49. B 43 fol. 60r, p. 831.

Thomas Hobbes, Leviathan, frontispiece to 1651 edition, p. 898.

George Herbert, "Easter Wings," in The Temple, 1633, p. 910.

John Milton, Paradise Lost, title page, 1674 edition, p. 991.

Katherine Philips, "Friendship's Mystery, To My Dearest Lucasia," poem in original spelling and punctuation, pp. 949–50.

John Milton, Paradise Lost, passage in original spelling and punctuation, pp. 992–93.

Leveller's Manifestos of 1647 and 1649, titles pages, p. 1124.

Gerrard Winstanley, A Declaration from the Poor Oppressed People of England, title page, 1649 edition, p. 1128.

JOHN SKELTON

c. 1460 – 1529

John Skelton was one of the most prominent writers of his time. Friendly with the royal family, he influenced both literary and political spheres. As a poet he was known for his breezy but cutting satirical writing. Politically, however, his most notable trait was outspokenness—a quality that sometimes got him into trouble. Not much is known about his childhood and adolescence beyond the fact that his family was from Yorkshire. He was educated at Cambridge University, then at Oxford. Oxford conferred on him the honorific title "poet laureate" in 1488, as did the University of Louvain in 1492 and Cambridge in 1493.

Skelton began his career as a rhetorician and translator. His translations of texts by such classical writers as Cicero and Diodorus Siculus (albeit from Latin versions, not from the Greek originals) associate him with early Tudor humanist admirers of ancient letters and learning. In 1488 he joined the court of King Henry VII as an official poet; thus began a connection with the court that would last for forty years. The next year he published the first work that can reliably be ascribed to him, an "Elegy on the Death of the Earl of Northumberland" (1489). Between 1496 and 1501 he served as a tutor for Prince Arthur (who died young) and Prince Henry (later Henry VIII); around 1501 he wrote for them his Speculum Principis (1501), a "mirror for Princes" on the nature of good rulership that he later revised and presented to Henry on the new king's accession to the throne in 1509.

In 1498 Skelton started a new phase in his professional life. He began studying for the priesthood and, once ordained, rapidly advanced through the lower hierarchy of the church, serving as subdeacon, deacon, and then finally a priest of the Abbey of St. Mary Grace. Despite being a priest, and perhaps because of a satirist's tendency to attract jest and anecdote, he eventually acquired a probably undeserved and largely posthumous reputation for drunkenness and womanizing. Some sources say that he was suspended briefly from serving his church in 1511 for having a wife. He began writing in earnest at this time, and in 1498 published "The Bowge of Courte" (the rewards of court), a biting satire on court politics.

In 1503 Skelton retired briefly from court life to become rector of the parish church in Diss, Norfolk, where he stayed until 1512. While serving this parish, he wrote one of his best-known works, "Phyllyp Sparrowe," a young girl's lament for her dead pet bird. Although Skelton was not a courtier during these years, he continued to address the court in works such as "A Lawde and Prayse Made for Our Souereigne Lord the King" (1509) and an elegy in Latin on the death of Henry VII (commissioned by the Abbot of Westminster in 1512). After Henry VII's death, Skelton returned to the court, now in the employ of his former pupil, Henry VIII, who gave him the title Orator regius, the King's Orator.

During the next few years Skelton served as a poet-propagandist for the court, celebrating England's military victories over the French and the Scots. His "Ballad of the Scottysshe Kynge" was released and distributed throughout England just days after Henry VIII defeated James IV of Scotland, and thus served simultaneously as a poetic reflection on the victory and as a news bulletin.

Skelton's courtly writing also focused on kingship. One of his most elaborate works, a drama called Magnyfycence (1515?), is a morality play that explores the qualities to which a king should aspire: generosity, good sense, and grandeur. The main character, Magnificence, is a kingly figure tempted by political vices such as Folly and Counterfeit Countenance but restrained by courtly virtues such as Measure and Perseverance. It is possible that Shakespeare was influenced by this work; the narrative of Prince Hal in Henry IV.I and II somewhat resembles Magnyfycence's dramaturgical structure.

In 1518 Skelton moved to a house in the Sanctuary of Westminster in London. He began a series of literary attacks on Cardinal Wolsey, England's highest-ranking church official, who had political power commensurate to his station. Skelton's attacks include "Speke, Parrot" (1521?), "Colin Cloute" (1521–22), and "Why Come Ye Nat to Courte" (1522). Wolsey, as Henry VIII's chief minister, had Skelton imprisoned briefly and then released him. In 1523, Skelton appears to have made peace with the cardinal and wrote The Garlande of Laurell, which is part autobiography, part lyric, and part apology to Wolsey. In this poem, however, Skelton resumed his vitriolic tone. Written while England was still Catholic, his "Replycacion Against Certayne Yong Scolers Abjured of Late" (1527) scolds two Cambridge graduates for what Skelton thought were their heretical opinions. The poet's outspokenness was not just reserved for political figures, for he maintained a long-standing feud with Alexander Barclay, a rival poet-priest. The two ridiculed each other mercilessly in their poems.

Although he imitated Chaucer's seven-line stanza in some early works, Skelton could also deploy a literary style all his own. His verse often has a peculiar pattern of short, rapid-fire alliterative lines with two or three heavy stresses per line, together with end rhymes that can continue for upwards of seven or eight lines; so distinctive is this manner that scholars have named it "Skeltonic." The subject matter of his writing varied widely—although he wrote frequently for and of the court, many of his works (such as "The Tunnyng of Elynour Rummyng," a satirical poem in Skeltonic lines on female brewers) have commoners as their subjects. Similarly, despite his experiments with Latinate ("aureate") style or the macaronic multi-lingual juxtapositions of his "Speke, Parrot," his writing is grounded in colloquial English. A number of commonplace phrases such as "I smell a rat" and "by hook or by crook" have their earliest recorded literary appearances in his work.

Skelton's work marks a point of transition for English literature. He lived at a time when a medieval mindset was evolving into that of the Renaissance, and his writing has elements of both periods. Bitterly opposed to the Reformation and even to some parts of the new humanist learning, his many classical allusions and his translations demonstrate an interest in exploiting and valuing the culture of the ancient Greeks and Romans.

Skelton died 21 June 1529. He is buried at St. Margaret's Church, Lee Green, London.

⌘⌘⌘

The Tunning° of Elinour Rumming brewing

Tell you I chill,[1]
If that ye will Awhile be still,
Of a comely Gill° woman
That dwelt on a hill:
But she is not gryl,° harsh
For she is somewhat sage
And well worn in age.
For her viságe° face
It would assuage
A man's coráge.° courage
  Her loathly lere[2]
Is nothing clear,
But ugly of cheer,° expression

---

[1] I chill I will (from "Ich will").

[2] loathly lere Disgusting complexion.

roopy and drowsy,
Scurvy and lowsy,
Her face all bowsy,° boozy
Comely crinkléd,
Woundrously wrinkléd,
Like a roast pig's ear,
Bristléd with hair.
Her lewd lippes twain,
They slaver, men sayne,
Like a ropy° rain, stringy
A gummy glair.[1]
She is ugly fair.
Her nose somedele° hookéd, somewhat
And camously crooked,[2]
Never stopping,
But ever dropping;
Her skin, loose and slack,
Grainéd like a sack;
With a crooked back.
Her eyen° gowndy° eyes / bleary
Are full unsowndy,° unhealthy
For they are bleared;
And she gray-haired,
Jawéd like a jetty;[3]
A man would have pity
To see how she is gumméd,
Fingered and thumbéd,
Gently jointed,
Greased and annointed
Up to the knuckles;
The bones of her huckles° hips
Like as they were with buckles
Together made fast.
Her youth is far past.
Footed like a plane,
Leggéd like a crane,
And yet she will jet° strut
Like a jollivet,[4]
In her furréd flocket,[5]
And gray russet rocket,[6]
With simper and cocket.[7]
Her hood of Lincoln green
It had been hers, I ween,° imagine
More than forty year;
And so doth it appear,
For the green bare threadës
Look like sere° weedës, dry
Witheréd like hay,
The wool worn away.
And yet, I dare say,
She thinketh herself gay
Upon the holy day
When she doth her array[8]
And girdeth in her geets° garments
Stitched and pranked with pleats;
Her kirtle° Bristol-red, dress
With clothes upon her head
That weigh a sow of lead,[9]
Writhen° in wondrous wise twisted
After the Saracen's guise,[10]
With a whim-wham° fancy detail
Knit with a trim-tram° ornament
Upon her brain-pan;° skull
Like an Egyptian
Cappéd about.
When she goeth out
Herself for to shew,
She driveth down the dew
With a pair of heelës
As broad as two wheelës;
She hobbles as a goose
With her blanket hose
Over the fallow;
Her shoon° smeared with tallow, shoes
Greaséd upon dirt
That baudeth° her skirt. dirties

---

[1] glair Substance resembling egg white.

[2] camously crooked Awkwardly turned up.

[3] Jawéd like a jetty With a jaw that sticks out like a pier.

[4] jollivet Neatly dressed woman.

[5] flocket Loose tunic with long sleeves.

[6] russet rocket Cloak made out of homespun fabric.

[7] With simper and cocket With an affected, simpering manner.

[8] doth her array Dresses herself.

[9] weigh a sow of lead Weighs as much as a lead ingot.

[10] After the Saracen's guise Like the turban worn by the "Saracen," a term used in the period to refer to an Arab, a Turk, or a Muslim.

FIT° THE FIRST part

And this comely dame,
I understand, her name
Is Elinour Rumming,
At home in her wonning;° dwelling
And as men say
She dwelt in Surrey,
In a certain stead
Beside Leatherhead.
She is a tonnish gib,[1]
The devil and she be sib.° siblings

But to make up my tale,
She breweth nappy° ale, strong
And maketh thereof pot-sale[2]
To travellers, to tinkers,
To sweaters, to swinkers,° laborers
And all good ale-drinkers,
That will nothing spare
But drink till they stare
And bring themselves bare,
With "Now away the mare![3]
And let us slay care."
As wise as an hare!

Come whoso will
To Elinour on the hill
With "Fill the cup, fill!"
And sit there by still,
Early and late.
Thither cometh Kate,
Cisly and Sarah,
With their legs bare,
And alsó their feet
Hardely full unsweet;
With their heelës daggéd,° dirty
Their kirtles all to-jaggéd,
Their smockës all to-ragged,
With titters and tatters,
Bring dishes and platters,
With all their might running
To Elinour Rumming
To have of her tunning.
She lendeth them on the same,[4]
And thus beginneth the game.
Some wenches come unlacéd,
Some housewives come unbracéd,[5]
With their naked pappes,° breasts
That flippës and flappës,
That wiggës and waggës
Like tawny° saffron baggës; light brown
A sort of foul drabbës
All scurvy with scabbës.
Some be flybitten,
Some skewéd as a kitten;
Some with a shoe-clout[6]
Bind their headës about;
Some have no hair-lace,
Their locks about their face,
Their tresses untrussed
All full of unlust;
Some look strawry,
Some cawry-mawry;[7]
Full untidy teggës,[8]
Like rotten eggës.
Such a lewd sort
To Elinour resort
From tide to tide.
Abide, abide!
And to you shall be told
How her ale is sold
To Maud and to Mold.

FIT THE SECOND

Some have no money
That thither comë

---

[1] tonnish gib Literally "fashionable cat."

[2] maketh thereof pot-sale Makes it available for sale.

[3] away the mare Away with sadness.

[4] She lendeth them on the same She loans them beer with their clothes as collateral.

[5] unbracéd With their garments open.

[6] shoe-clout Cloth used for wiping shoes.

[7] cawry-mawry Like rough material.

[8] teggës Contemptuous term for the women (literally "young unshorn sheep").

For their ale to pay.
That is a shrewd array!
Elinour swearéd, "Nay,
Ye shall not bear away
My ale for nought,
By Him that me bought!"[1]
With "Hey, dog, hey!
Have these hogs away!"
With "Get me a staff,
The swine eat my draff![2]
Strike the hogs with a club,
They have drunk up my swilling-tub!"
For, be there never so much press,[3]
These swine go to the high dais,
The sow with her pigs,
The boar his tail wrigs,° wriggles
His rump alsó he frigs° rubs
Against the high bench!
With, "Fo, there's a stench!
Gather up, thou wench;
Seest thou not what is fall?° happening
Take up dirt and all,
And bear out of the hall:
God give it ill-preving,[4]
Cleanly as evil 'chieving!"

But let us turn plain,
There we left again.
For, as ill a patch as that,
The hens run in the mash-vat;
For they go to roost
Straight over the ale-joust,° ale-pot
And dung, when it comës,
In the ale-tunnës.° ale-casks
Then Elinour taketh
The mash-bowl, and shaketh
The hens' dung away,
And skimmeth it into a tray
Whereas the yeast is,
With her mangy° fistës: scabby
And sometime she blens
The dung of her hens
And the ale together,
And sayeth, "Gossip,° come hither, friend
This ale shall be thicker,
And flower° the more quicker; froth
For I may tell yóu
I learned it of a Jew
When I began to brew,
And I have found it true.
Drink now while it is new:
An ye may it brook,° enjoy
It shall make you look Younger than ye be Yearës two or three,
For ye may prove it by me."
"Behold," she said, "and see
How bright I am of ble!° complexion
Ich am not cast away,
That can my husband say,
When we kiss and play
In lust and in likíng;
He calleth me his whiting,[5]
His mulling° and his miting,° darling / little one
His nobbës° and his coney,° sweetheart / rabbit
His sweeting and his honey,
With 'Buss,° my pretty bonny, kiss me
Thou art worth goods and money!'
Thus make I my fellow fonny,° foolish
Till that he dream and drony;° becomes sluggish
For, after all our sport,
Then will he rout° and snort: bellow
Then sweetly together we lie
As two pigs in a sty."

To cease meseemeth best,
And of this tale to rest,
And for to leave this letter
Because it is no better,
And because it is no sweeter;
We will no further rime
Of it at this time,
But we will turnë plain
Where we left again.

---

[1] By Him that me bought By Christ.

[2] draff Leftover brewing grains, often used as hogs' swill.

[3] be there never so much press If the establishment is not busy.

[4] God give it ill-preving May God bring it to ruin.

[5] whiting Species of fish (a term of endearment).

Fit the Third

Instead of coin and money
Some bringë her a coney,° rabbit
And some a pot with honey,
Some a salt, and some a spoon,
Some their hose, some their shoon;° shoes
Some run a good trot
With a skillet or a pot;
Some fill their pot full
Of good Lemster wool:
An housewife of trust,
When she is athirst,
Such a web can spin,
Her thrift is full thin.[1]

Some go straight thither,
Be it slaty or slither:[2]
They hold the highway,
They care not what men say,
Be that as be may.
Some, loth to be espied,
Start in at the backë-side
Over the hedge and pale,
And all for the good ale.
Some runnë till they sweat,
Bring with them malt or wheat,
And Dame Elinour entreat
To birle them of the best.[3]

Then cometh another guest:
She sweareth by the rood of rest[4]
Her lippës are so dry
Without drink she must die,
"Therefore fill it by and by,
And have here a peck of rye."

Anon cometh another,
As dry as the other,
And with her doth bring
Meal, salt, or other thing,
Her harvest girdle, her wedding-ring,
To pay for her scot° bill
As cometh to her lot.
One bringeth her husband's hood
Because the ale is good;
Another brought her his cap
To offer to the ale-tap,
With flax and with tow;° unprepared flax
And some brought sour dough
With "Hey" and with "Ho!
Sit we down a row,
And drink till we blow,° argue, boast
And pipe 'Tirly Tirlow!'"[5]

Some laid to pledge
Their hatchet and their wedge,
Their heckle[6] and their reel,
Their rock,[7] their spinning-wheel;
And some went so narrow
They laid to pledge their wharrow,[8]
Their ribskin[9] and their spindle,
Their needle and their thimble.
Here was scant thrift
When they made such shift.° trade
Their thirst was so great
They asked never for meat,
But "Drink, still drink,
And let the cat wink![10]
Let us wash our gums
From the dry crumbs!"

Fit the Fourth

Some for very need
Laid down a skein° of thread, length

---

[1] Her thrift is full thin Her thriftiness goes away.

[2] slaty or slither On smooth roads or on stony roads.

[3] To birle them of the best To pour them a drink of her best.

[4] rood of rest Cross of salvation.

[5] Tirly Tirlow Nonsense singing.

[6] heckle Comb used in spinning.

[7] rock Staff used in spinning.

[8] wharrow Pulley on a spinning wheel.

[9] ribskin Leather apron used in preparing flax for spinning.

[10] let the cat wink A proverb: "let the cat wink and let the mouse run."

And some a skein of yarn;
Some brought from the barn
Both beanës and peas;
Small chaffer° doth ease trades
Sometime, now and then;
Another there was that ran
With a good brass-pan,
Her colour was full wan;° pale
She ran in all the haste,
Unbracéd and unlaced;
Tawny, swart,° and sallow dark-skinned
Like a cake of tallow.
I swear by all hallow
It was a stale° to take lure
The devil in a brake!° cage
And then came halting° Joan, limping
And brought a gambone[1]
Of bacon that was reasty:° rancid
But, Lord, as she was testy,
Angry as a waspy!
She began to gape and gaspy,
And bade Elinour go bet° quicker
And fill in good met;° measure
It was dear that was far-fet.° far-fetched

Another brought a spick° fat portion
Of a bacon flick,
Her tongue was very quick
But she spake somewhat thick.
Her fellow did stammer and stut,
But she was a foul slut,
For her mouth foaméd
And her belly groanéd:
Joan sayn she had eaten a fiest.
"By Christ," said she, "thou liest,
I have as sweet a breath
As thou, with shameful death!"
Then Elinour said, "Ye callets,° whores
I shall break your palates,° heads
Without° ye now cease!" unless
And so was made the peace.
Then thither came drunken Alice,
And she was full of talës,
Of tidings in Walës,
And of Saint James in Galës,[2]
And of the Portingalës,° Portuguese
With "Lo, gossip, ywis,° truly
Thus and thus it is:
There hath been great war
Between Temple Bar
And the Cross in Cheap,[3]
And there came an heap
Of mill-stones in a rout[4] …"
She speaketh thus in her snout,
Snivelling in her nose
As though she had the pose.° a head cold
"Lo, here is an old tippet,° stole, scarf
An ye will give me a sippet
Of your stale ale,
God send you good sale!"
And as she was drinking
She fell in a winking
With a barlichood,° fit of drunkenness
She pissed where she stood.
Then began she to weep,
And forthwith fell asleep.
Elinour took her up
And blessed her with a cup
Of newë ale in cornës:[5]
Alice found therein no thornës,
But supped it up at onës,
She found therein no bonës.

Fit the Fifth

Now in cometh another rabble:
First one with a ladle,
Another with a cradle,

---

[1] gambone Bottom of a "side."

[2] Saint James in Galës Saint James (d. 44 CE), patron saint of Spain. Many Christians made pilgrimages to his shrine in the Spanish province of Galicia.

[3] Temple Bar … Cheap Temple Bar and Cheapside, areas of London.

[4] great war … rout Reference to riots which began on "Evil May Day" (1 May 1517) in which residents of London's East End rose up against immigrant workers, particularly wealthy French and Flemish merchants.

[5] newë ale in cornës Ale drawn off the malt.

And with a side-saddle:
And there began a fabble,° fable
A clattering and a babble
Of foolish Philly
That had a foal with Willy,
With "'Jast you!" and "Gup gilly!"[1]
She could not lie stilly.

Then came in a jennet° horseman
And swore, "By Saint Bennet,[2]
I drank not this sennight° week
A draught to my pay!
Elinour, I thee pray,
Of thine ale let us essay,° try
And have here a pilch[3] of gray:
I wear skinnes of coney,° rabbit
That causeth I look so dony!"° drab

Another then did hitch° her, jerk
And brought a pottle-pitcher,
A tunnel° and a bottle, funnel
But she had lost the stopple:
She cut off her shoe-sole,
And stoppéd therewith the hole.

Amongë all the blommer° uproar, confusion
Another brought a skommer,° ladle with a sieve
A frying-pan, and a slicer:
Elinour made the pricë
For good ale each wit.° offering

Then start in mad Kit
That had little wit:
She seeméd somedele sick
And brought a penny chick
To Dame Elinour
For a draught of liquor.

Then Margery Milkduck
Her kirtle she did uptuck
An inch above her knee,
Her legs that ye might see;
But they were sturdy and stubbéd,
Mighty pestles and clubbed,
As fair and as white
As the foot of a kite.[4]
She was somewhat foul,
Crooken-neckéd like an owl;
And yet she brought her fees,
A cantle° of Essex cheese,[5] piece
Was well a foot thick
Full of maggots quick:° live
It was huge and great,
And mighty strong meat° food
For the devil to eat:
It was tart and pungete!° sharp

Another set of sluts:
Some brought walnuts,
Some apples, some pears,
Some brought their clipping shears,
Some brought this and that,
Some brought I wot° ne'er what; knew
Some brought their husband's hat,
Some puddings and links,° sausages
Some tripes that stinks.
But of all this throng
One came them among,
She seeméd half a leech° doctor
And began to preach
Of the Tuesday in the week
When the mare doth kick;
Of the virtue of an unset leek,[6]
Of her husband's breek;° breeches
With the feathers of a quail
She could to Bordeaux sail;
And with good ale barmë° yeast
She could make a charmë
To help withal a stitch:
She seemed to be a witch.
Another brought two goslings

"Jast you!" and "Gup gilly!" Exclamations generally used in handling a horse.

[2] Saint Bennet Saint Benedict (c. 480–543), the founder of Western monasticism.

[3] pilch Coat made up of both the skin and fur of the animal.

[4] kite Small bird of prey.

[5] Essex cheese Type of cheese prone to maggot infestation.

[6] the virtue of an unset leek Young leeks were thought to have strong medicinal properties.

That were noughty frostlings;[1]
She brought them in a wallet,° knapsack
She was a comely callet:° lewd woman
The goslings were untied;
Elinour began to chide,
"They be wretchocks° thou hast brought, runts
They are sheer shaking nought!"[2]

Fit the Sixth

Maud Ruggy thither skippéd:
She was ugly hippéd,
And ugly thick lippéd,
Like an onion sided,
Like tan leather hided.
She had her so guided
Between the cup and the wall
That she was there withal
Into a palsy fall;
With that her head shakéd,
And her handes quakéd,
One's head would have achéd
To see her naked.
She drank so of the dreggës,
The dropsy was in her leggës;
Her face glistering like glass,
All foggy fat she was.
She had alsó the gout
In all her joints about;
Her breath was sour and stale,
And smelléd all of ale:
Such a bedfellaw
Would make one cast his craw.[3]
But yet for all that
She drank on the mash-vat.
There came an old ribibe:° woman
She halted of a kibe,[4]
And had broken her shin
At the threshold coming in,
And fell so wide open
That one might see her token,
The devil thereon be wroken!° unleashed
What need all this be spoken?
She yelléd like a calf.
"Rise up, on God's half!"
Said Elinour Rumming,
'I beshrew thee for thy coming!'
And as she at her did pluck,
"Quack, quack!" said the duck
In that lampatram's lap;
With "Fie, cover thy shap
With some flip flap!
God give it ill hap,"° fortune
Said Elinour, "for shame!"—
Like an honest dame.
Up she start, half lame,
And scantly could go
For pain and for woe.
In came another dant,° loose woman
With a goose and a gant:° yawn
She had a wide weasant;° windpipe
She was nothing pleasant,
Neckéd like an elephant;
It was a bulliphant,
A greedy cormorant.[5]

Another brought her garlic heads,
Another brought her beads
(Of jet or of coal)
To offer to the ale pole.
Some brought a wimble,° hand drill
Some brought a thimble,
Some brought a silk lace,
Some brought a pincase,
Some her husband's gown,
Some a pillow of down,
Some of the napery° table linen
. . . .[6]
And all this shift° they make trade
For the good ale sake.

---

[1] noughty frostlings I.e., of poor quality.

[2] sheer shaking nought Diseased.

[3] cast his craw Vomit.

[4] kibe Ulcer on the heel.

[5] cormorant Sea bird known for swallowing fish whole.

[6] Line missing.

“A straw!°” said Bely, “stand utter,° nonsense! / back
For we have eggs and butter,
. . . .[1]
And of pigeons a pair.”

Then start forth a fizgig,° giddy girl
And she brought a boar pig,
The flesh thereof was rank,
And her breath strongly stank;
Yet, ere she went, she drank,
And gat° her great thank got
Of Elinour for her ware
That she thither bare
To pay for her share.
Now truly, to my thinking,
This is a solemn drinking!

Fit the Seventh

“Soft!” quod one hight° Sybil, named
“And let me with you bibble.”° drink
She sat down in the place
With a sorry face
Whey-wormed about.[2]
Garnishéd was her snout
With here and there a pustule
Like a scabbéd mussel.
“This ale,” said she, “is noppy;
Let us suppë° and soppy° eat / drink
And not spill a droppy,
For, so may I hoppy,° hope
It cooleth well my croppy.° stomach

“Dame Elinour,” said she,
“Have here is for me—
A clout° of London pins!” bag
And with that she begins
The pot to her pluck
And drank a “good-luck.”
She swingéd up a quart
At once for her part:
Her paunch was so puffed,
And so with ale stuffed,
Had she not hied° apace gone
She had defiled the place.

Then began the sport
Among that drunken sort.
“Dame Elinour,” said they,
“Lend here a cock° of hay stack
To make all thing clean—
Ye wot° well what we mean!” know

But, sir, among all
That sat in that hall
There was a prick-me-dainty[3]
Sat like a sainty
And began to painty° pant
As though she would fainty:
She made it as coy
As a lege de moy;[4]
She was not half so wise
As she was peevish nice.
She said never a word,
But rose from the board
And calléd for our dame,
Elinour by name.
We supposéd, ywis,
That she rose to piss:
But the very ground
Was for to compound[5]
With Elinour in the spence,° liquor pantry
To pay for her expense.
“I have no penny nor groat[6]
To pay,” she said, “God wote,° knows
For washing of my throat,
But my beads of amber
Bear them to your chamber.”
Then Elinour did them hide
Within her beddës side.

---

[1] Line missing.

[2] Whey-wormed about Pimple-faced.

[3] prick-me-dainty One who dresses in an affected manner.

[4] lege de moy Kind of dance.

[5] ground ... compound The very ground would settle their dispute.

[6] groat Coin worth one eighth of an ounce of silver.

But some then sat right sad
That nothing had,
There of their own,
Neither gelt nor pawn:[1]
Such were there many
That had not a penny.
But, when they should walk,
Were fain° with a chalk[2] glad
To score on the balk,° wood beam
Or score on the tail:° tally
God give it ill hail!° bad luck
For my fingers itch,
I have written too much
Of this mad mumming
Of Elinour Rumming.
Thus endeth the geste° tale
Of this worthy feast.
—1521? (WRITTEN C. 1517)

To Mistress Isabell Pennell

By Saint Mary, my lady,
Your mammy and your dady
Brought forth a goodly baby!
My maiden Isabel,
Reflaring° rosabell,° sweet smelling / rose
The flagrant° camamell,° fragrant / chamomile
The ruddy rosary,
The sovereign° rosemary, healing
The pretty strawberry,
The columbine, the nepte,° catnip
The jeloffer° well set,° gillyflower / adorned
The proper violet;
Ennewéd° your colowre renewed
Is like the daisy flower
After the April shower;
Star of the morrow gray,[3]
The blossom on the spray,° branch
The freshest flower of May:
Maidenly demure,
Of womanhood the lure;
Wherefore I make you sure
It were an heavenly health,
It were an endless wealth,
A life for God himself,
To hear this nightingale
Among the birdës smale° small
Warbeling in the vale,—
Dug, dug, jug, jug,
Good year and good luck,
With chuck, chuck, chuck, chuck!
—1523

---

[1] Neither gelt nor pawn Neither money nor something to trade.

[2] a chalk Account of credit written in chalk, a tab.

[3] Star of the morrow gray Venus.

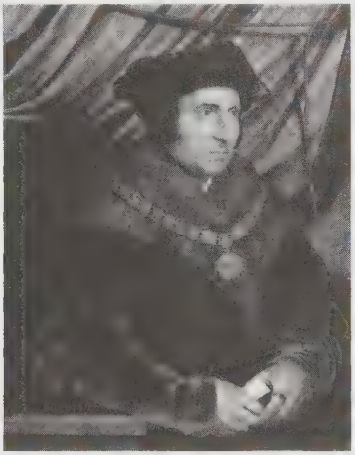
SIR THOMAS MORE

1478 – 1535

Thomas More was one of the most impressive figures of the English Renaissance. His writings on politics, religion, faith, and history, his translations of Lucian from the Greek, and his witty Latin epigrams, together with his activities as lawyer, parliamentarian, and Lord Chancellor, won him international fame as an author, a vigorous polemicist, an influential statesman, and, eventually, a Catholic martyr. He is remembered above all for his Utopia, an important work of satirical political speculation, and for maintaining his principles during one of the nastiest political struggles in English history—a moral choice that cost him his life.



More was born in London on 7 February 1478, the son of Agnes and Sir John More, a lawyer and judge. As a boy, he studied at St. Anthony's School in London before leaving at age 13 to become a page in the household of John Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury and a future cardinal. Morton recognized More as a promising, intelligent boy, and had him sent to Oxford around 1492. While there, More immersed himself in Greek, Latin, French, history, mathematics, and philosophy. He stayed for two years and then was compelled by his father to leave in order to study law at New Inn in London. In February 1496, he was admitted as a student to Lincoln's Inn, another London law school; once he had qualified as a lawyer, he stayed on as a popular lecturer.

Although law absorbed much of More's time (as he laments in a preface to Utopia), he continued to pursue his studies and in 1497 was delighted to meet the famous Dutch scholar Desiderius Erasmus, with whom he became good friends; many of their letters survive. More had, he claimed, considered becoming a monk, living for a while in the London Charterhouse, a monastery for Carthusian monks. Eventually he decided, as he put it, to be "a chaste husband rather than an impure priest." But his early attraction to communal and penitential ways did not disappear; it may well underlie More's wearing a hair shirt—and Utopia's stress on a communal way of life.

In 1504, More was elected to Parliament, where he defended the free speech of Members and opposed Henry VII's demand for a heavy round of taxation. The taxes were reduced, but an angry King arranged to have More's father arrested on a trumped-up charge and More himself expelled. More returned to public life only in 1509, when Henry VIII came to the throne. In 1505, he married Jane Colt; theirs was a happy marriage that produced four children before Jane's death six years later. Grieving, but wanting a mother for his children, More married Alice Middleton, a widow, a month after his first wife's death. He arranged an excellent education for all his children, including his daughters, and was particularly proud of young Margaret's scholarly accomplishments.

In succeeding years, More held several political offices. In 1515, he joined a trade embassy that spent six months in Flanders, where he used his leisure time to begin Utopia, which was published the following year. Upon his return to England, More joined the court of Henry VIII. He developed a warm but uneasy relationship with the King, and over the next two decades he received many honors: knighted in 1521, he was elected Speaker of the House in 1523 and appointed High Steward of Cambridge University in 1525. In 1529, More succeeded Cardinal Wolsey as Lord Chancellor, England's highest political position next to the king's. His first responsibility was to serve as Chief Justice, a position he filled with skill and honesty, introducing reforms that streamlined the judicial system. More was also responsible for enforcing anti-heresy laws (like many at the time, More believed that heresy threatened political stability as well as souls). He not only prosecuted some he called "heretics" but wrote strident denunciations of Martin Luther, William Tyndale, and others, becoming in turn a target of Protestant polemics.

More's greatest challenge was to deal with the "King's great matter," Henry's claim that his marriage to Catherine of Aragon was invalid and that he was free to marry Anne Boleyn. Pope Clement VII refused to agree to an annulment or a divorce and Henry eventually renounced papal authority and declared himself to be head of the English Church. More could not support the King's actions, although he did not publicly reject them and indeed insisted on his right to keep his opinions private. In May 1532, he resigned.

In March 1534, Parliament passed Henry's Act of Succession. This legislation required certain of the King's ministers and subjects to take the Oath of Supremacy, which stated that the King's children by Anne Boleyn were legitimate heirs to the throne. Those who took the Oath were also required to repudiate all foreign authority, including that of the Pope. On 14 April 1534, More was asked to swear. He refused and was sent to the Tower of London. There he wrote letters and religious works, including the serene and surprisingly funny Dialogue of Comfort Against Tribulation, until the authorities confiscated his writing implements. On 1 July 1535, More was indicted for high treason, found guilty, and sentenced to hang, although the king commuted the sentence to a more humane method of execution, beheading. More was executed on Tower Hill on 6 July, reportedly saying, "I die the King's good servant but God's first." His body was buried in the Church of St. Peter and his head was displayed on London Bridge for a month. On 19 May 1935, Pope Pius XI declared More a saint.

⌘⌘⌘

Utopia

Even a brief look at the variety—and the interconnectedness—of the life More led during the period leading up to the writing of Utopia may offer illuminating perspectives on the work. A lawyer by training, More had attended parliament as a representative of the London merchants. In 1510 he was appointed to the post of under-sheriff in London (one of two such positions); his responsibility was to act on behalf of the sheriff at the Sheriff's Court, held once a week at the Guildhall. Acting in this capacity until 1518, he dealt with a wide variety of matters and had a great deal of contact with the criminal elements of society; theft, assault, rape, and arson were among the many sorts of cases he tried; many of those convicted were sentenced to death (even petty theft could be a capital offence). According to Erasmus he developed a reputation for fairness, and was widely regarded with affection as well as respect. He must also have developed a keen sense of the issues surrounding capital punishment, and inevitably, he would have developed a knowledge of the effects that poverty and disease may have on human lives. But at the same time he was becoming more and more well-connected with people of influence and power both in London and in the country as a whole. He advised various city bodies on legal matters; he acted as a spokesman and legal representative for groups as diverse as the fishmongers, the mercers, the bakers, and various groups of tradesmen, and he began frequently to play a significant negotiating role in the concluding of agreements involving these groups. He was appointed as a commissioner of sewers along the Thames; he lectured regularly on legal matters at Lincoln's Inn; he maintained his own (increasingly flourishing) legal practice; he met frequently with the archbishop of Canterbury and became intimately familiar with many Church affairs; he maintained contact with many of the leading thinkers of the day; he wrote his History of Richard III; he began too to become involved in Court and diplomatic circles. Given the scope of his experience, it is hardly surprising that, when an English delegation was being formed in 1515 to try to resolve various commercial disputes with Flanders over the vital wool trade, both the king's council and the Merchant Adventurers asked that More be a part of the delegation.

The negotiations turned out to be far more protracted than had been expected—they dragged on intermittently for several months—but they were far from all-consuming, particularly for someone as used to a busy schedule as More was. He spent some time complaining about the lack of activity (and about the meager pay for those attached to the delegation), but he also spent a great deal of time engaged in intellectual pursuits. Aside from Utopia, the most notable of his 1515 writings is perhaps a long letter he wrote to the theologian Martin Dorp in defense of Erasmus, whose projects at the time included a comparison of the then-standard Latin (Vulgate) text of the New Testament with that of the original Greek with a view to identifying misleading or erroneous passages in the Vulgate. Dorp was among those conservative voices in the Church who were suspicious of such work, seeing no need for scholarly initiatives that might lead to challenges to traditional interpretations of Christian texts. But More's arguments for the value of such scholarship were effective; Dorp withdrew his criticisms, and Erasmus's work went forward.

While in Flanders More stayed for several weeks in Antwerp with Peter Giles, Chief Secretary to the city and, like More, a good friend of Erasmus. Like More too, Giles was concerned with questions of justice and fairness; with economic matters and with civic governance; with crime and punishment; and with international affairs. The two spent a good deal of time in conversation, and became friends. It was during his time in Antwerp that More conceived of the idea of writing De Optimo Reipublicae Statu (as the work that came to be known as Utopia was originally entitled)— "The Best Condition of a Society." Eventually, More made Giles a central figure in Utopia, and Giles played an important role in arranging for the printing and dissemination of the work.

More's Utopia has given its name to an entire genre (though many would argue that the genre of utopian fiction predates Utopia); "utopia" has come to signify any work describing a seemingly idyllic, fictional society. But to what extent is More's Utopia a utopia? This elusive and sometimes playful text resists any simple categorization or interpretation. The text can be read convincingly as moral allegory, political manifesto, or elaborate literary joke. And if Utopia is indeed meant to illustrate an ideal, it is a matter of much debate what that ideal is; the text has frequently been read as presenting an idealized version of (what we now refer to as) socialist or communist society, but it has also been read as presenting an idealized version of classical Greek society, and as presenting an idealized version of Catholic society. Conflicting interpretations of More's life and beliefs have been brought into the debate as historians and literary critics have attempted to solve the puzzle of the work's meaning through appeals to authorial intention. But Utopia has stubbornly resisted efforts to fix its meaning. In part this resistance to fixity may be attributed to the work's form. More seems to have written the second part of the work first, and some time later to have added the opening book, setting the second in the context, but also problematizing any interpretation tending towards taking Book 2 at face value; the two-book structure of the final work militates against interpretations that would resolve its meaning into a neatly unified whole. In part, too, Utopia's elusiveness may be attributed to complexity of narrative viewpoint; multiple layers of narrative voice allow ample space for multiple readings (for example, of the degree to which irony may be at play) and work to steer readers away from readings that exclusively privilege a single point of view.

More's Utopia (like other Renaissance texts with utopian themes, such as Francis Bacon's The New Atlantis and Henry Neville's The Isle of Pines), is deeply steeped in classical tradition: More's text serves as a commentary on classical meditations on the characteristics of an ideal commonwealth—most notably that of Plato in his Republic, Timaeus, and Laws. (More was no doubt aware as well of the views of Aristotle on such matters, as set out in his Politics, but the Platonic influence clearly predominates over the Aristotelian.) In Plato's Republic the guardians of an ideal society are obliged to ensure that property is held in common, everyone is obliged to work, and the ideal ruler is a philosopher. Other classical texts are also relevant; the often playful spirit of Utopia seems indebted to Lucian's Satirical Sketches and Horace's Satires, both of which aim to combine humor and instruction. A satirical sketch by Lucian, which was translated from Greek to Latin by More and Erasmus around 1505, may have suggested the structure of Utopia; in the first part of the sketch a serious issue is discussed from different points of view, and in the second the character Menippus throws light on the issue by telling the tale of a journey to an imaginary land. In other formal aspects too Utopia recalls classical authors: Book 1's dialogue form is indebted to the Dialogues of Plato and of Cicero. In the degree to which it both relies upon and reappraises classical works, then, Utopia is very much a characteristic work of its time.

Another key influence for Utopia was the burgeoning genre of travel literature. During the Renaissance, as European countries competed to explore and lay claim to large parts of Asia, Africa, and the New World, the proliferation of printed material made accounts of many voyages readily available to the literate public. Tales of incredible journeys ranged from the completely fabricated to the accurately documented, and readers had to sift the truth from the fiction. Utopia plays with this genre of travel narrative, purporting to be an account of a voyage undertaken by real-life explorer Amerigo Vespucci. In Book 1 Raphael Hythloday is introduced as a sailor with Vespucci, who has encountered the island of Utopia on one of his trips to the New World. The language and tone of Book 2's description of Utopia are suggestive of a travel narrative, while the playful paratexts (prefaces, maps, marginalia, and even a poem in Utopian) that accompanied early editions of Utopia resemble the sorts of materials that often accompanied accounts of real voyages. In the context of the possibilities presented by Renaissance exploration, the discovery of such an island would have seemed almost plausible, and this plausibility is played upon throughout the text.

Deliberate gestures towards potential reality are considered one of the defining elements of utopian texts; such works tend to go to great lengths to highlight the plausibility of the lands they describe even while, paradoxically, presenting themselves as works of fiction. Utopias are generally not set in fictional lands, or in distant past or future times. (It is a common mistake to imagine that utopias are typically set in the future.) Instead, these ideal societies tend to neighbor our own; explanations are typically provided as to why they have remained hidden for so long, and how they were discovered. Further, human nature is generally shown to be as we sense it to be from our own experience—members of society are as likely to put their own needs first as they are to give preference to the collective well-being. Economic realities relating to supply and demand still apply, and the same problems of limited resources present themselves. What makes a utopia ideal, then, is not its citizens or its superior environment, but its superior social organization.

The social organization of Utopia—and the ways in which it contrasts with that of England—is the central focus of More's work. Book 1 is set up as a conversation between More, his friend Peter Giles, and Raphael Hythloday, to whom More is introduced by Giles. The three debate the social problems of England, with Raphael denouncing many aspects of the way in which society is organized, from the system of land ownership to the practice of executing thieves when the poor have often been forced by poverty to turn to theft or begging for survival. In Book 2 Raphael provides, by way of contrast, a glowing description of the island of Utopia's social structures and customs. A central principle is collective ownership; private property has been abolished in order to end poverty and curb human greed and pride. (This economic system is presented in contrast to that of England, in which supposedly holy men "enclose every bit of land for pasture, pull down houses, and destroy towns," and wealth is "divvied up among a few, who leave to the rest nothing but poverty.") But it is not only pride and greed that have been curbed; Utopia, it seems, has also eliminated such things as religious conflict and idleness, and greatly reduced criminal activity. It is a society that allows a then-unprecedented degree of equality to women. Without a revealed religion, Utopians privilege rationality, make happiness their highest good, and permit both divorce and euthanasia.

On the face of it, Book 2 presents ways of organizing society that would largely provide solutions to the problems discussed in Book 1. But clearly the relationship between the two is less straightforward than that; no reader should presume a stable relationship between Utopian society and that of Renaissance England in which the former is to be consistently taken as superior to the latter. The reference in Book 2 to the Utopian language retaining "some traces of Greek in the names of their cities and officers" is a pointer; the name "Utopia" puns on the Greek words for "no place" and "good place." Are we to take that to suggest simply that such a place does not and never has existed on earth, or to suggest that it would not be feasible or advisable to try to emulate the practices of the Utopians on earth? Similar examples abound. The name "Raphael" links the character with the Archangel Raphael (Hebrew for "God has healed"), but his last name, "Hythloday," is derived from the Greek for "speaker of nonsense." Utopia's main river, "Anyder," means "waterless" in Greek, while "Polylerites" means "land of much nonsense." Nor are the facts provided about life in Utopia entirely straightforward. We are told that Utopians never resort to the death penalty—but later learn that if prisoners break any of the rules when they are in bonded labor, the penalty is death. Utopian society is lauded for the liberties it gives its citizens, but the Utopians seem in practice to have little freedom or leisure time, and are expected to spend their non-working hours in service to the community. Throughout Book 2 the character of "More," while recounting Raphael's tale, periodically interrupts the narrative with comments that throw into question the reliability of the account; he misses some of what Raphael says, and is unsure as to certain details. More broadly, the very structure of dialogue-within-dialogue keeps us as readers at a distance, with the layers of narrative acting almost as filters.

The elusiveness of the characters casts further doubt on who and what we are meant to believe. The text seems to set up "More" and Raphael as opposites, yet many of the biographical details of Raphael's life correspond exactly to those of the real More (both served as pages in the household of Cardinal Morton, and both had doubts about the advisability of a career as counselor to a prince). But any attempt to see Raphael as embodying aspects or beliefs of More the author is surely problematic, given that many Utopian practices Raphael praises would have been opposed by More (a devout Catholic who died for his faith)—for example, divorce and remarriage, euthanasia, and expressions of pagan beliefs.

It is impossible fully to divine More's intentions in writing Utopia, but the text makes it equally impossible to avoid raising the question of authorial intent. It is impossible to say which aspects of Utopian society More most admired, but it is equally impossible to avoid interpreting much of the work as legitimate criticism of European folly. It is hard to say which specifics of Utopian life may be intended to be seen as exemplary, but difficult not to feel that the author approves of an overarching spirit of self-sacrifice for the good of a community. Beyond that, however, generalizations are hazardous. And perhaps More's text is meant to serve only as a challenge to the reader's assumptions; More's imaginary world surely prompts readers see themselves and their society in a new light—a goal shared by nearly all writers of utopian fiction since.

What of Utopia's recurring discussions of the appropriate role of private property in society? The character "More" asserts that "life can never be happy or satisfactory, where all things are held in common," but as author More seems to give Raphael stronger arguments than he does "More." It is almost impossible to read the argument of "More" in the book's final paragraph as having been intended without irony; the suggestion by "More" that the principle of living communally and sharing goods should be rejected out of hand because enacting it would have a deleterious effect on "splendor and majesty" must surely be satire. Much as the abolition of private property may to modern readers suggest Communist principles, we should not forget that such notions are also in accord with the principles of the early Christian Church: Acts 4:32 says of the followers of Jesus that none of them said that any of the things "which he possessed was his own, but that they had all things common." Yet equally, there is a good deal of what we know of More's life that has led scholars to doubt that the author of Utopia would ever in fact have advocated abolishing private property—and there are several passages in his other writings that many have argued confirm he desired no such thing. Modern editions usually call this work Utopia, but we should remember the long titles of the early editions. According to them, this "salutaris," and "festivus" book concerns the "optim[us]" state (not perfect or ideal, but merely best—the utopia as a fantasized ideal or perfect society comes after More). Nor do they explicitly equate Utopia with the "best," whatever it might be.

Are we in the end to take at face value the concluding thought of "More" that "there are many things in the Utopian commonwealth that are worth wishing for in our own states—much as there may be little hope of ever seeing them realized"? And if so, what are those things? Utopia provides an extraordinary wealth of material for thought and discussion, but we shall never be quite sure what of it the author intended us to take seriously. In this the work is very much in accord with what we know of its author; though Thomas More was clearly a man of great gravitas and high principle, he was also, according to his great grandson, a man who "spoke always so sadly that few could see by his looke whether he spoke in earnest or in jeaste."

THE TEXT

Like the vast majority of works at the time that were written for an educated, international audience, Utopia is written in Latin, not English; Latin served as a "universal" language, spoken as well as written by those with education across Europe and in some cases beyond. It was first translated into English by Ralph Robinson in 1551, and that translation continued to be widely read until well into the twentieth century.

The present text has been prepared for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature by William P. Weaver. It is an extensive revision and modernization of the early twentieth-century translation of G.C. Richards. The Richards is generally very faithful to the Latin, both in diction and in retaining to a high degree the syntax of More's Latin. But it is in some respects inaccurate, and it does not read at all smoothly in English—particularly for readers in the twenty-first century. The present revision endeavors to strike a balance between fidelity to the original Latin and readability for a modern English-speaking audience. Latinate sentence structures have been simplified. Many of the original parallelisms have been retained but tightened up to some degree. The translation strives to convey the rhetorical feel of More's argumentative style—especially its frequent litotes and irony—while keeping sentences to a manageable length for the modern reader. At the same time, the sentence structures have not been fully regularized; it would be impossible to do so without losing much of the colloquial style in which More writes (or Raphael speaks) Utopia.

In its diction too the present translation tries to convey more of More's colloquialism than one finds in a translation such as the Richards, while not losing More's sense of formalism—and to convey the plain meaning of the original in the common currency of today's English. "Just as perilous" becomes "no less dangerous," "make a hotchpotch of tragedy and comedy" becomes "mangle a perfectly good comedy," and "one insatiable glutton" becomes "one fat cat."

Modern translations differ widely in the degree to which they take liberties with the original in the interests of making the text relevant politically to the modern reader. An interesting point of comparison, for example, is the Latin "ubi omnia sint communia." The phrase is given a fairly close literal translation in these pages—

> "I can't agree," I said. "Life can never be happy or satisfactory where all things are held in common."

Similarly, the translation of the distinguished More scholar George Logan has

> "But I don't see it that way," I replied. "It seems to me that people cannot possibly live well when all things are held in common."

The popular Paul Turner translation, in contrast, uses phrasing that suggests a stronger connection to the nineteenth-century ideas of Karl Marx than it does to Platonic or Christian notions:

> "I disagree. I don't believe you'd ever have a reasonable standard of living under a communist system."

There can be no doubt that parallels between ideas found in Utopia and those of modern socialists and Marxists make for fruitful discussion—and an argument may be made that embedding such parallels in the text makes for a livelier read today. The present editors have felt it preferable, however, not to embed such parallels in the translation.

A notable feature of early editions of Utopia is the inclusion of numerous annotations in the margins. These marginal glosses are generally believed to have been added by Peter Giles and/or by Erasmus. Often interesting in themselves, they also provide a real sense of the way in which the intellectual community of the time operated in a collaborative fashion. This edition includes all the significant glosses, albeit in the form of footnotes rather than marginal notations; each such note begins with the heading [marginal note] in square brackets.

> [Note to instructors: Utopia is among over 400 available editions from Broadview, any one of which may be packaged together with this anthology volume at no extra cost to the student.]

Utopia[1]

The Best State of a Commonwealth and the New Island of Utopia

A Truly Golden Handbook,
No Less Beneficial than Entertaining,
By the Distinguished and Eloquent Author.
THOMAS MORE
Citizen and Sheriff[2] of the Famous City of London

THOMAS MORE TO PETER GILES[3]

I am almost ashamed, my dear Peter Giles, to send you this little book about the Utopian commonwealth after nearly a year, for I am sure you expected it within a month and a half. Certainly you know that I was relieved of all the labor of gathering materials for it and had to give no thought to their arrangement. I had only to repeat what in your company I had heard Raphael relate. There was no reason for me to take trouble over the style of the narrative; first, his language was, hurried and impromptu, and then, to make matters worse, spoken by one who was, as you know, less acquainted with Latin than with Greek. Therefore the nearer my style resembles his careless simplicity the closer it comes to the truth, which here is my main concern.

---

[1] Utopia The present text has been prepared for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature by William P. Weaver. The translation from the Latin is that of G.C. Richards, considerably revised and modernized for this anthology.

[2] Sheriff More had been appointed Undersheriff of London in 1510. The position sometimes entailed acting in the capacity of a judge as well as representing the Sheriff.

[3] Peter Giles Giles (c. 1486–1533), a friend of More's, was a scholar who also worked for the city of Antwerp. As has been noted by scholars of More, in this letter and in Utopia More plays with words meaning "all," "nothing," and "nowhere" often exploiting, in the letter to Giles, the rhetorical figure "litotes" (denying the contrary, as in "not nowhere" to mean "somewhere"). Even at the lexical level, then, More's text is a not unsmiling venture into paradox of the sort Renaissance humanists found not unappealing.

I confess my dear Peter, that all these considerations relieved me of so much trouble that scarcely anything remained for me to do. Otherwise gathering and arranging materials would have required much time and attention from someone with wits neither the slightest nor the most ignorant. Had the task required writing down the material not only accurately but eloquently, I could not have performed it, no matter how much time and effort I might expend. But, as it was, since those burdensome cares had been removed and it remained only to write out simply what I had heard, I had no difficulty at all. And yet my other obligations left me practically no leisure to finish this trifling task. I am constantly engaged in legal business, either pleading or hearing, either giving an award as arbiter or deciding a case as judge. I pay a courtesy visit to one person and go on business to another. I devote almost the whole day to other people's affairs and what little is left to my own. For myself, that is for learning, I leave nothing at all. When I have return home I must talk with my wife, chat with my children, and confer with my servants. All this activity I count as business if it must be done—and it must be done, unless you want to be a stranger in your own home. Besides, one must take care to be as agreeable as possible to those whom nature has supplied, chance has made, or you yourself have chosen to be the companions of your life, provided you do not spoil them by kindness or through indulgence make masters of your servants.

Amid such occupations, the day, the month, and the year slip away. When, then, can I find time to write? Nor have I said a word about sleep, nor even about food, which for many people takes up as much time as sleep—and sleep takes up almost half a man's life. So I have for myself only the time I filch from sleep and food. Slowly, therefore, because this time is so little, and yet at last, because this time is something, I have finished Utopia and sent it to you, my dear Peter, to read—and to remind me of anything that has escaped me.

In this respect I do not entirely distrust myself, wishing only that I were as nimble in intelligence and learning as I am not altogether deficient in memory. Nevertheless, I am not so confident as to believe that I have forgotten nothing. As you know, John Clement,[1] my pupil-servant, was also present at the conversation. Indeed I do not allow him to absent himself from any profitable talk, for from this young plant, which has begun to put forth green shoots in Greek and Latin literature, I expect no small harvest someday. He has made very doubtful concerning one point: according to my own recollection, Hythlodaeus[2] declared that the bridge spanning the river Anydrus[3] at Amaurotum[4] is five hundred paces in length. But my John says that two hundred must be subtracted, for the river there is not more than three hundred paces in breadth. Please recall the matter to mind. If you agree with him, I shall adopt the same view and think myself mistaken. If you do not remember, I shall put down, as I have actually done, what I myself seem to remember. Just as I shall take great pains to have nothing incorrect in the book, so, if there is doubt about anything, I would rather tell an objective falsehood than an intentional lie—for I would rather be honest than clever.

It would be easy for you to remedy this defect if you were to ask Raphael himself, either in person or by letter. You must do so because of another doubt that has arisen, whether through my fault or through yours or through Raphael's I do not know. We forgot to ask, and he forgot to say, where in the New World Utopia is located. I am sorry that point got omitted, and I would be willing to pay a considerable sum to purchase the information, partly because I am somewhat embarrassed not to know in what sea lies the very island of which I am saying so much, and partly because there are several among us (and one in particular, a devout man and a theologian by profession) burning with an extraordinary desire to visit Utopia. The theologian wishes to go not from an idle taste for sight-seeing in novel places, but in order to foster and promote our religion, begun there so felicitously. To carry out this plan properly, he has decided to ask the Pope to send him there and, what is more, to name him Bishop of Utopia. He has no scruple in pressing for this appointment, since he considers it a holy suit, motivated not by desire for honor or gain but by piety.

---

[1] John Clement Clement (d. 1572), later a leading scholar and physician to Henry VIII, was at this time tutor to More's children.

[2] Hythlodaeus Greek: knowledgeable about nonsense.

[3] Anydrus Greek: without water.

[4] Amaurotum Greek: made dim.

Therefore I beg you, my dear Peter, either in person, if you conveniently can, or by letter if he has gone, to reach Hythlodaeus and make sure that my work includes nothing false and omits nothing true. I am inclined to think that it would be better to show him the book itself. No one else is so well able to correct any mistake, and he cannot do me this favor unless he reads through what I have written. In this way, moreover, you will determine whether he accepts with pleasure or suffers with annoyance my composition of this work. If he has decided to write about his adventures himself, perhaps he might not want me to do so. In making known the commonwealth of Utopia, I certainly do not wish to forestall him or to rob his own narrative of novelty's flower and charm. Nevertheless, to tell the truth, I have not yet made up my own mind whether or not to publish this. So varied are the tastes of mortals, so peevish the characters of some, so ungrateful their dispositions and wrongheaded their judgments, that those who blithely indulge their desires seem better off than those who torment themselves with anxiety in order to publish something meant to bring profit or pleasure to those who all too often receive it with disdain or ingratitude.

Many are ignorant of learning; many despise it. The barbarian rejects as harsh whatever is not utterly barbarian. Those with pretensions to learning despise as trite whatever is not packed with obsolete expressions. Some approve only of what is old; many admire only their own work. This fellow is so grim he will not hear of a joke; that fellow is too insipid to endure wit. Some are so dull-minded that they fear all satire as much as someone bitten by a rabid dog fears water. Others are so fickle that when sitting they praise one thing and when standing praise another. Some lounge in taverns and over their cups criticize the talents of authors. With much pontificating and self-indulgence, they condemn each one for his writings, plucking each one, as it were, by the hair. They themselves remain under cover and, as the saying goes, out of range. They are so smooth and shaven that they present not even one honest hair by which they might be caught. Others are so ungrateful that although delighted with the work they do not love the author any the better. They are not unlike discourteous guests who, after being freely entertained at a rich banquet, go home well filled but without thanking the host who invited them. So go ahead and spread a feast at your own expense for men of such dainty palates, of such varied tastes, and of such unforgetful and grateful natures!

At any rate, my dear Peter, consult with Hythlodaeus on the matter I mentioned. Later I shall be fully free to reopen that case for new debate. Now that I have gone through the labor of writing, however, it is too late for me to be wise. Therefore, provided it be done with the consent of Hythlodaeus, in the matter of publishing in everything that remains I shall follow the advice of my friends—and above all yours. Good-bye, my sweetest friend, and my regards to your excellent wife. Love me as you have ever done, for I love you more than ever.

The Best State of a Commonwealth,
The Discourse of the Extraordinary Character, Raphael Hythlodaeus, as Reported by the Renowned Figure,
Thomas More,
Citizen and Sheriff of the Famous City of Great Britain,
London.

Utopia

BOOK I

The most invincible King of England, Henry VIII, a prince adorned with incomparable virtues, recently found himself involved in a dispute, over matters of no little weight, with His Serene Highness Charles, King of Castile.[1] To discuss these things and negotiate a settlement he sent me on an embassy to Flanders, along with the peerless Cuthbert Tunstall, whom recently, to the great satisfaction of all,[1] he has named Master of the Rolls.[2] Of his praises I shall say nothing, not because I fear that the testimony of a friend might be disbelieved, but because his merit and his learning are too much for me to describe and too well known for me to attempt the task, lest I should display the brightness of the sun with a candle, as the proverb has it.[3]

---

[1] Charles ... Castile Charles V (1500–58), Holy Roman Emperor (1519–58), was also King of Spain (1516–56), but at the time referred to here had not yet risen to such heights. The "weighty matters" were commercial matters concerning the prohibition of wool sales to the Netherlands.

We were greeted at Bruges, the place appointed for our meeting, by the king of Castile's commissioners, all notable men, at the head of whom was the great Margrave of Bruges.[4] But the chief speaker, and the ablest of them all, was George de Theimsecke, Provost of Cassel,[5] a man not only trained in eloquence but a natural orator, highly learned in the law, moreover, and a clever diplomat of much experience. When after several meetings there were certain points on which we could not agree, they bade us farewell for a few days and left for Brussels to learn their king's will. Meanwhile I myself, as my business led me, made my way to Antwerp.

While I stayed there I had various visitors. Most welcome of all[6] was Peter Giles, a native of Antwerp, where he is highly esteemed and respectably employed (somewhat beneath his merit), a young man both learned and prudent. He is most virtuous, cultured, and courteous, and to his friends so open-hearted, affectionate, loyal and sincere, that you will scarcely find his match in all the annals of friendship. He is unusually modest, exceptionally honest, and second to none for plain good sense. In conversation he is so polished and so witty (without ever giving offence) that though I missed hearth and home, wife and children terribly (for it had been more than four months since I left), his delightful society and charming discourse relieved me of my homesickness.

One day I had been at divine service in Notre Dame, the finest church in the city and the most crowded with worshippers. Mass being over, I was about to return to my lodging when I happened to see Peter conversing with a stranger, a man of advanced years with sunburnt countenance and long beard, his cloak hanging carelessly from his shoulder; his appearance and dress looked to me like those of a seafarer. When Peter saw me, he came up to greet me, but before I could return his salutation he drew me a little aside and said, pointing to the one with whom I had seen him talking, "Do you see this man? I was on the point of taking him straight to you."

"He would have been very welcome," said I, "for your sake."

"No," said he, "if you knew him, then for his own sake. There is no man alive today who can give you such an account of unknown peoples and lands. I know you're passionate to hear such tales."

"Well, then," said I, " my guess was not a bad one. The moment I saw him, I was sure he was a ship's captain."

"But you are quite mistaken," said he, "for his sailing has not been like that of Palinurus but of Ulysses, or rather like that of Plato.[7] Now this Raphael, for that was his name (Hythlodaeus was his family name), was something of a Latinist, but an expert in Greek. He was less studious of the Roman tongue because he was entirely devoted to philosophy and knew that Latin had little to offer him there, except for a few things by Seneca and Cicero.[8] Eager to see the world, he left his worldly goods at home with his brothers (he is Portuguese) and joined Amerigo Vespucci.[9] He was his constant companion on the last three of those four voyages about which everyone has read. In the end, he did not accompany him home, for he pestered, even harassed Amerigo to let him be one of the twenty-four left behind at the fort during the last voyage. And so, to let him have his way, they left him behind, more anxious for travel than over the place of his death; for these two sayings are constantly on his lips: 'He who has no grave is covered by the sky,' and, 'From all places it is the same distance to heaven.'[1] But for the grace of God, this determination of his would have cost him dear. In any case, after Amerigo had set sail, Raphael traveled with five companions from the fort through many countries and came by sheer luck to Ceylon, and thence to Calcutta,[2] where by good fortune he found some Portuguese ships. And so, after much time and beyond all exectation, he returned home."

---

[1] [marginal note] Cuthbert Tunstall. [More published Utopia through his friend Peter Giles, a humanist scholar city official in Antwerp; Erasmus was also consulted. Early editions of the work include numerous marginal glosses, which, it has been widely speculated, were additions by Giles and/or Erasmus. The more significant of these glosses are included in the present volume in the footnotes rather than in the margin.]

[2] Cuthbert Tunstall Prominent member of the clergy (1474–1559) who was appointed Archdeacon of Chester at the time of this diplomatic mission; Master of the Rolls Principal Clerk of the Chancery Court (a court of appeals).

[3] [marginal note] Adage.

[4] Bruges Significant port for the wool trade.

[5] Provost of Cassel I.e., Chief Magistrate of Cassel.

[6] [marginal note] Peter Giles.

[7] Palinurus Aeneas's steersman, who falls asleep at the helm and is tossed overboard in the Aeneid; Ulysses His story is told variously in the Iliad, the Odyssey, and the Aeneid; Plato Greek philosopher (c. 427–347 BCE).

[8] Seneca Roman philosopher, playwright and orator (c. 4 BCE–65 CE); Cicero Roman statesman, philosopher, and orator, who was stoical in many of his attitudes (c. 106–43 BCE).

[9] Amerigo Vespucci Noted Italian explorer (1451–1512), Vespucci was one of the explorers of the "New World," for whom it is named America.

After Peter finished his story, I thanked him for his kindness in going to such lengths to introduce me to one whose conversation he hoped would give me pleasure; then I turned to Raphael. We greeted each other, exchanging the civilities that commonly pass at the first meeting of strangers, and then went off to my house, where we sat down to talk in the garden, on a bench covered with turves of grass.

Raphael told us how, after the departure of Vespucci, he and the friends who had stayed behind in the fort slowly ingratiated themselves with the natives. Little by little, after continued meetings and civilities, they were not only welcome but even treated as familiars. They were, moreover, in favor and good repute with a chief (whose name and country I have forgotten). He said that the chief, out of generosity, provided him and his five companions with ample provisions and travel money, as well as with a trusty guide for their journey (which was partly by water and partly in carriages over land) who could take them to other princes bearing careful recommendations in their favor.

After traveling many days, he said, they found towns and cities and very populous commonwealths with excellent institutions. To be sure, under the Equator, and on both sides of it as far as the sun's orbit extends, there lie waste deserts, scorched with continual heat. This offers an altogether sad and desolate sight, rough and uncultivated, inhabited by wild animals, snakes, and men as savage and dangerous as animals. But when you have gone a little farther, gradually the country assumes a milder aspect, the climate is less fierce, the ground covered with a pleasant green herbage, and the living creatures less wild. At length you reach peoples, cities and towns that maintain a continual traffic by sea and land, not only with each other and their neighbors but also with far-off countries. This gave him the chance to visit many countries in all directions, for there was not a ship trimmed to sail, no matter where, that did not welcome him and his companions. The ships they saw first were flat-bottomed, with the sails made of sheets of papyrus, and sometimes of leather, stitched together on willow branches. Afterwards they found ships with pointed keels and canvas sails, in all respects like ours. The mariners were skilled in dealing with the sea and weather, although he won their favor by showing them how to use a compass. Because they had not known about such an instrument before, they had hesitated to trust themselves to the sea, doing so only in the summer; but now, trusting the compass, they no longer fear stormy weather and have become dangerously confident. So this instrument, expected to be of great use, may turn out to be one of great mischief because of their lack of prudence.

It would be a long tale to report what Raphael said he saw in each place, and that is not the purpose of this book. Perhaps on another occasion I shall tell his story, especially concerning those good and wise institutions that he noticed in civilized nations. We asked him eagerly about such things, and he was more than willing to converse at length, leaving out, however, the sort of marvelous reports that are really old news. For Scyllas and greedy Harpies and cannibal Laestrygonians[3] are common enough, but well and wisely trained citizens are not to be found everywhere. Just as he noted many ill-advised customs among these strange nations, however, so too he mentioned not a few matters from which our own cities, nations, races, and kingdoms could use as models in correcting our own errors. These, as I said,

---

[1] [marginal note] Aphorism. [These are paraphrases of Lucan's Pharsalia, 8.819, and Cicero's Tusculan Disputations 1.43.104, respectively.]

[2] Ceylon Island (now the nation of Sri Lanka) located in the Indian Ocean off the coast of India; Calcutta Port city on the eastern coast of India.

[3] Scyllas … Harpies … Laestrygonians Monsters of classical myth.

I must save for another occasion. For now, I will merely relate what he told us of the manners and customs of the Utopians, first, however, recounting the conversation that led him to mention that commonwealth.

Raphael touched with wisdom on the faults of this part of the world and of that, finding many in both, and compared the wiser measures that have been taken by us and by them; for he remembered the manners and customs of each nation he visited as well as if he had lived there all his life. Peter expressed his surprise as follows: "Why, Master Raphael, I wonder that you do not attach yourself to the court of some king. I am sure there is none of them to whom you would not be very welcome, for you are capable not only of entertaining a ruler with this learning and experience of countries and people, but also of furnishing him with examples and assisting him with counsel. Thus you would not only help advance your own interests but also those of your relatives and friends."

"As for my relatives and friends," Raphael said, "I'm not much troubled about them; for I think I have pretty well performed my duty to them already. Whereas other men don't usually give up their possessions unless they are sick and old, and even then do so unwillingly, I divided my wealth among my relatives and friends when I was not just hale and hearty but young. I think they ought to be satisfied with such generosity and not ask or expect that for their sakes I would become the slave of kings."

"Well said, my good sir!" Peter replied. "But I meant not that you should be in servitude, only in service to kings."

"One word is but a syllable shorter than the other,"[1] said Raphael.

"Whatever name you call it," said Peter, "I think it is just the right way not only to improve things for individuals and the commonwealth alike, but also to make your own condition more prosperous."

"Would I really be better off," asked Raphael, "with a way of life I completely detest? Right now I live as I please, which is more than could be said for those courtiers of yours. Besides, there are plenty of those who court the friendship of the great; and so you need not think it any great loss if they have to do without me or a few others like me."

"Well," said I, "it is plain, Master Raphael, that you desire neither riches nor power. Assuredly, I admire and look up to a man of your mind, just as much as I do to any of the high and mighty. But, I think, you will do what is worthy of you and of this generous and truly philosophic spirit of yours, if you order your life so as to apply your talent and industry to the public interest, even if so doing involves some disadvantage to yourself. This you could never do more profitably than if you were counselor to some great prince and make him follow, as I am sure you would, a straightforward and honorable course. For from the prince, as from a never failing spring, flows a stream of all that is good or evil over the whole nation. But you have such learning that even without experience of affairs you would make an excellent member of any king's council as well as such experience that even if you had no learning the same would be true."

"You are twice mistaken," said Raphael, "first in me, and then in the matter in question. For I have no such ability as you ascribe to me, and even if I did, and surrendered my leisure to affairs of state, I would not promote the public interest. For in the first place, almost all princes prefer to occupy themselves in the pursuits of war (with which I have no acquaintance nor desire any) rather than in the honorable activities of peace, and they care much more for how, by hook or by crook, they may win fresh kingdoms than how to administer well those they already have.

"In the second place," Raphael continued, "a king's courtiers are so wise that they do not need a second opinion, or so confident that they do not want one—unless, of course, it be the opinion of one of the king's favorites. In that case, one and all eagerly approve and applaud even the stupidest of opinions, for they are studious to gain his favor by such approval. Granted, it is only natural for everyone to like his own brainchild best: the crow is delighted with his chick, the ape pleased with his cub. But if in the company of such self-seeking, such jealous men, someone should propose something that he has read was done in former times or that he has seen done in other places, they try to find fault with it, believing their whole reputation for wisdom endangered if they do not. If all else fails, they take refuge in this as a last resort: 'These things,' they say, 'were good enough for our ancestors, and we wish only we were as wise as they were.' With this argument, which they regard as unanswerable and a conclusion of the whole matter, they resume their seats, as if it were dangerous for anyone to be wiser than his forebears. It is curious—we seem to be completely oblivious of the sound opinions of our ancestors until somebody suggests something better. Then, oh, how zealously, how religiously we adhere to them! Such proud, ridiculous and obstinate prejudices I have encountered in many places, and once even in England."

---

[1] One . . . other In the original Latin, the words for "in servitude to" and "in service to" are "servias" and "inservias."

"What?" I asked. "You were in our country?"

"Yes," Raphael said, "I once spent several months there, not long after the disastrous end of the Cornish revolt against the King put down with such horrible bloodshed.[1] During that time I was much indebted to the Right Reverend Father, Cardinal John Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury, at that point also Lord Chancellor[2] of England. Here was a man, Master Peter, (for Master More knows about him and needs no information from me) who deserved no less respect for his wisdom and virtue than for his authority. He was of middle stature and showed no sign of his advanced age; his countenance inspired respect rather than fear; his conversation was agreeable, although serious and dignified. He sometimes liked to speak sharply to petitioners, although not rudely, so as to bring out their spirit and presence of mind. Provided these capacities did not become impudence, they gave him pleasure, for he shared them and thought that they well suit those holding public office. His speech was polished and to the point and his knowledge profound; he was very able, and his memory amazingly retentive, while by learning and practice he improved his natural qualities. The King placed much confidence in his advice, and when I was there, the state seemed to depend upon him. In early youth he had been taken straight from school to court, and there he had spent his whole life in important public affairs. He suffered many turns of fortune, so that through many and great dangers he had acquired that level-headedness which, once learned, is not easily forgotten.

"One day I was at his table,"[3] continued Raphael, "when a layman, who happened to be there and was learned in the laws of your country, took some occasion to launch into a precise encomium of the severe punishments that were then meted out to thieves.[4] They were executed everywhere, he said, with as many as twenty being hanged on one gallows at a time. With so few escaping execution, he wondered by what bad luck they still so infested the country. Being free to speak my mind in front of the Cardinal, I said, 'You need not wonder; for this manner of punishing thieves goes beyond justice and is not in the public interest. It is both too harsh a penalty for theft and an insufficient deterrent. For theft is not so hideous a crime that it should cost someone his life, and no punishment, however great, will deter that man from stealing, who has no other means of getting food. In this practice, you and the greater part of the world resemble bad schoolmasters, who would rather beat than teach their scholars. You ordain grievous and terrible punishments for theft, when it would be much better to provide some means of employment; then no one would be under this terrible necessity of first stealing and then dying for it.'[5]

"'We have,' the layman said, 'made sufficient provision for this. There are handicrafts and there is agriculture; they might maintain themselves by these, if they did not prefer to be rascals.'

"'No,' I said. 'You don't get away so easily. Let's say nothing of those who often come home maimed from foreign or civil wars, such as the recent fight with the

---

[1] disastrous … bloodshed In 1497, in response to harsh tax burdens imposed by Henry VII, about 15,000 Cornishmen (men from Cornwall) marched on London and were brutally defeated at Blackheath.

[2] Cardinal John Morton Cardinal, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellor, Morton (1420–1500) was an early patron of More and a lifelong friend; Archbishop of Canterbury Highest church official in England; Lord Chancellor High-ranking official in the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor is the Keeper of the Great Seal of England and chief administrator of the judicial system.

[3] One day … his table The dialogue over the course of the following pages is sometimes difficult to follow. Raphael recounts a long dinner-table conversation with the Cardinal, with a "layman learned in the laws" of England, with a friar, and briefly with various others. The long digression ends with Raphael's apology for telling such a lengthy tale.

[4] [marginal note] Of unjust laws.

[5] [marginal note] How to reduce the number of thieves.

Cornishmen and before that with France.[1] They have lost limbs for country and king, and now their infirmity prevents them from exercising their old crafts even while their age prevents them from learning a new one. These, I say, we can ignore, for wars come intermittently; but let us consider what happens every day. Now there are a great many idle noblemen who not only live like drones off the labors of others, such as their tenants, whom they squeeze to the utmost by raising their rents (for that is the only way to get money they know, being otherwise so extravagant as to beggar themselves), but also carry about with them a huge crowd of parasites who have never learnt a trade by which to live. When their master dies, or they themselves fall ill, they are soon turned out, for it is easier to maintain the idle than the sick, and in any case the heir can't always support as big a household as had his father. So in the meantime their energies turn to starving, if not to thieving. For what can they do? When by a vagabond life they have worn out both clothes and health, sickly and ragged as they are, gentlemen will not engage them and country folk dare not, knowing well that someone softly brought up in idleness and luxury and has been wont to strut around in sword and buckler,[2] looking down with a swaggering expression on the whole neighborhood, and thinking himself miles above everyone, is not fit to render honest service to a poor man with spade and hoe, for scanty wage, and on frugal fare.'

"'But these' the layman replied, 'are just the men we ought to encourage and make much of; on them, who have spirits loftier and more manly those of artisans and husbandmen, depend the strength and sinews of our army when we have to wage war,'

"'Indeed,' I said, 'you might as well say that for the sake of war we should encourage thieves. For as long as you have these men, you will never be without thieves. Just as robbers are not bad soldiers, so soldiers are not the most cowardly of robbers—so well do these two lines of argument agree. But this defect, though frequent with you, is not yours alone, being common to almost all nations. France in particular is sick with another more grievous plague. Even in peace (if you can call it peace) the whole country is crowded and beset with mercenaries, for the French, like you, think it smart to keep these idle retainers. These wiseacres think the public safety means having a standing army, strong and reliable, and made up chiefly of veterans, for they have no confidence in untrained men.[3] So they must always be finding an excuse for war, lest they have men without experience. They must also make sure that they are not unskilled at cutting throats, lest, as Sallust says wittily, "the hand or mind through lack of practice[4] get dull." Yet France has learned how dangerous it is to rear such wild beasts, and the examples of Rome, Carthage, Syria, and other nations show the same: not only their empires, but also their land and even their cities have been more than once destroyed by their own standing armies. How unnecessary it is to maintain them is clearly proved by this: not even the French soldiers, trained in arms from infancy, can boast that they have very often bested your fresh recruits.[5] I shall say no more, for fear of seeming to flatter you to your faces.

"'At any rate,' I went on, 'neither your town workers nor your rough and untrained farm laborers are supposed to fear the idle followers of gentlemen, unless perhaps their bodies are unfitted for strength and bravery, or whose spirits are broken by poverty. So there is no danger that those, whose bodies, once strong and vigorous (for it is only such men whom gentlemen deign to corrupt), would become weakened by idleness or enfeebled by womanly occupations if they were trained to earn their living by honest pursuits and exercised some manly toil. But, however this may be, it seems to me by in no way helpful to the commonweal to keep for the emergency of a war such a multitude of those who trouble and disturb the peace. You never have war unless you choose it, and you ought to think far more of peace. But this is not the only thing that makes thieving necessary; there is another, one I believe peculiar to you Englishmen alone.'

"'What is that?' said the Cardinal.

"'Your sheep,' I replied, 'which used to be so mild and content, are now, it is said, so greedy and wild that they devour men, laying waste and depopulating fields, houses, and towns.[1] For in those parts of the realm that produce the finest and therefore most costly wool, nobles and gentlemen, and even holy abbots, are unsatisfied with the revenues and annual profits they derive from their estates.[2] No longer content with merely leading an idle life and contributing nothing good to their country, they must also do it real harm. They leave no ground to be tilled, enclose every bit of land for pasture, pull down houses, and destroy towns, leaving only a church for a barn. And, as if not enough English land were already wasted on deer parks and game preserves, these holy men turn all human habitations and cultivated land into a wilderness. Thus so that one fat cat, an insatiable and terrible scourge to his homeland, might enclose some thousand acres of tillable land in a single fence, many tenants are ejected. Some, through fraud or violence, lose their goods. Others are so wearied by oppression that they are driven to sell. Thus by hook or by crook poor wretches are compelled to leave their homes—men, women, husbands, wives, orphans, widows, parents with little children and a family not rich but numerous (for farm work requires many hands). Away they must go, I say, from hearth and home, and find no shelter. All their household furniture, which would not fetch a great price even if they could wait for a purchaser, must be sold for a trifling profit. Then as soon as they've gone through their last penny (near the beginning of their migration), what's left but to steal and hang—with justice, mind you—or wander and beg? But even wandering might land you in prison these days, for it is an "idle loitering." Nobody wants to hire their services, which they desperately offer. Why? They're accustomed to farming, and there's no need for a plow where nothing's to be sowed. It used to take several workers to cultivate a field until it was ripe for the harvest; the same field now requires only a single shepherd or rancher.

---

[1] Let's say ... France A reference to the battle at Dixmude (1489) and that at Boulogne (1492).

[2] buckler Small shield, usually round, that can be carried or buckled to the arm.

[3] [marginal note] The mischief of standing armies.

[4] Sallust Roman politician and historian (86–34 BCE); hand or ... practice Cf. Sallust's Cataline Conspiracy.

[5] not even ... recruits The English had won several decisive victories over the French.

"'And so it is because of this,' I continued, 'that the price of food has risen in many parts. Wool too has gone up in price. So much so that the poor, who used to make cloth in England, cannot now afford to buy it, and so are driven from work to idleness. For after the great increase in pastureland a plague killed off a vast number of sheep. Perhaps God, vexed by the owners' display of greed, sent a murrain.[3] It might have fallen more justly on their own heads. In any case, even if the number of sheep had risen, the price wouldn't have fallen, because of the monopoly—excuse me, the oligopoly,[4] for there are more than one of them. Wealth stays in the hands of the same few, who are not obliged to sell before they wish, and they do not wish to sell until they get the price they ask. All other kinds of livestock are also high-priced for the same reasons, and all the more so, because as the farmhouses have been pulled down and the tillage is lessened, there are none left to raise livestock. These rich men will not rear calves as they do lambs, but buy them lean and cheap elsewhere and then, having fattened them up in their own pastures, resell them again at a tidy profit. I fear that the full mischief of this system has not yet been felt. Thus far it has raised the prices only where the animals are sold; over time, though, if the buyers remove them faster than they can be bred, then as the supply gradually diminishes in the areas where they are bought, there will be great shortages. Thus the unscrupulous greed of a few is ruining the very thing for which your island was once counted most fortunate. The high price of food is causing everyone to get rid of as many servants as possible, and what, I ask you, can they do but to beg, or, if more courageous, to rob?

"'What, moreover, is found alongside this wretched need and poverty but wanton luxury? For not only the servants of noblemen but craftsmen and farmers, indeed all classes alike, are given to flashy dress and fancy dining. Do not brothels, wine-shops, ale houses, and all those games of chance, cards, dicing, tennis, bowls, and quoits,[5] soon drain the purses of those who cannot resist them, sending them off to rob others when their money is gone? Cast out these ruinous plagues; make laws that those who have destroyed farmhouses and country towns must either restore them or hand them over to those who will do so and are ready to build. Restrict this right of the rich to buy up everything and maintain a kind of monopoly. Let fewer be brought up in idleness. Let farming be restored. Let wool-manufacturing be reintroduced so that there may be honest occupations for the idle crowd of those whom poverty has already made thieves or who are currently vagabonds or lazy servants, and thus likely in any case to become such. Unless you remedy these evils, it is useless for you to boast of the justice you mete out in punishing theft. Such justice is for show, not truly fair or useful. For when you let your young be brought up badly, with their characters corrupted, and then penalize them when as adults they commit the very crimes that from their boyhood they had shown every prospect of committing, what else are you doing but first creating thieves and then punishing them?'

---

[1] Your sheep … and towns Reference to the practice of enclosure, starting in the thirteenth century, in which wealthy landlords would fence off lands previously set aside for common use, using them instead for raising sheep. This practice dislocated rural laborers and sent some into beggary, vagabondage, and even thieving.

[2] even holy abbots … estates The Church frequently enclosed land for its own use.

[3] murrain Infectious disease, usually of animals, especially sheep.

[4] oligopoly Control of prices by a handful of owners. Drawing on an analogy with "monopoly," More invents a word to satirize landowners.

[5] quoits Game in which flat rings of stone, iron, or rope are pitched at a stake.

"Even while I was speaking," Raphael said, "the lawyer had been preparing his reply, determined to adopt the usual method of disputants, who are more careful in repeating what has been said than in answering it, so highly do they regard memory.

"'Certainly, sir,' the lawyer said, 'you have spoken well, considering that you are but a stranger, and have been able only to hear something about these matters, not to get exact knowledge of them. I will briefly make things clear. First I will repeat in order what you have said; then I will show in what respects ignorance of our conditions has deceived you; finally I will demolish and destroy all your arguments. So to begin with what I promised first, in four respects you seemed to me—'

"'Hold your tongue,' said the Cardinal, interrupting the lawyer, 'for it looks as if your reply will be lengthy, if you begin thus.[1] We will relieve you of the trouble of making your answer now and postpone that duty until your next meeting, which I would like to schedule for tomorrow, if, of course, you are both free. But now I should very much like to hear, Raphael, your reasons why we should not punish theft with death. What penalty more beneficial to the commonweal would you recommend? For you must think some punishment is necessary. Even with the death penalty, men still rush into stealing. Give them a guarantee that they will live, then what force, what threat could deter the criminals? They would regard a lighter punishment as a reward, an invitation to commit more crime.'

"'Certainly,' I said to the Cardinal, 'most kind and reverend father, I think it quite unjust that what cost one person some money should cost another his life. Indeed, I do not think that all the goods in the world can equal a man's life in value. But some will say it is not about the money, but about the laws that have been assaulted, the justice that has been violated. They call this "extreme justice"—extreme wrong is more like it. For we ought not to approve such severe Manlian[2] laws that justify drawing the sword against even the slightest infraction. On the other hand, nor should we accept Stoical rulings that count all offences equal, so that there would be no difference between killing a man and taking his coin. If equity has any meaning, there is no similarity or connection between the two cases. God has said, "Thou shalt not kill," and shall we so lightly kill a man for taking a little money? And if the divine commandment does not stop us when we legalize killing, what prevents us from also legalizing adultery, rape and perjury? Now God forbids a man to take another's life—forbids him to take even his own. But certain men have mutually agreed to laws that do allow taking human life. If this exempts their agents from having to observe God's law, killing others without any divine example, will not human law then take precedent over that of God? And so men will obey God in the same way they manage everything else: as it suits them. Finally, the law of Moses, though severe and harsh (being made for an enslaved and stubborn people), nevertheless punishes theft by fine, not death. Let's not suppose that God's new law of mercy, in which He gives commands as a father to his children, allows us greater license to be cruel to one another. These are my reasons for thinking this treatment unlawful. Surely everyone knows how absurd and even dangerous to the commonwealth it is to penalize a thief and a murderer with the same punishment. For as soon as a robber sees that he faces no more penalty for a murder conviction than for the mere guilt of theft, he would not hesitate to kill a man he might otherwise just rob. Because he is in no more danger if caught, it is safer for him to cover up the offence by making sure that there is no one left alive to tell the tale. And so even as we try to frighten thieves with excessive cruelty we also urge them on to the destruction of honest people.

---

[1] [marginal note] Illustrates the Cardinal's way of interrupting a babbler.

[2] Manlian Roman general Manlius (4th century BCE) executed his own son for breaking the law.

"'Now, as to determining what punishment might be better,' I continued to the Cardinal; 'that is an easy task. It would be much harder to find a worse! But why should we doubt the effectiveness of those punishments that worked for so long for the Romans, those experts in government? When men were convicted of great crimes they were condemned to a lifetime of working, shackled, in stone quarries or mines. Yet I can find no better custom in any nation than that which during my travels I noticed in Persia among the people commonly called the Polylerites.[1] Theirs is a large and well-governed nation. They pay an annual tribute to the Persian ruler, but they are in all other respects free and autonomous.[2] Living far from the sea, almost surrounded by mountains, and satisfied with what their own bounteous land yields, they neither visit others often nor receive visits. In accord with their ancient custom, they do not try to enlarge their territory. Their boundaries, moreover, are protected from all aggression by their mountains and by the tribute they pay to their overlord, and so they live free from military service, not at all extravagantly but comfortably, more in happiness than in fame or honor. Only their immediate neighbors even know their names.

"'In their land,' I went on, 'those who are convicted of theft repay what they have taken to the owner and, not, as is usual elsewhere, to the ruler, who they think has no more right to the stolen thing than do the thieves.[3] If the thing is lost, the value is made up and paid out of the thieves' belongings, the rest is given to their wives and children, and the thieves themselves are condemned to hard labor. Unless the theft was outrageous, they are neither shackled nor jailed but employed in public works, unbound and unguarded. If they refuse to work or if they slack off, they are whipped but not put in chains. If they do a good day's work, they need fear no humiliation. Every night after roll call, they are locked into their sleeping quarters. Aside from its constant toil, their life is not hard. As servants to the commonwealth, they are fed well at public expense, though the arrangement varies in different places. In some parts what is spent on them is raised by donations, and though this method is unpredictable, the people are so kind hearted that the criminals' needs are plentifully supplied. Elsewhere public revenues are set aside to cover the cost, while in yet other places everyone pays a fixed tax. In some parts the offenders do no work for the community, but when someone needs a hired hand he can go to the marketplace and hire a convict for a day at a fixed wage that is less than what he would have had to pay a free man—and it is lawful to whip these servants if they become lazy. So the convicted thieves are never out of work, and beyond the cost of their keep each brings a little daily profit to the public treasury. They are all dressed in clothes of the same color,[4] with hair not shaved off but cropped a little above their ears and the tip of one ear cut off. Their friends may give them food, drink and the appropriately colored clothes, but it is a capital offence to give them money, both for the giver and the receiver. It is just as perilous for a free man to receive money for any reason from one of these slaves, as the convicts are called, as it is for the slaves to touch weapons. A special badge distinguishes each district's slaves. It is a capital offence for slaves to throw away this badge, to go beyond their own bounds, or to talk to a slave from another district. And it is no less risky to plan an escape than actually to run away. Indeed, aiding and abetting an escape means death for a slave, and slavery for a free man. For an informer, however, there is a reward: money for a free man, liberty for a slave. Both are pardoned and given immunity for their help, thus ensuring that it is never safer to follow a wicked purpose than to repent it.

"'This is their way of arranging things,' I continued, 'as I have described it to you. You can easily see how humane and advantageous it is. The object of this punishment is to destroy the vice and save the person. The treatment of the criminals is necessary to make them good, and they have the rest of their lives to repair the damage they have done. There is so little fear of their backsliding that even travelers feel safe having these slaves as guides on their journeys, changing them for new ones as they arrive in new districts. Look, there are all sorts of obstacles to their committing a robbery: they are unarmed, money would simply betray them, penalties await them if caught, and there is absolutely no hope of escape. For how could a man expect to escape detection in clothes unlike those of anyone else in the country, unless he were to run away naked—and even then his ear would betray him? It may be objected that convicts might get together and conspire against the state—as if any group of slaves could have a prayer without first tempting and persuading those of many other districts. But this could not happen, because they may not meet and converse, or even greet one another. It is unlikely that they would tell others of a plot when they know that plotting is dangerous if concealed but profitable to anyone who divulges it to the authorities. On the other hand, no one is quite without hope of some day recovering his liberty through obedience and patience, and by showing that he is capable of one day living a reformed life. For no year passes in which some are not restored to freedom, recommended by their patient endurance.'

---

[1] Polylerites People of much nonsense, one of More's many invented Greek compounds: polus (much) and leros (nonsense).

[2] [marginal note] The Polylerite society near the Persians.

[3] [marginal note] To be noted by us, who do otherwise.

[4] [marginal note] Yet modern servants exult in livery of the same sort.

"After saying this," Raphael continued, "I added that I saw no reason why this method might not also be adopted in England, and be more beneficial than the system of justice that my lawyerly opponent had praised so highly. The lawyer replied that it could never be established in England without seriously endangering the state. He shook his head, screwed up his face, and held his peace. And everyone there agreed with him. Then the Cardinal said, 'It is not easy to guess if it would turn out well without hazarding the attempt. But say a death penalty has been pronounced, and the King postpones its execution and suspends the right to sanctuary[1] in order to try this method. If the experiment works, it is only right to make it law. If it fails, putting to death those already condemned would be no less for the public good and no more unjust than to do so right away. In the meantime, no danger can come of the experiment. Moreover, I am sure that vagabonds might quite well be treated in the same way, for in spite of repeated legislation, we have not made much progress in dealing with them.'

"After the Cardinal said this, they all took turns praising the very plan they ridiculed when I suggested it. They were especially enthusiastic about the part concerning vagabonds, because it was the Cardinal's own addition.

"Perhaps it would be better to omit what followed, it was so absurd," said Raphael, "but I will relate it. It was not bad in itself and had some bearing on the matter.[2] There was present a hanger-on who apparently wanted to adopt the role of fool, but what he said was too near the truth to be funny. His ill-timed jokes were meant to raise a laugh, but he himself was more often the object of laughter than were his jests. Sometimes the fellow made clever observations, however, thus confirming the proverb that if a man throws the dice often he will sooner or later get lucky. So it happened when one of the guests remarked that because my proposal provided well for thieves and the Cardinal had taken precautions for vagabonds, it remained only to make some provision for the poor, who were unable to earn a living because of sickness or old age.

"'Give me leave,' said the hanger-on, 'and I will see that this, too, is set right. For I am very anxious to get this sort of person out of my sight. They have often harassed me with their pitiful whinings, begging for money, but they could never pitch a tune that would get a coin out of my pocket. For one of two things always happens: either I do not want to give, or I cannot because I have nothing to give. So now they have begun to wise up, for when they see me pass by they say nothing, and spare their pains, expecting no more from me than they would from a priest.[3] But I would like to see a law that would distribute all those beggars among the Benedictine monasteries, where the men could become lay brothers,[4] as they call them, and the women could become nuns.'

---

[1] right to sanctuary Right whereby criminals (or those accused of crimes) could demand asylum in churches, escaping—for a time at least—potential penalties imposed by law.

[2] [marginal note] The friar and the fool: a merry dialogue.

[3] [marginal note] A common saying of beggars.

[4] Benedictine monasteries Monasteries of the Benedictine religious order, an order of monks founded in the sixth century by St. Benedict, notable for their influence on medieval education; lay brothers Men living and working in the monastery but who have not taken vows for clerical orders.

"The Cardinal smiled and allowed it in jest. The others took it seriously—except for a certain friar, who was learned in theology. He was so delighted by this jest at the expense of priests and monks that he too began to laugh, though usually he was serious almost to the point of sourness.

"'Indeed,' said the friar,[1] 'you will not be rid of beggars, unless you make provision for us friars too.'

"'Already done,' said the hanger-on. 'His Eminence made excellent provision for you when he determined that vagabonds should be arrested and made to work. For you are the greatest vagabonds of all.'

"After the company saw by looking at the Cardinal that he did not object to this joke any more than he had to the other, they all began to commend it vigorously. But not the friar, for he—and I do not wonder why—was stung by this taunt. He became so furious and enraged that he could not hold himself back from abuse. He called the man a rascal, a slanderer, a sneak, and a son of perdition, all the while quoting terrible denunciations out of Holy Scripture. Now the hanger-on began to laugh in earnest and was quite in his element.

"'Don't be angry, good friar,' he said, 'for it is written "In your patience ye shall possess your souls."'[2]

"To which the Friar replied—I will repeat his very words—'I am not angry, rogue, or at least I do not sin; for the Psalmist says, "Be ye angry, and sin not."'[3]

"Then the Cardinal gently cautioned the friar to calm himself, but he replied, 'No, my lord, I speak only from good zeal, as holy men should, as it says in the Scriptures, "The zeal of thy house hath consumed me," and we sing in Church—"The scorners of Elisha, while he went up to the house of God, felt the zeal[4] of the bald head,"[5] as perchance this vulgar scoffer shall feel it.'

"'Perhaps,' said the Cardinal, 'you mean well, but I think it would be wiser, though perhaps no holier, to keep from matching wits with a silly fellow or picking a foolish fight with a fool.'

"'No, my lord,' the friar said, 'it would not be wiser. As the wise Solomon saith, "Answer a fool according to his folly."[6] So I do now, and show him the pit into which he will fall, if he take not good heed. For if many scoffers at Elisha, who was only one bald head, felt the zeal of a bald head, how much more will be felt by one scorner of many friars, among whom are many bald men? Moreover, we have a Papal bull[7] by which all who scoff at us are excommunicated.'

"When the Cardinal saw there was no end to the matter in sight, he dismissed the hanger-on with a motion of his head and turned the conversation to a more suitable subject. Soon afterwards he rose from table, dismissed us, and went to hear what the petitioners[8] had to say.

"There, Master More," concluded Raphael, "what a long tale I have burdened you with, one that I would never have told at such length if you had not in the first place so eagerly pestered me and then listened as if you did not want me to leave out a thing. I could have told it more briefly, but I had to tell it in every point to show the judgment of those who initially rejected what I said but then immediately supported it when the Cardinal did not disapprove. They flattered him so much that they even encouraged and almost took in earnest the suggestions of the hanger-on, which the Cardinal took as a joke. So from this you may judge how little regard courtiers would pay me and my advice."

"To be sure, Raphael," I said, "you have given me great pleasure, so wise and clever is everything you have said. Besides, while listening to you I felt not only as if

---

[1] friar Member of one of the four mendicant orders—Franciscans, Dominicans, Carmelites, or Augustinians. Friars are not allowed private property, but must instead beg or work for their sustenance.

[2] In your … souls Luke 21.19.

[3] [marginal note] How his people speak in character! [Be ye … not Psalms 4.4.]

[4] [marginal note] Out of ignorance, the friar uses "zelus" as if it were a neuter noun, like "scelus." [In the original Latin, the friar incorrectly says "zelus" instead of "zelum," using the wrong form of the noun.]

[5] The zeal … me Psalms 69.9; The scorners … bald head In 2 Kings 2.23–24, Elisha, the heir of the prophet Elijah, curses a group of children who have mocked his baldness. Two bears attack the children, killing forty-two of them.

[6] Solomon King of Israel noted for his wisdom; Answer a … folly Proverbs 26.5.

[7] Papal bull Decree issued by the Pope, so called because it was closed by a lead bulla, or seal.

[8] petitioners Those asking for favors from the Church authorities.

I were at home in my native country, but also as if I had gone back to the days of my youth, for I was pleasantly reminded of the Cardinal in whose household I was brought up as a boy. And since you so highly honor his memory, you cannot think how much more attached I am to you for that than I was already. But my mind is still not changed, and I continue to think that if you could persuade yourself not to shun the courts of kings, you could do the greatest good to the commonwealth through your advice. This is the most important part of your duty, as it that of every good man. For since your favorite writer, Plato, believes that states will be happy only if philosophers are kings or kings turn to philosophy, what a faint hope there will be of happiness if philosophers will not share their advice with kings."[1]

"Philosophers are not so ungracious," Raphael said, "as to refuse to advise monarchs—indeed, many have done so through published books. But rulers must be ready to take good advice. Doubtless Plato was right that unless kings become philosophical they will never take the advice of real philosophers. From their youth, most are infected by and saturated with wrong ideas. Plato experienced this with Dionysius.[2] So if I were to give wise advice to some king, trying to remove the seeds of evil and corruption from his mind, do you not think that as a result, I would be at once banished or ridiculed?

"Come now, imagine me at the French king's court, sitting with the most trusted members of his Privy Council. Imagine the king presiding as they all set their wits to determine by what crafty means he might keep his hold on Milan, bring Naples (which has for the time eluded his grasp) back into his power, destroy Venice, subjugate the whole of Italy, and then add to his rule Flanders, Brabant and the whole of Burgundy, as well as other lands.[3] And suppose that someone advises that he should sign a treaty with the Venetians meant to last only so long as he thought convenient, and that he should develop a common strategy with them, even allowing them to keep part of the booty, which, when all has gone as he wished, he could reclaim. While one counselor recommends the hiring of German lanzknechts,[4] another suggests winning over the Swiss with money,[5] and a third advises appeasing the offended majesty of the Emperor with gold. A fourth thinks that a settlement should be made with the King of Aragon, to whom the independent kingdom of Navarre would be ceded as a guarantee of peace, while still another proposes that the king of Castile should be lured by the prospect of a marriage alliance and that the offer of money would draw some Castilian nobles over to the French side.

"The most perplexing question is what to do with England. The advisers agree that peace should be made and that the alliance, which may be weak at first, should be strengthened as much as possible so that the English could be called friends and suspected as enemies. The Scots therefore must be posted in readiness, ready for any opportunity to be let loose on the English should the latter make any move. Moreover, some exiled noble must be encouraged (secretly, for treaties prevent this being done openly) to maintain a claim to the throne so that he may keep in check a king he does not trust.

"In a case like this, with such plans afoot and each vying with the other in making warlike proposals, what do you suppose would happen if an insignificant person like myself got up and advised another tack: leave Italy alone and stay at home, for as it is, the kingdom of France is almost too large to be well governed by a single man, and so the king should not think of adding another dominion. Suppose I then put before them the decisions taken by the Achorians,[6] who live on the mainland southeast of the Island of Utopia?[7] They went to war to win their king another kingdom, one he claimed because of an old marriage alliance. After securing it they saw it would take no less trouble to keep it than it had taken to obtain it, for there were constant rebellions and foreign invasions. So the Achorians had to keep an army in constant readiness, either to defend them or in case of an attack by them. In the meantime they were being plundered, money was leaving the country, they were losing their lives for the glory of others, and peace was no more secure than before. War corrupted their citizens' morals and they developed a lust for robbery and murder, holding laws in contempt because the king, distracted by governing two kingdoms, could not properly attend to either. Eventually, seeing no other way to end this mischief, the Achorians rallied together and courteously but firmly offered their king his choice of whichever kingdom he preferred. He could not keep both because each had too many people to be ruled by half a king. For who would hire a mule-driver if he worked half the time for somebody else? So the worthy king was forced to be content with his own realm. He handed over the new one to one of his friends, who was soon afterwards driven out.

---

[1] For since ... kings See Plato's Republic 5.473.

[2] Dionysius Dionysus II, tyrant of Syracuse (c. 397–343 BCE). Plato unsuccessfully attempted to instruct him in philosophy.

[3] [marginal note] Indirectly he discourages the French from seizing Italy.

[4] lanzknechts German infantry (literally "lance knights").

[5] [marginal note] Swiss mercenaries.

[6] Achorians People with no country; another invented Greek compound: a (without) and xoros (country).

[7] [marginal note] A notable example.

"Furthermore, imagine I proved that all this warfare, by which so many nations would be kept in turmoil on the French king's account, would, after draining his resources and destroying his people, come to nothing in the end. So it would be more beneficial for him to look after his own kingdom and make it as rich and as flourishing as possible: loving his subjects, being loved by them, living with them, and ruling them gently with no designs upon other kingdoms since what he has is more than enough for him. Now what reception, friend More, do you think this advice of mine would find?"

"To be sure, not a very favorable one," I said.

"Well, then, let us proceed," he said. "Suppose the King and his counselors are debating and calculating how they might heap up treasure for him. One advises raising the value of money when he has to pay off debts and lowering it when he has to receive any. Thus he could settle a large debt with a small sum but receive a large one when only a small one is due him. Another suggests a make-believe war as a pretext for raising money. Then when he saw fit, he could make peace with great solemnity, misleading the people into believing that their king was compassionate, eagerly avoiding bloodshed.Another reminds him of old moth-eaten laws that no one remembers and so everyone has broken. He could exact fines for such infractions, there being no better source of profit—nor any more honorable, for such an approach can outwardly resemble justice. Another says that the king should prohibit many common activities under threat of heavy fines, and then, for large sums of money, allow exceptions to those whose interests are hampered by the prohibition. Thus favor is won from the people, and a double profit is made, first by the exaction of fines from those whose greed has entangled them in the snare, and then by selling privileges to others at a higher price. In fact, the higher the price the better the prince: since he dislikes making exceptions harmful to the common welfare, he will not do so except for much money.

"Another counselor persuades him that he must befriend judges who always decide in favor of the royal prerogative. He must summon them to the palace and invite them to debate his affairs in his presence. In even the most unfair of charges, the judges will all, from a desire to contradict, to be original, or to win favor, find some loophole whereby a false accusation may be set up. If the judges can be made to differ, even the clearest claim will need to be debated and truth becomes a matter of doubt. A convenient handle will be given to the king to interpret the law in his own interest, and everyone else will acquiesce from shame or fear. The sentence will boldly be pronounced from the Bench, and then a pretext can never be lacking for deciding for the king. To such a judge it is enough to have on his side either the letter of the law, or a twisted reading of it, or (what outweighs all law with conscientious judges) the undoubted prerogative of the King's majesty.

"Thus all the counselors agree, consenting to the saying of Crassus:[1] no amount of gold is enough for a king who must keep an army.[2] A king, however much he might want to, can do nothing wrong, for all that men possess is his—they themselves are his—and a man's own is only what the king's generosity does not take away. It is much to the king's interest to leave him as little as possible, so that the people do not threaten him by growing wanton with riches and freedom. Freedom and riches would make them less willing to endure harsh and unjust commands, whereas poverty and need depress them, encouraging their patience and taking away from the oppressed the lively spirit of rebellion.

---

[1] Crassus Roman statesman (d. 53 BCE) who—along with Caesar and Pompey—made up the first triumvirate. According to Cicero, Crassus said that only those who had the money to maintain an army should take part in government.

[2] [marginal note] Saying of Crassus the Rich.

"Suppose again I rose and maintained that this advice was both dishonorable and dangerous for the king, whose very safety, as well as his honor, rested on the people's resources and not on his own. Suppose I argued that people choose their king for their own sake and not for his, that he has a duty to ensure that they live well, safe from injustice and wrong. That it is the king's responsibility to take more care for the welfare of his people than for his own, just as it is the duty of a shepherd, insofar as he is a shepherd, to feed his flock rather than himself.[1] That whoever thinks the stability of the kingdom rests in the poverty of the people is way off the mark, proved wrong by the facts. For where do you see more quarrelling than among beggars? Who is more eager for revolution than a man discontented with his state of life? Who is more reckless in upsetting order in the hope of profiting by any means or other than someone with nothing to lose? Now if there was a king so despised and hated by his subjects, that the only way he could maintain order would be to oppress, plunder, and harass them, and so reduce them to poverty, it would surely be better for him to resign his throne than to keep it by such means. Otherwise, though he might retain the name of ruler he loses its majesty. For it is not a king's part to reign over beggars, but rather over the prosperous and happy. This was certainly the opinion of that noble and lofty spirit Fabricius,[2] who said that he would rather rule rich men than be rich himself.

"If one man lives a life of pleasure and self-indulgence amidst the groans and lamentations of all around him, he is the keeper of a prison, not of a kingdom. Just as a doctor who cannot cure one disease except by creating another must admit he is incompetent, so a monarch who cannot correct the lives of citizens except by depriving them of the good things of life must admit that he does not know how to govern free men.

"Such a king should rule his own self-indulgence or pride, for it is generally as a result of these vices that the people either scorn or hate him. Let him live harmlessly on what is his own and limit his expenses to his revenues. Let him put a stop to evildoers, and by training his subjects well prevent new evils rather than allow them to develop and then have to punish them. Let him not be hasty in putting into force laws long since fallen into disuse, especially those that were never needed.[3] And let him never confiscate property that no judge would allow a private person to appropriate; it would be crafty and unjust to act that way.

"What if I then recommended to them a law of the Macarians,[4] a people not very far from Utopia? Their king, on the day he first takes office, after solemn sacrifices, is bound by an oath that he will never have in his treasury more than a thousand pounds of gold, or its equivalent in silver.[5] They say that this law was instituted by an excellent king who cared more for his country's good than for his own wealth; his aim was to prevent any ruler from hoarding so much money that he would impoverish his people. He saw that his present wealth was enough to quell a rebellion or defend the kingdom against invasion but not large enough to tempt him to invade the lands of others. This was the law's main purpose; it also provided sufficient funds for daily transactions with the citizenry. Finally, a king who has to pay out to the people whatever exceeds the limit prescribed by law, he is less likely to oppress them. Such a king will be a terror to the evil and be loved by the good. But if I tried to tell these truths to men strongly inclined to the opposite way of thinking, would I not be telling my tale to deaf ears?"[6]

"Deaf indeed, without a doubt," I said, "and by Heaven I am not surprised. Nor, to tell the truth, do I think such talk should be thrust on people, nor such advice given to those who will never listen to it. What good could such novel ideas do? How could they penetrate minds of those entirely possessed by the opposite view? In private conversation among friends this academic sort of philosophizing is not without its charm, but in the councils of kings, where great matters are debated with great authority, there is no room for such things."

---

[1] That it is ... himself See Plato's Republic 1.343, which argues that the true ruler always acts in his subjects' best interest, not his own. Also see Aristotle's Politics 4.8.3, which defines a tyrant as one who rules with his own private interests in mind, rather than those of his people.

[2] Fabricius Roman general and statesman (d. 275 BCE), noted for his incorruptibility.

[3] Let him ... needed Some counselors to Henry VII were notorious for fining citizens for breaking laws so old they did not know of their existence.

[4] Macarians "Happy ones," from the Greek makarios (blessed or happy).

[5] [marginal note] Wonderful law of the Macarians.

[6] [marginal note] Proverb.

"That is just what I meant," he said, "by saying there is no room for philosophy in dealing with kings."

"Yes there is," I said, "but not for this academic philosophy that thinks every thing suited to every place.[1] There is another philosophy, however, a practical one better suiting political life, one that knows its cues, adapts itself to them, and in the play at hand performs its own part neatly and fittingly. This is the one you must use.[2] Suppose a comedy of Plautus is being performed, and just as the household slaves are making trivial jokes at each other you come on the stage in a philosopher's getup and spoke those lines from the Octavia in which Seneca is arguing with Nero. Would it not be better to have a non-speaking part than to recite something inappropriate and thus mangle a perfectly good comedy?[3] You spoil and unbalance the play by bringing in irrelevant matter, even if your own lines are superior. Whatever drama is being staged, perform it as well as you can and don't try to wreck it just because you think of another that has more charm.

"So it is in the commonwealth and in the deliberations of kings. Suppose wrong opinions cannot be pulled up by the root and that you cannot cure, as you would wish, vices of long standing. You must not on that account abandon the ship of state during a storm just because you cannot control the winds. Neither must you try to impose upon ministers of state strange and untested notions that you know will carry no weight with those of opposite conviction. You must do your best with an indirect approach and with covert suggestions. And when you cannot ensure a good outcome you must make it as little bad as you can. It is impossible that all can be well until all people are entirely good, something I do not expect for a great many years to come."

"By such means," Raphael said, "I would accomplish nothing except to share the madness of others while attempting to cure their lunacy. If I wish to speak the truth, I must do so in the manner I have described. For all I know, it may be the role of a philosopher to speak falsely, but it is not mine. Although my language may be unwelcome and disagreeable, I cannot see why it should seem so strange that they would think me foolish. It's not as if I told them the kind of things that Plato imagines in his Republic, or that the Utopians actually put in practice in theirs.[4] Though such institutions might seem superior (as in fact they are) they might also seem bizarre, because here we have private property, whereas there everything is held in common.

"My advice, in that case, would surely not be accepted—not only because it would be addressed to those who had made up their minds to go headlong down the opposite path, but also because people tend to resent it. But leaving that aside, what have I recommended that would not be appropriate or desirable everywhere? Truly, if all things that to the perverse ways of humanity have come to seem peculiar must be dismissed as unusual and absurd, we must also suppress almost all the doctrines of Christ. And He forbade us to suppress them—so much so that what He whispered in the ears of His disciples, He ordered them to proclaim openly from the housetops.[5] The greater part of His teaching is far more alien to our customary ways than anything I said. But preachers, crafty men that they are, and I suppose following your advice, found that people did not wish to change their ways so as to fit the words of Christ, and so they adapted them to human behavior as if His were a rule of lead, not of iron, in the hope that somehow the two might be reconciled. I cannot see what they have gained except to allow us to be bad with a good conscience. I would achieve no more in the councils of kings. Either I would offer a different opinion, which would be overruled, or I would voice the same opinion as the others, in which case I would, like Mitio[6] in Terence, share their madness. As to the indirect approach you suggested, saying that if all things cannot be made good, they must at least be so handled as to be made, as far as can be done, as little bad as possible, I do not see the use. At court there is no room for dissembling, nor can you shut your eyes to things; you must openly approve the worst advice, and subscribe to the most ruinous decrees. He will be counted as a spy, almost a traitor, who even stutters in his praise of evil advice. Moreover, you have no chance to do any good when you mix with colleagues more likely to corrupt the best of men than to be reformed. Their evil conversation will either seduce you or turn your integrity and innocence into a screen for the wickedness and folly of others. Thus you are far from being able to make anything better by your indirect approach and your covert suggestions.

---

[1] [marginal note] Philosophy of the Schools.

[2] [marginal note] A striking comparison.

[3] Plautus Roman playwright (c. 254–184 BCE) known for his low-brow, farcical comedies; Octavia Grave play in the tragic historical mode, spuriously attributed to Seneca; comedy [marginal note] A mute part.

[4] [marginal note] Utopian institutions.

[5] what He … housetops See Matthew 10.27 and Luke 12.3.

[6] Mitio Character in a comedy (The Brothers) by Terence (c. 190–158 BCE), a Roman playwright. In the speech referred to here, Mitio declares, "Still, if I inflamed or even fell in with his passionate temper, I should surely give him another madman for company" (1.145–47).

"For this reason, Plato shows in a wonderful analogy why philosophers are right to stay away from political life. Although they observe people rushing into the streets and getting soaked by constant showers, they cannot induce them to come in out of the rain. Knowing that they will accomplish nothing by going out, other than to get soaked with the rest, they stay put under cover, content that though they cannot cure the stupidity of others, they can at least save their own heads.[1]

"My dear More, to speak frankly from the heart, it seems to me that wherever you have private property, and all men measure all things by money, it is scarcely possible to have justice or prosperity. Surely you don't think there is justice when all good things come into the hands of the worst people, or that there is prosperity where a very few own everything. Even then those few are not fully content, while the many are downright wretched.

"Consider the wise and holy institutions of the Utopians, among whom, and with very few laws, affairs are so well ordered that virtue is rewarded and yet everyone has an equal abundance of everything. Contrast this with the situation of those many nations that keep creating fresh laws yet never manage to create good order—states in which whatever a man has grabbed he calls his own property but in which all these laws still do not help him secure or defend his goods or distinguish them from those of others (and notice the ever rising number of interminable lawsuits in such nations over what belongs to whom). I tell you, when I consider all this I become more partial to Plato and understand why he disdained to make laws for those who refused to accept the principle of granting an equal share of good things to everyone.[2] The wise philosopher foresaw that the one and only road to the general welfare of a commonwealth would be to enforce equality in all respects.

"I doubt that such well being could be achieved where there is private property. For when everyone aims to have as much of it as possible, even where there is a great wealth it is divvied up among a few, who leave nothing to the rest but poverty. And it generally happens that one class deserves the lot of the other, for the rich tend to be greedy, unscrupulous and useless, while the poor tend to be well behaved, simple and useful—more useful, by their daily labor, to the community than to themselves. I am entirely convinced that no just and even distribution of goods can be made, nor any perfect happiness be found among human beings, until private property is utterly abolished. While it lasts, for most of mankind, and not the worst, there will remain a heavy and intolerable burden of poverty and anxiety. I admit that this can be relieved to some extent, but I maintain that it cannot be removed. A statute might be made that no one be allowed to hold more than a certain amount of land, and that no one might have an income beyond a certain maximum. Laws could be passed to prevent the king from becoming too powerful and the people from becoming arrogant. There might also be legislation to stop public offices from being bought and sold, or held only at great personal expense. Otherwise, officials might take the chance to recoup by fraud and robbery what they spent to gain office, and then the rich would hold offices that should be held by the wise. Laws such as these can alleviate and lessen these evils, just as sick bodies that are past cure can still be kept going by constant medical treatment. There is no hope of a cure or a return to health, however, while each man is master of his own property. Indeed, while you are occupied with the curing of one part, you make the sores of the other worse; thus the disease of the one arises from the healing of the other, since nothing can be added to one man without being subtracted from another."

---

[1] Plato ... their own heads See Republic 6.469 D-E.

[2] who refused ... everyone This was Plato's reason for refusing to rule the Arcadians and the Thebans when the possibility was offered to him.

"I can't agree," I said. "Life can never be happy or satisfying where all things are held in common. How could a sufficient supply of goods be kept up? Each person would spend less time working. If hope of personal gain does not motivate a man, he becomes lazy and relies on the industry of others. But when people are driven to labor by poverty and are not allowed to keep what they have worked for, is there not bound to be continual trouble, bloodshed, and revolution? Not to mention that magistrates must lose both authority and dignity, for how there can be any place for them among men who are all on the same level escapes me."

"I am not surprised that you think so," Raphael said, "for you have either no conception, or a false one, of the sort of state I describe. If you had been with me in Utopia and had yourself seen how people behave, as I did (for I lived there more than five years, and would never have wished to leave except for the desire to make that new world widely known), you certainly would admit that you had never seen a more well-ordered people anywhere."

"Yet surely," said Peter Giles, "it will be hard for you to convince me that one might find in that new world a people better ordered than in our own familiar one. I imagine our governments are older and our minds at least equal in intelligence. Long experience has helped us to invent many conveniences for human life, not to speak of the things we discovered by pure luck and that no amount of intelligence could have devised."

"As for the age of states," said Raphael, "you could give a better opinion if you had read the world's histories; if we may believe them, there were cities there before there were men here. As to what intelligence has invented or chance discovered, that might have happened equally in both places. But even if it's true that we surpass the Utopians in intelligence, I am sure they leave us far behind in perseverance and industry. For according to their chronicles, up to our arrival they had never heard anything about us, whom they call the Ultraequinoctials, except that 1,200 years ago a ship driven by tempests to the island of Utopia was wrecked there. Some Romans and Egyptians were cast on shore and never left the island. Now mark with what industry they exploited this one opportunity. There was no useful art in the Roman empire that the Utopians did not either learn from the shipwrecked strangers or discover themselves after making some inquiries. What advantage they took of the chance arrival of a few men there! But if the same fortune has ever carried someone from their country to ours, it is completely forgotten, as perhaps it will be forgotten in times to come that I was ever at Utopia. At our first encounter they immediately took up any good invention of ours, yet I suppose it will be a long time before we receive and adopt anything that is better ordered by them. This, I think, is the chief reason why, though we are inferior to them neither in intelligence nor in wealth, their commonwealth is more wisely governed and more prosperous than ours."

"Well, Raphael," I said, "I insist that you give us a description of the island, and do not be brief, but set forth in order the land, the rivers, the cities, the inhabitants, the manners, customs and laws—in fact everything that you think we would like to know. And you may imagine we'd like to know everything of which we are as yet ignorant."

"There is nothing," he said, "I would be more pleased to do, for I have the facts ready to hand. But it will take time."

"Then," I said, "let us go in to dinner, and afterwards we will take up as much time as we like."

"So be it," he said.

So we went in and dined, and then returned to the same spot, sat down on the same bench, and having given orders to the servants that we must not be interrupted, Peter Giles and I urged Raphael to fulfill his promise. When he saw us intent and eager to listen, after sitting in silent thought for a time, he thus began his tale.

BOOK 2
CHAPTER 1

The island of Utopia extends in the center (where it is broadest) for two hundred miles, and this breadth continues for the greater part of the island, but towards both ends it begins gradually to taper.[1] These ends form a circuit of about 500 miles, so that the island resembles a new moon with horns divided by a strait about eleven miles across that then opens out into a wide expanse. The land that almost surrounds the bay keeps the winds off the water, making it seem like a huge lake, unruffled and not subject to storms. Thus almost all the center of the island makes a harbor, one in which ships can go in every direction to the great convenience of the inhabitants. Shallows and rocks make the mouth of this sea (which is situated between the horns) dangerous. Near the center of the gap stands one great cliff, which is not dangerous because clearly visible. On it stands a tower, manned by a garrison.[1] The other rocks are hidden, and therefore treacherous. Only the natives know the channels, so very few foreigners enter the gulf without a Utopian pilot. Even for them the entrance is hardly safe, but they are guided by landmarks on the shore. If these were removed and resituated, the shoals could easily destroy an enemy fleet, however large.[2]

---

[1] [marginal note] Site and shape of Utopia and the new island.

On the opposite coast there are numerous harbors, but the landing is everywhere so well defended by nature or by art that it would take only a few men to prevent a strong force from invading. As is recorded, and as the appearance of the ground shows, the island was not surrounded by sea until the time of Utopus, who conquered it and gave it its name (up to then it was called "Abraxa").[3] He brought a rude and rustic people to such a degree of civilization and refinement that they now excel almost all others. After a victory on his first landing, he ordered the land excavated for fifteen miles where it was connected to the mainland, thus letting the sea flow round it.[4] He set to the task not only the inhabitants but his own soldiers, and so he prevented anyone from thinking the task imposed upon him a disgrace. By dividing the work equally among so many hands, he ensured that it was finished with astonishing speed. The neighbors, who had at first ridiculed the undertaking as vain, were struck with wonder and terror at his success.[5] The island contains 54 cities or county towns, all large and fine, identical in language, manners, customs and laws,[6] similar in situation, and everywhere, so far as the nature of the ground permits, the same in appearance.[7] None of them is less than twenty-four miles from the next, but none is so isolated that you cannot go from it to another in a day's journey on foot.[8] From each city three senior and experienced citizens meet once a year at Amaurote,[9] the capital, to discuss affairs of common interest to the island, for the city's central location makes it the most conveniently situated place to which representatives of all parts can travel.

The land is so well distributed that each city has at least twenty miles of it on every side, and on some sides more, where the towns are farther apart.[10] No town has any desire to extend its territory, for its citizens consider themselves to be cultivators, not owners, of what they hold.[11] Everywhere in the country they have provided, at suitable distances from each other, farmhouses well equipped with farming tools.[12] These are inhabited by citizens who come in succession to live there. No rural household numbers fewer than forty men and women, besides two slaves attached to the soil, and over each are set a responsible master and mistress of mature years. A Phylarch[13] rules over every thirty households. Twenty from each household return every year to the city, after completing two years in the country. In their place the same number are sent fresh from the city to be instructed by those who have already been there a year and are therefore more experienced in husbandry. They themselves teach others the following year; so there is no danger of any mistake or ineptitude causing scarcity, as might happen if all at one time were newcomers without knowledge of husbandry.

---

[1] [marginal note] Being naturally safe, the entry is defended by a single fort.

[2] [marginal note] The trick of shifting landmarks.

[3] [marginal note] Utopia named for King Utopia.

[4] [marginal note] This was a bigger job than digging across the Isthmus. [Several unsuccessful attempts had been made to dig a canal across the Isthmus of Corinth, which joins the Peloponnesian peninsula to the rest of Greece. As a result of these repeated failures, this was a proverbially difficult task.]

[5] [marginal note] Many hands make light work.

[6] [marginal note] The towns of Utopia.

[7] [marginal note] Likeness breeds concord.

[8] [marginal note] A middling distance between towns.

[9] Amaurote Dim or dark; from the Greek amauroton, meaning "made dark."

[10] [marginal note] Distribution of land.

[11] [marginal note] But today this is the curse of all countries.

[12] [marginal note] Farming is the prime occupation.

[13] Phylarch Leader of the tribe, from the Greek phylarchos, meaning "head of a group."

Though this system of changing the cultivators of the soil is the rule, designed to prevent anyone being forced to continue long in a life of hard work, men who take a natural pleasure in agriculture can obtain leave to stay several years. The job of the cultivator is to till the ground, to feed the animals, and to get wood, getting it to town by land or water, as is most convenient.[1] Cultivators breed a great quantity of poultry by a wonderful device.[2] The hens do not sit on the eggs; instead, a great number of eggs are kept at a uniform heat until they come to life and hatch. As soon as they have come out of the shell, the chicks follow and recognize human beings instead of hens. They breed very few horses and these only high-spirited ones, which they use for no other purpose than to exercise their young men in horsemanship.[3] All the labor of cultivation and transport is performed by oxen, which may be inferior to horses in a sprint, but are far superior to them in staying power and endurance and not susceptible to so many diseases.[4] Moreover, it takes less trouble and expense to feed them, and when they are past work can be eaten.

Utopians grow grain only for bread.[5] They drink wine, made of grapes or of apples and pears, or else pure water infused with honey or licorice, which they have in abundance.[6] Though they know for certain how much grain the city and its adjacent lands require, they produce far more grain and cattle than they need and distribute the surplus among their neighbors.[7] Whenever they require anything not found in the country, they requisition it from the city, and without having to give anything in exchange easily obtain it from the town officials and have it brought to them every month on a recurring holiday, when many people go to the city and can help transport the needed materials. When the time of harvest is at hand, the Phylarchs in the country tell the city officials how many citizens they need. These harvesters, arriving at the appointed time, and weather permitting, complete almost all the harvest work in a single day.[8]

Chapter 2

The Cities, and Especially Amaurote

If you know one of the cities, you know them all, for as far as the landscape permits they are almost identical, so I could describe this one or that—it does not matter which I would choose—but nothing could be better than Amaurote.[9] None is worthier, for the others defer to it as the place where the Council meets; and none is better known to me, for I lived there for a full five years.

Built on the gentle slope of a hill, Amaurote is almost square-shaped. Its breadth is about two miles starting from just below the crest of the hill and running down to the river Anyder;[10] its length along the river is rather more than its breadth.[11] The river, which rises eighty miles beyond Amaurote from a small spring, is augmented by various tributaries, two of which are fairly large, so that by the time it reaches the city it is half a mile across. It becomes even broader as it flows a further sixty miles and then falls into the ocean. Through the whole distance between the city and the sea, and even above the city for some miles, the tide flows in rapidly for six hours at a time and then recedes with equal speed. When the sea comes in it fills the whole bed of the Anyder with its water for a distance of thirty miles and drives the river back.[12] At such times it turns its water salt for some distance farther, but after that the river becomes gradually fresh and passes the city untainted. When the ebb comes, the fresh water extends almost down to the mouth of the river.

Amaurote is joined to the opposite bank of the river not by a wooden bridge but by a stone one with fine arches.[1] It is placed at the corner of the city farthest from the sea so that sea-going ships may easily pass along almost the whole town. There is also another river, not large but very gentle and pleasant, which rises out of the same hill on which the town is built and flows through it into the Anyder. The Amaurotians have fortified the source of this river with walls connecting it to the city so that no invading enemy can divert or pollute their drinking water.[2] From where it enters, the water is distributed by brick channels into various parts of the lower town. Where the ground makes that impossible, rainwater collected in big cisterns serves the purpose. A high and broad wall with many towers and battlements surrounds the town.[3] A ditch, dry but deep, broad, and made impassable by thorn hedges, surrounds the walls on three sides; on the fourth side is the river.

---

[1] [marginal note] Farmers' jobs.

[2] [marginal note] A notable way of hatching eggs.

[3] [marginal note] Uses of the horse.

[4] [marginal note] Uses of oxen.

[5] Utopians … bread Rather than for making ale or beer.

[6] [marginal note] Food and drink.

[7] [marginal note] Planned planting.

[8] [marginal note] The value of collective labor.

[9] [marginal note] Description of Amaurote, first city of Utopia.

[10] Anyder Without water, from the Greek anydros, meaning "waterless."

[11] [marginal note] The river Anyder.

[12] [marginal note] Just like the Thames in England.

The streets are well laid out both for traffic and to avoid the winds.[4] The houses, which are in no way shabby, are set together in long continuous rows facing one another, with twenty-foot wide streets in between.[5] Behind the houses, along the whole length of each street, lies a broad garden enclosed on all sides.[6] Every house has not only a door onto the street but also a back door into the garden. Folding doors, opening easily by hand and closing automatically, give admission to anyone, so that nothing at all is private.[7] Indeed, every ten years citizens exchange their houses by lot. Utopians are very fond of their gardens. These have vines, fruits, herbs, and flowers, so well kept and flourishing that I had never seen anything so fruitful or elegant. They take great pleasure in the gardens themselves but also in keen competition among streets as to which block will have the best ones. Certainly you cannot find anything in the whole city more profitable and enjoyable to the citizens, and there was nothing that the first founder cared more for than these gardens.[8]

They say that Utopus himself first laid out the whole city but left its adornment and improvement to future generations, knowing that there was too much to be done in one lifetime. According to their chronicles (which cover 1,760 years of history and are most carefully preserved), their first houses were low, mere hovels and cabins with mud walls and thatched roofs. But now all the houses are handsome, with three stories and walls faced by flint, plaster, or brick. The roofs are flat and covered with a cement that is inexpensive yet so well mixed that it is fire-resistant and better than lead in resisting the violence of storms. Utopians keep the wind out of their windows by glass, which is in very common use, or sometimes by thin cloth smeared with translucent oil or amber. This has two advantages: more light is let in, and the winds are better kept out.[9]

Chapter 3
The System of Local Government

Each year every thirty families choose a representative whom in their old language they had called a "Syphogrant"[10] but now call a "Phylarch."[11] Over every ten Syphogrants with their families is set a Tranibor,[12] or chief Phylarch. Then the whole body of two hundred Syphogrants, having sworn to pick the one best qualified for the position, chooses by secret ballot a chief executive from four candidates nominated by the citizens[13] in each quarter of the city.

The chief governor holds office for life unless suspected of trying to make himself a dictator.[14] The Tranibors are elected annually and are not changed without good reason, but other administrators hold office for one year. The Tranibors consult the governor every other day, more often if need be. They discuss the affairs of the commonwealth, and if there are disputes between private persons—which happen rarely—they settle them quickly.[1] Each day the Tranibors invite two different Syphogrants into the chamber. Nothing concerning the commonwealth may be ratified unless it has been discussed by the Senate on three different days,[2] and talking about public affairs outside the Senate or the electoral body is a capital offence. These rules, Utopians say, make it harder for governor and Tranibors to plot a tyranny and change the nature of the commonwealth. And so important matters are referred to the assembly of Syphogrants, who after informing their families confer and then report their decision to the Senate. Sometimes the matter is laid before the council of the whole island. By custom, the Senate postpones debate on a new matter until the next day, so that no one will blurt out what first comes into his mind and then put all his effort into defending what he had said rather than into thinking of the commonweal, willing to sacrifice the public good if he might save his reputation from seeming to have had so little foresight. He should have taken care at the outset to speak with wisdom rather than in haste.[3]

---

[1] [marginal note] Here too London is just like Amaurote.

[2] [marginal note] A source of drinking water.

[3] [marginal note] City walls.

[4] [marginal note] Streets, of what sort.

[5] [marginal note] Buildings.

[6] [marginal note] Gardens next to the houses.

[7] [marginal note] This smacks of Plato's community.

[8] [marginal note] Virgil also wrote in praise of gardens. [See Georgics, 4.16–48.]

[9] [marginal note] Windows of glass or oiled linen.

[10] Syphogrant Wiseman, from the Greek sophos (wise) and gerontes (old men).

[11] [marginal note] In the Utopian tongue "tranibor" means "chief official."

[12] Tranibor Plain-glutton, from the Greek tranos (plain, clear) and boros (devouring, gluttonous).

[13] [marginal note] A notable way of electing officials.

[14] [marginal note] Tyranny hateful to the well-ordered commonwealth.

Chapter 4
Crafts and Occupations

Agriculture is the one pursuit common to all, both men and women, without exception.[4] Everyone is trained in it from early years, partly in school and partly by being taken for an outing to the nearby farmland, where students don't just watch but get their exercise by lending a hand.

Besides agriculture, which as I said is common to all, each person is taught some craft, generally wool working, preparing linen, masonry, carpentry, blacksmith's work, or silk weaving.[5] No other pursuit occupies very many people.[6] Each family makes its own clothes, which are in the same style throughout the island except for distinctions between the sexes and between the married and the single.[7] The garments please the eye, allow the body to move easily, and suit both summer and winter. Everyone, man and woman alike, learns one of these crafts.[8] But women, the weaker sex, take on the lighter tasks, generally working with wool and linen, while the men do the heavy labor. As a rule, a son is brought up in his father's craft, for which he usually has a natural inclination, but anyone attracted to another sort of work is adopted by a family pursuing it.[9] Parents and officials strive to ensure that such a child joins a serious and honest household. Moreover, those already expert in one craft who want to learn a second may do so; having acquired both, they practice whichever they please unless the city has more need of one than the other.

The chief and almost only function of the Syphogrants is to see that no one sits idle but pursues a craft zealously.[10] No one, however, is wearied like a beast of burden by constant toil from early morning till late at night, a wretchedness worse than slavery. Outside Utopia, that is the usual lot of laborers.[11] Utopians divide the day and night into twenty-four equal hours, assigning only six to labor. People work for three hours before noon, after which they go to dinner. After resting for two hours, they do three more and then go to supper.[12] At about 8 p.m. they go to bed and sleep for eight hours. Each person decides how to pass the leisure hours, so long as he does not fritter them away in sloth and roistering but pursues some interest to which he is inclined. Many devote these breaks to literature and learning.[1] For their custom is to hold daily public lectures in the early morning, and although only those specially chosen to devote themselves to learning have to attend, a great number of men and women from every line of work go to hear whichever lecture appeals to them. They do not blame those many who prefer spending time on their craft rather than on intellectual matters, and in fact commend them as useful citizens. After supper they spend one hour in recreation, in summer in the gardens and in winter in the common halls where they have their meals.[2] There they either practice music or entertain themselves with conversation. They know nothing of throwing the dice and other such stupid and hurtful pursuits.[3] They do play two games not unlike chess—one a battle of numbers in which one number takes another, the other a game in which vices fight a pitched battle with virtues.[4] The game cleverly shows the strife among the vices and their concerted opposition to the virtues. It shows which vices oppose which virtues; by what means they attack openly, and by what contrivances they do so indirectly; by what reinforcement the virtues break the power of the vices and by what arts they frustrate their designs; and, finally, by what means one side gains the victory.[5]

---

[1] [marginal note] A quick ending to disputes, which now are endlessly and deliberately prolonged.

[2] [marginal note] No abrupt decisions.

[3] [marginal note] This is the old saying, "Do your thinking overnight."

[4] [marginal note] Agriculture is everyone's business, though now we put it off on a despised few.

[5] Besides ... weaving In contrast to Plato's conception of an ideal republic, in which order would be maintained only if each individual had only one task.

[6] [marginal note] Trades taught to satisfy need, not greed.

[7] [marginal note] A uniform dress code.

[8] [marginal note] No citizen without a trade.

[9] [marginal note] Everyone to learn the trade for which his nature fits him.

[10] [marginal note] The idle are expelled from society.

[11] Outside ... laborers In England at that time, laborers worked from sunrise to sunset.

[12] [marginal note] Workmen not to be overtasked.

But here, lest you misunderstand, there is one matter to which we should return. Since Utopians spend only six hours working, you might think that some scarcity of goods must follow. But this is far from the case: the time is more than ample to supply a wealth of necessities, even of conveniences. You must bear in mind that a large part of the population in other countries does not work.[6] First, almost no women (half of the population) do so, and where the women are busy, almost as a rule, the men are snoring. Second, there is the great and idle company of secular priests and the so-called "religious" clergy. Add to them the rich, and especially the landowners commonly called gentlemen and noblemen. Now add their retainers—I mean that rabble of good-for-nothing swaggering bullies.[7] Finally, add those beggars who are perfectly able to work but who fake some disease as an excuse for laziness, and you will certainly find that those who produce everything that people need for daily use are fewer by far than you had supposed.[8] Now, of those who do work calculate how few ply essential trades. In a society that makes money the standard of everything, inevitably many crafts are vain and superfluous, serving luxury and extravagance. If the number of those who now work were assigned to only those few crafts supplying the needs and conveniences that Nature demands, there would be such a flood of goods that prices would fall drastically and many would lose their jobs. But if all those now busied with unneeded labor, together with all the lazy and idle crowd (each one of whom now consumes as much of the fruits of other men's efforts as any two laborers), were made to do something useful, you would easily see how little time it would take to produce all that is required by necessity, comfort, or even pleasure.

The experience of Utopia makes all this clear. In any city and its immediate neighborhood, exemption from work is granted to no more than five hundred of those men and women whose age and strength makes them fit for toil. The Syphogrants, though released by law from work, take no advantage of this privilege, so that by their example they may inspire others to labor.[9] Others, on the recommendation of priests and by a secret vote of the Syphogrants are granted permanent freedom from labor so that they might devote themselves to study, although anyone who disappoints the hopes placed in him must become a laborer once more. On the other hand, it often happens that someone so industriously devotes his spare hours to learning and makes such progress that he is relieved of manual labor and promoted to the scholarly order. It is out of this group that

---

[1] [marginal note] The study of letters.

[2] [marginal note] Diversion after supper.

[3] [marginal note] But now gambling is the sport of kings.

[4] vices fight ... virtues In More's England the most familiar vices were the seven deadly sins (pride, envy, wrath, sloth, greed, gluttony, and lust) and their opposite virtues (the biblical trio faith, hope, and charity, together with the Aristotelian prudence, temperance, fortitude, and justice); in still pagan Utopia, the virtues are more likely to be those of Aristotle, and their opposing vices the many mentioned by Roman moral philosophers. Moralized chess was found also in Europe. Numbers were on European minds, for the Arabic numerals were still new to many places.

[5] [marginal note] Their games are useful too.

[6] [marginal note] Kinds of idlers.

[7] [marginal note] Noblemen's bodyguards.

[8] [marginal note] A very shrewd observation.

[9] [marginal note] Not even officials dodge work.

Utopians choose ambassadors, priests, Tranibors, and finally the governor himself,[1] whom in their ancient tongue was the "Barzanes," but who is now called the "Ademos."[2]

Because the rest of the people are neither idling nor busied with useless occupations, it is easy to reckon what good work can be accomplished in a few hours. In addition to what I have mentioned, there is the further convenience that most of the necessary crafts do not require as much work as they do in other nations.[3] Take, for example, the building or repair of houses. In most places, this requires the constant labor of a great many men simply because what a father builds his extravagant heir lets decay. Consequently, what might have been kept up at small cost must now be rebuilt at great expense. Even if a house has cost one man a large sum, another man is so fastidious that he thinks little of it, lets it crumble, and then builds another elsewhere at no less cost. But in the Utopians' well-ordered and well-regulated commonwealth, people seldom find new sites for new houses. Not only do they quickly remedy present defects, they also prevent future damages. So with little labor, houses last a long time and masons and carpenters sometimes have scarcely anything to do, although they are told to prepare timber at home and use the time gained to square stone, so that if any work is required they can do it quickly.

As for clothing, see again how little labor is required.[4] While Utopians are at work they dress casually in hide or skins that last for seven years. When they go outdoors they put on a cloak to hide their working clothes; all over the island, this garment has the same natural color. Thus they need much less woolen cloth than is required elsewhere and what they have is less expensive; such cloth is made with less labor, and less of it is consumed. For linen cloth, they care only that it be clean and white; they don't worry about the fineness of thread. So whereas elsewhere one man is not satisfied with four or five woolen gowns of different colors and as many silk coats (and for the more demanding not even ten is enough), in Utopia a man is content with one coat, generally for two years. There is no reason to desire more, for more would not better fortify him against the cold or make him appear better dressed.

With everyone devoted to useful work and satisfied with few goods, sometimes when there is a superabundance of supplies, a great number of citizens are set to fixing roads that are in bad shape. Or, if there is nothing of that kind that needs doing, the officials announce that there will be fewer hours of work. For they do not keep the citizens against their will at unnecessary labor. The constitution of the commonwealth has one objective: that so far as public needs permit, as much time as possible should be taken from serving the body and devoted to the freedom and cultivation of the mind. In that, they believe, consists the happiness of life.

CHAPTER 5
THEIR DEALINGS WITH ONE ANOTHER

Now I should explain the relations of the citizens one to another, how they treat each other, and how they distribute goods.

Because a city consists of families, the households for the most part consist of those related by blood, although women, when they arrive at maturity and get married, go live in their husbands' houses. Male children and the next generation remain in the family and answer to the oldest parent, unless his mind has become unfit from age, in which case the next oldest is put in his place. Lest any city either be depopulated or grow beyond measure, though, no family of the six thousand that each city (apart from the surrounding district) contains may have fewer than ten or more than sixteen adults.[5] No number can be fixed for underage children. This rule is easily observed by transferring some members of overly large families to those that have too few. If the whole number of citizens surpasses the fixed limit, then they make up any deficient population of other cities. But if the whole island becomes overpopulated they select citizens from each city to go to the mainland nearest them and found a colony wherever the inhabitants have unoccupied and unused land. There they live under their own laws, letting the natives who wish to do so join them. When the two groups do blend, the two peoples easily grow into the same way of life and manners, to the great advantage of both. Using Utopian methods, they make the land sufficient for both groups whereas it had once seemed barely adequate for one. If the natives refuse to live according to Utopian laws, the settlers drive them out of the territory that they have claimed. If such natives resist, they fight them, for they think it a most just cause for war whenever a people does not use its soil but keeps it vacant and even forbid others, whose natural right it is to be nourished by it, to use and possess it. If an accident diminishes the citizenry of any Utopian city so badly that the loss cannot be made up by people from other parts of the island without bringing their cities, too, below their proper strength (this has happened only once in all the ages, when a fierce plague raged), they bring back settlers from the colony. They would rather lose colonies than let any of the island's cities weaken.

---

[1] [marginal note] Only the learned hold public office.

[2] Barzanes Probably from the Hebrew bar (son of) and Zanos (of Zeus); Ademos "Peopleless," from the Greek a (without) and demos (people).

[3] [marginal note] Avoiding expense in building.

[4] [marginal note] Avoiding expense in clothing.

[5] [marginal note] The number of citizens.

To return to the family life of the citizens: the oldest, as I said, rules the family. Wives serve their husbands, children their parents, and generally the younger minister to their elders.[1] Every city is divided into four quarters. In the middle of each quarter is a market for all kinds of goods. There the products of each family are conveyed and each kind is put in separate storehouses. From these, any father of a family takes what he and his family require; and without money or any kind of payment he carries it off. Why should anything be refused? All things are plentiful, and there is no fear that anyone will demand more than he needs. Why should he, when he knows he will never lack anything?[2] In all creatures, only fear of want causes greed; only in human beings does pride lead some to think it glorious to excel in displays of excess. This vice can have no place among Utopians.

Next to the marketplaces I have mentioned are provision markets to which are brought, from sites outside the city where running water washes away all disease and filth,[3] vegetables, fruit, and bread, as well as fish and all edible beasts and birds. In those outer areas, slaves clean the animal carcasses, for Utopians do not allow free citizens to accustom themselves to butchering animals, thinking that such a practice erodes mercy, the finest quality of our nature.[4] Nor do they allow inside the city anything dirty or unclean lest the air be tainted by putrefaction and spread disease.

Every street has spacious halls at equal distance from one another and with special names. In these live the Syphogrants, to each of whom are appointed thirty families, fifteen on either side, with whom to share meals. The caterers of each hall meet at a fixed time in the market and get enough food for the appropriate number of people.

Special care is taken of the sick, who are looked after in one of the four public hospitals that are spaced out at the edges of town, a little outside the walls.[5] These are so roomy that they seem like small towns;[6] the purpose is to prevent the sick, however numerous, from being packed close in discomfort, and also to isolate the contagious and thus prevent their passing on their maladies to others. These hospitals are so well furnished and equipped with everything conducive to health, and the expert attending physicians provide such delicate and careful treatment, that although no one is sent there involuntarily there is hardly anybody in the whole city who, when ill, does not prefer to be cared for there rather than at home.

When the hospital caterer has received the food prescribed by the physicians, the rest is equally distributed among the halls according to the number in each, except that special consideration is given to the Governor, the Bishop, the Tranibors, and to ambassadors and foreigners, if any. Foreigners seldom visit, but when they do, they have special housing.

A trumpet blast summons the whole Syphogranty to assemble in these halls at the fixed hours for dinner and supper, except for those who are in hospital or who take their meals at their own houses.[7] No one is forbidden to bring extra food from the market to his house after the halls have been served. Utopians know that this is never done without good reason,[1] for while no one is forbidden to dine at home, no one does so willingly—it is seen as inappropriate. It seems foolish to bother preparing an inferior dinner when a rich and sumptuous one is all ready in a nearby hall. In the hall slaves perform all tasks that demand heavy work and soil the hands. The women, from each family by turns, cook and serve the food and arrange the whole meal.[2] They sit down at three or more tables according to the number of the company, the men with their backs to the wall and the women on the outside, so that if they feel any sudden sickness or pangs, as often happens during pregnancy, they may easily rise and go see the nurses without disturbing others.

---

[1] [marginal note] Thus they eliminate crowds of idle servants.

[2] [marginal note] The sources of greed.

[3] [marginal note] Filth and garbage spread disease in cities.

[4] [marginal note] By butchering beasts we learn to slaughter men.

[5] [marginal note] Caring for the sick.

[6] These … towns England at this time had a number of hospitals, but none on this scale.

[7] [marginal note] Meals in common, mixing all groups.

The nurses sit apart with the infants in a special room supplied with a fire, clean water, and cradles, so that when they wish they can lay the infants down or take them by the fire and let them play. Each woman nurses her own child unless prevented by death or disease. When that happens, the wives of the Syphogrants quickly provide a nurse and find no difficulty in doing so.[3] Those who can do the service offer themselves with the greatest readiness, since everyone values this kind of charity and the child sees his nurse as his natural mother. In the nurses' quarters are all the children up to five years old;[4] all the others below the age of marriage either wait on their elders or, if not old and strong enough, stand by in absolute silence. Both groups of children eat what is handed to them from the table and have no other separate mealtimes.

The Syphogrant and his wife sit in the middle of the high table, the place of honor, from which they can view the whole company, their table standing crosswise at the end of the room. Alongside sit two of the elderly, for there are always four at a table. If there is a temple in the Syphogranty, the priest and his wife sit with the Syphogrant and preside.[5] On both sides of them sit the younger and next to them, old men again, and so it is throughout the house that those of the same age sit together, and yet still associate with those of a different age.[6] The reason, they say, is to let the grave and reverend behavior of the senior restrain the junior from mischievous words and gestures, since nothing can be done or said at the table that escapes the notice of older neighbors.

The courses are not served in order from the top place down; rather, old men, seated in specially marked places, are served first, with the best food, and then equal portions go to the rest.[7] But the senior, at their discretion, give a share of their delicacies to their neighbors if there are not enough of these for everyone. Thus due respect is paid to age and yet equality is honored. Every meal starts with some reading conducive to morality but brief enough not to become boring.[8] Next the elders introduce good topics of conversation, not too serious or devoid of wit.[9] But they do not take up the whole dinner with long speeches, for they enjoy hearing the young men too, and indeed, try to draw them out, testing the ability and talent that are revealed in the freedom of conversation. Their dinners are somewhat short, their suppers more prolonged, because the first are followed by labor, the latter by sleep and rest, which they think more effective for wholesome digestion.[10] No supper passes without music, nor does any meal lack dessert.[11] They burn spices, and scatter perfumes, and omit nothing that might cheer the company; for they enjoy such things, and regard no pleasure as illicit that does no harm.[12]

Life in the city is communal, but in the country those who live far from others take their meals in their own homes. No family lacks any kind of food, however, for whatever the city-dwellers eat comes from the country.

---

[1] [marginal note] Note how freedom is granted everywhere, lest people act under compulsion.

[2] [marginal note] Women prepare the meals.

[3] [marginal note] Honor and praise incite people to act properly.

[4] [marginal note] Raising the young.

[5] [marginal note] Priest before prince. But now even bishops act as servants to royalty.

[6] [marginal note] Young mixed with old.

[7] [marginal note] Respect for the elderly.

[8] [marginal note] Not even monks do this now.

[9] [marginal note] Table talk.

[10] [marginal note] Modern doctors think ill of this practice.

[11] [marginal note] Music at mealtimes.

[12] [marginal note] Innocent pleasures are not to be rejected.

CHAPTER 6
TRAVELING

Those struck with a desire to visit friends in another city or to see the country may easily get leave from their Syphogrants and Tranibors unless there is good reason against it. Right away a party is formed and departs, bearing a letter from the Governor certifying their permission to travel and naming the day of their return. They are given a wagon with a community slave to drive it and to tend to the oxen, but unless they have women with them they leave the carriage behind as a burden and hindrance.

Throughout their journey, although carrying nothing with them, they lack for nothing, being at home everywhere. If they stay longer than a day in any one place, each plies his trade and finds warm hospitality among his brethren of the same craft. Anyone caught outside his territory's limits without a certificate, however, is scorned as a runaway and punished severely; should he rashly repeat the offence he is made a slave. If anyone wants to explore the country around his own city, though, he may do so if he gets his father's leave and his wife's consent. Wherever he goes, however, he is given no food until he completes a morning's worth of work, or so much work as is usually performed between dinner and supper. If he fulfills his responsibility, he may go where he please within the city's territorial limits, for he will be just as useful to it there as if he were in town. So you can see that there is no way of evading work and no pretext for idleness: no wine shop, no ale house, no brothel, no occasion for depravity, no lurking holes, no secret meetings.[1] Everything is open to everyone, and everyone is bound either to do the usual work or to take lawful and not indecent recreation.

A people following such customs inevitably produce an ample store of everything. And because it is distributed evenly to everyone, nobody is forced into poverty or beggary.[2] The Senate of Amaurote, to which as I have said every city annually sends three members, determines what goods abound in one place or are lacking in another, then fills the shortage in one place with the overflow from another. There is no payment, no taking of anything from those to whom is given, and those who have given freely from their surplus to one city can in turn get what they need from another, thus the whole island is like a single family.[3]

When the Utopians have laid up enough for themselves (figuring that it should last for two years in case of crop failure), then they export to other countries a great deal of grain, honey, wool, linen, wood, scarlet and purple dye, fleeces, wax, tallow,[4] leather, and surplus livestock. They give one-seventh of these goods to the poor of that region and sell the rest at a moderate price.[5] By this exchange they import not only whatever they lack themselves—and practically everything is found in Utopia except iron—but also a great deal of silver and gold. The custom has stood so long that now they have everywhere plenty of these things—more than one would believe—so they care little whether they are paid immediately or later, and usually have much owed to them.

Whenever they are not paid at once, they do not trust the credit of individuals but rather that of a city, as a rule requiring signed promises.[6] When the day for payment arrives, the city collects the money owed by private debtors, puts it into the treasury, and enjoys the use of it until the Utopians claim payment.[7] But for the most part they do not demand repayment, thinking it unfair to take away something useful to others when they do not require it themselves. If other people do need it, however, they call in their debts so as to make a new loan. They do the same whenever a war impends, for war is the only reason for keeping treasure at home and thus available for use in extreme peril or a sudden emergency.[8] They primarily use such treasure to pay extravagant sums to foreign mercenaries, whom they would rather hazard than their own citizens, knowing that with such huge cash reserves even their enemies might be purchased and set to fight one another by deceit or open warfare. For this reason they keep a vast treasure, but not as treasure. I almost blush to say how they keep it, lest I be disbelieved. Had I not been there and witnessed it, I would have difficulty crediting it myself,[1] for in general the more alien something is to the manners and ways of those who hear, the farther it is from what they can believe. An impartial judge, though, knowing that their other customs are so unlike our own, will not be surprised that their treatment of gold and silver suits their way of life, not ours. And, again, they do not use money themselves but keep it for emergencies that may or may not come.

---

[1] [marginal note] O sacred society, worthy of imitation, especially by Christians!

[2] [marginal note] Equality for all results in enough for each.

[3] [marginal note] The commonwealth is nothing but a kind of extended family.

[4] tallow Animal fat used in soap and candle production.

[5] [marginal note] Utopian business dealings.

[6] [marginal note] Never do they fail to be mindful of the community.

[7] [marginal note] How money can be useful.

[8] [marginal note] Better to avoid war by bribery or guile than to wage it with great bloodshed.

In the meantime, gold and silver, of which money is made, are treated so that no one values them more than they merit by their nature. Anyone can see that gold and silver are less useful than iron, for iron is as vital to human life, by Heaven, as are fire and water. Nature gave gold and silver no utility—it is only our folly that makes them seem precious.[2] Rather, like a kind and indulgent parent, she exposed to our sight all that is best, such as air, water, and earth itself, and has hidden away as far as possible all vain and unprofitable things.

Now if in Utopia these metals were kept locked up in a tower, it might be suspected—for such is the foolish imagination of the common people—that the Governor and the Council were craftily deceiving the public and profiting at its expense. Moreover, Utopians know that if they turned the metal into drinking cups or other objects of skilful handiwork, then, if they needed to melt them down again so as to hire soldiers, people would be unwilling to lose what they had begun to treasure. To avoid these dangers, they have devised a method that fits their own culture but would seem incredible to anyone who had not been there, so much do we value gold and so careful are we to hoard it. They themselves eat and drink from earthenware and glass of fine workmanship if of little value. But to make chamberpots and other indecent containers for both public halls and private houses they use gold and silver.[3] They use the same metals for their slaves' chains, and they make those who are to be publicly shamed for some offence wear gold earrings, finger rings, necklaces, and coronets. Thus by every means in their power they turn gold and silver into marks of disgrace.[4] Some nations take the loss of these same metals harder than they would a disemboweling, but in Utopia, if all gold and silver were taken in a single crisis, no one would feel that he had lost as much as a penny.

Utopians do gather pearls by the seashore, and value certain stones such as diamonds and garnets, but they do not go searching for them. When they chance upon them, they polish them up and give them to children, who when they are little take delight and pride in such ornaments.[5] After they grow up, however, and see that only children value these toys, they lay them aside, not thanks to orders from their parents but through their own sense of adult self-respect, just as our young, when they grow up, lay aside their marbles, rattles, and dolls.

Different customs, different attitudes.[6] This struck me forcibly during a visit by the Anemolian[7] ambassadors, who came to Amaurote during my stay there. In their honor, the city had assembled ahead of time three representatives of each city in the island. Now, the ambassadors of nearby nations, who had already visited Utopia and knew its customs, were well aware that Utopians have no respect for costly clothes, look with contempt on silk, and regard gold as a badge of disgrace, so they usually arrived in the simplest possible dress. But the Anemolians lived farther off and had had fewer dealings with Utopians. Knowing that in Utopia all dressed alike and with equal simplicity, they had assumed that Utopians must not have what they do not wear, and so, being more proud than wise, they had planned to play the gods by the fineness of their clothing and thus dazzle the eyes of the poor natives. And so the three ambassadors made a grand entry with an entourage of a hundred followers, all in multicolored clothes, mostly of silk. The ambassadors themselves, who were noblemen at home, were splendid in cloth of gold, with big chains of gold and gold earrings, with gold rings on their fingers, and with strings of pearls and precious stones upon their caps—in short, decked out with the very things that in Utopia are used to punish slaves, stigmatize evildoers, or amuse children. And so it was a sight to see how they strutted when they compared their grand clothing with the dress of the Utopians, who had poured into the streets to see them pass. It was no less amusing to notice how mistaken they were in their overconfidence and how far from winning the admiration they had expected. For the Utopians, with the exception of those very few who had visited other countries, found all this gaudy show disgraceful. So they bowed to the lowest of the party but ignored the ambassadors and paid them no deference, thinking them slaves because of their gold. Indeed, you might have seen those children who had discarded pearls and precious stones nudge their mothers at the sight of such things on the caps of the ambassadors and say, "Look at that big idiot, Mother, still wearing pearls and gems like a kid."[1] The mothers in all seriousness would answer, "Hush, son, I think he's one of the ambassadors' jesters." Others called the gold chains useless: so slender that a slave could easily break them, or so loose that he could slip them off and escape. For a couple of days the ambassadors watched as their stupendous show of gold was slighted—indeed, disregarded to the same degree that they had hoped for honor. Then they observed that there was more gold and silver in the chains and fetters of a single runaway slave than in all of their finery put together. Crestfallen and ashamed, all the more so as they became more familiar with the Utopians and their ways, they put away all the finery with which they had made themselves so conspicuous.

---

[1] [marginal note] O crafty fellow!

[2] [marginal note] As far as utility goes, gold is inferior to iron.

[3] [marginal note] O magnificent scorn for gold!

[4] [marginal note] Gold the mark of infamy.

[5] [marginal note] Gems the playthings of children.

[6] [marginal note] A neat tale.

[7] Anemolian Windy; from the Greek anemolios.

The Utopians wonder how any mortal can take pleasure in the uncertain sparkle of a tiny gem or shiny pebble stone when he can look at a star or at the sun itself.[2] They wonder how anyone can be lunatic enough to think himself grander than others because he wears wool of a thinner thread: however finely spun it is, a sheep once wore it and the sheep is still just a sheep. They wonder, too, that gold, in its own nature so useless, is now everywhere valued so highly that humanity itself, by whom and for whose use it got its value, is priced far below gold. They cannot comprehend that a leaden-head who has no more wit than a post and is no less wicked than foolish can keep in bondage many wise and good men merely because he has a great heap of gold coins.[3] Yet if this dolt, by chance or legal chicanery, loses that gold to the lowest rascal of the household (for the law can reverse the high and low as arbitrarily as can fortune), he will surely become a slave of his former servant, as if he had been a mere appendage or adjunct of the money. Much more are they aghast at the madness of those who almost worship the rich even though neither owing them anything nor being in any fashion beholden to them and impressed only by their wealth.[4] This especially surprises the Utopians, for they know that these men are so mean and miserly that probably of all that pile of cash, so long as the rich men live, not a penny will ever come their way. These and similar opinions they have derived partly from their upbringing in a commonwealth with institutions free from such folly and partly from reading books.

Only a few in each city are relieved from other work so as to devote themselves exclusively to study: those who have shown from childhood talent, high intelligence, and a fine disposition. Nevertheless, all children are trained in good letters, and many people, men and women alike, throughout their lives spend those hours that I said were free from manual labor on learning. They study the various branches of knowledge in their own language, for it is rich in vocabulary, pleasing to the ear, and well adapted for expressing thought.[5] Much of that part of the world has the same language, though sometimes in a variety of corrupted forms.

Philosophers whose names are famous to us were unknown to Utopians before our arrival, yet in music, dialectic, arithmetic and geometry they have made almost the same discoveries as our forebears.[6] Just as they equal the ancients in almost all respects, however, so they fall far short of our inventive modern logicians,[1] for they have not discovered a single one of those ingeniously derived rules about restrictions, amplifications, and suppositions that our children learn in the Parva Logicalia.[2] They are so far from being able to find out second intentions,[3] that not one of them was able to catch sight of "Humanity" in the abstract, even after we pointed at him with our fingers, though "Humanity" is, as you know, a Colossus greater than any giant. But they are most expert in the paths of the stars and the movements of the celestial bodies.[4] Furthermore, they have cleverly devised instruments of different shapes by which they have most exactly understood the movements and positions of the sun and moon and the other stars they see in the sky. But of the agreements and discords of the planets, and of all deceitful divination by the stars, they do not even dream.[5] They forecast rain, wind and changes in the weather by certain signs that they have learned to recognize after long practice. As for the causes of all these things, however, or on the flow of the sea and its saltiness, or in sum on the origin and nature of the heavens and the universe, they sometimes agree with our ancient natural philosophers or, like our own experts, sometimes introduce new theories that disagree with all earlier ones—nor do they always agree with each other.[6]

---

[1] [marginal note] The rascal!

[2] [marginal note] "Weak" because the gems are false, or the glitter is feeble and scanty.

[3] [marginal note] How true and how apt!

[4] [marginal note] How much wiser are the Utopians than the common sort of Christians.

[5] [marginal note] Training and studies of the Utopians.

[6] [marginal note] Music, dialectic, and mathematics.

As for moral philosophy, they discuss the same topics that we do.[7] They inquire into the goods of the soul, goods of the body, and external goods.[8] They also wonder whether the name of "good" may be rightly applied to all three or belongs only to the endowments of the soul.[9] They discuss virtue and pleasure, but chiefly they discuss in what thing—or things—happiness consists.[10] In this matter they seem to lean more than they should to the school that defends pleasure, since they believe it to be the whole or at least chief cause of human happiness.[11] More astonishing, they try to defend this soft philosophy with principles taken from their religion, which is grave and strict, even stern and rigid.[12] They never discuss happiness without joining some principles derived from religion to reasoning drawn from philosophy.[13] Without these principles, they think, reason is too weak and insufficient to investigate true happiness.

These principles are that the soul is immortal, that thanks to God's goodness it is born to be happy, and that after this life our virtues and good deeds are rewarded and our crimes punished.[14] Although these principles are matters of faith, Utopians think that reason leads us to believe and acknowledge them.[15] If they were set aside, they hasten to add, nobody would be so stupid as not to seek pleasure by means fair or foul. He should take care only to stop a lesser pleasure from interfering with a greater one, or to avoid pleasure that leads to pain.[16] For to seek a hard and painful virtue, and not only drive away all enjoyment but voluntarily to suffer pain that without later profit—for what profit can there be if after death you get nothing for having spent your whole life unpleasantly, even wretchedly?—this they hold to be utter nonsense. But as it is, the Utopians think happiness rests not in all kinds of pleasure, but rather in those that are good and honorable. To these, as to the supreme good, our nature is drawn by virtue itself (to which alone the opposite school of philosophy attributes happiness).[1]

---

[1] [marginal note] The passage seems a bit satiric.

[2] Parva Logicalia Latin: Little Logical Works. Texts with this or similar titles were made by Medieval Nominalist philosophers, for whom Renaissance humanists had little liking, although they still studied them. Hence More's allusion to "good letters"—to some extent what we call "literature" and a contrast to the late medieval stress on logic.

[3] second intentions "First intentions" are the direct apprehensions of material objects; "second intentions" are abstract conceptions derived from generalizations upon first intentions.

[4] [marginal note] The study of the stars.

[5] [marginal note] Yet these astrologers are revered by Christians to this very day.

[6] [marginal note] Physics the most uncertain study of all.

[7] [marginal note] Ethics.

[8] [marginal note] Higher and lower goods.

[9] They also wonder … soul This first position is that of the Aristotelians; the second is held by the Stoics.

[10] [marginal note] Supreme goods.

[11] In this … happiness This reflects an Epicurean position that sensual pleasures were the only happiness available in the material world.

[12] [marginal note] The Utopians consider honest pleasure the measure of happiness.

[13] [marginal note] First principles of philosophy to be sought in religion.

[14] [marginal note] Utopian theology.

[15] [marginal note] The immortality of the soul, on which nowadays no small number even of Christians have their doubts.

[16] [marginal note] Not every pleasure is desirable, neither is pain to be sought, except for the sake of virtue.

Utopians define virtue as living according to nature, since God created us to that end.[2] Whoever obeys the dictates of reason in desiring one thing and avoiding another, they say, follows the guidance of nature. Reason, first of all, inspires us to love and venerate the Divine Majesty who gave us our lives and our capacity for happiness. Second, reason urges and admonishes us to lead lives as free from care and as full of joy as possible, and, because of our natural fellowship, to help others do likewise. No one was ever such a solemn and strict follower of virtue and hater of pleasure that however hard the labor, wakefulness, and discomfort he urged on you he would not also tell you to do your best to relieve the poverty and discomfort of others. He would tell you to think it praiseworthy, in the name of humanity, for one person to provide for another's health and comfort. Now, if it is especially humane (and this is the virtue most peculiar to humankind) to relieve the misery of others, to take away sorrow from their lives, and to restore enjoyment and pleasure, why should not nature urge us to do the same for ourselves? For if a joyous and pleasurable life is evil, then you should not only not help anyone experience joy and pleasure, you should even try to take these away from everyone else on the grounds that they are harmful and deadly.[3] On the other hand, if you feel bound to praise such a life as good for them, then you should do the same for yourself, to whom you should show no less favor than to others. When nature bids you to be good to others, she does not command you to be cruel and merciless to yourself. Nature herself, the Utopians say, calls us to a merry life, so that, in sum, pleasure is the end of all activity, and to live according to her prescriptions is virtue. But even though Nature calls us all to help each other to a merrier life (for she regards no one as raised so far above the common human lot as to be the sole object of her care), she surely bids you take constant care not to favor yourself so much that you put others at a disadvantage.

Utopians think not only that all bargains between individuals should be observed, but also that the common laws should be obeyed by everyone. Provided that they have been proclaimed by a just ruler and ratified by common consent, such laws provide just rules for the fair distribution of material goods, or, in other words, the means of pleasure.[4] So long as these laws are not broken, it is wisdom to look after your own interests and your duty to take care of the public interest as well. To deprive others of their pleasure so as to secure your own is injustice, while to take away something from yourself to give to others is a duty of humanity and kindness, which never takes away as much as it gives back. First, you are for the most part eventually compensated by a return of benefits. Second, the consciousness of having done a good deed is a benefit in itself. And receiving the love and goodwill of those whom you have benefited gives your mind a greater pleasure than the bodily pleasure you have given up.[5] Finally—this is brought home to those of a religious bent—in return for a brief and small pleasure God repays you with great and endless joy. So the Utopians, having carefully considered and weighed the matter, believe that all our actions and even our virtues have pleasure as their final purpose.

By pleasure they understand every activity or state of body or mind in which a person delights under the guidance of nature.[6] They are right to specify a person's natural inclinations.[7] The senses and right reason aim at whatever is naturally pleasant—that is, at whatever is not achieved by wrong-doing, does not involve the loss of something more pleasant, and is not followed by pain. But there are some disagreeable things that mortals unnaturally imagine by a foolish consensus to be agreeable (as though mortals could change the nature of things as easily as they do their names).[1] Not only do these things not cause any happiness, they seriously hinder it, for once rooted in the mind they possess it with a false idea of pleasure, leaving no room for true and natural delights. There are many things which by nature are not sweet—indeed, are usually very bitter—yet which through the perversity of our evil desires we regard as the greatest pleasures and even count among those things that make life most worth living. Among those who follow false pleasure the Utopians include the people I mentioned who think themselves better because they wear better clothes.[2] In this one thing such people make two mistakes, for they are just as deceived in thinking their clothes better as in thinking themselves better. If you consider clothing's use, why is fine-spun wool superior to thicker? And yet snobs think not only that the thread is better but also that some extra value thereby attaches to themselves. Dressed in finer threads, they demand a level of respect that they would never hope for if dressed in shabbier clothing. If passed by without visible respect, they get indignant.

---

[1] school ... happiness This is the Stoic view, which emphasizes morality, virtue, and duty over material pleasures.

[2] [marginal note] This is like Stoic doctrine.

[3] [marginal note] But now some people cultivate pain as if it were the essence of religion, rather than incidental to performance of a pious duty or the result of natural necessity—and thus to be borne, not pursued.

[4] [marginal note] Contracts and laws.

[5] [marginal note] Mutual assistance.

[6] [marginal note] What is pleasure?

[7] By pleasure ... inclinations The following discussion reflects both Plato's and Aristotle's praise of physical and mental pleasures and their distinctions between true pleasures (those "pleasant by nature") and false ones. See Plato's Philebus and Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics. Many of the false pleasures listed here are discussed in More's friend Erasmus's The Praise of Folly (1511).

And does it not show the same folly to think so much of empty and unprofitable honors?[3] What true and natural pleasure can the bared head or bent knees of another give you? Will this cure the pain in your own knees or relieve the madness in your own head? In this fantasized view of pleasure, men who imagine themselves noble show a strange lunacy, pride themselves on it, and applaud themselves because it has been their fortune to be born of a long succession of rich ancestors (for that is now the only nobility), rich especially in land.[4] But they think themselves not a whit less noble even if their ancestors have not left them an acre, or if they themselves have used up their inheritance through extravagant living.

The Utopians also see as chasing a false pleasure those who dote on jewels and gems, thinking themselves gods if they acquire a fine specimen.[5] They especially ridicule those who most value the most fashionable stones—for the same kinds are not always and everywhere the most highly prized.[6] Such people will not buy gems unless they can see them out of their gold settings, and even then they make the seller swear and offer some security that it is a genuine jewel, a true gem, so anxious are they lest a fake deceive their eyes. But why should a counterfeit stone give less pleasure to the eye if the eye cannot tell it from a true one? Both should be of equal value to you, even as they would be to a blind man.

What can be said of people who keep a surplus of wealth for no other use than to look at? Do they feel any real pleasure, or are they not in fact cheated by an unreal one? And what of people who have the opposite folly and hide away gold that they will never use and may never see again? In their fear of losing it, they lose it indeed—for what else is it to put it back in the ground and thus deprive themselves (and all others) of its use? And still they exult over their hidden treasure as though quite free of all anxiety. Yet suppose someone were to take it, and the miser then were to die ten years later knowing nothing of the theft. During all those ten years, what would it matter to him whether it was stolen or safe? In either case it would have been of equally little use to him.[7]

Also among those who indulge in senseless delights Utopians number those who turn to gambling, and to hunting and hawking. What true pleasure can there be, they ask, in casting dice into a box?[8] To do it so often, even if there is some pleasure in it, must eventually lead to boredom. Or what true pleasure can there be (and not disgust) in hearing the barking and howling of dogs?[9] How is it more pleasurable if a dog chases a hare than if a dog runs after a dog? The same thing happens in either case. Each has fast running, if that's what you like. Only if you are drawn by the hope of slaughter and the sight of a creature being torn apart in front of you will the former give you more pleasure than the latter. Rather, you should feel pity when you see a poor, weak, timid, and innocent hare rent in pieces by a strong, fierce, and cruel dog. That is why the Utopians have handed over the whole business of hunting, a job unworthy of free citizens, to the butchers (as I said before, they make their slaves butchers).[1] They regard hunting as the most ignoble part of the butcher's craft, and the other parts of his job as more useful and honorable. The butcher does much good and kills animals from necessity, whereas the hunter seeks nothing but pleasure from killing and mangling some poor creature. Utopians think a hunter's desire to see bloodshed either arises from a cruel disposition or creates one as the effect of constant practice in savage pleasure.

---

[1] [marginal note] False pleasures.

[2] [marginal note] Mistaken pride in fancy dress.

[3] [marginal note] Foolish titles.

[4] [marginal note] Empty nobility.

[5] [marginal note] The silliest pleasures of all: gemstones.

[6] [marginal note] Popular opinion gives gemstones their value or takes it away.

[7] [marginal note] A strange fancy, and much to the point.

[8] [marginal note] Dicing.

[9] [marginal note] Hunting.

Although these and innumerable related pursuits count as pleasures to the common crowd, Utopians hold that they have absolutely nothing to do with real pleasure, since there is nothing naturally agreeable in them. That they commonly inspire a feeling of enjoyment (which seems to be the function of pleasure) does not alter this opinion, for the enjoyment does not arise from the nature of the thing but from a perverse habit that leads people to take what is really bitter to be sweet, just as pregnant women with a distorted taste think pitch and tallow sweeter than honey.[2] And yet no person's judgment, however depraved by disease or habit, could change the true nature of pleasure any more than it could change the nature of other things.

The Utopians divide pleasures that they consider genuine into various classes, some belonging to the soul and others to the body.[3] To the soul they ascribe intelligence and the delight that comes from contemplating the truth; to these they add the pleasant recollection of a well-spent life and the confident hope of happiness to come. Bodily pleasure they divide into two categories.[4] The first is that which fills the senses with a perceptible sweetness. This may come by the renewing of those parts that have been emptied by our natural exertion and are restored by food and drink. Sometimes this agreeable sensation comes when some excess is relieved from the overloaded body, as when we move our bowels, engage in the procreative act, or relieve an itch by rubbing or scratching. But sometimes pleasure comes neither from restoring what our bodies lack nor from removing what causes discomfort, for there is a pleasure that tickles and moves us with a secret but remarkable force and attracts the senses: the pleasure engendered by music.

The second category of bodily pleasure, they say, comes from a calm and harmonious state of the body—in a word, health, uninterrupted by any disorder. This is itself delightful, even when not activated by any pleasure applied from without. Although it is less obvious and less perceptible to the senses than the coarser delights of eating and drinking, nonetheless good health is held by many to be the greatest of pleasures. Almost all Utopians so regard it, and it is practically the basis and foundation of all other pleasures, because it alone can make life peaceful and desirable; without it there is no room for any enjoyment.[5] Being without pain but also without health they consider mere dullness, not pleasure.

Utopians long ago rejected the position of those who hold that a state of tranquil and stable health (for this question, too, they have actively discussed) is not to be counted as a pleasure on the grounds that its presence cannot be felt except in contrast with its opposite.[6] Utopians now almost all agree that health is above all things conducive to pleasure. For in disease there is pain, which is pleasure's bitter enemy, just as disease is the enemy of health. So why should we not take pleasure in the complacency of health? Utopians think that it makes no difference whether you call disease pain or pain disease. Both come to the same thing. For if you believe that health is either a pleasure itself or the necessary cause of pleasure, as fire is of heat, in both cases it follows that those in good health cannot be without pleasure. Besides, they say, when we eat, what is that but health fighting against hunger with the aid of food when it was fading? While the body gradually regains strength, the process itself supplies the pleasure by which we are restored. Shall health, which delights in the struggle, not rejoice when it has gained the victory? And, when at last health has successfully found its old strength, which was its sole aim all along, shall it then become insensible and not recognize nor embrace its own good? It is quite false to say that the senses cannot perceive health, the Utopians think, for who when awake does not feel that he is in health (unless he is not)? Who is so insensible or lethargic that he does not confess health to be pleasurable and delightful? And what is delight except pleasure under another name?

---

[1] [marginal note] Yet today this is the chosen art of our court-divinities.

[2] [marginal note] Morbid tastes of pregnant women.

[3] [marginal note] Varieties of true pleasure.

[4] [marginal note] Bodily pleasures.

[5] [marginal note] To enjoy anything, one should be in good health.

[6] Utopians … opposite The position is discussed in Plato's Republic 9.583 C-E.

Above all, Utopians value the pleasures of the mind (they hold them to be the founts and heads of all), and of these the most important arise from the exercise of virtues and the consciousness of a good life.[1] Of all the bodily pleasures, they give the first place to health. Other delights—eating and drinking, and anything that gives the same kind of enjoyment—they also think desirable, but only for the sake of health. For such things are not pleasurable in themselves but only insofar as they resist the secret assaults of disease. And just as a wise man should rather try to prevent disease than seek a remedy for it, so it would be better to have this kind of pleasure than to be eased of pain. If a man thinks that happiness consists in this kind of pleasure, he must admit that the greatest happiness would be to spend his life in perpetual hunger, thirst, itching, eating, drinking, scratching and rubbing. What could be more disgusting or pathetic? These pleasures must be the lowest of all because they are the least pure, never occurring unless joined with their respective pain.[2] Thus to the pleasure of eating is joined hunger (and on no fair terms: the pain is the stronger and lasts longer, for it comes into being before the pleasure and does not end until the pleasure dies with it). Such pleasures should not be highly valued except in so far as they are necessary. Yet Utopians enjoy even these, gratefully acknowledging the kindness of Mother Nature, who with enticing sweetness coaxes her offspring into doing what by necessity they must constantly perform. In what discomfort would we live if, like the sicknesses that less frequently assail us, these daily diseases of hunger and thirst could be cured only by bitter medications?

Utopians value beauty, strength and nimbleness as special and pleasant gifts of nature. They also prize even those pleasures that enter by the ears, eyes and nose, pleasures that nature designed to be peculiarly characteristic of our species—for no other kind of living creature takes in the fairness and form of the universe, is affected by the pleasantness of smell (except in connection with food), or distinguishes concordant and discordant musical intervals. But in all these matters Utopians make this limitation: the lesser pleasure must not interfere with the greater, and pleasure must not produce pain. They think the latter inevitable if the pleasure in question is base. But to disdain physical beauty, to waste the body and turn agility into sluggishness, to starve oneself to death, to neglect health and all other favors of Mother Nature—to do any of these things for any reason other than the public good and a greater reward from God they consider extreme madness. It is a delusional pleasure to afflict oneself when this doesn't serve anyone, and self-torment does nothing to alleviate future sufferings that may never come. It is above all an offense to nature to reject her benefits so that one might owe her nothing.

This is their understanding of virtue and pleasure, and they believe that human reason can find nothing truer unless some Heaven-sent religion inspires them with something holier.[3] Whether in this they are right or wrong, time does not permit us to examine now, and in any case I have undertaken only to describe their principles, not to defend them, yet of this I am sure: whatever you think of their views, there is nowhere in the world a more excellent people nor a happier commonwealth.[4]

Utopians are active and nimble of body, and stronger than you would expect from their generally short although not minuscule stature. And though their soil is not very fertile nor is their climate very wholesome, they protect themselves by living temperately and repair the defects of the land by hard work. Thus nowhere in the world is there a better supply of grain and cattle, nor a people more vigorous of body and less subject to disease. And so you may behold in Utopia not only farming that improves poor soil by intelligence and industry, but also a whole forest uprooted in one place by human labor and replanted in another. In this they were thinking not so much of abundance as of transport, so that they might have wood closer to the sea, rivers, or the cities themselves. It takes less work to convey grain a long distance by land than it does timber.

---

[1] Above all ... life See Cicero, On Old Age 3.4: "The most suitable defenses of old age are the principles and practice of the virtues, which, if cultivated in every period of life, bring forth wonderful fruits at the close of a long and busy career."

[2] These pleasures ... pain See Plato, Gorgias 494 C.

[3] [marginal note] Note this and note it well.

[4] [marginal note] The happiness of the Utopians, and a description of them.

The people are in general easy-going, good tempered, skillful with their hands, and fond of leisure but doing their share of manual labor when occasion requires (at other times they are not fond of it). In their devotion to mental study they are unwearied. When they heard from us about Greek learning and letters (except for historians and poets, there was not much in Latin we thought they would like), they were very keen to have us teach them the language and instruct them in the literature.[1] We therefore began to give them lessons, at first more to avoid seeming reluctant to take the trouble than with expectation of success. But soon their progress and diligence showed that our efforts would not be in vain.[2] They began so easily to imitate the shapes of the letters, so readily to pronounce the words, so quickly to learn by heart, and so faithfully to reproduce what they learned, that it would have seemed a miracle, except that we knew most of them signed on not by choice but by an order of the senate, selected from among the scholars of exceptional talent and advanced years.[3] In less than three years they were perfect in the language and able to read good authors without difficulty except when the text was faulty. I imagine that they grasped Greek literature all the more easily because it is so allied to their own. Indeed, I suspect that their race is derived from the Greek, because their language, which in other respects resembles Persian, retains some traces of Greek in the names of their cities and officers.

When I was about to set out on my fourth voyage to Utopia, instead of putting on board goods to sell, I took a fairly large bundle of books, having decided not to leave any time soon, and perhaps not at all. I have given them most of Plato, almost all of Aristotle, and Theophrastus[4] on plants. This last, I regret to say got damaged during the voyage when someone left it lying around and an ape who picked it up to play with carelessly tore out several pages from different parts of the book. Of grammarians they have only Lascaris, for I did not take Gaza with me, and no lexicographer but Hesychius and Dioscorides.[5] They are very fond of Plutarch's works and delight in Lucian's[6] pleasantry and wit. Of the poets they have Aristophanes, Homer, Euripides, and Sophocles in the small Aldine editions;[7] of historians they have Thucydides, Herodotus and also Herodian.[8] As for medicine, my companion Tricius Apinatus had brought along some small treatises of Hippocrates and the Microtechne of Galen,[9] which they valued highly, for though there is scarcely any nation that needs medicine less, nowhere is it held in greater honor. For them, medical knowledge is one of the finest and most useful parts of philosophy.[10] When they practice this philosophy and search out the hidden secrets of nature, they not only enjoy it but also believe that they win the approval of the Author and Maker of all things.[1] They think that He, like all artificers, set forth the visible mechanism of the world as a spectacle for human beings, whom alone He made capable of appreciating such wonder. He therefore prefers a careful and diligent beholder and admirer of His work to one who like a brute beast passes by so great and marvelous a spectacle ignorant and unimpressed.

---

[1] [marginal note] The usefulness of the Greek tongue.

[2] [marginal note] Their wonderful aptitude for learning.

[3] [marginal note] But now clods and dullards are taught letters, while the best minds are corrupted by pleasures.

[4] Theophrastus Student of Aristotle (d. 287 BCE), whose works on botany were still current during More's time.

[5] Lascaris Constantine Lascaris (1434–1501), who wrote the first "modern" Greek grammar; Gaza Theodore of Gaza (d. 1478), a translator of Aristotle who also published a Greek grammar; Hesychius Hesychius of Alexandria (c. fifth century CE), noted for his Greek dictionary; Dioscorides Greek physician of the first century who wrote De Materia Medica, the first systematic pharmacological text outlining descriptions and uses for plants and medications.

[6] Plutarch Greek biographer (c. 45–125 CE); Lucian Greek rhetorician and satirist (c. 120–180 CE).

[7] Aristophanes Greek comedy writer (c. 448–380 BCE); Euripides Greek tragedian (c. 480–406 BCE); Sophocles Greek tragedian (c. 495–406 BCE); Aldine editions Editions published by Aldus Manutius (1449–1515), noted Italian printer.

[8] Thucydides Greek historian (c. 471–400 BCE) who wrote The History of the Peloponnesian War; Herodotus Herodotus of Halicarnassus (c. fifth century BCE), author of The Histories; Herodian Roman historian (c. 170–240 CE) noted for his History of the Empire.

[9] Tricius Apinatus Fictitious character; Hippocrates Greek physician (c. 460–377 BCE); Microtechne … Galen Treatise by Roman physician (c. 131–201 CE).

[10] [marginal note] Medicine most useful of all studies.

The Utopian mind, then, being trained in all learning, is exceedingly successful in the invention of arts that bring pleasure and convenience. Two of these, however, they owe to us: printing and the manufacture of paper. Not entirely to us, for when we showed them our Aldine editions and talked about (since none of us was an expert, I cannot say explained) the material of which paper is made and the art of printing, they promptly and accurately guessed how it was done. Though they had earlier written only on skins, bark and papyrus,[2] they now attempted to manufacture paper and print books. Their first attempts were not very successful, but through trial and error they soon mastered both, so that if they had the texts of Greek writers, they would have no lack of books. At present they have nothing more than I have mentioned, but what they have, they now have in many thousands of printed copies.

Whoever visits their country is gladly received if knowledgeable about many nations, gifted in intellect, or experienced in wide travel, for they delight in hearing what is going on in every country, which is why we were so welcome. But few merchants come there. What could they bring to trade except the same iron, or gold and silver that they would rather take back home? And as for what Utopia exports Utopians think it wiser to transport it themselves than to let others come and fetch it, so that by traveling they might acquire more information about foreign nations while also honing their navigational skills.

---

[1] [marginal note] Contemplation of nature.

[2] skins ... papyrus Writing materials made of animal skins (predominantly calf and sheep and called vellum), the outer portion of trees, and fibers of the papyrus (an Egyptian rush plant), respectively.

CHAPTER 7
SLAVERY

They do not enslave prisoners of war except those they take themselves.[3] Nor do they force the children of slaves into bondage, nor slaves whom they could get in other countries. Their slaves are either made such in their own country for heinous crimes or have been condemned to death elsewhere for some offence; most of their slaves are of this latter kind. Utopians bring away many such people from other lands, sometimes buying them cheaply or, often, just asking for them and getting them for nothing. Both sorts of slaves, foreigners and Utopians, are kept at work and in chains, but Utopians treat their own countrymen more harshly. These they regard as more deserving of exemplary punishment because despite their good education in virtuous living they could not restrain themselves from crime. There is also another sort of slave: poor laborers in other countries who voluntarily exchange their drudgery for slavery in Utopia. Except for having somewhat more work assigned to them, these are treated almost as well as are citizens. If anyone of this class of slave wishes to leave, which seldom happens, he is not detained against his will or sent away empty handed.

The sick, as I said, are very lovingly cared for; nothing is left undone that might restore them to health, whether medicine or diet.[4] Those suffering from incurable disease they console by sitting and conversing with them and by applying all possible alleviations. But if the disease brings unceasingly pain and trauma, the priests and the magistrates urge the sufferer, now unfit for all the duties of life and become a living burden to himself as well as a distress to others, to cease fostering disease and plague and be willing to die, now that living is an anguish, and so liberate himself from a life as bitter as imprisonment or torture—or let others liberate him.[5] In this the sufferer will act wisely, since death will put an end not to enjoyment but to torment, and since in so doing he will be obeying the counsels of the priests, interpreters of God's will, his death would be a pious and devout act.

---

[3] [marginal note] The wonderful fairness of these people.

[4] [marginal note] The sick.

[5] [marginal note] Deliberate death.

Those convinced by these arguments either starve themselves to death or, being put to sleep, are released without the sensation of dying. But they do not do away with anyone against his will; nor in such a case do they at all relax their care. They think a death sanctioned by authority is honorable but that anyone who kills himself without the consent of priests and Council is unworthy of fire or earth; without a proper burial, his disgraced body is tossed into a marsh.

Women may not marry before eighteen, men not until they are four years older.[1] Anyone convicted of premarital intercourse is punished severely; such people are forbidden to marry altogether unless pardoned by the governor. The father and mother in whose house such an offence was committed incur great disgrace for having been neglectful. Utopians made this severe law because they foresaw that few would join in conjugal love, spend all of life with one companion, and bear the vexations and troubles that are incident to marriage unless all were restrained from sexual promiscuity.

In choosing mates they seriously and strictly follow a custom that we thought idiotic and utterly ridiculous.[2] The woman, whether maiden or widow, is shown naked to her suitor by a worthy and respectable matron, and so too a discreet man shows her suitor naked to the woman.[3] We laughed at this custom and condemned it as foolish, but they themselves marvel at the notable folly of other nations. In buying a pony, where there is just a little money involved, people in other nations are so cautious that though the animal is practically naked they will not buy until they have taken off the saddle and removed all the harness lest they conceal some sore. Yet in choosing a wife, a choice on which hangs lifelong pleasure or disgust, the same people are so careless that while the rest of her body is covered with clothes they judge the whole woman from one handbreadth, only her face being visible, and take her to themselves even though there is a high chance that two will find each other unattractive. Not every man is so wise as to care only for the woman's character, and even wise men find good looks no small enhancement of the mind's virtues. Certainly a deformity hidden beneath these coverings may be so foul that it alienates a man's mind from his wife, bodily separation being no longer possible. If such a deformity comes by chance after the marriage contract, each must endure his own fate; but until then the law should protect him against being taken in by deceit.

This provision was all the more urgent, because the Utopians are the only people in that part of the world who are satisfied with one wife; marital bonds are seldom broken except by death, though on rare occasions a marriage may also end because of adultery or an intolerable offensiveness in the mate's disposition.[4] When either spouse is thus offended, the Council gives permission to take another mate while the rejected partner lives in disgrace and perpetual celibacy. But the Utopians think it wrong to divorce a wife because of some physical problem for which she is in no way to blame. They think it cruel to abandon anyone in need of comfort; if that sort of behavior were condoned, there would be little protection against the insecurities of age, which brings disease and is itself a disease.

But sometimes, when a married couple does not accord in dispositions and both find others with whom they hope they might live more agreeably, they part by mutual consent and contract fresh unions. This may not be done without the permission of the Council, which forbids divorce until it and the spouses have carefully reviewed the matter. Even then, it is reluctant to give consent, knowing that to feed hopes of remarriage is hardly a way to reinforce the marital bond.

Those who break that bond are punished by the strictest slavery. If both parties to an adultery were married, the injured spouses, if they so desire, may divorce their mates and marry each other or whomever they wish. If one of them still feels affection for the adulterous mate, the marriage shall continue in force if such a spouse is willing to accompany and share the labor of the one now condemned to slavery. Sometimes the penitence of the one partner and the dutiful persistence of the other move the Governor's compassion and they are freed. But those who repeat the offence risk being executed.

For other offences there is no fixed legal penalty, but in each case the Council appoints a punishment according to the seriousness of the crime.[5] Husbands chastise their wives, and parents discipline their children unless the offence is so monstrous that public punishment would serve public morality. Generally the worst offences are punished by slavery, since slavery is no less painful than death to the offender. Besides, putting criminals to work is far more advantageous to the state than slaughtering them forthwith. If they rebel and kick against this treatment, unrestrained by prison or fetter, then they are put to death like untamable beasts. If they are patient, however, they are not entirely without hope, for if, tamed by long misery, they show a penitence testifying that they are sorrier for their sin than for their punishment, then sometimes by the prerogative of the Governor and sometimes by the resolution of the people their slavery is either lightened or ended. Trying to tempt another into debauchery is as punishable as the act itself, for in all offences they count the deliberate and open attempt equal to the deed,[1] thinking that failure ought not to excuse one who wanted to succeed.

---

[1] [marginal note] Marriages.

[2] [marginal note] Not very modest, but not so impractical either.

[3] The woman … woman Plato advocates this practice in his Laws.

[4] [marginal note] Divorce.

[5] [marginal note] Degrees of punishment left to magistrates.

Utopians are very fond of fools. They think it a great disgrace to insult them, but there is no prohibition against taking delight in their fooling, for this benefits the fools themselves.[2] If anyone is too stern and morose to be amused by what fools do or say, the Utopians do not trust him to take on the care of one, fearing he might not treat the fool with enough indulgence.

To mock someone for a deformity or the loss of a limb they think shames the mocker, not the one mocked; it is stupid to find fault with something not in our power to avoid. Although they think it a sign of sluggish thick-wittedness not to try to preserve natural beauty through exercise and the like, for them it is a blameworthy presumption to pretty oneself up by putting paint on the skin.[3] Experience shows that no external loveliness recommends wives to husbands as much as do honor and integrity; though some men are won by pretty looks, only virtue and obedience make love endure.

The Utopians discourage crime not by punishment alone but also by giving honors and rewards that can incite citizens to do good deeds.[4] Thus they set up in the marketplace statues of those who have served the commonwealth well, so that their admirable acts might be remembered and their glory might inspire their descendents to virtue.

He that campaigns for votes is forbidden ever to hold any office.[5] Utopians live in mutual affection and goodwill, for no magistrate is haughty or formidable; they are called and indeed act like fathers.[6] Respect is willingly paid to them, as it should be, but it is not exacted from the unwilling. The Governor himself is not distinguished by a robe or a crown,[7] only by the handful of grain he carries, just as the high priest's mark is the wax candle borne before him.[8]

They have very few laws; a populace so well educated needs only a few.[9] The chief fault they find with other nations is that their almost numberless laws and legal commentaries are still not enough for them. They themselves think it most unfair to bind anyone by laws too many to read or too obscure to understand. Moreover, they utterly banish all lawyers, who use cleverness and cunning in handling cases and arguing legal points.[10] They think it best for everyone to plead his own cause and tell the judge the same thing he would tell an attorney. There is less ambiguity, and the truth is more readily determined, when one who has not been taught deception by a lawyer conducts his own case. The judge thoughtfully weighs each statement and helps the more naïve deal with accusations by the crafty.

It's unlikely that such practices would be adopted in other countries, with their mass of overcomplicated laws. In Utopia, everyone is an expert in the laws because, as I have said, they have very few of them and because for them a law's most obvious meaning is thought the most likely to be the most just. Since all laws are there mainly to remind citizens of their duty, they say, a refined and obscure meaning would remind only those few who could figure it out, whereas laws with a simple and obvious sense are clear to everyone. As for the common people (that is, the most numerous and most in need of instruction), what difference would there be between having no law and having one that must be interpreted by experts? Since no one can master the meaning of such laws without much instruction and extensive debate, the wits of the common folk are too untrained, and their lives not long enough—granted their need to work for a living—for them to do so.

---

[1] [marginal note] The penalty for soliciting to lewdness.

[2] [marginal note] Pleasure derived from fools.

[3] [marginal note] Artificial beauty.

[4] [marginal note] Citizens to be animated by rewards for good conduct.

[5] [marginal note] Running for office condemned.

[6] [marginal note] Magistrates held in honor.

[7] [marginal note] Dignity of the ruler.

[8] only by … him The sheaf of grain symbolizes prosperity, as the candle symbolizes vision.

[9] [marginal note] Few laws.

[10] [marginal note] The useless crowd of lawyers.

These virtues of the Utopians have moved those neighbors who are free and independent (the Utopians long ago having delivered many of them from tyrants) to borrow magistrates from them—some for a year, others for five. When their terms are up they escort them home with praise and honor and then return with their successors. Certainly such nations make very good provision for their own commonwealths; they recognize how much—prosperity or ruin—depends on the character of magistrates. How could they make a wiser choice than by choosing from those who will not leave the path of honesty for a bribe (since money will be no good to them after they return home) and who cannot be influenced either by partiality or animosity towards anyone (since everyone is a stranger to them). In every place where they hold sway over judgment, though, favoritism and greed instantly destroy the justice that is the strongest sinew of a commonwealth.

Utopians regard the peoples who fetch their magistrates from Utopia as "allies"; those they assist in any way they call "friends." They never make treaties with other nations, because the latter so often make them only to break them again.[1] What is the use of a treaty, they wonder; did Nature herself not sufficiently bind one person to another? If someone has no regard for Nature, can he really be expected to honor words? Utopians hold this opinion chiefly because in those parts of the world treaties and covenants between princes are observed with such little faith. Europeans, of course, and especially where the faith and religion of Christ prevails, everywhere consider the majesty of treaties holy and inviolable.[2] This respect arises in part from the justice and goodness of kings and in part from a reverence for and fear of popes, who not only carry out their own promises most conscientiously but also command all other rulers to keep their vows, compelling the unruly by pastoral censure and stern rebuke. They rightly think it particularly reprehensible if those who are specially called the faithful do not faithfully keep their word.

In that New World, which is almost as far removed from ours by the Equator as their character and life are unlike our own, nobody relies on treaties. For the more numerous and binding are the ceremonies with which a treaty is tied and bound in those places, the more quickly is it dissolved; people quibble over the meaning of phrases that they have sometimes cunningly devised precisely to prevent themselves from being tied so strongly that they cannot escape, thus allowing themselves to break both the treaty and their word. If such cunning, fraud, and deceit were found in the contracts of individuals, men would condemn them as sacrilegious and deserving the gallows, although the same men would proudly advise kings to use the same methods. Such men must think either that all justice is merely a low and plebeian virtue, far below the majesty of kings, or that it has at least two forms. One goes on foot, creeping on the ground, fit only for the common sort and too shackled ever to overstep its bounds; the other is the virtue of kings, both grander and less onerous than that of ordinary folk, to which everything is permitted except what it doesn't want to do anyway.

The customs of kings who observe their treaties so badly explain, I suppose, why the Utopians make none; perhaps if they lived in Europe they would change their minds. But they think that, even if alliances are faithfully observed, it is a pity to make them at all. For the result is that men think themselves born adversaries and enemies of one another (as though nations divided by a mere hill or a river were joined by no natural bond) and that they are right in aiming to destroy each other unless a treaty were there to prevent it. Yet even after a treaty is made, friendship does not follow, for the right to pillage each other remains unless it is carefully, explicitly prohibited by the wording. The Utopians, on the other hand, think that nobody who has done you no harm should count as an enemy, that the fellowship that nature creates makes a treaty unnecessary, and that men are better and more firmly joined by good will than by covenants, better allied by affection than by words.

---

[1] [marginal note] Treaties.

[2] Europeans ... inviolable Ironic; in fact, the rulers of the time, as well as the two most recent Popes (Alexander VI and Julius II), were notorious for breaking treaties.

CHAPTER 8
WARFARE

War may be brutish, but no brute is more passionate and eager for it than man. The Utopians regard it with utter loathing, and contrary to the fashion of almost all nations they count nothing so inglorious as glory won in battle. Though both men and women undergo military training on fixed days so as to be prepared, they do not go to war lightly. They will fight to protect their own territory, to drive an invading enemy out of their friends' lands, or to deliver an oppressed nation from the tyrant's yoke and bondage—a course prompted purely by human sympathy. They are willing to help their friends, not always merely to defend them but sometimes even to avenge injuries done them earlier. But they do this only if they are consulted before any step is taken, and they recommend that war should be declared only after they have approved the cause and a demand for restitution has been made in vain. This final step they are willing to take not only when a hostile force has carried out a raid but also when merchants from countries friendly with Utopia are wrongly accused under the pretence of justice in another country. Such was the origin of the war that the Utopians waged a little before our time on behalf of the Nephelogetes against the Alaopolitans.[1]

Some traders of the Nephelogetes suffered an injury, as they thought, under pretence of law, but rightly or wrongly, it was avenged by a fierce war. To this war the resources of neighboring nations were brought in to assist the power and intensify the resentment of both sides, until flourishing nations had been shaken or overthrown; the troubles were ended only by the surrender and subjection of the Alaopolitans. These yielded themselves to the rule of the Nephelogetes (for the Utopians were not fighting for their own interest), a people who had been, while the Alaopolitans were prosperous, not at all comparable to them in strength.

So you see how severely the Utopians punish wrongs done to their friends, even in money matters. But things are different when the wrongs are done to themselves. When defrauded of their goods anywhere, if there has been no violence their anger goes no farther than to suspend trade until some recompense arrives. It is not that they care less for their own citizens than for their friends, but they are more annoyed when their friends suffer financial loss than when they themselves do, for their friends' merchants, who lose their own property, suffer severely by the loss. Utopian citizens lose nothing more than some of what is held in common by all, and that must be plentiful at home, or it would not have been exported in the first place, and so no individual feels a loss. They therefore think it too cruel to avenge their loss by the death of many when that loss does not harm the life or the living of a Utopian citizen. But if any Utopian anywhere is wrongfully disabled or killed, whether by public sentence or private deed, they first ascertain the facts through diplomatic investigation and then, if the guilty persons are not extradited to them, they will not be appeased but immediately declare war. If the guilty persons are handed over, they punish them with death or slavery.

Utopians not only regret but are even ashamed of a victory that costs much blood, thinking it folly to purchase anything, however precious, at too high a price.[2] But if they overcome an enemy by stratagem and cunning, they exult beyond measure, holding a victory parade and erecting a trophy. They boast having acted valiantly and with manly prowess when their victory is one that no animal, but only a man could have won, being achieved through strength of mind; strength of body, they say, is for bears, lions, boars, wolves, dogs and other wild beasts when they fight. Such animals are superior to us in strength and spirit but inferior in forethought and intelligence.

The Utopians' single object in fighting is to obtain the very thing that, had it been granted, would have prevented the war. But when it is not granted, they punish those on whom they lay the blame so severely that the perpetrators would be afraid to try anything like that again. This is the Utopians' chief interest, which they pursue directly, caring more to avoid danger than to win glory or honor.

---

[1] Nephelogetes ... Alaopolitans More's own Greek coinages, meaning "People from the clouds" and "Nationless people."

[2] [marginal note] Victory too dearly bought.

As soon as war is declared, they arrange for posters carrying their official seal to be put up simultaneously in the most prominent spots of the enemy's territory. These promise large rewards to anyone who assassinates the enemy leader and smaller but still considerable sums for the heads of those named on the same posters, these being men whom, next to the leader himself, they hold responsible for the hostilities against them. Whatever reward they offer to anyone who kills one of these people they double for whoever brings one in alive. Indeed, they even offer the same rewards, with a guarantee of personal safety, to those whose names appear on the poster and who turn against their fellows. So before long their enemies suspect everyone else; among themselves, no one trusts or remains loyal to any other, and everyone is in a state of utter panic and real danger. It is known to happen that most of them, beginning with the king himself, are betrayed by those in whom they placed most trust—so easily do bribes incite men to commit any crime. Thus the Utopians place almost no limit on their offers of reward; knowing what a risk they ask people to run, they want the rewards to outweigh the risks. They thus promise not just a great deal of gold but also land in freehold that will bring in a great income—and they always keep their promises.

This policy of bidding for and purchasing an enemy, elsewhere condemned as base and degenerate, they think shows their wisdom, for they conclude great wars without actual battles. They also think it reflects well on their humanity and mercy, for by the death of a few guilty persons they purchase the lives of many harmless people who would have fallen in battle, and on both sides. They are as sorry for the common soldiers of the enemy as for their own, knowing that they do not go to war through their own choice but are, rather, driven to it by the madness of kings.

If this plan does not succeed, they plant seeds of dissension and foster strife by encouraging a brother of the king or one of his noblemen to hope he might take over the throne. If internal strife dies down, then they stir up the neighbors of their enemies by reviving some forgotten claims to dominion such as kings have always at hand and then promise their own assistance for the war. But although they supply money liberally, they are very reluctant to send their own citizens, whom they hold singularly dear, thinking each so valuable that they would not exchange any one of them for an enemy king. As for gold and silver, since they keep it all for this one use, they pay it out unhesitatingly, for they would live just as well if they spent it all. In addition to the riches that they keep at home, moreover, they have such a vast treasure abroad that many nations, as I said, are in their debt. Thus they hire mercenaries from all parts, especially from the country of the Zapoletes.[1]

These people, who live five hundred miles to the east of Utopia, are rough, crude, and brave, fond of the woods and rugged mountains where they are bred.[2] They are a hardy race, able to endure heat, cold, and hard work, entirely without civilized refinement. They are not skilled in farming, are careless about the houses they inhabit and the clothes they wear, and occupied only with their flocks and herds. Living chiefly by hunting and plunder, they are born for warfare and zealously seek opportunities to fight. When such a chance arrives, they eagerly embrace it, and leaving the country in great numbers they offer themselves at a cheap rate to anyone who needs fighting men. The only art of living they know is the same one by which they seek their deaths. They fight hard and loyally for those who pay them. They bind themselves for no fixed period, and if the enemy offers them higher pay they switch sides, and then the day after that, if a little more is offered to them, they return to the side they had first taken. Seldom is there a war that does not see many of them in both armies, so it often happens that those bound by blood, as well as those serving in the same army and thus intimate with each another, soon find themselves on opposites sides and meet in battle. Then with fierce animosity, forgetting both kinship and friendship, they stab and destroy each other only because they were hired by opposing kings for a small sum of which they take such careful account that they are easily led to change sides by adding a penny to their daily pay. So quickly have they developed the habit of greed! And yet it profits them nothing, for what they get by exposing their lives they soon spend on riot and wretchedness.

---

[1] Zapoletes "Busy sellers."

[2] [marginal note] These people not unlike the Swiss. [Swiss mercenaries were hired by the rulers of several European countries at the time. To this day, popes continue to hire Swiss guards.]

This people will fight for the Utopians against any enemies whatsoever because paid more than they can get anywhere else. The Utopians, just as they seek good men to use, so they enlist these bad men to abuse. For when the need arises, they send them into great peril with the tempting bait of big promises. A large proportion never returns to claim their wages, but the survivors are honestly paid what has been promised in order to incite them to repeat similar deeds of daring. The Utopians do not care how many of them they lose, thinking that it would benefit the whole human race if they could relieve the world of this abominable and shameful people.

Next in order of preference after these mercenaries, the Utopians employ the soldiers of the people for whom they are fighting; then auxiliary squadrons of other allies; and finally a contingent of their own citizens, out of whom they appoint some man of tried valor to command the entire army. They add two potential replacements; these hold no rank while he lives, but if he is taken prisoner or killed then one becomes, as it were, his heir and successor, and then he, if things fall out this way, is succeeded by the third.[1] Thus the death of the commander, the fortunes of war being always incalculable, will not bring the whole military into disorder.

Each city chooses from its volunteers. No one is forced to fight abroad against his will, because the Utopians are convinced that anyone who is timid by nature is unlikely to acquit himself manfully and may make his companions more timid. However, should any enemy assail their own country, they put the faint-hearted, provided that they are physically fit, on shipboard among the braver sort, or put them here and there to man the walls where they cannot run away. Thus the continual regard of their comrades, the looming threat of their enemies, and the impossibility of escape combine to overpower their timidity, and often extreme danger makes them brave.

Just as no one is forced to go fight abroad, so if wives want to go with their husbands to war, not only do the Utopians not forbid it, they even encourage and spur them on by praise. The pair leaves for battle together and wives fight next to their husbands, surrounded by their children, relations and connections, so that those to whom nature has given the strongest motive to help one another may be closest and offer mutual assistance. It is the greatest reproach for a husband to return without his wife, a wife without her husband, or a son without his father; so in hand-to-hand fighting, if the enemy stand his ground, the fight is long and desperate, and ends only when all are dead.

Though Utopians bend every effort not to have to fight themselves so long as they can finish the war by hiring substitutes, when personal service is inevitable they prove just as courageous in fighting as they had been prudent when trying to avoid it, not so fierce in the first onslaught as stubborn in the protraction and duration of the fight, more likely to be cut to pieces than to relent. The absence of that anxiety over a man's livelihood or his family's future, which everywhere else breaks the highest spirit, makes a Utopian hold his head high and disdain the foe. The Utopians' training in military discipline gives them confidence, moreover, and the good and sound opinions in which they have been trained from childhood, both in school and through good institutions of the commonweal, give them added courage. So although they do not hold their lives so cheap as to throw them away carelessly, neither do they hold them so excessively dear as to keep them at the price of shame when duty bids them sacrifice themselves.

When the battle is everywhere hottest, a picked band of young men who have sworn themselves to the mission seek out the enemy general, and openly assault or secretly ambush him.[2] They assail him from afar and at close range, as a long chain of men, with fresh comers taking the place of the exhausted, keep up the attack. Almost always, unless he saves himself by running away, he is killed or falls alive into Utopian hands. If the victory rests with the Utopians, they do not revenge themselves with blood, for they would rather take a defeated foe prisoner than kill him, and they never pursue the flying enemy without always keeping one division ready for engagement. Even if they win the battle with this reserve force after the rest of the army has been beaten, they prefer to let the whole hostile force escape rather than get into the habit of pursuing the foe in a disorderly way. They remember that on occasion, with most of their army beaten and routed, and while the enemy was flushed with victory and pursuing the fugitives in all directions, a few of their own number, held in reserve for emergencies, had suddenly counter-attacked the scattered enemy, who believing themselves quite safe were off their guard, and had changed the whole fortune of the battle. Thus the Utopians wrest back from the enemy's hand a certain and undoubted victory, conquering their seeming conquerors.

---

[1] They add ... third Strategy practiced by the Spartans.

[2] [marginal note] The enemy general to be most fiercely attacked, so as to end the war sooner.

It is not easy to say whether the Utopians are more cunning in laying ambushes or more cautious in avoiding them. You would think them about to turn tail, when that is the last thing they intend. Then, when they do decide to retreat, you would imagine they were planning anything but that. For if they find themselves inferior in number or position, they noiselessly move away by night and set up camp elsewhere, or they evade the enemy by some stratagem, or by daylight withdraw so imperceptibly and in such regular order that it would be as risky to attack them in retreat as it would be if they were advancing. They carefully protect their camps by digging a deep and broad ditch, tossing aside the dirt. They do not use laborers for this. Rather, the soldiers make the ditch with their own hands, and so the whole army is kept at work except for those who keep armed watch in front of the rampart in case of emergencies. Thanks to the work of many hands they can create impressive fortifications, enclosing a large space with amazing speed.

They wear armor strong enough to ward off blows but so well adapted to their body's movements and gestures that they can even swim in it. (Learning to swim armed is part of their military training.)[1] The weapons they use at a distance are arrows, which they shoot with great strength and sureness of aim, both on foot and on horseback, while at close quarters they use not swords but axes, which deal a deadly blow either with blade or through sheer weight, depending on whether they are used to cut or thrust. They are ingenious in inventing weapons, carefully concealing them lest, if seen before needed, they become objects of laughter rather than instruments of war. In making them, their first criteria are maneuverability and ease of transport.

If they make a truce, they keep it so religiously that they will not break it under any provocation.[2] They do not ravage the enemy's country or burn his fields. Indeed, as far as possible they do not allow crops to be crushed by the feet of their men or horses, thinking them grown for their own benefit. They injure no non-combatant unless he is a spy. They keep intact any city that yields. They do not even plunder the ones they have stormed, but merely put to death the men who blocked a surrender and make slaves of the rest, leaving civilians unharmed. If they can locate those who had urged the city to yield they give them a share in the property of the condemned, presenting the rest of the confiscated goods to their auxiliaries; no Utopian touches the booty.

When the war is over, they do not ask the friends for whom they have borne its cost to repay any of it, but rather they make the conquered pay reparations with cash, setting it aside for use in future wars, and also get them to hand over estates from which Utopia itself can get a large annual income, indefinitely.[3] They now have such varied sources of revenue in so many countries that the proceeds have grown to over seven hundred thousand ducats[4] a year. To administer these estates they send some of their own citizens, called Quaestors,[5] to live in grand style and play the part of great lords. Much is left over for the Utopians' common treasury, however, unless they prefer, as they often do, to give the defeated nation credit until the money is needed, and even then they almost never call in the whole sum. Out of these estates they confer a part on those who at their request undertake the dangerous mission that I described earlier. If any king arms himself against Utopia and is about to invade, they immediately march out in great strength beyond their own borders and meet him there, for they prefer not to fight on their own country, nor is any emergency so pressing as to make them let foreign auxiliaries into their island.

---

[1] [marginal note] The variety of their weapons.

[2] [marginal note] Truces.

[3] [marginal note] But today the victors foot most of the bill.

[4] ducats European gold coins of varying value depending on the nation of origin.

[5] Quaestors Agents.

CHAPTER 9
THE RELIGIONS IN UTOPIA

There are different religions in different parts of the island and also within each city. Some worship the Sun, others the Moon, and yet others one of the planets. Some people reverence a man who was in former times conspicuous for virtue or glory, not just as a god, but also as the supreme God. But the most people, especially the wiser, do nothing of the kind, believing in one unknown Divine Power, eternal, incomprehensible, inexplicable, far beyond the reach of human intellect, diffused throughout the universe as a powerful force. Him they call Father, to Him alone they attribute the beginnings, the growth, the progress, the changes and the ends of all things, and to no other do they give divine honors.

Although all the others believe different things, they agree with the majority in thinking there is one Supreme Being to Whom we owe the creation and maintenance of the world. In their native language all call Him Mithra.[1] Different people define Him differently, however, each thinking that whatever they regard as supreme is that same nature, but all attribute the sum of all things to His unique power and majesty. Gradually, indeed, they are all beginning to depart from their variety of superstitions and are uniting in one religion that seems to surpass the rest in rationality. No doubt the other beliefs would have all disappeared long ago, had not some misfortune happened to those considering changing their religion. Their misfortune was read not as a work of chance but as the work of the deity they had been planning to leave and who wanted to punish their impiety against himself.

But when they heard from us the name of Christ, His teaching, His example, His miracles, and the no less wonderful constancy of the many martyrs whose blood, freely shed, has brought together so many nations in so many parts of the world, you cannot imagine how willing they were to embrace Christianity at once, either secretly inspired by God or because they found it similar to their own most influential beliefs. I think, though, that what carried a lot of weight was our report that Christ approved his disciples' communal way of life,[2] one that the truest Christian communities continue to practice.[3] Whatever it was that affected them, not a few agreed to adopt our faith and were baptized.

But among the four of us (all that remained of our company, two having died), I am sorry to say there was no priest. We gave the Utopians religious instruction, but not those sacraments that we believe only a priest can administer;[4] they understand what they are, however, and are eager to receive them. Indeed, they are even debating earnestly among themselves whether, if no Christian bishop were sent, they might choose one of their own number who could take on valid holy orders. It seemed that they would choose someone, but by the time I left they had not yet done so.

Utopians who do not accept Christianity nevertheless do not try to deter others from doing so or oppose their conversion. Only one of our community was disciplined while I was there. As soon as he had been baptized, and despite our protests, he began to speak publicly of Christianity with more zeal than discretion, so much so that he not only set our religion above any other but condemned outright all others as profane. He loudly called those of other faiths impious, sacrilegious, and worthy of eternal fire. After he had been preaching in this style for some time, he was arrested, not for despising their religion but for stirring up strife. Tried and convicted, he was sentenced to exile. Indeed, among the most ancient Utopian principles is one holding that no one should be made to suffer for his religion.[5]

Before his arrival at the island, King Utopus had heard that the natives were constantly quarrelling over religion. Such dissension among the various sects fighting for their country, he realized, gave him an opportunity to subdue them all. After he had won, he first declared everyone free to follow the religion of his own liking and even to strive to convert others, provided he did so modestly and peaceably, with reasonable arguments, and with no attempt bitterly to discredit the beliefs of others. Should his efforts fail, he was not to use violence and must refrain from abuse. Those arguing too vehemently would be subject to exile or enslavement. Utopus made this rule not merely for the sake of peace, so easily destroyed by constant religious wrangling and hatred, but also because he thought it in the interest of religion itself. He did not dogmatize concerning faith, thinking that perhaps God desires a varied and manifold worship and so has inspired different people with different views. In any case Utopus thought it arrogant and foolish to insist, with violence and threats, that everyone else must agree with what you believe to be true. He quickly perceived, moreover, that if one religion is true and the others false, then, if religious questions are dealt with reasonably and moderately, by its own natural force truth will emerge into clear visibility. But if such matters are to be decided by force and armed violence, he thought, then the best and holiest religion would be overwhelmed by false ones, like grain overtaken by thorns and bushes, for the worst men are always the most obstinate. So he left the matter open, making it clear that all were free to decide what to believe. The one rule on which he insisted unrelentingly was that no one should sink so far beneath the dignity of human nature as to believe that the soul dies with the body or that mere chance, and not divine providence, rules the world.

---

[1] Mithra Persian god of truth and light.

[2] Christ … way of life See Acts 2.44–5 and 4.32–5.

[3] [marginal note] Monasteries.

[4] those sacraments … administer The administration of the Eucharist, Confession, Confirmation, Ordination, and Extreme Unction (the last rites of the Church before death) must be conducted by a priest, while Baptism and Marriage may be performed by non-clergy in extreme or emergency circumstances.

[5] [marginal note] Men must be drawn to religion by its merits.

This is why Utopians believe that after this life our vices are punished and virtues rewarded; if anyone thinks otherwise they do not regard him as even human, seeing that he has debased the lofty nature of his soul to that of a brute. Still less do they count him as a citizen, for as far as he dared he would thumb his nose at their laws and customs. No one, after all, can doubt that such a person would attempt either to evade by craft the common laws of his country or to break them by violence so as to serve his greed; he would have nothing to fear but the law and no hope beyond the grave. So the Utopians forbid anyone of this mind to hold office; they do not entrust him with any public function and regard him as having a mean and low disposition. They do not punish him in any way, however, convinced that people cannot help what they believe. They neither use threats to make him disguise his views nor allow deceptions or lies in the matter, for they hate mendacity almost as much as they hate actual wrongdoing. They forbid such a person to argue for his opinion publicly, but they encourage him to do so in front of priests and citizens of weight and importance, convinced that such madness will in the end yield to reason.

Another group of people, on the other hand, and a fairly large one, believes that even animals have immortal souls, although not comparable to ours in dignity and not destined for an equal happiness.[1] The Utopians do not find such people bad, and even think that there is something to be said for such a belief. Almost all are absolutely convinced that human bliss in the afterlife will be measureless, so that although they lament everyone's illness, they regret the death of no one unless they see him leave life anxiously or reluctantly. That they take as a very bad omen, as though the unwilling soul, without hope and with a guilty conscience, had a secret premonition of impending punishment. Besides, they think, God will not be pleased by the arrival of one who, when summoned, does not gladly hasten to obey but is drawn unwillingly. Horrified whenever they see this kind of death, they carry the departed to burial in melancholy silence, and then after praying that God might be merciful to the soul and graciously pardon its infirmities, they lay the corpse in the ground. On the other hand, over one who has died full of cheer and good hope, they do not mourn but attend the funeral with singing and affection, commending the soul to God. Then, with more reverence than sorrow, they burn the body[2] and on the spot erect a pillar inscribed with the virtues of the deceased. On returning home they speak of the person's character and deeds, no part of which is more frequently or gladly mentioned than the cheerful death.

They think this memorial to virtue both the best way to inspire the living to good deeds and the best way to honor the dead, who they think are present when talked about, even though invisible to weak mortal sight. For it would be inconsistent with the bliss of the departed not to be able to go where they please, and it would be ungrateful of them absolutely to reject all desire of revisiting their friends, to whom they were bound during their lives with mutual love and affection (which, like other good things, the Utopians believe does not diminish in the good but even increases posthumously). Thinking that their dead move among them, witnessing their words and actions, Utopians go about their business confident of their protection and convinced that the presence of their ancestors keeps them from all dishonesty.

---

[1] [marginal note] A strange opinion on the souls of animals.

[2] burn the body Before the nineteenth century Christians did not practice cremation.

They utterly despise and mock fortune-telling and all the superstitious divinations taken so seriously in many other places. But miracles, which occur without Nature's assistance, they revere as manifestations of divine power; such, they say, often occur in Utopia. Sometimes when in the midst of great danger they pray publicly for a sign, which they confidently expect and receive.

They think that to contemplate Nature and praise God in His works is a service acceptable to Him. There are some, and not so very few, who for religious reasons give up learning, pursue no science, and take no leisure, but pour themselves into work and other good deeds in order to win happiness after death.[1] Some tend the sick, others repair roads, clean out ditches, rebuild bridges, dig turf, sand and stone, fell and cut up trees, or cart wood, grain, or other materials into the cities. They serve not only the public but also individuals, working harder than slaves. If anywhere there is a task so rough, hard and repulsive that most are deterred by the toil, disgust and despair involved, these people gladly and cheerfully claim it for themselves. Engaged in endless hard work, and claiming no credit, they secure leisure for others, neither denigrating other peoples' lives nor extolling their own. The more they perform like slaves, the more everyone honors them.

These people are of two sorts, with differing opinions and practices. One group includes those who remain single, abstaining not only from sex but also from meat and even, in some cases, all animal food. They completely reject this world's pleasures as harmful and focus only on the life to come, hoping to obtain it soon, by prayer and labor; in the meantime, they are cheerful and lively. Those of the other sort are just as fond of hard labor, but they prefer marriage to the single life. They do not despise the comfort that marriage brings, and think that they owe it to nature to labor, and owe it to their country to have children. They refuse no pleasure that does not interfere with their work, eating meat only because they believe it makes them stronger for their tasks. Most Utopians think this group wiser and the other one holier. If the holier sect tried to defend their preference for celibacy and a hard life with arguments drawn from reason, most would laugh them to scorn; but since they say that their faith prompts them, other Utopians look up to and revere them, (Utopians are exquisitely careful not to jump to conclusions over any point of religion.) Such, then, are these who in their language are given a special name, Buthrescae, or "the particularly religious."

Utopian priests are people of great holiness, so there are very few of them, not more than thirteen in each city, with the same number of churches. When Utopians go to war, seven priests accompany the army, and seven substitutes are appointed until the priests return and take up their former duties. The substitutes then return to their earlier tasks until the priests die, after which they succeed to their places. Until then they assist the Bishop, who is the head of all. Like other officials, priests are elected by secret ballot, so as to prevent politicizing the process, and winners are then ordained by their colleagues. They preside over worship, conduct religious ceremonies, and provide moral guidance. It is a great disgrace for a man to be summoned before them, or reproved for immorality. It is their part to give advice and admonition, whereas the Governor and the other magistrates correct and punish offenders. The priests do, however, excommunicate those whom they determine to be evildoers, and there is no punishment more dreaded. The excommunicated incur very great disgrace and are tortured by inner religious fear; even their bodies do not go scot-free, for unless they quickly satisfy the priests that they are truly repentant, the Council arrests and punishes them for impiety.

The education of the young is entrusted to the priests, whose first concern is not learning, but behavior and virtue. They take the greatest pains to instill into the minds of children, while they are still tender and pliable, attitudes that will help preserve the commonwealth. When firmly implanted, such principles will accompany them all their lives and strengthen the commonwealth, which decays only through vices rooted in distorted thinking. The priests have the most desirable women in the country for wives. (Women are not debarred from the priesthood, but they are only seldom chosen, and none except widows and the elderly.)[1] To no other office in Utopia is so much honor given as to the priesthood—so much so that even priests who have committed a crime are not tried before a public tribunal, but left to God and to themselves.[2] Utopians think it wrong to lay mortal hands on a priest, however guilty, who has been specially consecrated to God as a holy offering. It is easier for them to observe this custom because their priests are few and carefully chosen. Only seldom does anyone elevated to such dignity for being the best of the good, for nothing but virtue sink into corruption and vice. Even if priests do sin (which is bound to happen, given the fallibility of human nature), Utopians need not fear that this will bring ruin to the commonwealth, because priests are few and because their positions carry honor but no real power. Indeed, they keep the number of priests low in order to preserve the order's dignity; they think it hard to find many good enough for so honorable a post, one that requires a more than everyday virtue.[3]

---

[1] [marginal note] The active life.

Utopian priests are esteemed just as much in foreign countries as they are among their own people. When the armies are fighting, the priests are to be found not far off, kneeling, dressed in their sacred vestments with hands outstretched to heaven, and praying first of all for peace, then for victory, but without bloodshed on either side.[4] When their own people are winning, the priests run among the combatants and restrain the fury of their own men against the routed enemy. The enemy soldiers see this and appeal to the priests, which is enough to save many lives. To touch their flowing garments protects the supplicant's goods from spoliation. This has brought them such veneration among all nations, and given them so real a majesty, that they have saved their own citizens from the enemy as often as they have protected the enemy from their own men. It has even happened that after the Utopians' own line was broken and things looked grim, while they were retreating and the enemy was rushing on, the priests intervened and brought an end to the carnage, and the armies parted and settled on equal terms. For never was there any nation so savage, cruel, and barbarous that it has not regarded their bodies as sacred and inviolable.

They keep as holy days the first and the last of each month, and also the first and last days of the year, which they divide into months.[5] These they measure by the orbit of the moon, just as they determine the year by the course of the sun. In their language they call the first days Cynemernes, and the last days Trapemernes, which may be interpreted as "First Feasts" and "Last Feasts." Their churches are fine sights, elaborate in workmanship and able to hold vast congregations—a necessity, granted that there are so few of them.[6] They are all fairly dark, not because of the builders' ignorance but because the priests think that dazzle makes the thoughts wander, whereas sparse and dim light concentrates the mind and encourages earnest devotion.

As I have said, not everyone has the same religion, and yet because all the different faiths tend to the same end, the worship of the Divine Nature, nothing is seen or heard in the churches that does not seem to agree with this common belief. If any sect has a rite of its own, its adherents perform it within the walls of their own houses. No image of God is seen in a church, therefore, so that all may be free to conceive of Him according to their own beliefs, in any likeness they please. The priests have no special name for God except "Mithra," by which word they agree to represent the one nature of the Divine Majesty, whatever it might be, and prayers are phrased so that everyone may recite them without offense.

The priests come to the church in the evening of the last day of the month or year, fasting, to thank God for the prosperity they have enjoyed in the past year or month. On the next day, or "first feast," they assemble at the churches in the morning to pray for happiness and prosperity in the following year or month. At a "last feast," before they go to church, wives fall at the feet of their husbands and children at those of their parents, confessing how they have offended, whether by losing something or carelessly performing some duty, and pray for pardon.[1] If any cloud of quarrel in the family has arisen, it is dispelled by this penance, so that with clear and pure minds they may attend the divine service; their religion forbids them to attend with a troubled conscience.[2] If aware of hatred or anger against anyone, they do not come to until reconciled and with cleansed hearts; otherwise they risk swift and severe punishment. When they reach the church, men go to the right, women to the left, and arrange themselves so that the males in each house sit in front of the father while the mother of the family sits behind the females. This system allows parents to make sure that those responsible for domestic discipline may observe every visible gesture. They also carefully see to it that everywhere the younger ones are placed in the company of the older, in order to keep children from spending in childish folly time they should pass in developing the respect for God that is the greatest (if not the only) stimulus to virtuous living.

---

[1] [marginal note] Female priests.

[2] [marginal note] Unworthy priests.

[3] [marginal note] But what a crowd of them we have!

[4] [marginal note] O priests far more holy than our own!

[5] [marginal note] Holidays observed by the Utopians.

[6] [marginal note] What their churches are like.

The Utopians never sacrifice animals; they cannot believe that the Divine Being, who gave life to animals, delights in bloodshed and slaughter. They burn incense and other sweet savors, as well as a great many devotional candles. Not that they think these things add anything to the divine nature, any more than do the prayers of men, but they like this harmless kind of worship, and believe that these perfumes and lights and other ceremonies somehow uplift and impel them to a devotion to God's worship. The people wear white in church, and the priest wears vestments of various colors and wonderful design, but not of the costly material one might expect; these are not decorated with gold or precious stones but with different feathers, so cleverly and skillfully done that no costly material would have added to the value. According to the Utopians, the feathers, together with their arrangement on the priest's vestment, contain hidden mysteries with meanings carefully handed down by the priests and designed to remind Utopians of God's loving kindness to them, their own piety in return, and finally their duty to one another.

When the priest thus arrayed first comes out of the inner sanctum, the people fall on the ground in reverence with such deep silence everywhere that the very character of the proceeding fills them with holy awe and feel that God is truly present. After remaining awhile on the ground, at a signal from the priest they rise; then they sing praises to God, often to the accompaniment of musical instruments fashioned differently, for the most part, than those in our part of the world.[3] Many of these surpass our own in sweetness of sound, though some are not as good. In one thing they are undoubtedly far ahead of us: all their music, whether instrumental or vocal, so renders and expresses the natural feelings, the sound suiting the matter (prayer, joy, supplication, trouble, mourning, or anger), and so communicates in the rising of the melody a certain understanding, that it wonderfully seizes, penetrates, and influences the minds of the hearers. At last the priest and people together repeat solemn prayers, each worded so that all may apply individually what all request together.

In these prayers, all recognize God as the Author of the creation, of government, and of every other blessing, thanking Him for all His gifts particular for the favor of life in the happiest of commonwealths and for the truest religion. If this is mistaken, or if there is anything better of which God approves more, then may He of His goodness bring them to its knowledge, for they are ready to follow in whatever direction He may lead. If the Utopian system is the best, however, and one's religion the truest, then may God grant steadfastness in the same and bring all others to the same way of living and the same understanding—unless God in His wisdom prefers a variety of religions. Finally they pray that He will grant an easy death, however soon, or late. But if it is God's will, they are much readier to die a hard death and go to God than to be kept for long away from Him by a prosperous course of life. After this prayer, the people fall down on the ground again. Then, after an interval, they rise and go away to dinner, and the rest of the day they pass in games and military training.

Now I have described to you, as truly as I could, the constitution of that commonwealth, which I think is not only the best but indeed the only one that deserves the name "commonwealth." For everywhere else, although people talk freely of the common good they think only of their own, whereas there, where there is no private property, citizens seriously care for the commonweal. No wonder: in other countries, who doesn't know that he has to look out for himself? If he doesn't, no matter how much the community as a whole may flourish, he will die of hunger, and so necessity compels him, he believes, to think of himself rather than of others.

---

[1] [marginal note] The Utopian confession.

[2] [marginal note] But among us the worst sinners try to crowd closest to the altar.

[3] [marginal note] Utopian music.

In Utopia, on the other hand, where everything is shared, no one fears not having enough, provided the common warehouses are well filled. The distribution of good things is not ungenerous, and there are no poor people or beggars: though nobody can have just anything he wants, everyone is rich. For what greater wealth can there be than to live in joy and peace, with no fear for the future, untroubled about food, not harassed by the querulous demands of his wife, not afraid for his son's well-being or worried about his daughter's dowry, and thus without anxiety concerning his and his own, his wife, sons, grandsons, great-grandsons, great-great-grandsons and all the long succession of descendants to which people look forward?

Then recall that there is no less provision for those who have been laborers but are now unable to be such than for those who are still working. Here I would challenge anyone to compare the so-called justice practiced in other nations (among whom, I swear, I cannot discover a trace of justice or fairness) with the Utopian system. For what kind of justice is it for a nobleman or a goldsmith or a money-lender or any of those who do nothing (nothing of use to the commonwealth, anyway) to receive a grand and luxurious living in return for their leisure and pointless work? In the meantime, the day laborer, the carter, the smith, or the farmer, in return for continuous toil that beasts of burden could scarcely endure, and toil so essential that no state could last for a year without it, gets such a poor living and leads such a miserable life that the condition of beasts of burden might seem far preferable. For beasts do not have to work so incessantly, are not much worse fed, derive more pleasure from their lives, and have no fear for the future. The laborers not only must work here and now with little reward but are agonized by the thought of a helpless and indigent old age. Given that their daily wage does not even buy their daily bread, how could they possibly spare anything to put away for buying such bread when they are old?

Is it not unjust and ungrateful to lavish huge rewards on so-called gentlefolk, on goldsmiths, the idle, the parasites, the suppliers of empty pleasures? Is it not unjust to care nothing for those farmers, coal miners, day laborers, carters and smiths without whom there would be no commonwealth at all? But after such a system has used up laborers in their prime, and then, when they are weighed down by age and disease, and in their utter need, forgets all the benefits it has received from them it pays them back with a wretched death. Worse, every day the rich skim off part of the daily assistance to the poor, and not fraudulently but in ways sanctioned by the law itself. And so what was unjust to begin with—a pitiful allowance for those who deserve the best from the commonwealth—they have managed to make a complete travesty by enshrining their injustice in the laws they pass. So when I reflect on the state of all nations flourishing today, so help me God, I can see nothing but a conspiracy of the rich, seeking their own advantage under the name and pretext of the commonwealth.[1] They invent and devise all ways and techniques by which they may keep everything they have amassed by evil means and have no fear of losing their power to drive down wages and profit by the sweat and toil of the poor.

These sinister devices, as soon as the rich declare them to be in the public interest, even in the interest of the poor, finally become laws. But when these evil men, out of their insatiable greed, have divided among themselves what would have been enough for everyone, how far they fall short of the happiness of Utopia! When in Utopia all greed for money was abolished by abolishing money itself, what a mass of troubles was eliminated, and what a great crop of crimes was pulled up by the roots! For who does not know that fraud, theft, robbery, quarrels, disorder, strife, sedition, murder, treason, poisoning, avenged but not deterred by the daily executions, vanish with the death of money, and that fear, anxiety, worries, toils and watching will perish along with it? Although money is often thought to be the solution, take money away, and the problem itself disappears and dies away. To illustrate, imagine a barren year, with failed crops, in which many thousands have died of hunger. I'm sure that after the famine was over, if you searched the rich man's warehouses you would so much grain that, had it been distributed to the poor, those killed by hunger and disease would not have even noticed the fury of the sky and soil. How easily might men get their living, if that much-lauded money, that grand invention meant to open the way to a living, was not itself the only barrier to our getting a living! Even the rich should see that it would be better not to lack necessities than to have a great heap of superfluities, better to escape the many troubles caused by need than be hemmed in by great riches. Nor do I doubt that caring for our own advantage or for the authority of our Savior Christ (Whose wisdom could not fail to know what is best, and Whose goodness would not advise what He knew not to be best) would long ago have brought the world to adopt the laws of this commonwealth had not one single monster, the chief and originator of all plagues, stood in the way—Pride.[1] She measures prosperity not by her own good but by the harm of others. She would not even want to be made a goddess if she had no poor wretches to lord it over. Let her prosperity vex and aggravate their poverty so long as their poverty amplifies and sets off her prosperity. This serpent of Hell slithers into human hearts and stops us, like a suckfish attached to a ship, from following life's better course, sticking on us too tightly to be easily pulled off.

---

[1] [marginal note] Reader, note well!

Pride is too deeply rooted in us to be readily plucked out, so I rejoice that at least the Utopians have a system that I wish everyone everywhere would imitate. They have established institutions as the basis of their commonwealth that will produce the greatest possible happiness and that, as far as human foresight can tell, could last forever. At home they have pulled up the roots of ambition and faction, along with other vices, so there is no danger of trouble from the internal strife that has been the only cause for the ruin of many cities' well-established prosperity. So long as the Utopians preserve their internal harmony and keep institutions healthy, not all the envy of neighboring kings can shake or endanger that nation, although such has often been attempted—with no success.

When Raphael had finished his story, I was left thinking that not a few of that people's customs and laws were absurd—not only their method of waging war, their rites and religion, and their other institutions, but above all that which is the chief foundation of their entire system: their communal life with shared goods and no money. This alone utterly overthrows the nobility, magnificence, splendor, and majesty that are, in the opinion of the common people, the true glories and ornaments of a commonwealth. Yet I knew that he was wearied by telling his tale, and I myself had not had enough time to think it over. I doubted, too, whether he could brook any opposition to his views, particularly as I remembered how he had censured those who feared that they might not seem wise enough unless they could find fault with other men's thoughts. And so I praised the Utopian way of life, and also Raphael's account of it, and took him by the hand and led him in to supper, first saying that there would be time to think more deeply about these matters and to discuss them more fully. I hope that will indeed happen. In the meantime, while Raphael is in other ways a man of most undoubted learning, one with wide knowledge of the world, I cannot agree with all he said. And yet I readily admit that there are many features of the Utopian commonwealth that I can more easily wish for in our own societies than hope to see realized.

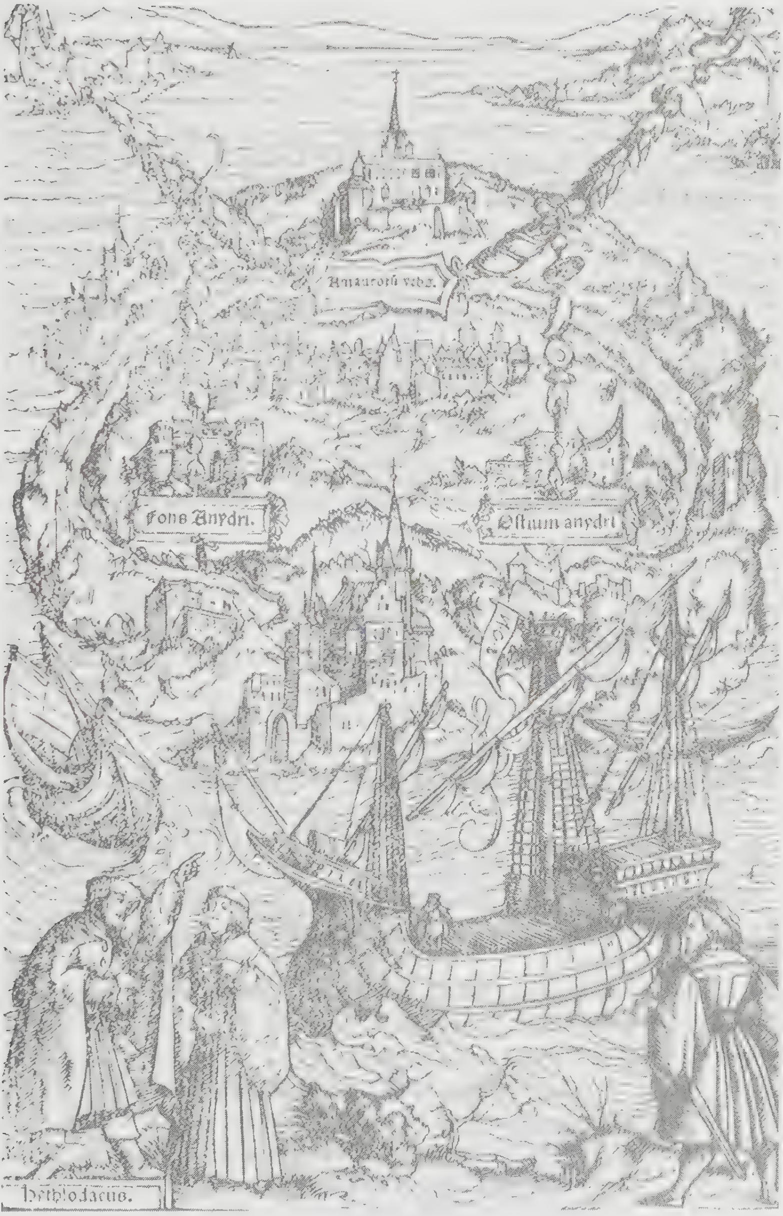
—1516

---

[1] [marginal note] A striking phrase.

In Context

Illustration of Utopia



Amaurotū vrbs.
Fons Anydri.
Ostium anydri Hythlodaeus.

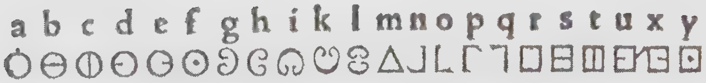
Ambrosius Holbein, Map of the Island of Utopia. This illustration appeared in the 1518 edition (the 1516 edition includes a less fully developed illustration by an unknown artist).

In Context

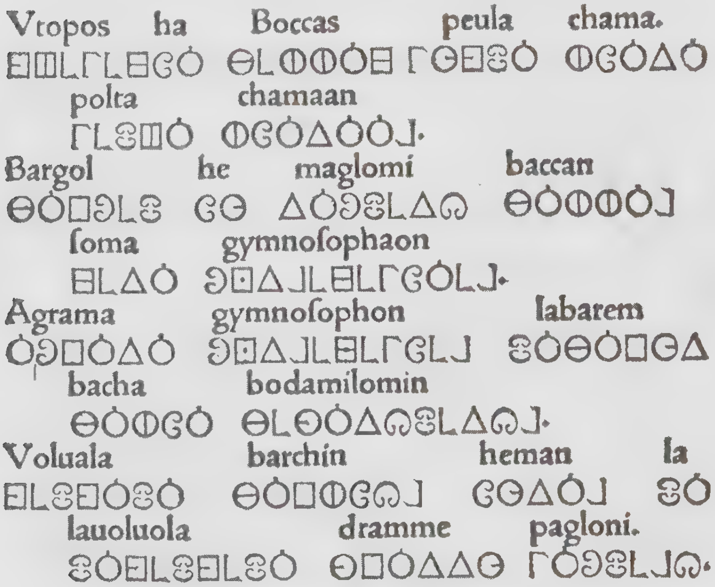
Utopian Language

THE UTOPIAN ALPHABET



a b c d e f g h i k l m n o p q r s t u x y

A QUATRAIN IN THE UTOPIAN LANGUAGE



Vtopos ha Boccas peula chama.
polta chamaan
Bargol he maglomi baccan
ſoma gymnoſophaon
Agrama gymnoſophon labarem bacha bodamilomin
Voluala barchin heman la lauoluola dramme pagloni.

A Literal Translation of These Verses

Utopus it was who redrew the map,
　And made me an island instead of a cape:
Alone among nations resplendent I stand,
　Making virtue as plain as the back of your hand—
Displaying to all without argumentation
　The shape of a true philosophical nation.
Profusely to all of my own store I give;
　What is shown me that's better, I gladly receive.

IN CONTEXT

Poems in the Utopian Tongue

The first poem in Utopian was published with the 1516 edition of Utopia, together with a translation into Latin. Several later writers found it amusing to write in Utopian, although not using the original Utopian alphabet. For an example of Utopian in prose, see François Rabelais's Pantagruel, chapter 9.

Henry Peacham, epigrammatist and author of a book on drawing, contributed to the many friendly but mocking poems that prefaced Coryate's Crudities (1611) by Thomas Coryate of Odcomb, famous for his foreign travels and sometimes clownish behavior. Here the joke is the imaginary language that more or less lists real places:

In the Utopian Tongue

Ny thalonin ythsi Coryate lachmah babowans
O Asiam Europam Americ-werowans
Poph-himgi Savoya, Hessen, Rhetia, Ragonzie
France, Germanien dove Anda-louzie[1]
Not A-rag-on[2] ô Coryate, ô hone vilascar
Einen trunk Od-combe ny Venice Berga-mascar.

John Taylor, "The Water Poet," was by profession a waterman, ferrying customers up and down the Thames, and by avocation the author of many comic tracts and poems. One of his poems in Utopian appears in Laugh, and be Fat (1612), reprinted in his 1630 Works. It too is about Thomas Coryate and incorporates fragments of English words, usually as implied insults:

The Utopian Tongue

Thoyton Asse Coria Tushrump[3] codsheadirustie,
Mungrellimo whish whap ragge dicete tottrie,
Mangelusquem verminets nipsem barelybittimsore
Culliandolt travellerebumque, graiphone trutchmore.
Pusse per mew (Odcomb) gul abelgrik foppery shig shag
Cock a peps Comb[4] sottishamp, Idioshte momulus[5] tag rag.

A poem by Taylor from Odcomb's Complaint (1613; for sale, says the title page, in Utopia) and reprinted in 1630 comes right after a poem in the "Barmooda" tongue (ostensibly the language of the pigs found by the first European visitors to Bermuda). It is also on Coryate and incorporates place names and words from real languages:

---

[1] Anda-louzie Andalusia, in Spain, but also "And lousy"—having lice.

[2] A-rag-on Aragon (part of Spain) but also not even wearing a rag, naked.

[3] Thoyton Asse Coria Tushrump "Thomas Coryat" is embedded in the nonsense words.

[4] Cock a peps Comb A phrase incorporating "cockscomb."

[5] momulus A "momulus" would be a little "Momus," traditional Greek god of mockery.

Epitaph in the Utopian tongue

Nortumblum callimumquash omystoliton quashte burashte,
Scribuke woshtay solusbay per ambulatushte;
Grekay sons Turkay Paphay zums Jerusalushte.
Neptus esht Ealors Interremoy diz Dolorushte,
Confabuloy Odcumbay Prozeugmolliton tymorumynoy,
Omulus oratushte paralescus tolliton umbroy.

The Same in English,
Translated by Caleb Quishquash, an Utopian Born and Principal Secretary to the Great Adelontado of Barmoodoes

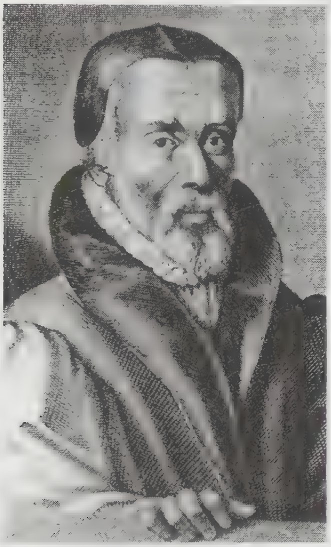
Here lies the wonder of the English nation,
Involved in Neptune's brinish vasty maw:
For fruitless travel, and for strange relation,
He passed and repassed all that e're eye saw.
Odcomb produced him; many nations fed him,
And worlds of writers, through the world have spread him.

WILLIAM TYNDALE

1494? – 1536

The English phrases that we now think of when we hear the term "Biblical language" are very largely the product of the work of one individual: William Tyndale. Tyndale met constant opposition from church and government officials throughout the course of his adult life. The work of translating the scriptures into the vernacular—English—was so dangerous that he went into hiding in continental Europe while trying to complete it. He was finally executed for his work, but within a few years of his death, his Bible was becoming widely read throughout England.



Tyndale was born in the mid-1490s, most likely in Stinchcombe, Gloucestershire, near the Welsh border. Not much is known about his early life and parentage. We do know that he attended Magdalen Hall, Oxford, was awarded a B.A. in 1512 and was incepted as M.A. in 1515, and was ordained a priest in London that same year. While at Oxford he was greatly influenced by the work of the Dutch philosopher Desiderius Erasmus—particularly by the venerable scholar's study of the Septuagint, the original Greek version of the books that Christians now refer to as the New Testament.

After graduation Tyndale returned to Gloucestershire, serving as household chaplain to Sir John and Lady Anne Walsh and as tutor to their children. During this period he began studying Erasmus's Greek New Testament and considered attempting his own English translation, which he hoped would enable local lay people to read the Scriptures for themselves. His translation of Erasmus's Enchiridion militis Christiani (Manual of the Christian Knight), which encourages the study the New Testament, helped gain the Walshs' support of his position. At this time Tyndale was also in demand as a preacher, but his sermons offended the local clergy, and he was brought before the Bishop's Chancellor on charges of heresy.

Tyndale left the area in 1523 and headed for London, hoping to find support for his translation work. He approached Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall, Erasmus's friend and Bishop of London, hoping he would serve as patron for the project. The Bishop not only refused his request, but became a vocal opponent of any plan to translate the Bible into the vernacular. Tyndale was forced to leave London in May 1524. With the sponsorship of Sir Humphrey Monmouth, a London merchant, he went to Germany, which at the time was more open to the ideas of the Protestant Reformation. He never returned to England.

The details of Tyndale's life in Germany are sketchy. His status as intellectual outlaw meant that he moved around considerably. He stayed in Hamburg for a while and then went to Wittenberg, where it is likely that he met with the famous Reformation leader Martin Luther. Eventually he settled in Cologne, where he set about having his translation of the New Testament published. Before it was finished, however, city magistrates caught wind of the project and ordered the printing house raided. Tyndale was able to escape with a portion of his printed New Testament, and this "Cologne Fragment" (which included most of the first Gospel, that of Matthew) circulated throughout England, accompanied by a prologue and marginal notes by Luther. Tyndale fled to Worms, a German town that had demonstrated more openness to the Reformation, where he was able to have the complete New Testament printed in 1526. The pocket-sized books (without Luther's preface or notes) were smuggled by boat into England and Scotland, where they circulated quickly. In January 1530, Tyndale completed a translation of the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Hebrew scriptures. Although he never managed to translate all of what Christians refer to as the Old Testament, his translation of the Pentateuch also became very widely read in England. Tyndale was the first to create an English language translation from Hebrew and Greek, the original languages in which the scriptures were written. Earlier English translations existed (created by Bede, John Wycliffe, and others), but they used the Vulgate, the church's official Latin translation, as their base text. But it is not only for removing this Latin "filter" that Tyndale is remembered. His elegant and powerful phrases were instrumental in establishing the Bible in English as both a literary and a religious text. And because his translation appeared at a time when it could be distributed widely through the use of the recently invented printing press, he had considerable influence in shaping the patterns of English speech. Tyndale introduced into the language phrases such as "the signs of the times," "fight the good fight," "the powers that be," and "a law unto themselves," which remain common currency today.

After his translations were in print, Tyndale turned to writing theological treatises and commentaries on the Bible. While his translations had angered the clergy, his treatises infuriated the government of England. In The Practice of the Prelates (1530) Tyndale harshly criticized King Henry VIII for divorcing his wife. The king responded by ordering Tyndale captured and returned to England. In 1534 Tyndale moved to Antwerp, then part of the Netherlands, thinking that there a new measure of openness to the Reformation would give him a greater measure of security. In 1535, however, he was betrayed by Henry Phillips, an English spy working in the Netherlands. He was arrested and held for 18 months in Vilvorde Castle prison near Brussels, where he was convicted of heresy. On 6 October 1536 he was scheduled to be burned at the stake, but as a mark of his distinction as a scholar, he was strangled to death and then his body was burnt.

Ironically, within a year of his death the English government approved Tyndale's translation. His Old Testament was completed by Miles Coverdale and was published with his New Testament in 1539; to avoid embarrassment, however, the English government did not allow Tyndale's name to appear. With Mary's accession to the throne in 1553, there was an abrupt change in policy, and Bibles in English were again banned. In the face of this censorship, a group of exiles in Geneva prepared a more scholarly translation, accompanied by substantial (and often tendentious) marginal notes. That version, known as the Geneva Bible, became widely available in England once Elizabeth I had replaced Mary as monarch. In response, Catholics in the Elizabethan era (many of them now in exile, as many Protestants had been under Mary) prepared a translation of their own, the Douay-Rheims version, also accompanied by interpretive notes. As the excerpts below demonstrate, other versions drew heavily on Tyndale's pioneering work of translation.

In 1611, a new authorized version of the Bible (now known as the King James Version) was released in England. The story of the creation of the authorized version is a complex and interesting one. It was a vast collaborative venture of considerable significance in English religious history. The result, however, was a text very much based on Tyndale's. For the books that Tyndale had translated, more than eighty percent of the text of the authorized version was taken word for word from his translation. Indeed, as the excerpts below illustrate, the phrasing (and the rhythm) of the King James version is typically closer to that of Tyndale than it is to any of the "intermediate" versions.

⁂

THE HOLY BIBLE,
Conteyning the Old Testament
ANNO DOMINI

Title page, Authorized version of the Bible ["King James Version"], 1611.

Tyndale's English Bible	King James Bible
GENESIS: CHAPTER I	GENESIS: CHAPTER I
In the beginning God created heaven and earth. The earth was void and empty, and darkness was upon the deep, and the spirit of God moved upon the water.	In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.
Then God said: let there be light and there was light. And God saw the light that it was good: and divided the light from the darkness, and called the light day, and the darkness night: and so of the evening and morning was made the first day.	And God said, Let there be light: and there was light. And God saw the light, that it was good: and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night. And the evening and the morning were the first day.
And God said: let there be a firmament between the waters, and let it divide the waters asunder. Then God made the firmament and parted the waters which were under the firmament, from the waters that were above the firmament: And it was so. And God called the firmament heaven. And so of the evening and morning was made the second day.	And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament Heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day.
And God said, let the waters that are under heaven gather themselves unto one place, that the dry land may appear: And it came so to pass. And God called the dry land the earth and the gathering together of waters called he the sea. And God saw that it was good.	And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he Seas: and God saw that it was good.
And God said: let the earth bring forth herb and grass that sow seed, and fruitful trees that bear fruit every one in his kind, having their seed in themselves upon the earth. And it came so to pass: and the earth brought forth herb and grass sowing seed every one in his kind and trees bearing fruit and having their seed in themselves every one in his kind. And God saw that it was good: and then of the evening and morning was made the third day.	And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth: and it was so. And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind: and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the third day.

Geneva Bible

GENESIS: CHAPTER 1

In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the deep, and the Spirit of God moved upon the waters.

Then God said, Let there be light: and there was light. And God saw the light that it was good, and God separated the light from the darkness. And God called the light, Day, and the darkness, He called Night. So the evening and the morning were the first day.

Again God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters: and let it separate the waters from the waters. Then God made the firmament, and parted the waters, which were under the firmament, from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament, Heaven. So the evening and the morning were the second day.

God said again, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. And God called the dry land, Earth, and He called the gathering together of the waters, Seas: and God saw that it was good.

Then God said, Let the earth bud forth the bud of the herb, that seedeth seed, the fruitful tree, which beareth fruit according to his kind, which may have his seed in itself upon the earth: and it was so. And the earth brought forth the bud of the herb, that seedeth seed according to his kind, also the tree that yieldeth fruit, which hath his seed in itself according to his kind: and God saw that it was good. So the evening and the morning were the third day.

Douay-Rheims Bible

GENESIS: CHAPTER 1

In the beginning God created heaven, and earth. And the earth was void and empty, and darkness was upon the face of the deep; and the spirit of God moved over the waters.

And God said: Be light made. And light was made. And God saw the light that it was good; and He divided the light from the darkness. And He called the light Day, and the darkness Night; and there was evening and morning one day.

And God said: Let there be a firmament made amidst the waters: and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made a firmament, and divided the waters that were under the firmament, from those that were above the firmament, and it was so. And God called the firmament, Heaven; and the evening and morning were the second day.

God also said: Let the waters that are under the heaven, be gathered together into one place: and let the dry land appear. And it was so done. And God called the dry land, Earth; and the gathering together of the waters, He called Seas. And God saw that it was good.

And He said: let the earth bring forth the green herb, and such as may seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after its kind, which may have seed in itself upon the earth. And it was so done.

And the earth brought forth the green herb, and such as yieldeth seed according to its kind, and the tree that beareth fruit, having seed each one according to its kind. And God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the third day.

Tyndale's English Bible	King James Bible
Then said God: let there be lights in the firmament of heaven to divide the day from the night, that they may be unto signs, seasons, days and years. And let them be lights in the firmament of heaven, to shine upon the earth. And so it was. And God made two great lights: A greater light to rule the day, and a less light to rule the night, and he made stars also. And God put them in the firmament of heaven to shine upon the earth, and to rule the day and the night, and to divide the light from darkness. And God saw that it was good: and so of the evening and morning was made the fourth day.	And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so. And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: He made the stars also. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth, and to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness: and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the fourth day.
And God said, let the water bring forth creatures that move and have life, and fowls for to fly over the earth under the firmament of heaven. And God created great whales and all manner of creatures that live and move, which the waters brought forth in their kinds, and all manner of feathered fowls in their kinds. And God saw that it was good: and God blessed them saying: Grow and multiply and fill the waters of the seas, and let the fowls multiply upon the earth. And so of the evening and morning was made the fifth day.	And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven. And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind: and God saw that it was good. And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth. And the evening and the morning were the fifth day.
And God said: let the earth bring forth living creatures in their kinds: cattle and worms and beasts of the earth in their kinds, and so it came to pass. And God made the beasts of the earth in their kinds and cattle in their kinds, and all manner worms of the earth in their kinds: and God saw that it was good.	And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind: and it was so. And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God saw that it was good.
And God said: let us make man in our similitude and after our likeness: that he may have rule over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over cattle, and over all the earth, and over all worms that creep on the earth. And God created man after His likeness, after the likeness of God created He Him: male and female created He them.	And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in His own image, in the image of God created He him; male and female created He them.

Geneva Bible

And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven, to separate the day from the night, and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so. God then made two great lights: the greater light to rule the day, and the less light to rule the night: He made also the stars. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven, to shine upon the earth, And to rule in the day, and in the night, and to separate the light from the darkness: and God saw that it was good. So the evening and the morning were the fourth day.

Afterward God said, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing that hath life: and let the fowl fly upon the earth in the open firmament of the heaven. Then God created the great whales, and every thing living and moving, which the waters brought forth in abundance, according to their kind, and every feathered fowl according to his kind: and God saw that it was good. Then God blessed them, saying, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let the fowl multiply in the earth. So the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

Moreover God said, Let the earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, cattle, and that which creepeth, and the beast of the earth, according to his kind: and it was so. And God made the beast of the earth according to his kind, and the cattle according to his kind, and every creeping thing of the earth according to his kind: and God saw that it was good.

Furthermore God said, Let us make man in our image according to our likeness, and let them rule over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the heaven, and over the beasts, and over all the earth, and over every thing that creepeth and moveth on the earth. Thus God created the man in his image: in the image of God created He him: He created them male and female.

Douay-Rheims Bible

And God said: Let there be lights made in the firmament of heaven, to divide the day and the night, and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years: To shine in the firmament of heaven, and to give light upon the earth. And it was so done. And God made two great lights: a greater light to rule the day; and a lesser light to rule the night: and the stars. And He set them in the firmament of heaven to shine upon the earth. And to rule the day and the night, and to divide the light and the darkness. And God saw that it was good. And the evening and morning were the fourth day.

God also said: let the waters bring forth the creeping creature having life, and the fowl that may fly over the earth under the firmament of heaven. And God created the great whales, and every living and moving creature, which the waters brought forth, according to their kinds, and every winged fowl according to its kind. And God saw that it was good. And He blessed them, saying: Increase and multiply, and fill the waters of the sea: and let the birds be multiplied upon the earth. And the evening and morning were the fifth day.

And God said: Let the earth bring forth the living creature in its kind, cattle and creeping things, and beasts of the earth, according to their kinds. And it was so done. And God made the beasts of the earth according to their kinds, and cattle, and every thing that creepeth on the earth after its kind. And God saw that it was good.

And He said: Let us make man to our image and likeness: and let him have dominion over the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the air, and the beasts, and the whole earth, and every creeping creature that moveth upon the earth. And God created man to His own image: to the image of God He created him: male and female He created them.

Tyndale's English Bible	King James Bible
And God blessed them, and God said unto them: Grow and multiply and fill the earth and subdue it, and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over all the beasts that move on the earth.	And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.
And God said: see, I have given you all herbs that sow seed which are on all the earth, and all manner trees that have fruit in them and sow seed: to be meat for you and for all beasts of the earth, and unto all fowls of the air, and unto all that creepeth on the earth wherein is life, that they may have all manner herbs and grass for to eat, and even so it was. And God beheld all that he had made, and lo they were exceeding good: and so of the evening and morning was made the sixth day. —1534	And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat. And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so. And God saw every thing that He had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day. —1611
MATTHEW: CHAPTER 5	MATTHEW: CHAPTER 5
When He saw the people He went up into a mountain, and when He was set, His disciples came to him, and He opened His mouth, and taught them saying: Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they which hunger and thirst for righteousness: for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they which suffer persecution for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men revile you, and persecute you, and shall falsely say all manner of evil sayings against you for my sake. Rejoice, and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven. For so persecuted they the Prophets which were before your days.	And seeing the multitudes, He went up into a mountain: and when He was set, His disciples came unto Him: and He opened His mouth, and taught them, saying, Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.

Geneva Bible

And God blessed them, and God said to them, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the heaven, and over every beast that moveth upon the earth.

And God said, Behold, I have given unto you every herb bearing seed, which is upon all the earth, and every tree, wherein is the fruit of a tree bearing seed: that shall be to you for meat. Likewise to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the heaven, and to every thing that moveth upon the earth, which hath life in itself, every green herb shall be for meat: and it was so. And God saw all that he had made, and lo, it was very good. So the evening and the morning were the sixth day.
—1599

MATTHEW: CHAPTER 5

And when He saw the multitude, He went up into a mountain: and when He was set, His disciples came to Him. And He opened His mouth and taught them, saying, Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they which hunger and thirst for righteousness: for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they which suffer persecution for righteousness sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you for my sake, falsely. Rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the Prophets which were before you.

Douay-Rheims Bible

And God blessed them, saying: Increase and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the air, and all living creatures that move upon the earth.

And God said: Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed upon the earth, and all trees that have in themselves seed of their own kind, to be your meat: And to all beasts of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to all that move upon the earth, and wherein there is life, that they may have to feed upon. And it was so done. And God saw all the things that He had made, and they were very good. And the evening and morning were the sixth day.
—1609

MATTHEW: CHAPTER 5

And seeing the multitudes, He went up into a mountain, and when He was set down, His disciples came unto Him. And opening His mouth He taught them, saying: Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are the meek: for they shall possess the land. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after justice: for they shall have their fill. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the clean of heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they that suffer persecution for justice' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when they shall revile you, and persecute you, and speak all that is evil against you, untruly, for my sake: Be glad and rejoice, for your reward is very great in heaven. For so they persecuted the prophets that were before you.

Tyndale's English Bible	King James Bible
Ye are the salt of the earth: but and if the salt have lost her saltiness, what can be salted therewith? It is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men. Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill, cannot be hid, neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, and it lighteth all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.	Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost his savor, wherewith shall it be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men. Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.
Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the Prophets: no I am not come to destroy them, but to fulfil them. For truly I say unto you, till heaven and earth perish, one jot or one tittle[1] of the law shall not escape, till all be fulfilled.	Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.
Whosoever breaketh one of these least commandments, and teacheth men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven. But whosoever observeth and teacheth, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.	Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.
For I say unto you, except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees,[2] ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven.	For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.
Ye have heard how it was said unto them of the old time: Thou shalt not kill. For whosoever killeth, shall be in danger of judgment. But I say unto you, whosoever is angry with his brother, shall be in danger of judgment. Whosoever sayeth unto his brother Racha,[3] shall be in danger of a council. But whosoever sayeth thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.	Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment: But I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.

[1] one jot or one tittle Not a whit; from "jot": the smallest particle or least letter of an alphabet, and "tittle": tiny mark or dot used for punctuation, e.g., the dot on the letter i.

[2] Scribes Ancient interpreters of religious law; Pharisees Members of an ancient orthodox Jewish sect.

[3] Racha Admonishment (sometimes spelled "Raca"), possibly meaning "fool" or "weakling."

Geneva Bible	Douay-Rheims Bible
Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost his savor, wherewith shall it be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men. Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill, cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.	You are the salt of the earth. But if the salt lose its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? It is good for nothing anymore but to be cast out, and to be trodden on by men. You are the light of the world. A city seated on a mountain cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but upon a candlestick, that it may shine to all that are in the house. So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven.
Think not that I am come to destroy the Law, or the Prophets. I am not come to destroy them, but to fulfil them. For truly I say unto you, Till heaven, and earth perish, one jot or one tittle of the Law shall not escape, till all things be fulfilled.	Do not think that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets. I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For amen I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot, or one tittle shall not pass of the law, till all be fulfilled.
Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall observe and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.	He therefore that shall break one of these least commandments, and shall so teach men, shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven. But he that shall do and teach, he shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.
For I say unto you, except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.	For I tell you, that unless your justice abound more than that of the scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.
Ye have heard that it was said unto them of the old time, Thou shalt not kill: for whosoever killeth, shall be culpable of judgment. But I say unto you, whosoever is angry with his brother unadvisedly, shall be culpable of judgment. And whosoever saith unto his brother, Raca, shall be worthy to be punished by the Council. And whosoever shall say, Fool, shall be worthy to be punished with hell fire.	You have heard that it was said to them of old: Thou shalt not kill. And whosoever shall kill, shall be in danger of the judgment. But I say to you, that whosoever is angry with his brother, shall be in danger of the judgment. And whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council. And whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.

Tyndale's English Bible	King James Bible
Therefore when thou offerest thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee: leave there thine offering before the altar, and go thy way first and be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.	Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee; Leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.
Agree with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way with him, lest that adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the minister, and then thou be cast into prison. I say unto thee verily: thou shalt not come out thence till thou have paid the utmost farthing.[1]	Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing.
Ye have heard how it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery. But I say unto you, that whosoever looketh on a wife, lusting after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.…	Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery: But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.
Ye have heard how it is said, an eye for an eye: a tooth for a tooth. But I say to you, that ye resist not wrong. But whosoever give thee a blow on thy right cheek, turn to him the other. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever will compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.[2] Give to him that asketh, and from him that would borrow turn not away.	Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.
Ye have heard how it is said: thou shalt love thine neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, love your enemies. Bless them that curse you. Do good to them that hate you. Pray for them which do you wrong and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your father that is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to arise on the evil, and on the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and unjust. For if ye love them, which love you: what reward shall ye have? Do not the Publicans[3] even so? And if ye be friendly to your brethren only: what singular thing do ye? Do not the Publicans likewise? Ye shall therefore be perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven, is perfect.	Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.
—1534	—1611

---

[1] farthing Coin of little value.

twain Two.

Publicans Tax-gatherers, a derogatory epithet.

Geneva Bible

If then thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, Leave there thine offering before the altar, and go thy way: first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.

Agree with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way with him, lest thine adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the sergeant, and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, thou shalt not come out thence, till thou hast paid the utmost farthing.

Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery. But I say unto you, that whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart....

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. But I say unto you, Resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever will compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. Give to him that asketh, and from him that would borrow of thee, turn not away.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies: bless them that curse you: do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which hurt you, and persecute you, That ye may be the children of your father that is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to arise on the evil, and the good, and sendeth rain on the just, and unjust.

For if ye love them, which love you, what reward shall you have? Do not the Publicans even the same? And if ye be friendly to your brethren only, what singular thing do ye? do not even the Publicans likewise? Ye shall therefore be perfect, as your Father which is in heaven, is perfect.
—1599

Douay-Rheims Bible

If therefore thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there thou remember that thy brother hath anything against thee; Leave there thy offering before the altar, and go first to be reconciled to thy brother: and then coming thou shalt offer thy gift.

Be at agreement with thy adversary betimes, whilst thou art in the way with him: lest perhaps the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Amen I say to thee, thou shalt not go out from thence till thou repay the last farthing.

You have heard that it was said to them of old: Thou shalt not commit adultery. But I say to you, that whosoever shall look on a woman to lust after her, hath already committed adultery with her in his heart....

You have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. But I say to you not to resist evil: but if one strike thee on thy right cheek, turn to him also the other: And if a man will contend with thee in judgment, and take away thy coat, let go thy cloak also unto him. And whosoever will force thee one mile, go with him other two. Give to him that asketh of thee and from him that would borrow of thee turn not away.

You have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thy enemy. But I say to you, Love your enemies: do good to them that hate you: and pray for them that persecute and calumniate[1] you: That you may be the children of your Father who is in heaven, who maketh his sun to rise upon the good, and bad, and raineth upon the just and the unjust. For if you love them that love you, what reward shall you have? do not even the publicans this? And if you salute your brethren only, what do you more? do not also the heathens this? Be you therefore perfect, as also your heavenly Father is perfect.
—1582

---

[1] calumniate Slander.

cxix.

The Goſpell off
Sancte Jhon.

The fyrſt Chapter.

IN the begynnynge was that worde/ ãd that worde was with god: and god was thatt worde. The ſame was in the begynnynge wyth god. All thyngſ were made by it/ and with out it/ was made noo thige/ that made was. In it was lyfe/ And lyfe was the light of mẽ/ And the light ſhyneth ĩ darcknes/ ãd darcknes cõprehẽded it not.

There was a mã ſent from god/ whoſe name was Jhon. The ſame cã as a witnes/ to beare witnes of the light/ that all men through hĩ myght beleve. He was nott that light: but to beare witnes of the light. That was a true light/ which lighteneth all men that come ĩto the worlde. He was in the worlde/ ãd the worlde by hĩ was made: and the worlde knewe hym not.

He cã ĩto his awne/ ãd his receaved hĩ not. vnto as meny as receaved hĩ/ gave he power to be the ſõnes of god: ĩ that they beleved õ his name: which were borne not of bloude nor of the will of the fleſſhe/ nor yet of the will of men: but of god.

And that worde was made fleſſhe/ and dwelt amonge vs/ and we ſawe the glory off yt/ as the glory off the only begotten ſonne off the father/

Page from William Tyndale's New Testament, 1526.

RELIGION AND DEVOTIONAL LIFE

CONTEXTS

After Henry VIII's break with the Roman Catholic Church in 1533 and the "Elizabethan Settlement" of 1558 that set the liturgical, ecclesiastical, and theological foundations of the Church of England, a majority of the English eventually came to accept, and many to love, the established Church. Others remained Catholic ("recusant") to varying degrees: some outwardly conformed; some risked their lives and fortunes to collaborate with a small but determined underground of priests who brought the sacraments and, often, texts printed in secret or smuggled in from abroad; yet others emigrated to the Continent, where some joined religious houses; and some changed allegiances—Ben Jonson changed twice, becoming a Catholic for a while and reverting. It is also wise to remember that, despite the period's religious hatreds and angry polemics, some Protestants had Catholic friends and a great many people in 1600 could still remember older relatives who had been raised Catholic.

Within the Church of England itself, on the other hand, a loud minority, although having little theological objection to the Elizabethan Settlement, demanded that religious practices and church government needed to be further "purified" of such "papist" elements as stained glass, fancy clerical costume, complex church music, altars, and even bishops. Those who rejected such demands sometimes scoffed at those who made them as "Puritans," and the name stuck. Eventually many "Puritans" left the Church of England altogether; these "Separatists," later called "Congregationalists," "Independents," "Nonconformists," or "Dissenters," were related to, although by no means identical with, the Presbyterians of Scotland. But the story does not end there, for beyond the edge of Protestantism a number of radical sects moved much further away from the practice and sometimes the theology of the established church. The political upheavals of the 1640s and 1650s in particular produced a great deal of religious radicalism: some were religious communists (the "Diggers"); some believed in the imminent coming of Christ ("The Fifth Monarchy Men"); some illegally preached to crowds, while others waited for an inward sense of God's presence that could even shake their bodies (the "Quakers"). Most of these movements disappeared; some, such as the Quakers and the Baptists, remain today. But while such people never held power in the period, their radical religious and political thought affected future developments in British devotional and intellectual culture.

Henry VIII broke with Rome but did not think himself thereby a Protestant. Particularly after 1540, with his Reformation in place, he became more conservative, restricting Bible reading and, in 1546, authorizing the torture and execution of those he thought "heretics." One of these was Anne Askew, whose suffering and death are described below. After his persecutions caused protest he swerved again toward the Protestants, and when his young son Edward VI took the throne in 1548, guided by Thomas Cranmer, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Edward Seymour, the Duke of Somerset, the English Reformation took an explicitly Protestant, indeed a Calvinist, direction. The year 1549 saw the first version of Cranmer's masterpiece, the Book of Common Prayer, which gave the new church a vernacular liturgy that everybody could understand and that, thanks in part to the printing press, could be uniform throughout the realm. Aside from William Tyndale, whose translations of the Bible in the 1520s and 1530s provided most of the language in the King James Version of 1611, there is no other writer whose prose played such a vital role in shaping the aesthetics of English Christian practice (or, nowadays, despite some modernization, that of the Anglican community globe-wide).

With the accession of the Catholic Mary I in 1553 and then of the Protestant Elizabeth I in 1558, religious and political oscillation continued. Under Mary the Catholic service was restored. Some Protestants fled abroad (a number to Geneva) but several hundred who stayed behind, some of them women, were burned at the stake or otherwise executed. Among these were Bishops Hugh Latimer and Nicholas Ridley in 1555 and Cranmer himself in 1556. Elizabeth restored English Protestantism (a slightly more mellow Protestantism than what Edward preferred, for the new queen could be conservative in her religious views and tastes), which began to put down deep roots. By the 1570s England was effectively a Protestant country, albeit one with a Catholic minority. Aside from the Bible and the Book of Common Prayer, the text most important to establishing the culture of the new religious order was John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (1563), a vivid account of the persecution and execution of various Protestants. Foxe includes some early Christian martyrs (he was trying to establish Protestantism as the ancient and hence true Christianity) as well as accounts of some earlier Reformers such as John Wycliffe and Martin Luther, but his focus is on the reigns of Henry VIII and Mary. Foxe's Book of Martyrs, as it came to be called, went through four editions in his lifetime and many thereafter; his work continued to fan the flames of anti-Catholic feeling for decades and indeed centuries after his death.

If John Foxe provides a vivid sense of the anti-Catholic streak in English Protestantism during this period, Lady Margaret Hoby (1571–1633) provides an equally vivid picture of the importance of religion to daily life in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Educated in a Puritan family and heir to a substantial estate, Margaret Dakins was eventually married (following the deaths of her first two husbands) to Thomas Hoby. The couple had no children, and she devoted herself to helping run their country estate, to providing medical services to the community—and to religious devotion.

The last of the texts below shows that some could respond to religious polemics in a moderate voice. Well before the seventeenth century, Puritan aims had broadened to include not just the hope (shared with less militant Protestants) that the Bible would be widely read, but also the elimination from the English Church of all remaining traces of Catholicism—in the liturgy, the physical appearance of churches, and church government—and the reformation of English manners and morals. This last aim included the elimination of many traditional practices, such as country dances, maypoles, bonfires, Mayday celebrations, bell-ringing, and games, that Puritans called "papist" or even "pagan." Puritans stressed sobriety of clothing and manner (they also objected to long hair), insisted on a strict observance of the Sabbath, and denounced drunkenness and other signs of immorality. Owen Felltham (?1602–68) was a widely-read essayist and poet; his "Of Puritans" (1623) explores the issues behind the rhetoric, notes the different meanings different people had attached to the label "Puritan," and resolves to admire what should be admired but not to deny life's pleasures. "Be merry, but sin not," he concludes, in a quintessential gesture of Anglican compromise.

⌘⌘⌘

The Martyrdom of Anne Askew

Anne Askew was among the Protestant reformers persecuted for their religious beliefs under Henry VIII. Some issues that excited controversy (particularly over precisely what happens to the consecrated bread and wine at Communion), although still important, now seem less urgent to many people. Others, such as the degree to which Christians need priests to act as intermediaries when they confess their sins or interpret the Bible, or if a Christian church needs a hierarchical clergy, or what should be the role of the government in church affairs, remain live issues for Christians today.

Askew wrote two accounts of the examinations to which she was subjected ("The First Examination" and "The Latter Examination"). She somehow arranged to have these smuggled out of the prison in which she was confined, and they were published in Germany by John Bale in his Examinations, and later incorporated by John Foxe into his Acts and Monuments. The versions differ somewhat, and in both cases it has been suggested that the mediating voices may have shaped Askew's accounts for their own purposes. There is no doubt, however, that both Bale's and Foxe's versions of the accounts are based on originals by Askew herself. The text below is that provided by Foxe, and has traditionally been considered the more reliable of the two.

Also included below are the description by Foxe of her death and a ballad alleged to have been written by Askew.

from Anne Askew, "The First Examination of Anne Askew" (1546)

To satisfy your expectation, good people (sayeth she), this was my first examination in the year of our Lord 1545, and in the month of March. First Christopher Dare examined me at Saddlers' Hall, being one of the quest,[1] and asked if I did not believe that the sacrament hanging over the altar[2] was the very body of Christ really. Then I demanded this question of him: wherefore Saint Stephen was stoned to death. And he said he could not tell. Then I answered that no more would I assoil[3] his vain question....

Thirdly, he asked me wherefore I said that I had rather to read five lines in the Bible, than to hear five masses in the temple. I confessed that I said no less. Not for the dispraise of either the Epistle or Gospel, but because the one did greatly edify me, and the other nothing at all....

Fourthly, he laid unto my charge that I should say: "If an ill[4] priest ministered, it was the Devil and not God." My answer was that I never spake such thing. But this was my saying: "That whatsoever he were which ministered unto me, his ill conditions could not hurt my faith, but in spirit I received nevertheless the body and blood of Christ." He asked me what I said concerning confession.[5] I answered him my meaning, which was as Saint James sayeth, that every man ought to knowledge[6] his faults to other, and the one to pray for the other....

Seventhly, he asked me if I had the spirit of God in me. I answered if I had not, I was but reprobate or cast away. Then he said he had sent for a priest to examine me, which was there at hand. The priest asked me what I said to the sacrament of the altar. And required much to know therein my meaning. But I desired him again to hold me excused concerning that matter. None other answer would I make him, because I perceived him a papist.

Eighthly, he asked me if I did not think that private masses did help souls departed.[7] And I said it was great idolatry to believe more in them than in the death which Christ died for us. Then they had me thence unto my Lord Mayor and he examined me, as they had before, and I answered him directly in all things as I answered the quest afore. Besides this my Lord Mayor laid one thing unto my charge which was never spoken of me but of them. And that was whether a mouse eating the host received God or no. This question did I never ask, but indeed they asked it of me, whereunto I made them no answer but smiled. Then the Bishop's Chancellor rebuked me and said that I was much to blame for uttering the Scriptures. For Saint Paul (he said) forbade women to speak or to talk of the word of God. I answered him that I knew Paul's meaning as well as he, which is, 1 Corinthians 14, that a woman ought not to speak in the congregation by the way of teaching. And then I asked him how many women he had seen go into the pulpit and preach? He said he never saw none. Then I said, he ought to find no fault in poor women, except[1] they had offended the law. Then my Lord Mayor commanded me to ward. I asked him if sureties would not serve me, and he made me short answer, that he would take none.

---

[1] being one of the quest I.e., being one of those conducting the inquest or examination.

[2] sacrament hanging over the altar Communion bread or wafers. According to the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, first asserted by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), the substance, but not the "accidental" appearance and taste, of the bread and wine consecrated at the sacrament of Holy Communion are miraculously changed into the body and blood of Christ. In the sixteenth century holy wafers sometimes hung in a container above the altar.

[3] assoil Refute.

[4] ill Ill in spirit; sinful.

[5] confession According to Catholic doctrine, it was essential that Christians confess to a priest at least once a year. For Protestants the confession of sins did not require an intermediary between oneself and God; confession could be conducted privately.

[6] knowledge Acknowledge; make known.

[7] private masses ... departed Arranging for a private Mass to be held was one means whereby Catholics hoped to receive benefits in the afterlife—the benefit in the case of these private services being a reduction of time to be served in Purgatory before ascending to Heaven.

Then was I had to the Counter,[2] and there remained eleven days, no friend admitted to speak with me. But in the meantime there was a priest sent to me which said that he was commanded of the Bishop to examine me, and to give me good counsel, which he did not. But first he asked me for what cause I was put in the Counter. And I told him I could not tell. Then he said it was great pity that I should be there without cause, and concluded that he was very sorry for me.

Secondly, he said it was told him that I should deny the sacrament of the altar. And I answered him again that, that I had said, I had said. Thirdly, he asked me if I were shriven.[3] I told him so that[4] I might have one of these three, that is to say, Doctor Crome, Sir William, or Huntingdon,[5] I was contented, because I knew them to be men of wisdom. "As for you or any other I will not dispraise, because I know ye not."...

Fourthly, he asked me if the Host should fall, and a beast did eat it, whether the beast did receive God or no. I answered, "Seeing ye have taken the pains to ask this question I desire you also to assoil it yourself. For I will not do it, because I perceive ye come to tempt me." And he said it was against the order of schools[6] that he which asked the question should answer it. I told him I was but a woman and knew not the course of schools. Fifthly, he asked me if I intended to receive the sacrament at Easter or no. I answered that else I were no[7] Christian woman, and there I did rejoice, that the time was so near at hand. And then he departed thence with many fair words....

In the meanwhile he commanded his archdeacon to common with me, who said unto me, "Mistress, wherefore are ye accused and thus troubled here before the Bishop?"

To whom I answered again and said, "Sir, ask, I pray you, my accusers, for I know not as yet."

Then took he my book out of my hand and said, "Such books as this hath brought you to the trouble you are in. Beware," sayeth he, "beware, for he that made this book and was the author thereof was an heretic, I warrant you, and burnt in Smithfield."

Then I asked him if he were certain and sure that it was true that he had spoken. And he said he knew well the book was of John Frith's[8] making. Then I asked him if he were not ashamed for to judge of the book before he saw it within or yet knew the truth thereof. I said also that such unadvised and hasty judgment is token apparent of a very slender wit. Then I opened the book and showed it to him. He said he thought it had been another, for he could find no fault therein. Then I desired him no more to be so unadvisedly rash and swift in judgment, till he thoroughly knew the truth, and so he departed from me.

from John Foxe, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days (1563)

In a passage separate from his version of Askew's own narrative, Foxe presents the following account of her death. (See also the selections from Foxe in the website component of this anthology.)

Hitherto we have entreated of this good woman, now it remaineth that we touch somewhat as touching her end and martyrdom. She being born of such stock and kindred that she might have lived in great wealth and prosperity, if she would rather have followed the world than Christ, but now she was so tormented, that she could neither live long in so great distress, neither yet by the adversaries be suffered to die in secret. Wherefore the day of her execution was appointed, and she brought into Smithfield in a chair, because she could not go on her feet, by means of her great torments. When she was brought unto the stake she was tied by the middle with a chain that held up her body. When all things were thus prepared to the fire, the King's letters of pardon were brought, whereby to offer her safeguard of her life if she would recant, which she would neither receive, neither yet vouchsafe once to look upon. Shaxton[1] also was there present who, openly that day recanting his opinions, went about with a long oration to cause her also to turn, against whom she stoutly resisted. Thus she being troubled so many manner of ways, and having passed through so many torments, having now ended the long course of her agonies, being compassed in with flames of fire, as a blessed sacrifice unto God, she slept in the Lord, in anno[2] 1546, leaving behind her a singular example of Christian constancy for all men to follow.

---

[1] except Unless.

[2] the Counter Prison in London.

[3] if I were shriven I.e., if I had received the Sacrament of Confession.

[4] so that So long as.

[5] Doctor Crome, Sir William, or Huntingdon All reformist preachers.

[6] order of schools Principles of scholastic theology.

[7] else I were no Unless I received the sacrament at Easter I would not be a Christian.

[8] John Frith Protestant reformer, executed in 1533.

Woodcut, The Burning of Anne Askew and Her Fellow Martyrs, July 1546 (1563).

This woodcut appears in the first edition of Foxe's Acts and Monuments. As the illustration shows, a grandstand had been built specially for the occasion. A sermon was preached before the pyre was lit, and the Lord Mayor and other officials were among the many spectators.

Anonymous, "I Am a Woman Poor and Blind" (16th century)

The following ballad, commonly attributed to Anne Askew, survives in a number of versions; evidently it was widely known throughout the sixteenth century.

I Am a Woman Poor and Blind

I am a woman poor and blind,
And little knowledge remains in me,
Long have I sought, but fain would find,
What herb in my Garden were best to be.

A Garden I have which in unknown,
Which God of his goodness gave to me,
I mean my body, where I should have sown
The seed of Christ's true verity.

My spirit within me is vexed sore,
My spirit striveth against the same,
My sorrows do increase more and more,
My conscience suffereth most bitter pain.

I with myself being thus at strife
Would fain have been at rest,
Musing and studying, in mortal life,
What things I might do to please God best.

With whole intent and one accord,
Unto a Gardiner[3] that I did know,
I desired him, for the love of the Lord,
True seed in my garden for to sow,

Then this proud Gardener, seeing me so blind,
He thought on me to work his will,
And flattered me with words so kind,
To have me continue in my blindness still.

He fed me then with lies and mocks,
For venial sins[4] he bid me go;
To give my money to stones and stocks,[5]
Which was stark lies and nothing so.[6]

With stinking meat then was I fed,
For to keep me from my Salvation,

---

[1] Shaxton Nicholas Shaxton, a preacher.

[2] anno Latin: year.

[3] Gardiner The poet puns here and in the next verse with the name of Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester and a chief councillor to Henry VIII.

[4] venial sins Roman Catholic doctrine makes a distinction between pardonable (or "venial") and deadly (or "mortal") sins.

[5] stones and stocks Images made of stone and of wood (for example, of saints).

[6] nothing so None of it true.

I had Trentals of mass, and balls of lead,[1]
Not one word spoke of Christ's passion.

In me was sown all kind of feigned seeds,
With Popish Ceremonies many a one,
Masses of Requiem,[2] with other juggling deeds,
Still God's Spirit out of my garden was gone.

Then was I commanded most strictly,
If of my Salvation I would be sure,
To build some Chapel or Chauntry,[3]
To be prayed for while the earth doth endure.

"Beware of new learning," quoth he, "it lyes,
Which in the thing I most abhor,
Meddle not with it in any manner of wise,° ways
But do as your fathers have done before."

My trust I did put in the Devil's works,
Thinking sufficient my Soul to save,
Being worse than either Jews or Turks,
Thus Christ of his merits I did deprave,° deprive

I might liken myself, with a woeful heart,
Unto the Dumb man, in Luke the eleven,[4]
From whence Christ caused the Devil to depart,
But, shortly after, he took the other seven.

My time thus, good Lord, so quickly I spent,
Alas! I shall die the sooner therefore;
O Lord, I find it written in thy Testament,
That thou hast mercy enough in store

For such Sinners, as the Scripture saith,
That would gladly repent and follow Thy word,
Which I'll not deny, whilst I have breath,
For prison, fire, faggot,[5] or fierce sword.

Strengthen me, good Lord, thy truth to stand,
For the bloody butchers have me at their will,
With their slaughter knives ready drawn in their hands,
My simple carcass to devour and kill.

O Lord, forgive me my offence,
For I offended thee very sore;
Take therefore my sinful body from hence,
Then shall I, vile Creature, offend thee no more.

I would wish all creatures, and faithful friends,
For to keep from this Gardener's hands,
For he will bring them soon unto their ends,
With cruel torments of fierce fire brands.

I dare not presume for him to pray,
Because the truth of him it was well known,
But, since that time, he had gone astray,
And much pestilent seed abroad he hath sown.

Because that now I have so space
The cause of my death truly to show,
I trust hereafter that, by God's holy Grace,
That all faithful men shall plainly know.

To Thee, O Lord, I bequeath my spirit,
That art the Work-master of the same,
It is Thine, Lord, therefore take it of right,
My carcass on earth I leave, from whence it came.

Although to ashes it can be now burned,
I know Thou can'st raise it again

---

[1] Trentals of mass Long series of masses; balls of lead Papal bulls, or commands.

[2] Masses of Requiem Requiem masses are Roman Catholic services on behalf of the souls of the dead, during which the congregation is exhorted to pray that the soul now departed this life not be required to remain in Purgatory for a protracted period before being released to Heaven. Early Christian doctrine conceived of Heaven and Hell as stark alternatives. Belief in Purgatory seems to have developed or at least to have been affirmed in the twelfth century. The doctrine holds that whereas the most sinful souls are sent to Hell for eternal punishment, all souls are in fact sinful to some degree and hence even those who are not damned, with the exception of the particularly good, need a period of purgative suffering before they are ready for God's presence. The clergy was thought able to intercede with God on behalf of such souls so as to reduce their time in Purgatory; sacrifices, including financial sacrifice in aid of the poor or the Church, please God and allow the donor future relief from time in Purgatory. This whole doctrine was roundly condemned by Protestants, both because of the corruption that they (and some Catholics) said it fostered and because Protestant belief holds that salvation depends on faith alone, not on good works. Nor, said Protestants, can Purgatory be found in the Bible, for them the only true source of doctrine.

[3] Chauntry Chapel specially endowed by its founder, for whom prayers are to be said during services held there.

[4] Unto … eleven See Luke 11.

[5] faggot Pile of kindling.

In the same likeness as Thou it formed,
In Heaven with Thee evermore to remain.

from Thomas Cranmer, The Book of Common Prayer (1552)

Thomas Cranmer's Book of Common Prayer, one of English literature's glories and the source of many common phrases still in use today, first came into use in 1549 as part of Edward VI's establishment of a fully Protestant Reformation in England. The book, much of it translated from the Catholic "Sarum" prayer book, was welcomed by some, but also criticized—from two directions. Conservatives such as Princess Mary (and an unknown percentage of the population) grieved that it deserted so much Catholic tradition and doctrine. Radical Protestants, such as John Hooper, said it did not go far enough; Hooper even refused to undergo the ritual making him bishop of Gloucester if his consecration had to follow the form in the new prayer book. Cranmer responded by sending Hooper to prison, and after three weeks of rethinking his objections, the radical relented and was consecrated bishop according to the new fashion. Cranmer himself, however, shared the view of some Reformers that the 1549 book had not moved far enough from its Catholic origins, and under his leadership substantial revisions were undertaken. The resulting 1552 Book of Common Prayer, although unable fully to escape the heritage of prayer and biblical texts that it shared with Catholic liturgical practice, was more fully Protestant.

The 1552 edition remained in use for only a very short period; when Queen Mary assumed the throne following the death of young Edward VI in 1553 she immediately brought back the Catholic (and Latin) services. In 1556 Cranmer himself was burnt at the stake for heresy. But when Elizabeth I succeeded Mary in 1558, use of the second prayer book soon resumed, although in the somewhat more moderate revised version of 1559. Further minor revisions to the Book were made by order of Elizabeth and James I; those made under Charles II in 1661–62, however, more significantly tilted the doctrinal balance of the prayer book toward Catholic tradition. The 1552 Book of Common Prayer, together with the modifications of 1559, nevertheless remains the basis of the Anglican services.

The Solemnization of Matrimony

First the banns must be asked three several Sundays or holy days, in the time of service, the people being present after the accustomed manner.

And if the persons that would be married dwell in diverse parishes, the banns must be asked in both parishes, and the curate of the one parish shall not solemnize matrimony betwixt them, without a certificate of the banns being thrice asked, from the curate of the other parish. At the day appointed for Solemnization of Matrimony, the persons to be married shall come into the body of the church, with their friends and neighbours. And there the Priest shall thus say,

Dearly beloved friends, we are gathered together here in the sight of God, and in the face of His congregation, to join together this man and this woman in holy matrimony, which is an honorable estate, instituted of God in Paradise, in the time of man's innocency, signifying unto us the mystical union that is betwixt Christ and His Church: which holy estate Christ adorned and beautified with his presence, and first miracle that He wrought, in Cana of Galilee, and is commended of Saint Paul to be honourable among all men; and therefore is not to be enterprised, nor taken in hand unadvisedly, lightly, or wantonly, to satisfy men's carnal lusts and appetites, like brute beasts that have no understanding: but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God: duly considering the causes for which Matrimony was ordained. One was the procreation of children, to be brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord, and praise of God. Secondly it was ordained for a remedy against sin, and to avoid fornication, that such persons as have not the gift of continency might marry, and keep themselves undefiled members of Christ's body. Thirdly, for the mutual society, help, and comfort, that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity; into the which holy estate these two persons present come now to be joined. Therefore if any man can show any just cause, why they may not lawfully be joined together: let him now speak, or else hereafter for ever hold his peace. . . .

If no impediment be alleged, then shall the Curate say unto the man,

Name, Wilt thou have this woman to thy wedded wife, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honour, and keep her in sickness and in health? And forsaking all other keep thee only to her, so long as you both shall live?

The man shall answer,

I will.

Then shall the Priest say to the woman,

Name, Wilt thou have this man to thy wedded husband, to live together after God's ordinance, in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou obey him, and serve him, love, honor, and keep him, in sickness and in health? and forsaking all other keep thee only unto him, so long as you both shall live?

The woman shall answer,

I will.

Then shall the Minister say,

Who giveth this woman to be married unto this man?

And the Minister receiving the woman at her father or friend's hands, shall cause the man to take the woman by the right hand, and so either to give their troth to other. The man first saying,

I Name take thee Name to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness, and in health, to love, and to cherish, till death us depart, according to God's holy ordinance: And thereto I plight thee my troth.

Then shall they loose their hands, and the woman taking again the man by the right hand shall say,

I Name take thee Name to my wedded husband, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness, and in health, to love, cherish, and to obey, till death us depart, according to God's holy ordinance: And thereto I give thee my troth.

Then shall they again loose their hands, and the man shall give unto the woman a ring, laying the same upon the book, with the accustomed duty to the priest and clerk. And the priest taking the ring shall deliver it unto the man, to put it upon the fourth finger of the woman's left hand. And the man taught by the priest, shall say,

With this ring I thee wed: with my body I thee worship: and with all my worldly goods I thee endow. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Then the man leaving the ring upon the fourth finger of the woman's left hand, the Minister shall say,

Let us pray.
O Eternal God, Creator and Preserver of all mankind, Giver of all spiritual grace, the Author of everlasting life: Send Thy blessing upon these Thy servants, this man and this woman, whom we bless in Thy name, that as Isaac and Rebecca lived faithfully together; so these persons may surely perform and keep the vow and covenant betwixt them made, whereof this ring given and received is a token and pledge: and may ever remain in perfect love and peace together; and live according unto Thy laws; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Then shall the Priest join their right hands together, and say,

Those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.

The Order for the Burial of the Dead

The Priest meeting the corpse at the Church stile, shall say, Or else the priests and clerks shall sing, and so go either unto the church or towards the grave,

I am the Resurrection and the Life (sayeth the Lord): he that believeth in Me, yea though he were dead, yet shall he live. And whosoever liveth and believeth in Me, shall not die for ever. (John 11.)

I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that I shall rise out of the earth in the last day, and shall be covered again with my skin, and shall see God in my flesh: yea, and I my self shall behold Him, not with other but with these same eyes. (Job 19.)

We brought nothing into this world, neither may we carry any thing out of this world. 1 Tim. 6. The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away. Even as it hath pleased the Lord, so cometh things to pass: blessed be the name of the Lord. (Job 1.)

When they come at the grave, whiles the corpse is made ready to be laid into the earth, the Priest shall say, or the priest and clerks shall singe,

Man that is born of a woman, hath but a short time to live, and is full of misery: he cometh up and is cut down like a flower; he flieth as it were a shadow, and never continueth in one stay. (Job 9.) In the midst of life we be in death: of whom may we seek for succour, but of Thee, O Lord, which for our sins justly art displeased? yet, O Lord God most holy, O Lord most mighty, O holy and most merciful Saviour, deliver us not into the bitter pains of eternal death. Thou knowest, Lord, the secrets of our hearts: shut not up Thy merciful eyes to our prayers: But spare us, Lord most holy, O God most mightie, O holy and merciful Saviour, Thou most worthy judge eternal, suffer us not at our last hour for any pains of death to fall from Thee.

Then while the earth shall be cast upon the body, by some standing by, the priest shall say,

Forasmuch as it hath pleased almighty God of His great mercy to take unto Himself the soul of our dear brother here departed: we therefore commit his body to the ground, earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust, in sure and certain hope of resurrection to eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be like to His glorious body, according to the mighty working whereby He is able to subdue all things to himself.

Then shall be said or sung,

I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me: Write from henceforth, blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. Even so sayth the spirit, that they rest from their labours. (Job 11.) …

The Collect

O Merciful God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the resurrection and the life, in whom whosoever believeth, shall live though he die; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Him, shall not die eternally: who also taught us (by His holy Apostle Paul) not to be sorry, as men without hope, for them that sleep in Him: We meekly beseech Thee (O Father) to raise us from the death of sin unto the life of righteousness, that when we shall depart this life, we may rest in Him, as our hope is this our brother doeth; and that at the general resurrection in the last day, we may be found acceptable in Thy sight, and receive that blessing which Thy well beloved Son shall then pronounce to all that love and fear Thee, saying: Come, ye blessed children of My Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world. Grant this we beseech Thee, O merciful Father, through Jesus Christ our mediator and redeemer. Amen.

John Foxe

John Foxe (1516–87) wrote an extended (though unfinished) martyrology in Latin when he was living on the Continent during the reign of Queen Mary; it was published under the title Rerum in ecclesia gestorum … commentari ("Commentary on the Story of Things Ecclesiastical") in 1559. The first English edition of the Actes and Monuments of these Latter and Perilous Dayes, Touching Matters of the Church appeared in 1563. Titles of subsequent editions varied considerably (Actes and Monuments of Things Passed in Every King's Time, in this Realm, Especially in the Church of England; Acts and Monuments of Martyrs, with a General Discourse of these Latter Persecutions and Tumults, Stirred up by Roman Prelates in the Church) but were always extensive. Not surprisingly, the work has come to be referred to simply as Acts and Monuments, or alternatively as Foxe's Book of Martyrs.

Included below are a few brief excerpts dealing with generalities, including an influential essay Foxe added to the 1570 edition arguing that the invention of the printing press was a gift from God to further the spread of Protestantism. These selections are followed by Foxe's famous account of the martydom of Bishops Ridley and Latimer in 1555. Also included are several illustrations; it has been widely speculated that the visual depictions of martyrdom that accompanied Foxe's text contributed significantly to the continuing popularity of the book.

from John Foxe, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days (1563)

… King Henry by Parliament according to God's Word put down the Pope: the clergy consented, and all men openly by oath refused this usurped supremacy, knowing by God's Word Christ to be Head of the Church, and every king in his realm to have under and next unto Christ, the chief sovereignty. King Edward also by Parliament according to God's Word, set the marriage of priests at liberty, abolished the popish and idolatrous Mass, changed the Latin service, and set up the holy Communion: the whole clergy consented hereunto: many of them set it forth by their preaching: and all they by practicing confirmed the same.

Notwithstanding, now when the state is altered, and the laws changed, the Papistical clergy, with other, like worldlings, as men neither fearing God, neither fleeing worldly shame, neither yet regarding their consciences, oaths, or honesty, like wavering weathercocks, turn round about, and putting on harlots' foreheads, sing a new song, and cry with an impudent mouth: come again, come again to the Catholic Church, meaning the anti-Christian Church of Rome which is the synagogue of Satan, and the very sink of all superstition, heresy, and idolatry.…

The Apostles were beaten for their boldness, and they rejoiced that they suffered for Christ's cause. Ye have also provided rods for us, and bloody whips: yet when ye have done that which God's hand and counsel hath determined that ye shall do, be it life or death, I trust that God will so assist us by His holy spirit, and grace, that we shall patiently suffer it, and praise God for it.

THE BENEFIT AND INVENTION OF PRINTING
(added in 1570)

In following the course and order of years, we find this foresaid Year of Our Lord 1450 to be famous and memorable, for the divine and miraculous invention of printing.… The first inventor thereof (as most agree) is thought to be a German dwelling first in Strasbourg, afterward citizen of Mainz, named John Faustus, a goldsmith. The occasion of this invention first was by engraving the letters of the alphabet in metal: who then laying black ink upon the metal, gave the form of the letters in paper. The man being industrious and active perceiving that, thought to proceed further, and to prove whether it would frame as well in words and in whole sentences as it did in letters. Which when he perceived to come well to pass, he made certain other of his counsel, one John Gutenberg and Peter Schaeffer, binding them by their oath to keep silence for a season. After 10 years, John Gutenberg, copartner with Faustus, began then first to broach the matter at Strasbourg. The Art being yet but rude, in process of time was set forward by inventive wits, adding more and more to the perfection thereof....

Printing came of God. Notwithstanding what man soever was the instrument, without all doubt God Himself was the ordainer and disposer thereof.... Now to consider to what end and purpose the Lord hath given this gift of printing to the earth, and to what great utility and necessity it serveth, it is not hard to judge.... God of His secret judgement, seeing time to help His church, hath found a way by this faculty of printing, not only to confound his[1] life and conversation, which before he could not abide to be touched, but also to cast down the foundation of his standing, that is, to examine, confute, and detect his doctrine, laws, and institution most detestable, in such sort, that though his life were never so pure: yet his doctrine standing, as it doth, no man is so blind, but may see, that either the Pope is Antichrist, or else that Antichrist is near cousin to the Pope: And all this doth, and will hereafter more and more appear, by printing.

The reason whereof is this: for that hereby tongues are known, knowledge groweth, judgement increaseth, books are dispersed, the Scripture is seen, the doctors be read, stories be opened, times compared, truth discerned, falsehood detected, and with finger pointed, and all (as I said) through the benefit of printing. Wherefore I suppose that either the Pope must abolish printing, or he must seek a new world to reign over: for else, as this world standeth, printing, doubtless, will abolish him. Both the Pope, and all his College of Cardinals, must this understand, that through the light of printing, the world beginneth now to have eyes to see, and heads to judge. He can not walk so invisible in a net, but he will be spied.... So that either the Pope must abolish knowledge and printing, or printing at length will root him out. By reason whereof, as printing of books ministered matter of reading: so reading brought learning: learning showed light, by the brightness whereof blind ignorance was suppressed, error detected, and finally God's glory, with truth of His word, advanced.

BISHOP RIDLEY AND BISHOP LATIMER

These reverend prelates suffered October 17, 1555, at Oxford, on the same day Wolsey and Pygott[2] perished at Ely. Pillars of the Church and accomplished ornaments of human nature, they were the admiration of the realm, amiably conspicuous in their lives, and glorious in their deaths.

Dr. Ridley was born in Northumberland, was first taught grammar at Newcastle, and afterward removed to Cambridge, where his aptitude in education raised him gradually until he came to be the head of Pembroke College, where he received the title of Doctor of Divinity. Having returned from a trip to Paris, he was appointed chaplain by Henry VIII and Bishop of Rochester, and was afterwards translated to the see of London in the time of Edward VI.

To his sermons the people resorted, swarming about him like bees, coveting the sweet flowers and wholesome juice of the fruitful doctrine, which he did not only preach, but showed the same by his life, as a glittering lantern to the eyes and senses of the blind, in such pure order that his very enemies could not reprove him in any one jot....

Dr. Ridley was first in part converted by reading Bertram's book on the Sacrament, and by his conferences with Archbishop Cranmer and Peter Martyr.

When Edward VI was removed from the throne, and the bloody Mary succeeded, Bishop Ridley was immediately marked as an object of slaughter. He was first sent to the Tower, and afterward, at Oxford, was consigned to the common prison of Bocardo, with Archbishop Cranmer and Mr. Latimer. Being separated from them, he was placed in the house of one Irish, where he remained until the day of his martyrdom, from 1554, until October 16, 1555....

This old practiced soldier of Christ, Master Hugh Latimer, was the son of one Hugh Latimer, of Thurkesson in the county of Leicester, a husbandman, of a good and wealthy estimation; where also he was born and brought up until he was four years of age, or thereabout: at which time his parents, having him as then left for their only son, with six daughters, seeing his ready, prompt, and sharp wit, purposed to train him up in erudition, and knowledge of good literature; wherein he so profited in his youth at the common schools of his own country, that at the age of fourteen years, he was sent to the University of Cambridge; where he entered into the study of the school divinity of that day, and was from principle a zealous observer of the Romish superstitions of the time. In his oration when he commenced bachelor of divinity, he inveighed against the reformer Melanchthon,[1] and openly declaimed against good Mr. Stafford, divinity lecturer in Cambridge.

---

[1] his I.e., the Pope's.

[2] Wolsey and Pygott William Wolsey and Robert Pygott were burnt at the stake for their Protestant beliefs at Ely in 1555.

Mr. Thomas Bilney, moved by a brotherly pity towards Mr. Latimer, begged to wait upon him in his study, and to explain to him the groundwork of his (Mr. Bilney's) faith. This blessed interview effected his conversion: the persecutor of Christ became his zealous advocate, and before Dr. Stafford died he became reconciled to him.

Once converted, he became eager for the conversion of others, and commenced to be public preacher, and private instructor in the university. His sermons were so pointed against the absurdity of praying in the Latin tongue, and withholding the oracles of salvation from the people who were to be saved by belief in them, that he drew upon himself the pulpit animadversions of several of the resident friars and heads of houses, whom he subsequently silenced by his severe criticisms and eloquent arguments. This was at Christmas, 1529. At length Dr. West preached against Mr. Latimer at Barwell Abbey, and prohibited him from preaching again in the churches of the university, notwithstanding which, he continued during three years to advocate openly the cause of Christ, and even his enemies confessed the power of those talents he possessed. Mr. Bilney remained here some time with Mr. Latimer, and thus the place where they frequently walked together obtained the name of Heretics' Hill.

Mr. Latimer at this time traced out the innocence of a poor woman, accused by her husband of the murder of her child. Having preached before King Henry VIII at Windsor, he obtained the unfortunate mother's pardon. This, with many other benevolent acts, served only to excite the spleen of his adversaries. He was summoned before Cardinal Wolsey for heresy, but being a strenuous supporter of the King's supremacy, in opposition to the Pope's, by favor of Lord Cromwell and Dr. Buts (the king's physician), he obtained the living of West Kingston, in Wiltshire. For his sermons here against Purgatory, the immaculacy of the Virgin, and the worship of images, he was cited to appear before Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, and John, Bishop of London. He was required to subscribe certain articles, expressive of his conformity to the accustomed usages; and there is reason to think, after repeated weekly examinations, that he did subscribe, as they did not seem to involve any important article of belief.

Guided by Providence, he escaped the subtle nets of his persecutors, and at length, through the powerful friends before mentioned, became Bishop of Worcester, in which function he qualified or explained away most of the papal ceremonies he was for form's sake under the necessity of complying with. He continued in this active and dignified employment some years.

Beginning afresh to set forth his plow he labored in the Lord's harvest most fruitfully, discharging his talent as well in diverse places of this realm, as before the King at the court. In the same place of the inward garden, which was before applied to lascivious and courtly pastimes, there he dispensed the fruitful Word of the glorious Gospel of Jesus Christ, preaching there before the King and his whole court, to the edification of many....

By the strength of his own mind, or of some inward light from above, he had a prophetic view of what was to happen to the Church in Mary's reign, asserting that he was doomed to suffer for the truth ... Soon after Queen Mary was proclaimed, a messenger was sent to summon Mr. Latimer to town, and there is reason to believe it was wished that he should make his escape.

Thus Master Latimer coming up to London, through Smithfield (where merrily he said that Smithfield had long groaned for him), was brought before the Council, where he patiently bore all the mocks and taunts given him by the scornful papists. He was cast into the Tower, where he, being assisted with the heavenly grace of Christ, sustained imprisonment a long time, notwithstanding the cruel and unmerciful handling of the lordly papists, which thought then their kingdom would never fall; he showed himself not only patient, but also cheerful in and above all that which they could or would work against him. Yea, such a valiant spirit the Lord gave him, that he was able not only to despise the terribleness of prisons and torments, but also to laugh to scorn the doings of his enemies.

---

[1] Melanchthon Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560), a leading Lutheran reformer.

Mr. Latimer, after remaining a long time in the Tower, was transported to Oxford, with Cranmer and Ridley, the disputations at which place have been already mentioned in a former part of this work. He remained imprisoned until October, and the principal objects of all his prayers were three—that he might stand faithful to the doctrine he had professed, that God would restore His Gospel to England once again, and preserve the Lady Elizabeth to be queen; all of which happened. When he stood at the stake without the Bocardo gate,[1] Oxford, with Dr. Ridley, and fire was putting to the pile of faggots, he raised his eyes benignantly towards heaven, and said, "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able." His body was forcibly penetrated by the fire, and the blood flowed abundantly from the heart; as if to verify his constant desire that his heart's blood might be shed in defence of the Gospel. His polemical and friendly letters are lasting monuments of his integrity and talents. It has been before said, that public disputation took place in April, 1554, new examinations took place in October, 1555, previous to the degradation and condemnation of Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer. We now draw to the conclusion of the lives of the two last.

Dr. Ridley, the night before execution, was very facetious, had himself shaved, and called his supper a marriage feast; he remarked upon seeing Mrs. Irish (the keeper's wife) weep, "Though my breakfast will be somewhat sharp, my supper will be more pleasant and sweet."

The place of death was on the north side of the town, opposite Balliol College. Dr. Ridley was dressed in a black gown furred, and Mr. Latimer had a long shroud on, hanging down to his feet. Dr. Ridley, as he passed Bocardo, looked up to see Dr. Cranmer, but the latter was then engaged in disputation with a friar. When they came to the stake, Mr. Ridley embraced Latimer fervently, and bid him: "Be of good heart, brother, for God will either assuage the fury of the flame, or else strengthen us to abide it." He then knelt by the stake, and after earnestly praying together, they had a short private conversation. Dr. Smith then preached a short sermon against the martyrs, who would have answered him, but were prevented by Dr. Marshal, the vice-chancellor. Dr. Ridley then took off his gown and tippet, and gave them to his brother-in-law, Mr. Shipside. He gave away also many trifles to his weeping friends, and the populace were anxious to get even a fragment of his garments. Mr. Latimer gave nothing, and from the poverty of his garb, was soon stripped to his shroud, and stood venerable and erect, fearless of death.

Dr. Ridley being unclothed to his shirt, the smith placed an iron chain about their waists, and Dr. Ridley bid him fasten it securely; his brother having tied a bag of gunpowder about his neck, gave some also to Mr. Latimer.

Dr. Ridley then requested of Lord Williams, of Fame, to advocate with the Queen the cause of some poor men to whom he had, when bishop, granted leases, but which the present bishop refused to confirm. A lighted faggot was now laid at Dr. Ridley's feet, which caused Mr. Latimer to say: "Be of good cheer, Ridley; and play the man. We shall this day, by God's grace, light up such a candle in England, as I trust, will never be put out."

When Dr. Ridley saw the fire flaming up towards him, he cried with a wonderful loud voice, "Lord, Lord, receive my spirit." Master Latimer, crying as vehemently on the other side, "Father of heaven, receive my soul!" received the flame as it were embracing of it. After that he had stroked his face with his hands, and as it were, bathed them a little in the fire, he soon died (as it appeareth) with very little pain or none.

Well! dead they are, and the reward of this world they have already. What reward remaineth for them in heaven, the day of the Lord's glory, when He cometh with His saints, shall declare.

In the following month died Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor of England.

---

[1] Bocardo gate Gate of the Bocardo prison, demolished in 1771.

This papistical monster was born at Bury, in Suffolk, and partly educated at Cambridge. Ambitious, cruel, and bigoted, he served any cause; he first espoused the King's part in the affair of Anne Boleyn: upon the establishment of the Reformation he declared the supremacy of the Pope an execrable tenet; and when Queen Mary came to the crown, he entered into all her papistical bigoted views, and became a second time Bishop of Winchester. It is conjectured it was his intention to have moved the sacrifice of Lady Elizabeth, but when he arrived at this point, it pleased God to remove him.

It was on the afternoon of the day when those faithful soldiers of Christ, Ridley and Latimer, perished, that Gardiner sat down with a joyful heart to dinner. Scarcely had he taken a few mouthfuls, when he was seized with illness, and carried to his bed, where he lingered fifteen days in great torment, unable in any wise to evacuate, and burnt with a devouring fever, that terminated in death. Execrated by all good Christians, we pray the Father of mercies, that he may receive that mercy above he never imparted below.

Anonymous, Nicholas Ridley, Bishop of London (1555).

Anonymous, Hugh Latimer, Bishop of Worcester (1555).

Anonymous woodcut, The Burning of Latimer and Ridley at Oxford, October 1555. This illustration was allotted a full page in the 1563 edition of Foxe's Acts and Monuments.

Anonymous woodcut, Bishop Bonner Flogging a Protestant. Edmund Bonner, Archbishop of London during the reign of Queen Mary, played a leading role in the persecution of Protestants—and is a chief villain of Foxe's. This illustration appeared in the original 1570 edition of Acts and Monuments.

ACTS AND MONUMENTS
Of matters moſt ſpeciall and memorable, happening in the Church, with an univerſall HISTORIE of the ſame.

Wherein is ſet forth at large, the whole
Race and Courſe of the CHURCH, from the Primitive age to theſe later times of ours, with the bloody times, horrible troubles, and great Perſecutions againſt the true
MARTYRS
Of Chriſt, ſought and wrought as well by heathen
Emperors, as now lately practiſed by Romiſh Prelates, eſpecially in this Realme of England and Scotland.

Now againe, as it was recogniſed, peruſed, and recommended to the ſtudious Reader, by the Author,
Mr. Iohn Fox, the eight time newly Imprinted.

Whereunto are annexed certaine Additions of like Perſecu- [illegible]

Title page, Foxe's Acts and Monuments, 1641 edition.

from Lady Margaret Hoby, Diaries (1599–1603)

Hoby's diaries extend from 1599 to 1605; she is the first English woman whose diaries have survived. (The practice of diary writing was rare or non-existent before the sixteenth century.)

1599

[Friday, August 17]

After private prayers I went about the house and read of the Bible and wrought[1] till dinner time: and after dinner it pleased for a just punishment to correct my sins to send me feebleness of stomach and pain of my head that kept me upon my bed till five o'clock: at which time I arose, having release of my sickness, according to the wonted kindness of the Lord who after He had let me see how I had offended, that so I might take better heed to my body and soul hereafter, with a gentle correction let me feel He was reconciled to me: at which time I went to private prayer and praises, examination, and so to work till supper time: which done I heard the lecture and after I had walked an hour with Mr. Hoby I went to bed.

[Monday, September 10]

After private prayers I went about the house, and then ate my breakfast: then I walked to the church with Mr. Hoby: after that I wrought a little and neglected my custom of prayer for which as for many other sins it pleased the Lord to punish me with an inward assault: But I know the Lord hath pardoned it because He is true of His promise, and if I had not taken this course of examination I think I had forgotten it: after dinner I walked with Mr. Hoby and after he was gone I went to get tithe apples:[2] after I came home, I prayed with Mr. Rhodes,[3] and after that privately by myself and took examination of myself: and so after I had walked a while I went to supper, after that to the lecture and so to bed.

[The Lord's Day, September 16]

After I had prayed privately I went to church and from thence returning I praised God both for the enabling the minister so profitably to declare the word as he had, and my self to hear with that comfort and understanding I did: after dinner I walked with Mr. Hoby till catechizing was done and then I went to church: after the sermon I looked upon a poor man's leg[4] and after that I walked and read a sermon of Gifford upon the Song of Solomon: then I examined myself and prayed: after supper I was busy with Mr. Hoby till prayer time after which I went to bed.

[Thursday, December 20]

After private prayers, I did eat my breakfast then I writ in my sermon book: after I prayed then I dined, and almost I writ in my Bible all the afternoon: then I dispatched some business in the house and then prayed and examined myself …

1600

[The 5 day of the week, February 1]

After I was ready I went about the house and then prayed, brake my fast, dressed a poor boy's leg that was hurt, and Jurden's[5] hand: after took a lecture, read of the Bible, prayed and so went to dinner: after, I went down a while, then wrought till four o'clock and took order for supper, and then talked a while with Mr. Hoby and after went to private prayer and meditation: after to supper then to public prayers and lastly to bed.

[The 4 day after the Lord's Day, April 10]

After private prayers I went to the minister where I heard Mr. Smith defend the truth against the papist: The question being whether the regenerate do sin: after I came home I went to dinner: I went to the church where I heard Mr. Stuart handle this question between the papists and us—whether we were justified by faith or work:[1] after I came to my lodging and after I had prayed I went and talked with my cousin Bouser: then I went to Mr. Doctor Benet's and after supper I prayed publicly with Mr. Rhodes, and so went to bed.

---

[1] wrought Worked (probably at needlepoint or embroidery).

[2] tithe apples Of all agricultural produce a tenth (or tithe) was typically paid to support the local church.

[3] Mr. Rhodes Chaplain to Lady Hoby.

[4] looked upon a poor man's leg I.e., with a view to providing medical assistance. At the time most small communities lacked trained physicians.

[5] Jurden's A servant of Lady Hoby's.

1601

[The 5 day of May 1601]
After prayers I went to the church where I heard a sermon: after I came home and heard Mr. Rhodes read: after dinner I went abroad and when I was come home I dressed some sores: after I heard Mr. Rhodes read and wrought within a while: after I went to see a calf at Munckman's which had two great heads, four ears, and had to either head a throat pipe besides: the heads had long hairs like bristles about the mouths, such as no other cow hath: the hinder legs had no parting from the rump, but grew backward, and were no longer but from the first joint: also the back bone was parted about the middest of the back, and a round hole was in the midst in to the body of the calf: but one would have thought that to have come of some stroke it might get in the cow's belly: after this I came in to private meditation and prayer.

[August 26]
This day in the afternoon I had had a child brought to see that was born at Silpho, one Talliour's son who had no fundament, and had no passage for excrements but at the mouth: I was earnestly entreated to cut the place to see if any passage could be made, but although I cut deep and searched there was none to be found.

[December 26]
Was young Farley slain by his father's man one that the young man had before threatened to kill and for that end prosecuting him: the man, having a pike staff in his hand, run him into the eye and so into the brain: he never spoke after: this judgment is worth noting, this young man being extraordinary profane, as once causing a horse to be brought into the church of God and there christening him with a name which horrible blasphemy the Lord did not leave unrevenged, even in this world, for example t'others.

1602

[May 6]
I praise God I had health of body: howsoever justly God hath suffered Satan to afflict my mind, yet my hope is that my Redeemer will bring my soul out of troubles, that it may praise His name: and so I will wait with patience for deliverance.

[The Lord's Day, June 27]
Until this day I have continued in bodily health notwithstanding Satan hath not ceased to cast his malice upon me: but temptations hath exercised me, and it hath pleased my God to deliver me from all: Mrs. Girlington with her daughter and son-in-law came but after the sermon: and so, when the Communion was ended and after dinner, we all heard the afternoon exercises[2] together.

1603

[March 26]
This day being the Lord's Day was the death of the Queen published and our now King James of Scotland proclaimed King to succeed her: God send him a long and happy reign, Amen.

[October 23]
This day I heard the plague was so great at Whitby that those which were clear shut themselves up, and the infected that escaped did go abroad: likewise it was reported that, at London, the number was taken of the living and not of the dead: Lord grant that these judgments may cause England with speed to turn to the Lord.

---

[1] faith or work A key difference between Protestant and Roman Catholic faiths was (and is) that Protestants believe in salvation on the basis of faith alone, Roman Catholics on the basis of both faith and the "works" (good deeds) one has done while on earth.

[2] exercises Religious exercises or devotions.

from Owen Felltham, Resolves (1623)

Felltham's Resolves brings together reflective essays on a broad variety of topics, including poverty, differences between men and women, and the nature of poetry. The following excerpt is from the essay entitled "Of Puritans."

I find many that are called Puritans; yet few, or none that will own the name. Whereof the reason sure is this; that 'tis for the most part held a name of infamy; and is so new, that it hath scarcely yet obtained a definition: nor is it an appellation derived from one man's name, whose tenets we may find, digested into a volume: whereby we do much err in the application. It imports a kind of excellency above another; which man (being conscious of his own frail bendings) is ashamed to assume to himself. So that I believe there are men which would be Puritans: but indeed not any that are. One will have him one that lives religiously, and will not revel it in a shoreless excess. Another, him that separates from our divine assemblies. Another, him that in some tenets only is peculiar. Another, him that will not swear.[1] Absolutely to define him is a work, I think, of difficulty; some I know that rejoice in the name; but sure they be such, as least understand it. As he is more generally in these times taken, I suppose we may call him a Church-rebel, or one that would exclude order, that his brain might rule. To decline offences; to be careful and conscionable in our several actions, is a purity that every man ought to labour for, which we may well do, without a sullen segregation from all society.… If mirth and recreations be lawful, sure such a one may lawfully use it. If wine were given to cheer the heart, why should I fear to use it for that end? Surely, the merry soul is freer from intended mischief, than the thoughtful man. A bounded mirth, is a patent adding time and happiness to the crazed life of man.… God delights in nothing more than in a cheerful heart, careful to perform him service. What parent is it, that rejoiceth not to see his child pleasant, in the limits of a filial duty? I know, we read of Christ's weeping, not of his laughter: yet we see, he graceth a feast with his first miracle; and that a feast of joy: And can we think that such a meeting could pass without the noise of laughter? What a lump of quickened care is the melancholic man! Change anger into mirth, and the precept will hold good still: Be merry, but sin not. As there be many, that in their life assume too great a liberty; so I believe there are some, that abridge themselves of what they might lawfully use. Ignorance is an ill steward, to provide for either soul, or body. A man that submits to reverent order, that sometimes unbends himself in a moderate relaxation; and in all, labours to approve himself, in the sereneness of a healthful conscience: such a Puritan I will love immutably. But when a man, in things but ceremonial,[2] shall spurn at the grave authority of the Church, and … out of a blind and uncharitable pride, censure and scorn others as reprobates: or out of obstinacy, fill the world with brawls about undeterminable tenets: I shall think him one of those, whose opinion hath fevered his zeal to madness and distraction. I have more faith in one Solomon, than in a thousand Dutch parlours of such opinionists.[3] Behold then, what I have seen good! That it is comely to eat, and to drink, and to take pleasure in all his labour wherein he travaileth under the sun, the whole number of the days of his life, which God giveth him. For, this is his portion. Nay, "there is no profit to man, but that he eat, and drink, and delight his soul with the profit of his labour." For, he that saw other things but vanity, saw this also, that it was the hand of God. Me thinks the reading of Ecclesiastes, should make a Puritan undress his brain, and lay off all those fanatic toys that jingle about his understanding. For my own part, I think the world hath not better men, than some that suffer under that name: nor withal, more scelestic[4] villainies.[5] For, when they are once elated with that pride, they so contemn others, that they infringe the laws of all human society.

---

[1] One will … will not swear Felltham is suggesting through these examples that it is extremely difficult to find full agreement as to the consistent parts of the "purity" in Puritanism.

[2] but ceremonial Merely ceremonial. (Many of the issues that Puritans raised concerned church ceremony.)

[3] Dutch parlours of such opinionists At this time the Dutch were more fervently Protestant than the English, and many English Puritans and radicals traveled to (or emigrated to) Holland.

[4] scelestic Wicked.

[5] the world … villainies Some of the world's best people are Puritans—and also some of the most wickedly villainous.

A DISCOVERY
OF
Six Women-Preachers, in Middleſex,
Kent, Cambridge, and Salisbury.
WITH
A Relation of their Names, Manners,
Life, and Doctrine.

Their Names.
Anne Hempſtall. Ioane Bauford. Eliz. Bancroft.
Mary Bilbrow. Suſan May. Arabella Thomas.

A company of women Preachers.

Printed, 1641.

Cover, anonymous pamphlet, A Discovery of Six Women Preachers, in Middlesex, Kent, Cambridge, and Salisbury (c. 1641). "Discovery" in such contexts means "revelation of illicit activity." By 1641, when England was in the early stages of civil war, there had been an explosion of quasi-revolutionary activities, texts, prophecies, and sermons, many not by "Puritans," whose leaders tended to be respectable propertied gentlemen, but by members of radical sects more open to the participation of women as preachers and prophets filled with "zeal." Royal and ecclesiastical authorities tried to discredit such radicals by publicizing what they saw as their ridiculous radical excesses, whether real or not.

Jews and Christians

The climate for Jews in the Christian world was extremely difficult throughout the medieval period—though the severity of persecution began to increase in the twelfth century. In Europe, anti-Semitism at that time received a powerful impetus from the interplay of religious doctrines and economic developments. The European system of feudalism that prevailed from the fifth through to the eleventh century had been based primarily on subsistence agriculture; in most areas there had been little by way of trade and virtually no money-based economy. By the eleventh and twelfth centuries that began to change; trade began to grow, labor began to be somewhat more specialized, and the seeds of a merchant economy began to be sown throughout Europe. Such needs placed Christians in a difficult position: economic pressures required that ventures be funded, and funding on any substantial scale could hardly be expected to be forthcoming unless lenders could receive some return on their money. But the Christian church had since the fourth century forbidden the practice of charging interest on any loan.

Whereas one might have expected these economic pressures to have led to a softening of the Church's antipathy toward moneylending, the opposite happened; the third and fourth Lateran Councils (of 1179 and 1215) hardened the Church's position against "usury," which was then defined far more broadly than it is today. Now, the term is applied only to the charging of excessive interest, but in the Middle Ages charging any interest whatsoever was considered usury. Many Christians continued to lend money, often making creative use of elaborate contracts to disguise interest charges, but faced severe penalties if they were caught. The medieval church declared that any Christian who engaged in usury would be excommunicated—a punishment that not only meant spiritual exclusion, since excommunicates could not receive communion or other sacraments, but also carried devastating social consequences.

To try to reconcile the economic need to borrow with the religious prohibition on borrowing the Christians turned to the Jews, who were prohibited by their religion from lending to fellow Jews, but not from lending to "foreigners." In most jurisdictions it became common to prohibit Jews from engaging in a wide variety of occupations, but to permit them and, indeed, to encourage them to lend money.

To restrict Jewish people very largely to a necessary occupation that Christianity regarded as villainy may have been an effective means of keeping the wheels of commerce turning. But the almost inevitable by-product was the transference of negative associations linked to the growing moneyed economy onto Jewish people themselves. If harvests failed and loans could not readily be repaid, if the general economy soured, if Christians came to feel that the world was becoming too commercial, too materialistic, there was a convenient scapegoat.

In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries anti-Semitism took on a new virulence throughout Europe. Christians began to accuse Jews of outrageous crimes such as re-enacting the Crucifixion using Christian victims; murdering Christian children and drinking their blood; and desecrating the host (the bread used in communion, which is spiritually equivalent to the body of Christ). The stereotypes applied to Jews became increasingly frightening and dehumanized: Jews were seen not only as extortionate, wealthy, and motivated by greed but also as cruel, bestial, and motivated by hatred of Christians and Christianity. In 1189 and 1190 Christians killed hundreds of Jews in massacres throughout England; in 1264 Simon de Montfort was among those calling for all Jews in London to be killed.

Anonymous, Desecration of the Host, from Rappresentazione d'un Miracolo del Corpo di Cristo (Representation of a Miracle of the Body of Christ), c. 1500. "Desecration of the host" refers to the profane destruction of the sacred bread that Christians consume in memory of Christ's crucifixion. Some Christians believe that when they consume the bread and wine during Holy Communion, it "transubstantiates"—miraculously changes into the actual body and blood of Jesus. This belief was widespread in medieval Europe, and Jews were frequently arrested and tried for allegedly stealing the "host"—the consecrated bread—and stabbing it to see if it bled. As tales surrounding these circumstances proliferated, they became a kind of conversion narrative in which Jews, astonished when the host did in fact bleed, became Christians. (In versions where they did not become Christians, they were put to death.)

Images of these legends began circulating more widely with the emergence of the printing press; the woodcut was a popular form of book illustration. On the left side of the woodcut above, Jews steal the host. On the right side, they not only stab it, but also cook it.

In 1275 Edward I responded to the tide of anti-Semitism by forbidding Jews from moneylending, thus leaving them little or no means of legal subsistence; in 1290 he went further, expelling all Jews from England. Although some Jews may have remained illegally and some converted to Christianity, most of the Jewish population—which by this point had been reduced to about 2,000, less than half of what it had been 150 years before—left as a result of Edward's edict. From the late thirteenth century until 1656 no Jew could live legally in England.

Even though there were virtually no Jews in England, the figure of the Jew continued to play a prominent role in the English literature of the late medieval and Renaissance periods. In stories of the miracles of the Virgin that were popular currency throughout the late Middle Ages; in Geoffrey Chaucer's "The Prioress's Tale"; in John Mandeville's Travels and other widely read travel literature; in Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles and other popular histories; in popular works of prose fiction such as Thomas Nashe's The Unfortunate Traveller; in plays such as Christopher Marlowe's The Jew of Malta—in English literature as a whole through these centuries, Jews are pilloried, caricatured not just as heartless moneylenders but also as purveyors of blasphemy and sadistic violence. John Foxe, the author of the enormously popular Acts and Monuments (1563), described Jews in one of his sermons as "scorpionlike savages, so furiously boiling against the innocent infants of the Christian Gentiles," and railed against the Jews' supposed "heinous abominations, insatiable butcheries, treasons, frenzies, and madness." Similar language is common in other writings of the period.

Edward I may have expelled the Jews centuries earlier, but for Christians in England[1] imagined Jews retained a central place in English consciousness (and, surely, in the English unconscious as well). If one were writing about commerce and about money in Shakespeare's England, one would almost always come back to the figure of the Jew.

from Richard Morison, A Remedy for Sedition (1536)

Richard Morison (c. 1510–56) was an English humanist and diplomat. Morison was a protégé first of the powerful Cardinal Wolsey and later of Thomas Cromwell. While serving for Cromwell, Morison wrote two anonymous tracts in which he addressed the issue of English rebellion and governmental authority. One of these tracts was A Remedy for Sedition.

Morison's attitude in the following passage of A Remedy for Sedition—including his acclamation of the way the Jews raise their children to be good scholars and practitioners of their faith, and his description of Jews as a civilized group— stands out as an exception amongst the wide variety of anti-Semitic publications that predominated in England at the time.

... I have oft marvelled, to see the diligence, that the Jews use in bringing up their youth, and been much ashamed to see how negligent Christian men are in so godly a thing. There is neither man, woman, nor child of any lawful age, but he for the most part knoweth the Laws of Moses:[2] and with us he is almost a good curate, that knoweth vi. or vii. of the x. Commandments: amongst the Jews, there is not one, but he can by some honest occupation, get his living. There be few idle, none at all, but such as be rich enough, and may live without labour. There is not one beggar amongst them. All the cities of Italy, many places in Cecilia, many burgs[3] in Germany, have a great number of Jews in them. I have been among them, that are in Italy, I never heard of a Jew, that was a thief, never that was a murderer. No I never heard of a fray between them. I am ashamed to say as I needs must say, they may well think their religion better than ours, if religion be tried by men's lives. Now if Moses' law learned in youth, and but carnally understand,[1] can so stay them, that few or none fall into other vice, than usury, which although they do think permitted by Moses' law, so they use it not one Jew to another, as indeed they do not, but a Jew to a stranger. Might not we learn so much of Christ's law, as were able to keep us from rebellion? … It is, it is undoubted, one sort of religion, though also it be not right, that keepeth men in concord and unity. Turks go not against Turks, nor Jews against Jews, because they both agree in their faith. …

---

[1] To use the umbrella term "Christians in England" may well be said to represent a distortion as well as an oversimplification; the conflicts between Catholic and Protestant (and among many Protestant groups) are a dominant theme from the early sixteenth century onward. But hostility toward Jews remained one thing that Catholics and Protestants of almost every stripe held broadly in common.

[2] Laws of Moses Set of laws believed to have been passed from God to Moses. These are given in the first five books of the Hebrew Bible (called the Old Testament in Christian scripture).

[3] Cecilia I.e., Sicily; burgs I.e., cities.

from Samuel Usque, Consolation for the Tribulations of Israel (1553)

> For obvious reasons, there are relatively few texts available by sixteenth-century Jewish writers that are relevant to discussions of Jews and Christians in England during this period. Samuel Usque's Consolation is one of the exceptions. Usque's family had been among those forced to leave Spain when that country expelled all Jews in 1492. They moved to Portugal and again came under threat; the Portuguese began forced conversions of Jews and, somewhat later, instituted the Inquisition to root out those suspected of insincerity in the practice of Catholicism. Usque left Portugal, eventually settling in Italy. Like Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (and, indeed, most chroniclers of "history" at the time), Usque freely mingles legend with fact—recounting, for example, how after the Jews had been expelled from England by one king, another invited them back in order to try to force them to convert to Christianity. The Chronicle is written in the first person, as if from the perspective of a Jew who has personally experienced persecution in all lands and all eras.

In the same country I witnessed another fierce and terrible calamity. After that king[2] had left this life he was succeeded by another, who disregarded the past expulsion and recalled all the Jews who had left the kingdom, offering to take them back and let them live in peace. The Jews took counsel among themselves in France, Flanders, Spain, and other lands where they had dispersed. They decided that for no reason, including ease or material gain, would they re-enter a place where they had suffered so great a calamity—except to see the children they had left behind, to talk with them and convince them to return to the faith of their fathers. …

O cruel Englishmen, … so quick to hurt me and so blind to the reason for which you harmed me! How is it that you have not become inured to crime from of old? Are not the ways of your princesses adulterous? Is not the garb of your masses woven of robberies, hatreds, and killing? I do not need to cite ancient histories to tell this, for modern records proclaim it. Consider in the years that King Henry reigned, how many acts of adultery were committed by his own queens; how many treacheries were attempted by the king's noblest and closest associates; how many heads were placed on London Bridge because of these and other ghastly crimes; and how many queens were killed by the sword, and deprived of dominion? The churches where you prayed were demolished by your own hands or converted to stables. Your priests were shamefully expelled.[3] …

According to your religion, all these acts, singly and collectively, are regarded as sins. They manifest extreme wickedness, and you deserved punishment for them. Misfortunes did not come to your land because of the Jews' sins alone, as you say.

---

[1] carnally understand I.e., understood only superficially, without spiritual death.

[2] that king Edward I, who expelled all Jews from England in 1290.

[3] churches … expelled Usque is referring to the upheavals in the wake of Henry VIII's break with Rome.

Title page, Coryat's Crudities, 1611. (Detail.) This image of Thomas Coryate being chased by a Jew with a knife is one of several illustrations included on the title page of the first edition of his account of his travels, Coryat's Crudities. No such incident is mentioned in Coryate's text, but a poem of commendation included in the volume offers this advice: "fly from the Jews lest they circumcise thee."

from Christopher Marlowe, The Jew of Malta (c. 1590)

Barabas, the central character in Marlowe's play, describes himself in the passage below. He delivers the speech in conversation with Ithimore, another Jew, who reports that he has spent his time "setting Christian villages on fire," cutting the throats of travelers, and crippling Christian pilgrims to Jerusalem. "We are villains both," Barabas replies; "we hate Christians both."

from ACT 2, SCENE 3

BARABAS. As for myself, I walk abroad o'nights,
And kill sick people groaning under walls.
Sometimes I go about the poison wells,[1]
And now and then, to cherish Christian thieves,
I am content to lose some of my crowns,
That I may, walking in my gallery,
See 'em go pinioned° along by my door. tied up
Being young, I studied physic,° and began medicine
To practice first upon the Italian;
There I enriched the priests with burials
And always kept the sexton's[2] arms in ure° use
With digging graves and ringing dead men's knells.
And after that was I an engineer,
And in the wars 'twixt France and Germany,[3]
Under pretense of helping Charles the Fifth,
Slew friend and enemy with my stratagems.
Then after that was I an usurer,
And with extorting, cozening,° forfeiting,[4] deceiving
And tricks belonging unto brokery,
I filled the jails with bankrupts in a year,
And with young orphans planted hospitals,
And every moon made some or other mad,
And now and then one hang himself for grief,
Pinning upon his breast a long great scroll
How I with interest tormented him.
But mark how I am blest for plaguing them:
I have as much coin as will buy the town.

---

[1] poison wells Reference to a stereotypical misconception about Jewish people commonly held during and after the Middle Ages.

[2] sexton Church administrator responsible for the burial of the dead.

[3] wars ... Germany Holy Roman Emperor Charles V (r. 1519–58) struggled for domination of Italy in several wars with Francis I of France (r. 1515–47). The wars continued with their respective successors, Ferdinand I (r. 1558–64) and Henri II (r. 1547–59).

[4] forfeiting Failing to pay bonds.

from Thomas Lodge, Wit's Misery, and the World's Madness (1596)

Thomas Lodge (1558–1625), poet and dramatist, was the son of Sir Thomas Lodge, Lord Mayor of London. Despite the notability of his family, young Lodge knew all too well the sting of financial strain: when he was five, his father went bankrupt. Lodge grew to despise moneylenders as unprincipled people, and attacks them both in An Alarum against Usurers (1584) and in Wit's Misery (1596). The following passage of physical description from his 1596 publication supplies a vivid example of the way in which the appearance of the usurer (and that of the Jew) were often described.

This Usury [has] the complexion of the baboon his father; he is haired like a great ape, and swart like a tawny Indian … He is narrow-browed, and squirrel-eyed, and the chiefest ornament of his face is, that his nose sticks in the midst like an embossment in terrace work, here and there embellished and decked with verrucae for want of purging with agaric; some authors have compared it to a rutter's cod-piece,[1] but I like not the allusion so well, by reason the tyings have no correspondence. His mouth is always mumbling, as if he were at his matins:[2] and his beard is bristled here and there like a sow that had the lousy.[3] Double-chinned he is, and over his throat hangs a bunch of skin like a money-bag.…

---

from Edward Coke, The Institutes of the Laws of England, Part 2 (1642)

Sir Edward Coke (pronounced "Cook," 1552–1634) was Attorney General and later Chief Justice of the King's Bench (a senior court of common law). Coke's Institutes of the Laws of England is a four-volume series (1628–44) in which Sir Edward writes about various statutes of Parliament and provides a history of different English courts. In the second volume, Coke writes venomously about Jewish people's practice of usury and promotes the image of Jews as malicious and greedy.

… Many prohibitions were made by this King and others, [and] some time[s] they [the Jews] were banished, but their cruel usury continued, and soon after they returned. And for respect of lucre and gain, King John in the second year of his reign granted unto them large liberties and privileges, whereby the mischiefs rehearsed in this act without measure multiplied.

Our noble King Edward I and his father King Henry III before him, fought by diverse acts and ordinances to use some mean and moderation herein, but in the end it was found that there was no mean in mischief.… And therefore King Edward I as this act said, in the honour of God, and for the common profit of his people, without all respect (in the respect of these) of the filling of his own coffers, did ordain, that no Jew from thenceforth would make any bargain, or contract for usury, no upon any former contract should take any usury; … so in effect all Jewish usury was forbidden.…

This law struck at the root of the pestilent weed, for hereby usury itself was forbidden; and thereupon the cruel Jews thirsting after wicked gain, to the number of 15,060, departed out of this realm into foreign parts, where they might use their Jewish trade of usury, and from that time that nation never returned again into this realm.…

---

[1] verrucae Warts; agaric Treatment made from dried fungus; rutter Mounted soldier; cod-piece Fabric flap tied over the opening of a pair of hose or breeches; also a colloquial term for "penis."

[2] matins Morning prayer.

[3] had the lousy I.e., was infected by lice.

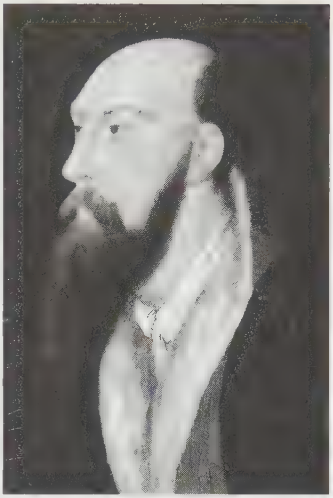
SIR THOMAS WYATT

c. 1503 – 1542



During Thomas Wyatt's brief, 39-year lifespan, English men and women served two kings; three lord chancellors were executed; England waged war in four other lands (Scotland, Wales, Ireland, and France); and Henry VIII married five of his six wives, most of whom met sorry ends. Wyatt lived his entire adult life in service to the court, amidst the political intrigue and turmoil that accompanied the reign of King Henry VIII, and was twice imprisoned in the Tower of London. A few of his poems portray an idyllic life in the countryside away from the machinations of the king and his courtiers, yet they can carry a subtext about the ambient political disorder or the court's political dramas. One of his most famous poems, "Whoso list to hunt," based on a sonnet written by Petrarch (1304–74), is thought to express longing for Anne Boleyn, Henry's future second wife. Wyatt wrote in many poetic forms, but he is best known for the artistry of his satires and songs and, along with Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (1517–47), for introducing the Italian sonnet to England.

Son of Anne Skinner and Sir Henry Wyatt, Thomas Wyatt was born in 1503 into wealth and status at Allington Castle in Kent, England. His later career as a statesman followed that of his father, as did his political trials and tribulations. Henry Wyatt had been imprisoned and tortured for over two years by the court of King Richard III for his loyalty to the Tudors. When Henry Tudor became King Henry VII, the elder Wyatt was made a Privy Councillor, and he was later knighted by Henry VIII.

Although it is not certain, it appears that Thomas Wyatt entered St. John's College, Cambridge at age twelve, and that he may have graduated by the age of sixteen. He was a man of many accomplishments, adept at music and poetry as well as politics, and he soon became a valued member of King Henry's court. After serving in various minor positions, Wyatt began his diplomatic career in 1526 with missions to France, Rome, and Venice, where, we may surmise, he acquired his knowledge of Italian sonnets. (At about this time Wyatt became estranged from his wife, Elizabeth Brooke, daughter of Lord Cobham, whom he had married at a young age.) He was knighted in 1536 but soon afterward had his first falling out with King Henry and was imprisoned in the Tower of London. Wyatt might have been under suspicion of having had an affair with Anne Boleyn when she was still unmarried; Henry VIII had divorced Catherine of Aragon for Boleyn and thereby provoked England's break with the Roman Catholic Church. Although Anne and five (almost certainly wrongly accused) lovers were all executed, Wyatt was released after a month.

Most of Wyatt's work to this point had been love poems, often containing themes of disappointment or unrequited love but rarely dark in tone. By contrast, poems written after his imprisonments can express bitterness.

Wyatt eventually regained both the king's favor and his diplomatic status. Unfortunately, though, he lost a great ally upon the fall and execution of the statesman Thomas Cromwell, in 1540, and in 1541 he was imprisoned again, this time on trumped-up charges of treason. Once again he was spared and was briefly in favor with the king. Wyatt succumbed to fever the next year, however, and died in Dorset in 1542.

Few of Wyatt's poems were printed in his lifetime, but many appeared in Richard Tottel's 1557 volume Songes and Sonettes (later to become known as Tottel's Miscellany); a third of the volume is made up of Wyatt's work. Some years later, the Elizabethan critic George Puttenham summarized Sir Thomas Wyatt's importance to the English literary tradition in terms that remain broadly accepted today: "[Wyatt and Surrey] travailed into Italie, and there tasted the sweet and stately measures and stile of the Italian Poesie as novices newly crept out of the schooles of Dante, Arioste and Petrarch. They greatly pollished our rude & homely maner of vulgar Poesie, from that it had been before, and for that cause may justly be said the first reformers of our English meetre and stile."

(Please note that additional poems by Sir Thomas Wyatt appear in the Elizabethan Sonnet and Lyric section elsewhere in the volume.)

⌘⌘⌘

SONNETS[1]

octet

10[2]

The long love that in my thought doth harbour A
And in mine heart doth keep his residence B
Into my face presseth with bold pretence B
And therein campeth, spreading his banner. A
She that me learneth° to love and suffer A teaches
And will° that my trust and lust's negligence B wishes
Be reined by reason, shame,° and reverence, B modesty
With his hardiness° taketh displeasure. A daring
Wherewithal unto the heart's forest he fleeth, C
Leaving his enterprise with pain and cry, D
And there him hideth and not appeareth. C
What may I do when my master feareth, C
But in the field with him to live and die? D
For good is the life ending faithfully. E
—1557

29[3]

The pillar perished is whereto I leant,
The strongest stay of mine unquiet mind;
The like of it no man again can find—
From east to west still seeking though he went—
To mine unhap,° for hap° away hath rent misfortune / chance
Of all my joy the very bark and rind,
And I, alas, by chance am thus assigned
Dearly to mourn till death do it relent.° abate
But since that thus it is by destiny,
What can I more but have a woeful heart,
My pen in plaint,° my voice in woeful cry, complaint, lament
My mind in woe, my body full of smart,° pain
And I myself, myself always to hate
Till dreadful death do cease my doleful state?
—1557

31

Farewell, Love, and all thy laws forever. A
Thy baited hooks shall tangle me no more. B
Senec[4] and Plato call me from thy lore B
To perfect wealth my wit for to endeavour.[5] A
In blind error when I did persevere, A
Thy sharp repulse, that pricketh ay so sore, B
Hath taught me to set in trifles no store B
And 'scape forth, since liberty is lever.° A dearer
Therefore, farewell. Go trouble younger hearts C
And in me claim no more authority. D
With idle youth go use thy property, D
And thereon spend thy many brittle darts. C
For hitherto, though I have lost all my time, e
Me lusteth° no longer rotten boughs to climb. e desire
—1557

---

[1] Sonnets For additional sonnets by Sir Thomas Wyatt, please refer to the Elizabethan Sonnet and Lyric section in this anthology.

[2] 10 This poem is an adaptation of sonnet 140 from Petrarch's Rime sparse (Scattered Rhymes), also translated by Wyatt's friend Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey.

[3] 29 An imitation of Petrarch's Rime 269. There has been some speculation that Wyatt here laments the execution of Thomas Cromwell, Wyatt's former patron.

[4] Senec Seneca, a Roman essayist and philosopher (c. 4 BCE—65 CE).

[5] wealth Well-being; wit Intellect; endeavour Exert.

EPIGRAMS

38

Alas, madam, for stealing of a kiss
Have I so much your mind there offended?
Have I then done so grievously amiss
That by no means it may be amended?
Then revenge you, and the next[1] way is this:
Another kiss shall have my life ended.
For to my mouth the first my heart did suck;
The next shall clean out of my breast it pluck.
—1557

48[2]

Vulcan[3] begat me; Minerva[4] me taught.
Nature my mother; craft nourished me year by year.[5]
Three bodies[6] are my food. My strength is in naught.[7]
Slaughter, wrath, waste, and noise are my children dear.
Guess, friend, what I am and how I am wrought:
Monster of sea or of land or of elsewhere?
Know me and use me, and I may thee defend
And, if I be thine enemy, I may thy life end.
—1557

60

Tagus,[8] farewell, that westward with thy streams
Turns up the grains of gold already tried,° refined
With spur and sail for I go seek the Thames, Gainward° the sun that show'th her wealthy pride[9] toward
And to the town which Brutus sought by dreams[10]
Like bended moon doth lend her lusty° side. pleasant
My king, my country, alone for whom I live,
Of mighty love the wings for this me give.
—1557

BALLADS

80

They flee from me that sometime did me seek
With naked foot stalking° in my my chamber. treading softly
I have seen them gentle, tame, and meek
That now are wild and do not remember
That sometime they put themself in danger
To take bread at my hand; and now they range,
Busily seeking with a continual change.

Thanked be fortune it hath been otherwise
Twenty times better; but once in special,
In thin array after° a pleasant guise,° in accordance with / style
When her loose gown from her shoulders did fall
And she me caught in her arms long and small,
Therewithal sweetly did me kiss
And softly said, "Dear heart, how like you this?"

It was no dream; I lay broad waking.° wide awake
But all is turned, through my gentleness,
Into a strange fashion of forsaking.
And I have leave to go of her goodness,[11]
And she also to use newfangleness.° inconstancy
But since that I so kindly[12] am served,
I would fain° know what she hath deserved. gladly
—1557

---

[1] next Nearest, most convenient.

[2] 48 This riddle was titled "Description of a gun" when it was first published in Tottel's Miscellany. The poem's first six lines are a translation of a Latin riddle found in Bombarda, by Pandolfo Collinutio.

[3] Vulcan The Roman god of fire and metal working.

[4] Minerva The Roman goddess of war, as well as wisdom.

[5] Nature … year I.e., the materials come from nature, but are formed through craft.

[6] Three bodies The ingredients of gunpowder.

[7] is in naught I.e., the "O" of the gun's mouth.

[8] Tagus River in Spain, where Wyatt spent several months as a diplomat. The Tagus is known for its gold colored sand.

[9] Gainward … pride Unlike the Tagus, which flows westward, the Thames flows "against" the sun's path, or eastward.

[10] the town … dreams London. According to Geoffrey of Monmouth, Brutus, a Trojan hero and descendant of Aeneas, was visited in a dream by the goddess Diana and told to sail to the cliffs of Albion, where he could build another Troy. When he landed, he proceeded inland and founded the city that became London.

[11] I have … goodness I have her permission to go from her.

[12] kindly Naturally, according to natural laws (i.e., that women are fickle). The word also ironically suggests the modern "with kindness." Tottel amends this to "unkindly," removing the irony.

94

Blame not my lute, for he must sound
Of this or that as liketh° me. pleases
For lack of wit the lute is bound
To give such tunes as pleaseth me.
Though my songs be somewhat strange,
And speaks such words as touch thy change,[1]
Blame not my lute.

My lute, alas, doth not offend,
Though that perforce he must agree
To sound such tunes as I intend
To sing to them that heareth me.
Then though my songs be somewhat plain
And toucheth° some that use to feign,[2] comments on
Blame not my lute.

My lute and strings may not deny,
But as I strike they must obey;
Break not them then so wrongfully,
But wreak° thyself some wiser way. avenge
And though the songs which I indite° compose
Do quit° thy change with rightful spite, requite
Blame not my lute.

Spite asketh spite, and changing change,
And falsed faith must needs be known;
The faults so great, the case so strange
Of right it must abroad be blown.° proclaimed
Then since that by thine own desert
My songs do tell how true thou art,
Blame not my lute.

Blame but thyself, that hast misdone
And well deserved to have blame;
Change thou thy way so evil begun,
And then my lute shall sound that same.
But if till then my fingers play
By thy desert their wonted way,
Blame not my lute.

Farewell, unknown, for though thou break
My strings in spite with great disdain,
Yet have I found out for thy sake
Strings for to string my lute again.
And if perchance this foolish rhyme
Do make thee blush at any time,
Blame not my lute.
—1557

Songs

109

My lute, awake! Perform the last
Labour that thou and I shall waste,
And end that I have now begun;
For when this song is sung and past,
My lute, be still for I have done.

As to be heard where ear is none,
As lead to grave in marble stone,[3]
My song may pierce her heart as soon.
Should we then sigh or sing or moan?
No, no, my lute, for I have done.

The rocks do not so cruelly
Repulse the waves continually
As she my suit and affection,
So that I am past remedy,
Whereby my lute and I have done.

Proud of the spoil that thou hast got
Of simple hearts thorough° Love's shot through
By whom, unkind, thou hast them won,
Think not he hath his bow forgot,
Although my lute and I have done.

Vengeance shall fall on thy disdain
That makest but game on earnest pain.
Think not alone under the sun
Unquit° to cause thy lovers plain,° unrequited / to lament
Although my lute and I have done.

---

[1] change Change of heart.

[2] use to feign Tend to lie or to hide their real feelings.

[3] As to … stone When sound is heard where there are no ears to hear it, or when lead (the softest metal) is able to engrave on stone.

May chance[1] thee lie withered and old
The winter nights that are so cold,
Plaining in vain unto the moon.
Thy wishes then dare not be told.
Care then who list,° for I have done. likes

And then may chance thee to repent
The time that thou hast lost and spent
To cause thy lovers sigh and swoon.
Then shalt thou know beauty but lent,
And wish and want as I have done.

Now cease, my lute. This is the last
Labour that thou and I shall waste,
And ended is that we begun.
Now is this song both sung and past.
My lute, be still, for I have done.
—1557

123

V. Innocentia
Veritas Viat Fides
Circumdederunt me inimici mei[2]

Who list° his wealth° and ease retain, desires / well-being Himself let him unknown contain.° keep
Press not too fast in at that gate
Where the return stands by disdain,[3]
For sure, circa Regna tonat.[4]

The high mountains are blasted oft
When the low valley is mild and soft.
Fortune with Health° stands at debate.° well-being / odds
The fall is grievous from aloft.
And sure, circa Regna tonat.

These bloody days have broken my heart.
My lust,° my youth did them depart, pleasure
And blind desire of estate.° high status
Who hastes to climb seeks to revert.° fall back down
Of truth, circa Regna tonat.

The Bell Tower showed me such sight
That in my head sticks day and night.
There did I learn out of a grate,° barred window
For all favour, glory, or might,[5]
That yet circa Regna tonat.

By proof, I say, there did I learn:
Wit helpeth not defence too yerne,° willingly
Of innocency to plead or prate.[6]
Bear low,[7] therefore; give God the stern.° tiller
For sure, circa Regna tonat.
—1969 (written 1536)

EPISTOLARY SATIRES

149[8]

Mine own John Poyns,[9] since ye delight to know
The cause why that homeward I me draw
(And flee the press of courts, whereso they go,
Rather than to live thrall° under the awe enslaved
Of lordly looks) wrapped within my cloak,
To will and lust° learning to set a law, pleasure
It is not because I scorn or mock
The power of them to whom Fortune hath lent
Charge over us, of right to strike the stroke;

---

[1] May chance It may chance that.

[2] V. Innocentia … mei This is a rebus, a puzzle in which Wyatt has arranged words to suggest a phrase. Translated from Latin, the rebus reads:
W[yatt] Innocence
Truth Wyatt Faith
My enemies surround me.

It is believed that Wyatt wrote this poem in 1536, while he was imprisoned in the Bell Tower. In May of that year, Wyatt may have witnessed Anne Boleyn's execution from his cell.

[3] Where … disdain From which your forced exit will be disdained.

[4] circa Regna tonat Latin: [He] thunders around thrones. This line, referring to Jupiter, is taken from Seneca's Phaedra. The first two stanzas of Wyatt's poem are imitations of lines from that play.

[5] For all … might Regardless of one's favor, glory, or might.

[6] Wit … prate Intellect does not help one to earn a defense, or to plead or prattle of one's innocence.

[7] Bear low Keep yourself in a humble position. Also a nautical term meaning "sail with the wind."

[8] 149 This poem is an imitation of Satira 10 (1532), by Luigi Alamanni.

[9] John Poyns A fellow member of the court of Henry VIII and a friend of Wyatt's.

But true it is that I have always meant
Less to esteem them than the common sort,
Of outward things that judge in their intent[1]
Without regard what doth inward resort.° reside
I grant sometime that of glory the fire
Doth touch my heart; me list not to report
Blame by honour and honour to desire.[2]
But how may I this honour now attain
That cannot dye the colour black a liar?[3]
My Poyns, I cannot frame my tune to feign,
To cloak the truth for praise, without desert,[4]
Of them that list all vice for to retain.
I cannot honour them that sets their part
With Venus and Bacchus[5] all their life long,
Nor hold my peace of them although I smart.
I cannot crouch nor kneel to do such wrong
To worship them like God on earth alone
That are like wolves these silly[6] lambs among.
I cannot with my words complain and moan
And suffer naught, nor smart without complaint,
Nor turn the word that from my mouth is gone.
I cannot speak and look like a saint,
Use wiles for wit° and make deceit a pleasure intellect
And call craft counsel, for profit still to paint.
I cannot wrest the law to fill the coffer,
With innocent blood to feed myself fat,
And do most hurt where most help I offer.
I am not he that can allow° the state praise
Of high Caesar and damn Cato[7] to die,
That with his death did 'scape out of the gate
From Caesar's hands, if Livy doth not lie,
And would not live where liberty was lost,
So did his heart the common wealth[8] apply.° serve
I am not he such eloquence to boast
To make the crow singing as the swan,
Nor call the lion of coward beasts the most,[9]
That cannot take a mouse as the cat can;
And he that dieth for hunger of the gold,
Call him Alexander,[10] and say that Pan
Passeth Apollo in music many fold;[11]
Praise Sir Thopas for a noble tale
And scorn the story that the knight told;[12]
Praise him for counsel that is drunk of ale;
Grin when he laugheth that beareth all the sway,[13]
Frown when he frowneth and groan when he is pale,
On other's lust to hang both night and day.
None of these points would ever frame° in me. fit, prosper
My wit is naught. I cannot learn the way.
And much the less of things that greater be,
That asken help of colours of device
To join the mean with each extremity:
With the nearest virtue to cloak alway the vice
And, as to purpose, likewise it shall fall,[14]
To press the virtue,[15] that it may not rise.
As° drunkenness good fellowship to call; for example,
The friendly foe with his double face
Say he is gentle and courteous therewithal;
And say that Favel° hath a goodly grace flattery

---

[1] I have … their intent I.e., I have always intended to esteem the great and powerful people less than do the common sort (of people), who form their opinions ("intent") based on external appearances.

[2] me list … desire I do wish to cast blame on honor, or attack honor, while at the same time desiring it.

[3] cannot dye … liar Cannot see black as anything but black.

[4] without desert Without its being worthy or deserving.

[5] Venus and Bacchus Goddess of love and god of drink, here representing lust and debauchery.

[6] silly Simple, helpless, pitiable.

[7] Cato Marcus Porcius Cato, the uncle of Brutus and an opponent of Caesar's who, after Caesar's victory, committed suicide rather than submit to his tyrannical authority. The story is recorded by the historian Titus Livius (Livy), mentioned on line 40.

[8] common wealth Public welfare, the common good, or the state.

[9] of coward beasts the most King of the (cowardly) beasts.

[10] he that … Alexander Alexander the Great conquered the known world. Wyatt says he will not call such a man "Alexander," a name that means "defender or protector of mankind."

[11] Pan … many fold Pan, half man, half goat, was the Greek god of shepherds and flocks. He played simple music on his "Pan's pipes," or "shepherd's pipes." Apollo was the great god of, among other things, poetry, music, and the sun.

[12] Praise … knight told In Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, Sir Thopas's tale is so ridiculous that the host asks him to stop before the end, while the knight's tale is considered by all to be the most noble.

[13] beareth all the sway Holds all the power.

[14] as to … shall fall As shall likewise be opportune.

[15] press the virtue Oppress virtue, condemn it as a vice.

In eloquence; and cruelty to name
Zeal of justice and change in time and place;[1]
And he that suffereth offence without blame,[2]
Call him pitiful,° and him true and plain compassionate
That raileth reckless to every man's shame;° modesty, decency
Say he is rude that cannot lie and feign,
The lecher a lover, and tyranny
To be the right of a prince's reign.
I cannot, I! No, no, it will not be!
This is the cause that I could never yet
Hang on their sleeves that weigh, as thou mayst see,
A chip of chance° more than a pound of wit. good fortune
This maketh me at home to hunt and to hawk
And in foul weather at my book to sit;
In frost and snow then with my bow to stalk.
No man doth mark whereso I ride or go;
In lusty° leas° in liberty I walk. pleasant / pastures
And of these news I feel nor weal° nor woe, happiness
Save that a clog[3] doth hang yet at my heel.
No force for that,[4] for it is ordered so
That I may leap both hedge and dike full well.
I am not now in France to judge the wine,
With savoury sauce the delicates to feel;° smell and taste
Nor yet in Spain where one must him incline,
Rather than to be, outwardly to seem.
I meddle not with wits that be so fine.
Nor Flanders' cheer[5] letteth not my sight to deem[6]
Of black and white, nor taketh my wit away
With beastliness they, beasts,[7] do so esteem.
Nor I am not where Christ is given in prey
For money, poison, and treason at Rome—
A common practice used night and day.
But here I am in Kent and Christendom
Among the muses, where I read and rhyme,
Where if thou list,° my Poyns, for to come, desire
Thou shalt be judge how I do spend my time.
—1557

IN CONTEXT

Epistolary Advice

Below is a letter from Thomas Wyatt to his son, who had recently married (at age fifteen). The letter was sent from Paris on 15 April 1537. Although a personal letter that mentions Wyatt's failed marriage, this exhortation also draws on a long tradition of epistolary advice to the young; William Cecil and Walter Ralegh contributed to the genre and Shakespeare parodies its sententiousness in Hamlet when Polonius gives fatherly counsel to Laertes.

In as much as now you are come to some years of understanding, and that you should gather within yourself some frame of honesty, I thought that I should not lose my labor wholly if now I did something advertise[1] to you to take the sure foundations and established opinions that leadeth to honesty. And here I call not "honesty" what men commonly call honesty, as reputation for riches, for authority, or some like thing, but that honesty that I dare well say your grandfather (whose soul God pardon) had rather left to me than all the lands he did leave me—that was wisdom, gentleness, soberness, desire to do good, friendliness to get the love of many, and truth[2] above all the rest. A great part to have all these things is to desire to have them: and although glory and honest name are not the very ends wherefore these things are to be followed, yet surely they must needs follow them, as light followeth fire, though it were kindled for warmth. Out of these things the chiefest and infallible ground is the dread and reverence of God, whereupon shall ensue the eschewing of the contraries of these said virtues—that is to say, ignorance, unkindness, rashness, desire of harm, unquiet enmity, hatred, many and crafty falsehood, the very root of all shame and dishonesty.

---

[1] change in time and place I.e., the time and place in which the law was made differ from those of the crime.

[2] suffereth ... blame Allows offences against those who are innocent.

[3] clog Heavy block of wood, attached to impede motion.

[4] No force for that No matter.

[5] Flanders' cheer The Flemish were known for their love of drinking.

[6] letteth not Prevents; deem Distinguish.

[7] beastliness Drunkenness; beasts Drunks.

I say the only dread and reverence of God that seeth all things is the defense of the creeping in of all these mischiefs into you. As for my part, although I do not say there is no man that would his son better than I,[3] yet on my faith I had rather have you lifeless than subject to these vices. Think and imagine always that you are in [the] presence of some honest man that you know, as Sir John Russell, your father-in-law, your uncle, parson, or some other such, and you shall, if at any time you find a pleasure in naughty touches, remember what shame it were before these men to do naughtily. And sure this imagination shall cause you remember that the pleasure of a naughty deed is soon past, and that rebuke, shame, and the note[4] thereof shall remain ever. Then, if these things you take for vain imaginations, yet remember that it is certain and no imagination that you are always in the presence and sight of God: and though you see Him not, so much is the reverence the more to be had, for that He seeth and is not seen. Men punish with shame as [the] greatest punishment on earth, yea greater than death, but His punishment is first the withdrawing of His favour and grace, and in leaving His hand to rule the stern,[5] to let the ship run without guide to your own destruction, and suffereth[6] so the man that He forsaketh to run headlong, as subject to all mishaps, and at last with shameful end to everlasting shame and death. You may see continual examples both of one sort and th'other, and the better if you mark them well that yourself are come of.[7] And consider well your good grandfather what things that were in him, and his end; and they that knew him noted him thus: first and chiefly to have a great reverence of God and good opinion of Godly things, next that there was no man more pitiful,[8] no man more true of his word, no man faster to his friend, no man diligenter nor more circumspect, which thing both the kings his masters noted in him greatly. And if these things, and especially the grace of God that the fear of God always kept with him, had not been, the chances of this troublesome world that he was in had long ago overwhelmed him. This preserved him in prison from the hands of the tyrant[9] that could find in his heart to see him racked, from two years and more imprisonment in Scotland, in irons and stocks, from the danger of sudden changes and commotions diverse, until that well beloved of many, hated of none, in his fair age and good reputation, Godly and Christianly he went to Him that loved him for that he always had Him in reverence. And of myself

---

[1] advertise Advise, counsel, explain.

[2] truth Wyatt's word is "trough," which suggests both "truth" and "troth"—i.e., a trustworthy integrity.

[3] that ... than I That is, would wish better for his son.

[4] rebuke ... note Notice, reputation.

[5] His ... stern In withdrawing his hand from (the ship's) steering wheel, the tiller.

[6] suffereth Allows.

[7] better ... of If you observe well those from whom you derive—your family.

[8] pitiful Full of pity, merciful.

[9] tyrant Richard III.

I may be a mere example unto you of my folly and unthriftiness[1] that hath as I well deserved brought me into a thousand dangers and hazards, enmities, hatreds, imprisonments, despites[2] and indignations: but that God hath of His goodness chastised me and not cast me clean out of His favour, which thing I can impute to nothing but to the goodness of my good father, that I dare well say purchased with continual request of God His grace towards me more than I regarded or considered myself, and a little part to the small fear that I had of God in the most of my rage[3] and the little delight that I had in mischief. You therefore, if you be sure and have God in your sleeve, to call you to His grace at last, venture not hardily[4] by mine example upon naughty unthriftiness in trust of His goodness; and, besides the shame, I dare lay ten to one you shall perish in the adventure: for trust not that my wish or desire of God for you shall stand you in as much effect as I think my father's did for me: we are not all accepted of Him. Begin therefore betimes, make God and goodness your foundations. Make your examples of wise and honest me; shoot at the mark; be no mocker—mocks follow them that delight therein. He shall be sure of shame that feeleth no grief in other men's shames. Have your friends in a reverence and think unkindness to be the greatest offence, and least punished amongst men, but so much the more to be dreaded, for God is Justiser[5] upon that alone. Love well and agree with your wife, for where is noise and debate in the house, there is unquiet dwelling. And much more where it is in one bed. Frame well yourself to love, and rule well and honestly your wife as your fellow, and she shall love and reverence you as her head. Such as you are unto her, such shall she be unto you. Obey and reverence your father-in-law as you would me; and remember that long life followeth them that reverence their fathers and elders. And the blessing of God for good agreement between the wife and husband is fruit of many children, which I for the like thing do lack, and the fault is both in your mother and me, but chiefly in her.

Read oft this my letter and it shall be as though I had often written unto you. And think that I have herein printed a fatherly affection to you. If I may see that I have not lost my pain(s), mine shall be the contentation[6] and yours the profit. And upon condition that you follow my advertisement I send you God's blessing and mine, and as well to come to honesty as to increase of years.

At Paris the 15th of April, your loving father, Thomas Wyatt.

---

[1] And … unthriftiness Prodigality and imprudence.

[2] despites Scorn.

[3] rage Irrationality, madness.

[4] hardily Boldly, incautiously.

[5] Justiser Judge, justice-maker.

[6] contentation Payment, satisfaction, contentment.

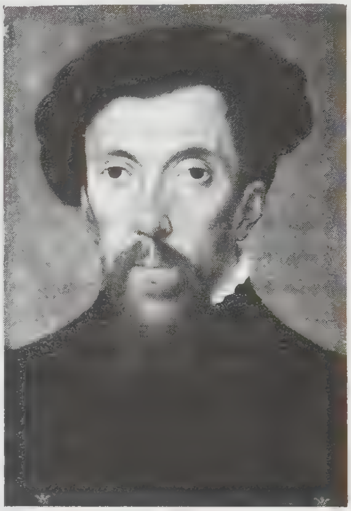
HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF SURREY

1517 – 1547

Like a number of other aristocrats, Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, largely confined his literary writings to manuscript circulation among his friends and fellow members of Henry VIII's court; it was the posthumous appearance of his works in the printer Richard Tottel's Miscellany (1557) that won him widespread readership. His work is a landmark in the development of English literature, for he was among the first in England to import the Petrarchan sonnet, and, in his translation of Books II and IV of Virgil's Aeneid, the first to deploy blank verse. As a writer, Surrey was innovative; as a courtier, he was imprudent, and paid the price when the king had him beheaded.



Surrey was born in Hunsdon, Hertfordshire in 1517, eldest son of Lord Thomas Howard, third duke of Norfolk, and Lady Elizabeth Stafford. Surrey's ancestors on both sides of his family included royalty, and as a boy this talented member of one of England's greatest families spent some time at Windsor Castle with Henry VIII's illegitimate son, Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Richmond, and in 1524 was granted the title of earl. He received a sound humanist education and had early experience living abroad when his father served as Lord Lieutenant in Ireland. One of his cousins was Anne Boleyn, second of Henry VIII's six wives, who managed to prevent a proposed marriage between Surrey and the king's daughter, Mary Tudor. Instead, in 1533, Surrey married Lady Frances de Vere, the earl of Oxford's daughter, by whom he had five children. As an adult, Surrey served as a courtier and soldier; his travels in France on diplomatic or military ventures doubtless had an impact on his understanding of the Continental Renaissance in art and letters. Service to the King was a risky business during the King's later years, however, for the King was increasingly suspicious and the court, especially after the Reformation, was split into competing factions. The balance had tipped against Surrey's family in 1536 when Henry VIII married Jane Seymour, his third wife, for the Seymours, who welcomed Henry's break with the Church of Rome, were bitter rivals of the Catholic Howards and took advantage of their new power (Surrey himself seems to have leaned toward Reform, although his exact views can be debated and perhaps shifted). Thanks to probably false accusations that he had sided with a rebellion against the King, the so-called Pilgrimage of Grace, Surrey was imprisoned between 1537 and 1539. His misfortune did not last, however, for Jane Seymour died shortly after giving birth. The King married Catherine Howard, another of Surrey's cousins, bringing the Howard family back into favor, at least until Catherine was found guilty of adultery and executed in early 1542. In 1541 the King named Surrey a Knight of the Garter, and for the next five years Surrey served the King in various English wars or administrative capacities.

During these years Surrey wrote verse (including love poems, elegies, satire, Biblical paraphrases, translated sections of Virgil's Aeneid, and a poignant meditation on Windsor Castle). During his lifetime he published only one poem, in praise of the deceased Sir Thomas Wyatt. Shakespeare and others would often adopt his sonnet structure, which instead of Petrarch's pattern—an octave followed by a sestet—most often has three quatrains (four lines usually rhyming alternately) and a couplet (a pair of lines). We call this the Shakespearean or English form, but it was Surrey who invented it. Even more important for the future of English literature is the blank verse that Surrey developed for his translations from Virgil, a flexible and harmonious meter that English writers such as Marlowe, Shakespeare, and Milton found the best equivalent for the dactylic hexameter of Latin epic.

In 1546, Surrey was involved in another political struggle. Henry VIII's health was bad, and the court was thinking about who might be regent for his little son, the future Edward VI. Surrey dared suggest openly that his father, the earl of Norfolk, would be Protector. Norfolk was next in the line of succession after Edward, and the Seymour family convinced the King that he was planning to depose the prince after Henry died and make himself king instead. Surrey was put on trial, the legal excuse being that he had treasonably placed the royal arms and insignia on his own coat of arms. He and his father were imprisoned in the Tower and there Surrey lost his head on 10 January 1547—the last person to be executed during Henry's reign. Norfolk was also condemned to die, but the death of Henry on January 28 voided the sentence at the last minute. Surrey is buried in Framlington, Suffolk.

[Please note that an additional poem by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey appears in the Elizabethan Sonnet and Lyric section elsewhere in this volume.]

⁂

Love, that Doth Reign and Live within My Thought[1]

Love, that doth reign and live within my thought, A
And built his seat within my captive breast, B
Clad in the arms wherein with me he fought, A
Oft in my face he doth his banner rest. B
But she that taught me love and suffer pain, C
My doubtful hope and eke° my hot desire D also
With shamefast° look to shadow and refrain, C modest
Her smiling grace converteth straight to ire. D
And coward Love, then, to the heart apace E
Taketh his flight, where he doth lurk and plain,° F complain
His purpose lost, and dare not show his face. E
For my lord's guilt thus faultless bide° I pain; F endure
Yet from my lord shall not my foot remove: G
Sweet is the death that takes end by love. G
—1557

Set Me Whereas the Sun Doth Parch the Green[2]

Set me whereas the sun doth parch the green,
Or where his beams may not dissolve the ice,
In temperate heat where he is felt and seen;
With proud people, in presence sad and wise;
Set me in base, or yet in high degree,
In the long night or in the shortest day,
In clear weather or where mists thickest be,
In lusty° youth or when my hairs be gray; vigorous
Set me in earth, in heaven, or yet in hell,
In hill, in dale, or in the foaming flood;
Thrall° or at large, alive whereso I dwell, captive
Sick or in health, in ill fame° or in good: repute
Yours will I be, and with that only thought Comfort myself when that my hap° is nought. luck
—1557

---

[1] Love … Thought This sonnet is a translation of Petrarch's Rima 140, which Surrey's friend Wyatt also translated.

[2] Set … Green Adaptation of Petrarch's Rima 145.

Alas! So All Things Now Do Hold Their Peace[1]

Alas! so all things now do hold their peace,
Heaven and earth disturbed in nothing.
The beasts, the air, the birds their song do cease;
The nightès chair[2] the stars about doth bring;
Calm is the sea, the waves work less and less:
So am not I, whom love, alas, doth wring,
Bringing before my face the great increase
Of my desires, whereat I weep and sing
In joy and woe, as in a doubtful ease.
For my sweet thoughts sometime do pleasure bring,
But by and by the cause of my disease° uneasiness, distress
Gives me a pang that inwardly doth sting,
When that I think what grief it is again
To live and lack the thing should rid my pain.
—1557

So Cruel Prison How Could Betide[3]

So cruel prison how could betide, alas,
As proud Windsor, where I, in lust and joy,
With a king's son my childish years did pass
In greater feast than Priam's sons of Troy?[4]

Where each sweet place returns a taste full sour:
The large green courts, where we were wont to hove,° linger
With eyes cast up unto the maidens' tower,
And easy sighs, such as folk draw in love.

The stately sales,[5] the ladies bright of hue,
The dances short, long tales of great delight,
With words and looks that tigers could but rue,[6]
Where each of us did plead the other's right.

The palm play,[7] where, despoiled° for the game, stripped
With dazed eyes oft we by gleams of love
Have missed the ball and got sight of our dame,
To bait° her eyes, which kept the leads[8] above. attract

The gravelled ground,° with sleeves tied on the helm,[9] jousting ground
On foaming horse, with swords and friendly hearts,
With cheer as though the one should overwhelm,
Where we have fought and chased oft with darts.° javelins

With silver drops the meads yet spread for ruth,[10]
In active games of nimbleness and strength,
Where we did strain, trained by swarms of youth,
Our tender limbs that yet shot up in length.

The secret groves, which oft we made resound
Of pleasant plaint,° and of our ladies' praise, lament
Recording soft what grace each one had found,
What hope of speed, what dread of long delays.

The wild forest, the clothed holts° with green; wooded hills
With reins avaled, and swift ybreathed[11] horse,
With cry of hounds and merry blasts between,
Where we did chase the fearful hart° a force.[12] male deer

The void[13] walls eke° that harboured us each night; also Wherewith, alas, revive within my breast

---

[1] Alas … Peace Surrey's version of Petrarch's Rima 164.

[2] nightès chair The constellation Ursa Major.

[3] So … Betide In 1537 Surrey was imprisoned in Windsor Castle for having struck a courtier and broken the peace in the king's domain. In this poem he remembers his earlier stay at the castle (1530–32) with Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Richmond and illegitimate son of Henry VIII. Richmond (who had married Surrey's sister in 1533) died in 1536.

[4] Priam's … Troy Priam, the king of Troy at the time of the Trojan war, had fifty sons.

[5] sales Halls or spacious chambers (from the French "salle").

[6] rue Regard with compassion.

[7] palm play Game in which the ball was hit with the palms.

[8] leads Sheets of metal that covered the roofs of the courts. Spectators would watch the game from these.

[9] helm Helmet, to which jousters would tie a lady's sleeve (then a separate, ornamental covering) as a token of her favor.

[10] With … ruth I.e., the meadows (meads) were still covered with dew; ruth Compassion.

[11] avaled Slackened; swift ybreathed Panting.

[12] chase … a force Run down.

[13] void I.e., empty. In royal houses it was customary for all tapestries and wall-hangings to be taken down when the resident members of the court were not at home.

The sweet accord, such sleeps as yet delight,
The pleasant dreams, the quiet bed of rest;

The secret thoughts imparted with such trust,
The wanton talk, the divers change of play,
The friendship sworn, each promise kept so just,
Wherewith we past the winter night away.

And with this thought the blood forsakes my face,
The tears berain° my cheeks of deadly hue, rain upon
The which, as soon as sobbing sighs, alas,
Upsupped° have, thus I my plaint renew: swallowed

"O place of bliss! renewer of my woes!
Give me accompt,° where is my noble fere,° account/ companion
Whom in thy walls thou didst each night enclose,
To other lief;° but unto me most dear?" precious

Each stone, alas, that doth my sorrow rue,
Returns thereto a hollow sound of plaint.
Thus I alone, where all my freedom grew,
In prison pine with bondage and restraint;

And with remembrance of the greater grief,
To banish the less, I find my chief relief.
—1557

Wyatt Resteth Here

Wyatt resteth here, that quick° could never rest; alive
Whose heavenly gifts increased by disdain,° malice
And virtue sank the deeper in his breast:
Such profit he by envy could obtain.

A head where wisdom mysteries° did frame, profound thoughts
Whose hammers beat still in that lively brain
As on a stith,° where that some work of fame anvil
Was daily wrought to turn to Britain's gain.

A visage stern and mild, where both did grow
Vice to contemn,° in virtue to rejoice; scorn
Amid great storms, whom grace assured so,
To live upright and smile at fortune's choice.

A hand that taught what might be said in rhyme;
That reft° Chaucer the glory of his wit— robbed
A mark the which (unperfected for time[1])
Some may approach, but never none shall hit.

A tongue that served in foreign realms his king;
Whose courteous talk to virtue did inflame
Each noble heart: a worthy guide to bring
Our English youth, by travail, unto fame.° good character

An eye whose judgment no affect° could blind, affection
Friends to allure and foes to reconcile;
Whose piercing look did represent a mind
With virtue fraught, reposed, void of guile.

A heart where dread yet never so impressed
To hide the thought that might the truth advance;
In neither fortune loft,° nor yet repressed, lifted
To swell in wealth or yield unto mischance.

A valiant corps° where force and beauty met, body
Happy—alas, too happy, but for foes;
Lived and ran the race that nature set,
Of manhood's shape, where she the mold did lose.

But to the heavens that simple° soul is fled, free from guile
Which left with such as covet° Christ to know[2] desire
Witness of faith that never shall be dead;
Sent for our health, but not received so.

Thus, for our guilt, this jewel have we lost;
The earth his bones, the heavens possess his ghost.
—1542

from Certain Books of Virgil's Aeneis: Book 2

The Greekës chieftains, all irked° with the war wearied
Wherein they wasted had so many years,
And oft repulsed by fatal destiny,
A huge horse made, high raised like a hill,

---

[1] for time For want of time.

[2] such as covet Christ to know I.e., Christians.

By the divine science of Minerva;[1]
Of cloven fir compacted were his ribs;
For their return a feigned sacrifice,
The fame whereof so wandered it at point.[2]
In the dark bulk they closed bodies of men,
Chosen by lot, and did enstuff[3] by stealth
The hollow womb with armed soldiers.
There stands in sight an isle hight° Tenedos, called
Rich and of fame while Priam's[4] kingdom stood,
Now but a bay and road[5] unsure for ship.
Hither them secretly the Greeks withdrew,
Shrouding themselves under the desert shore;
And, weening° we they had been fled and gone, believing
And with that wind had fet° the land of Greece, reached
Troia discharged her long continued dole.° grief
The gates cast up, we issued out to play,
The Greekish camp desirous to behold,
The places void, and the forsaken coasts.
Here Pyrrhus' band, there fierce Achilles', pight;[6]
Here rode their ships; there did their battles[7] join.
Astonnied,° some the scathful° gift beheld, astonished / harmful
Behight° by vow unto the chaste Minerve, dedicated
All wond'ring at the hugeness of the horse.
And first of all Timœtes gan° advise did
Within the walls to lead and draw the same,
And place it eke° amid the palace court— moreover
Whether of guile, or Troia's fate it would.[8]
Capys, with some of judgment more discreet,
Willed° it to drown, or underset with flame desired
The suspect present of the Greeks' deceit,
Or bore and gauge the hollow caves uncouth:° unknown
So diverse ran the giddy people's mind.
Lo! foremost of a rout° that followed him, company
Kindled° Laöcoön[9] hasted from the tower, inflamed
Crying far off, "O wretched citizens!
What so great kind of frenzy fretteth° you? consumes
Deem ye the Greeks, our enemies, to be gone?
Or any Greekish gifts can you suppose
Devoid of guile? Is so Ulysses[10] known?
Either the Greeks are in this timber hid,
Or this an engine° is to annoy our walls, instrument of war
To view our towers, and overwhelm our town.
Here lurks some craft. Good Trojans! give no trust
Unto this horse, for, whatsoever it be,
I dread the Greeks, yea[11] when they offer gifts."
—1557

---

[1] Minerva Goddess of wisdom, invention, the arts, and war.

[2] The fame ... point I.e., the story (of the supposed sacrifice) traveled ("wandered it") conveniently ("at point").

[3] enstuff Fill, garrison.

[4] Priam King of Troy.

[5] road Sheltered area of water, close to shore, where boats can anchor.

[6] Pyrrhus Achilles's son. He became the new leader of the Myrmidons, Achilles's followers; band troop; Achilles Greatest Greek warrior; pight Were pitched.

[7] battles Bodies of troops in battle array.

[8] Whether ... would I.e., either this idea was a result of Timœtes's treachery, or it was merely Troy's fate that the horse would enter the walls of Troy.

[9] Laöcoön Trojan priest.

[10] Ulysses Odysseus, the king of Ithaca and the hero of Homer's Odyssey. Odysseus was the warrior who suggested the construction of the horse.

[11] yea Especially, even more.

THE ELIZABETHAN SONNET AND LYRIC

Developed first in thirteenth-century Italy and wildly popular in Renaissance Europe, the sonnet (or "little song") became one of the most enduring forms of English verse. A lyric poem in fourteen lines, usually with ten or twelve syllables to a line, the standard sonnet follows one of several rhyme schemes. The most important are the Italian or "Petrarchan," the English (often referred to as the "Shakespearean," although it was Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, who first developed it), and the Spenserian. The Petrarchan form, introduced by the Italian writer Francesco Petrarch in the fourteenth century, has two parts: first comes the "octave" of eight lines, which usually sets forth some situation, argument, narrative, analogy, comment, wish, or other thought. This is followed by the "sestet," six lines that often perform a volta, or turn, that gives some resolution, further elaboration, counter-argument, or other contrast to the octave. The rhyme scheme ordinarily is abba abba cde cde, although variations for the sestet (such as cdc dcd or cdd cdd) are acceptable.

The English poets Thomas Wyatt and Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey first introduced the sonnet into English, translating some of Petrarch's sonnets in the 1520s and 1530s and, in the case of Surrey, writing a few more in the Petrarchan manner. They were not published until 1557, but they circulated in manuscript. By the 1580s the popularity of the sonnet on the Continent led to its revival in England, and the posthumous publication in 1591 of Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella started a fashion for the form and for the sonnet sequence that blazed for a few years with extraordinary intensity.

The influence of Wyatt and Surrey (and later of Sidney, Spenser, and Shakespeare) on poetry in English has been so powerful that we tend to think of the sonnet sequence as being naturally associated with love poetry. The first known sonnet sequence in English—Anne Lock's A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner—is a forceful reminder that the form may also be put to religious purposes. Appended to her translation of a selection of John Calvin's sermons, the sonnet sequence now attributed with considerable confidence by scholars to Lock includes five prefatory sonnets, followed by twenty-one sonnets providing commentaries on the verses of Psalm 51; taken as a whole, the sequence is a powerful Calvinist poetic meditation on sin and guilt. It is worth noting in passing here that, in a variety of forms, psalm discourse became during the sixteenth century a recognized genre of writing, particularly for women; it was one form in which women writers could express themselves in the first person without fear of their behavior being termed inappropriate. Later in the century Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke, completed a poetic translation of all the psalms that her brother, Sir Phillip Sidney, had begun before he died. (Of considerable importance in themselves, Herbert's series of translations are also thought to have influenced John Donne's series of Holy Sonnets.)

Shakespeare's sonnets (some of which certainly, and many others probably, were written in the 1590s although Shakespeare may well have revised them before they were published, well after the fashion was over, in 1609) typically have four parts: three "quatrains" (a set of four lines) each rhyming abab cdcd efef and then a couplet rhyming gg. The quatrains may trace the development of an idea, state the same notion several times, or describe a situation from several angles—the possibilities of this flexible form are nearly endless. The couplet may be a logical conclusion, a further thought, or even a dramatic denial of what has come before.

Edmund Spenser's Amoretti (1595) have yet another scheme, a sort of compromise between the Petrarchan and the Shakespearean, interlocking its quatrains with the rhyme scheme abab bcbc cdcd concluding with a couplet ee. Substantial selections from the sonnets by Wyatt, Surrey, Sidney, Shakespeare, and Spenser appear elsewhere in this volume, thus the sonnets in this section are designed to provide further insight into the origins and range of the form; the lyrics by Gascoigne and by an anonymous poet are meant to extend the reader's sense of how the short Elizabethan lyric could handle some of the themes—age, absence—found in the sonnets.

* * *

The Continental Background

FRANCESCO PETRARCH (1304–1374)

The influence of Petrarch's sonnet sequence, about his unfulfilled love for Laura, was immense, and provided European love poets with a way to shape the erotic experience in terms of frustration, self-scrutiny, self-division, praise, and longing and to express this through elaborate metaphor, paradox, and an intense focus on detail. Whether the object of imitation, revision, or satire, Petrarch's approach to love long remained the discourse against which and through which poets defined themselves when writing on love.

from Rime Sparse

134

Pace non trovo et non ò da far guerra,
e temo et spero, et ardo et son un ghiaccio,
et volo sopra 'l cielo et giacco in terra,
et nulla stringo et tutto 'l mondo abbraccio.
Tal m'à in pregion, che non m'apre né serra,
né per suo mi riten né sciolglie il laccio,
et non m'ancide Amore et non mi sferra,
né mi vuol vivo, né mi trae d'impaccio.
Veggio senza occhi, et non ò lingua et grido, et bramo di perir, et cheggio aita,
et ò in odio me stesso et amo altrui.
Pascomi di dolor, piangendo rido, egualmente mi spiace morte et vita.
In questo stato son, Donna, per vui.
—WRITTEN MID-14TH CENTURY

134

I find no peace and all my war is done,
I fear and hope, I burn and freeze like ice;
I fly above the wind yet can I not arise;
And naught I have and all the world I season° seize upon
That[1] looseth nor locketh holdeth me in prison
And holdeth me not, yet can I 'scape no wise,
Nor letteth me live nor die at my device.° own choice
And yet of death it giveth none occasion.
Without eyen° I see and without tongue I eyes
plain;° complain
I desire to perish, and yet I ask health;
I love another, and thus I hate myself;
I feed me in sorrow and laugh in all my pain;
Likewise displeaseth me both death and life:
And my delight[2] is causer of this strife.
—C. 1520S (TRANS. SIR THOMAS WYATT)

---

[1] That Which (i.e., Love).

[2] my delight His paradoxical pleasure in loving but also the lady—Laura, in Petrarch's poem.

140

Amor, che nel penser mio vive et regna
e 'l suo seggio maggior nel mio cor tene, talor armato ne la fronte vene;
ivi si loca et ivi pon sua insegna.
Quella ch' amare et sofferir ne 'nsegna
e vol che 'l gran desio, l'accesa spene ragion, vergogna, et reverenza affrene, di nostro ardir fra se stessa si sdegna.
Onde Amor paventoso fugge al core,
Lasciando ogni sua impresa, et piange et trema;
ivi s'asonde et non appar più fore.
Che poss' io far, temendo il mio signore, se non star seco infin a l'ora estrema?
ché bel fin fa chi ben amando more.

—written mid-14th century

140

Love, that doth reign and live within my thought
And built his seat° within my captive breast, dwelling
Clad in the arms wherein with me he fought
Oft in my face he doth his banner rest.
But she that taught me love and suffer pain,
My doubtful hope and eke° my hot desire also
With shamefast° look to shadow° and refrain,° modest / conceal hold back
Her smiling grace converteth straight to ire.
And coward Love then to the heart apace
Taketh his flight, where he doth lurk and plain;° complain
His purpose lost, and dare not show his face.
For my lord's guilt thus faultless bide I pain,
Yet from my lord[1] shall not my foot remove:
Sweet is the death that taketh end by love.

—c. 1530s (Trans. Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey)

189

Passa la nave mia colma d'oblio
per aspro mare a mezza notte il verno enfra Scilla et Caribdi, et al governo siede 'l signore anzi 'l nimico mio;
à ciascun remo un penser pronto et rio che la tempesta e 'l fin par ch' abbi a scherno;
la vela rompe un vento umido eterno di sospir, di speranze et di desio;
pioggia di lagrimar, nebbia di sdegni bagna et rallenta la già stanche sarte che son d'error con ignoranzia attorto.
Celansi i duo mei dolci usati segni, morta fra l'onde è la ragion et l'arte tal ch' i' 'ncomincio a desperar del porto.

—written mid-14th century

189

My galley chargèd with forgetfulness
Through sharp seas in winter nights doth pass
'Tween rock and rock;[2] and eke° mine enemy, alas, also
That is my lord,[3] steereth with cruelness;
And every oar a thought in readiness,
As though that death were light° in such a case. easy
An endless wind doth tear the sail apace
Of forcèd sighs and trusty fearfulness.
A rain of tears, a cloud of dark disdain,
Hath done the wearied cords° great hinderance, ship's rigging
Wreathèd with error and eke with ignorance
The stars be hid that led me to this pain;
Drownèd is reason that should me consort,° accompany
And I remain despairing of the port.

—c. 1520s (Trans. Sir Thomas Wyatt)

---

[1] lord I.e., Love—the speaker's feudal lord.

[2] 'Tween rock and rock Petrarch specifies Scylla and Charybdis, the dangerous monsters who lived on a rock and in the whirlpool on either side of a narrow channel through which Ulysses must sail in Homer's Odyssey.

[3] lord I.e., Cupid, Love.

190

Una candida cerva sopra l'erba
verde m'apparve con duo corna d'oro, fra due riviere all'ombra d'un alloro,
levando 'l sole a la stagione acerba.
Era sua vista sì dolce superba ch' i' lasciai per seguirla ogni lavoro, come l'avaro che 'n cercar tesoro con diletto l'affanno disacerba.
"Nessun mi tocchi," al bel collo d'intorno scritto avea di diamanti et di topazi.
"Libera farmi al mio Cesare parve."
Et era 'l sol già vòlto al mezzo giorno, gli occhi miei stanchi di mirar, non sazi,
quand' io caddi ne l'acqua et ella sparve.
—written mid-14th century

190

Whoso list° to hunt, I know where is a hind,° wishes female deer
But as for me, alas, I may° no more: can
The vain travail° hath wearied me so sore effort
I am of them that farthest come behind.
Yet may I by no means my wearied mind
Draw from the deer: but, as she fleeth afore, Fainting I follow. I leave off therefore,
Since in a net I seek to hold the wind.
Who list to hunt, I put him out of doubt,
As well as I may spend his time in vain.
And, graven with diamonds in letters plain,
There is written her fair neck round about:
"Noli me tangere,[1] for Caesar's I am,
And wild for to hold, although I seem tame."
—c. 1520s (Adapted by Sir Thomas Wyatt)

Gaspara Stampa (1523–1554)

132

Quando io dimando nel mio pianto Amore,
Che cosí male il mio parlar ascolata,
Mille fate il dí, non una volta,
Ché mi fere e trafigge a tutte l'ore:
"Come esser può, s'io diedi l'alma e 'l core al mio signor dal dí ch'a me l'ho tolta, e se ogni cosa dentro a lui raccolta
è riso e gioia, è scema di dolore, ch'io senta gelosia fredda e temenza,
e d'allegrezza e gioia resti priva,
s'io vivo in lui, e in me di me son senza?"
"Vo' che tu mora al bene ed al mal viva," mi risponde egli in ultima sentenza;
"Questa ti basti, e questo fa' che scriva."
—1554 (Rime, no. 132 in A. Salza ed., 1913)

132

When in my weeping I inquire of Love[2]
(Who so unwillingly gives ear to me)
A thousand times a day—never just once—
Why he will wound and pierce me all the time:
"How can it be, since I gave heart and soul
To him,[3] the day I took them both from me;
If everything enclosed within his breast
Is only joy and laughter, never sorrow,
How can I feel cold jealousy and fear
And be deprived of all my joyfulness,
Living in him, and never in myself?"
"I bid you die to joy and live in grief,"
Love answers me in his hard final sentence:

---

[1] Noli me tangere "Do not touch me," words said by Christ after the Resurrection. Early commentators on Petrarch often read this as signifying that Laura considered herself bound by the laws of chaste marriage as decreed by Augustus Caesar. Wyatt's readers who identified the deer with Anne Boleyn (whom Wyatt knew and perhaps loved), would have read the lines as suggesting that the "hind" belongs to Henry VIII.

[2] Love The personified god of love, Cupid, Eros.

[3] To him Stampa refers to her beloved and social superior, Count Collatino di Collalto, on whose name, "high hill," she often puns, and who seems for a while to have reciprocated her love.

"Let this suffice you, that it makes you write."
—1997 (TRANS. LAURA ANNA STORTONI AND MARY PRENTICE LILLIE)

JOACHIM DU BELLAY (?1522–1560)

from L'Olive augmentée[1]

113

SI NOSTRE VIE ...

Si nostre vie est moins qu'une journée
En l'eternel, si l'an qui faict le tour
Chasse noz jours sans espoir de retour,
Si perissable est toute chose née,
Que songes-tu, mon ame emprisonée?
Pourquoy te plaist l'obscur de nostre jour
Si pour voler en un plus cler sejour,
Tu as au dos l'aele bien empanée?
La, est le bien que tout esprit desire,
La, le repos ou tout le monde aspire,
La, est l'amour, la, le plaisir encore.
La, ô mo name au plus hault ciel guide!
Tu y pouras recongnoistre l'Idée
De la beauté, qu'en ce monde j'adore.[2]
—1550

113

IF THIS, OUR LIFE ...

If this, our life, be less than but a day
In the eternal; if each circling year
Bears off our days, never to reappear;
If every creature born must death obey,
Why then, my prisoned soul, should you delay?
How can it please you thus to tarry here,
In darkness, when unto a brighter sphere,
Your well-plumed wings would carry you away?
There is the good that man's mind hungers for;
There, the repose he seeks, forevermore;
There, love and joy abound, their bliss bestow.
There, O my soul, as you reach heaven's height,
Beauty ideal will loom within your sight,
That beauty that I worship here below.
—2002 (TRANS. NORMAN R. SHAPIRO)

from Les Regrets[3]

31

Heureux qui, comme Ulysse, a fait un beau voyage,
Ou comme cestuy-là qui conquit la toison,
Et puis est retourné, plein d'usage et raison,
Vivre entre ses parents le reste de son âge!

31

Blest he who like Ulysses voyaged fair and wide,
Or like the man who conquered Colchis' Golden Fleece,[4]
And then returned well-traveled, learned now and wise,
To live among his own all his remaining years!

[1] L'Olive augmentée The L'Olive sequence of sonnets, written in the style of Petrarch, did much to popularize the sonnet form in France. Whereas for Petrarch the laurel was the symbol of his loved one, for Du Bellay it was the olive tree. The first edition of Du Bellay's collection appeared in 1549; the expanded edition in which this sonnet first appears was published a year later.

[2] Si nostre ... monde j'adore A Neoplatonic sonnet adapted from a sonnet by Bernardino Daniello.

[3] Les Regrets Du Bellay published this sequence of 191 sonnets in 1558. The poem has been translated for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature by Roger P. Kuin.

[4] Colchis' Golden Fleece In Greek mythology, Jason and his Argonauts traveled to Colchis (on the Black Sea) in a quest for the fleece of a winged ram made of gold.

Quand reverrai-je, hélas, de mon petit village
Fumer la cheminée, et en quelle saison
Reverrai-je le clos de ma pauvre maison,
Qui m'est une province, et beaucoup davantage?

Plus me plaît le séjour qu'ont bâti mes aïeux,
Que des palais Romains le front audacieux,
Plus que le marbre dur me plaît l'ardoise fine:

Plus mon Loir gaulois, que le Tibre latin,
Plus mon petit Liré, que le mont Palatin,
Et plus que l'air marin la doulceur angevine.
—1558

Alas, when shall I see my village and the smoke
Of its few humble fires once more, and in what season
Shall I behold again the yard of my poor house,
Which is to me a province, yea, and even more?

Better I love the dwelling my forefathers built
Than Roman palaces' great arrogant façades;
Better than marble hard I love the gentle slate:

Better my Gallic Loire than Latin Tiber[4] far,
Better my slight Liré[5] than the Mount Palatine,
And better than sea air the softness of Anjou.[6]
—2015 (TRANS. ROGER P. KUIN)

PIERRE DE RONSARD (1524–1585)

Je vouldroy bien richement jaunissant
En pluye d'or goute à goute descendre
Dans le giron de ma belle Cassandre,
Lors qu'en ses yeux le somne va glissant.[1]
Puis je vouldroy bien en toreau blandissant[2]
Me transformer pour finement la prendre,
Quand elle va par l'herbe la plus tendre
Seule à l'escart mille fleurs ravissant.
Je vouldroy bien afin d'aiser ma peine
Estre un Narcisse, & elle une fontaine
Pour m'y plonger une nuict à sejour:
Et vouldroy bien que ceste nuict encore
Durast toujours sans que jamais l'Aurore[3]
D'un front nouveau nous r'allumast le jour.
—1552 (Amours I.20)

I would in rich and golden coloured rain,
With tempting showers in pleasant sort descend
Into fair Phyllis' lap (my lovely friend)
When sleep her sense with slumber doth restrain.
I would be changed to a milk-white bull,
When midst the gladsome fields she should appear,
By pleasant sweetness to surprise my dear,
Whilst from their stalks she pleasant flowers did pull.
I were content to weary out my pain,
To be Narcissus so she were a spring
To drown in her those woes my heart do wring:
And, more, I wish transformed to remain:
That whilst I thus in pleasures' lap did lie,
I might refresh desire, which else would die.
—1593 (TRANS. THOMAS LODGE, Phillis 34)

---

[1] Je vouldroy … glissant In this poem, popular in England, Ronsard wishes to become golden rain like that into which Zeus changed himself so as to visit the imprisoned Danaë, into a white bull like the one Zeus became when he seduced and kidnapped young Europa, and a pool like the one in which Narcissus saw himself and fell in love.

[2] blandissant Later editions have "blanchissant"—"white."

[3] l'Aurore The dawn goddess.

[4] Loire … Tiber The Loire, France's most celebrated river, flows through central France to the Atlantic; the Tiber River flows through Rome, in Italy.

[5] Liré Village in which Du Bellay was born and raised.

[6] Anjou A former county of France, Anjou is located in the Loire valley.

Quand vous serez bien vielle, au soir à la chandelle,
Assise aupres du feu, devidant & filant,
Direz, chantant mes vers, en vous esmerveillant,
"Ronsard me celebroit du temps que j'estois belle."
Lors vous n'aurez servante oyant telle nouvelle,
Desja sous le labeur à demy sommeillant,
Qui au bruit de "Ronsard" ne s'aille resveillant,
Benissant vostre nom de louange immortelle.
Je seray sous la terre, & fantaume sans os:
Par les ombres Myrtheux je prendray mon repos.
Vous serez au fouyer une vielle accroupie,
Regrettant mon amour, & vostre fier disdain.
Vivez, si m'en croyez, n'attendez à demain:
Cueillez dés aujourdhuy les roses de la vie.
—1578 (Sonnets for Hélène II, 43)

When you are very old, by candle's flame,
Spinning beside the fire, at end of day,
Singing my verse, admiring, you will say:
"When I was fair, Ronsard's muse I became."
Your servant then, some weary old beldame—
Whoever she may be—nodding away,
Hearing "Ronsard," will shake off sleep, and pray
Your name be blessed, to live in deathless fame.
Buried, I shall a fleshless phantom be,
Hovering by the shadowed myrtle tree;
You, by the hearth, a pining crone, bent low,
Whose pride once scorned my love, much to your sorrow.
Heed me, live for today, wait not the morrow:
Gather life's roses while still fresh they grow.
—2002 (Trans. Norman R. Shapiro)

Anne Lock (?1533–c. 1600)

from A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner

English Sonnet

Long have I heard, and yet° I hear the sounds[1] a still
Of dreadfull threats and thunders of the law, b
Which echo of my guilty mind resounds, a
And with redoubled horror doth so draw b
My listening soul from mercy's gentle voice c
That louder, Lord, I am constrained to call: d
Lord, pierce mine ears, and make me to rejoice c
When I shall hear, and when thy mercy shall d
Sound in my heart the gospel of thy grace. e
Then shalt thou give my hearing joy again, f
The joy that only may relieve my case. e
And then my bruised bones, that thou with pain f
Hast made too weak my feebled corpse to bear, g
Shall leap for joy, to show mine inward cheer. g abuse?

Look on me, Lord: though trembling I beknowe,[2]
That sight of sin so sore offendeth thee,
That seeing sin, how it doth overflow
My whelmed soul, thou canst not look on me
But° with disdain, with horror and despite.° except / scorn
Look on me, Lord: but look not on my sin.
Not that I hope to hide it from thy sight,
Which seest me all without and eke° within. also
But so remove it from thy wrathful eye,
And from the justice of thine angry face,
That thou impute it not.[3] Look not how I Am foul by sin: but make me by thy grace
Pure in thy mercy's sight, and, Lord, I pray,
That hatest sin, wipe all my sins away.
—1560

---

[1] The marginal gloss provided for this sonnet is verse 8 of Psalm 51: "Thou shalt make me hear joy and gladness; all the bones which thou hast broken shall rejoice."

[2] The marginal gloss provided for this sonnet is verse 9 of Psalm 51: "Turn away thy face from my sins, and do away all my misdeeds."

[3] impute it not Do not take it into consideration.

SAMUEL DANIEL (1562–1619)

from Delia

6[1]

Fair is my love, and cruel as she's fair;
Her brow shades frowns, although her eyes are sunny;
Her smiles are lightning, though her pride despair;
And her disdains are gall, her favours honey.
A modest maid, decked with a blush of honour,
Whose feet do tread green paths of youth and love;
The wonder of all eyes that look upon her:
Sacred on earth, designed a saint above.
Chastity and Beauty, which were deadly foes,
Live reconciled friends within her brow:
And had she pity to conjoin° with those, join
Then who had heard the plaints I utter now?
O had she not been fair, and thus unkind,
My Muse had slept, and none had known my mind.
—1592

28[2]

Raising my hopes on hills of high desire,
Thinking to scale the heaven of her heart,
My slender means presumed too high a part;
Her thunder of disdain forced me retire,
And threw me down to pain in all this fire,
Where, lo, I languish in so heavy smart,
Because th'attempt was far above my art:
Her pride brooked not poor souls should come so nigh her.
Yet I protest my high aspiring will
Was not to dispossess her of her right:
Her sovereignty should have remained still,
I only sought the bliss to have her sight.
Her sight, contented thus to see me spill,
Framed my desires fit for her eyes to kill.
—1592

33

When men shall find thy flower, thy glory pass,
And thou with careful° brow sitting alone full of cares
Received hast this message from thy glass,
That tells thee truth, and says that all is gone;
Fresh shalt thou see in me the wounds thou madest,
Though spent thy flame, in me the heat remaining:
I that have loved thee thus before thou fadest,
My faith shall wax, when thou art in thy waning.
The world shall find this miracle in me,
That fire can burn when all the matter's spent:
Then what my faith hath been thy self shalt see,
And that thou wast unkind thou mayst repent.
Thou mayst repent that thou hast scorned my tears,
When winter snows upon thy golden hairs.
—1592

MICHAEL DRAYTON (1563–1631)

from Idea

6

How many paltry, foolish, painted things,
That now in coaches trouble every street,
Shall be forgotten, whom no poet sings,
Ere they be well wrapped in their winding sheet?
Where I to thee eternity shall give,
When nothing else remaineth of these days,
And queens hereafter shall be glad to live
Upon the alms of thy superfluous praise;
Virgins and matrons reading these my rhymes,
Shall be so much delighted with thy story,
That they shall grieve they lived not in these times,
To have seen thee, their sex's only glory:
So shalt thou fly above the vulgar throng,
Still to survive in my immortal song.
—1619

61

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part;
Nay, I have done: you get no more of me,
And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart,
That thus so cleanly I myself can free;
Shake hands for ever, cancel all our vows,
And when we meet at any time again,

---

[1] 6 The numbering here follows that in the edition edited by A.C. Sprague (Cambridge, MA, 1930). Because Daniel frequently revised his poetry, numbering varies in the editions published during his lifetime.

[2] 28 First printed in a collection of sonnets appended to the 1591 unauthorized edition of Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella.

Be it not seen in either of our brows
That we one jot of former love retain.
Now at the last gasp of Love's latest breath,
When his pulse failing, Passion speechless lies,
When Faith is kneeling by his bed of death,
And Innocence is closing up his eyes,
Now if thou would'st, when all have given him over,
From death to life, thou might'st him yet recover.
—1619

63

Truce, gentle Love, a parley now I crave:
Methinks 'tis long since first these wars begun.
Nor thou, nor I, the better yet can have;
Bad is the match, where neither party won.
I offer free conditions of fair peace,
My heart for hostage that it shall remain.
Discharge our forces, here let malice cease,
So for my pledge thou give me pledge again.
Or if no thing but death will serve thy turn,
Still thirsting for subversion of my state,
Do what thou canst, raze, massacre, and burn,
Let the world see the utmost of thy hate:
I send defiance, since if overthrown,
Thou vanquishing, the conquest is mine own.
—1599

William Shakespeare (1564–1616)

from Romeo and Juliet (Act 1, Scene 5)

ROMEO. If I profane with my unworthiest hand
This holy shrine,[1] the gentle fine is this,
My lips, two blushing pilgrims, ready stand
To smooth that rough touch with a tender kiss.
JULIET. Good pilgrim, you do wrong your hand too much,
Which mannerly devotion shows in this;
For saints[2] have hands that pilgrims' hands do touch,
And palm to palm is holy palmers' kiss.[3]
ROMEO. Have not saints lips, and holy palmers too?
JULIET. Aye, pilgrim, lips that they must use in prayer.
ROMEO. Oh then, dear saint, let lips do what hands do.
They pray. Grant thou, lest faith turn to despair.
JULIET. Saints do not move, though grant for prayers' sake.
ROMEO. Then move not while my prayer's effect I take.
[He kisses her.]
—1597 (written c. 1595)

Sir John Davies (1569–1626)

from Gulling Sonnets[4]

3

What eagle can behold her sun-bright eye,
Her sun-bright eye that lights the world with love,
The world of Love wherein I live and die,
I live and die and diverse changes prove,
I changes prove, yet still the same am I,
The same am I and never will remove,
Never remove until my soul doth fly,
My soul doth fly and I surcease to move,
I cease to move which now am moved by you,
Am moved by you that move all mortal hearts,
All mortal hearts whose eyes your eyes doth view,
Your eyes doth view whence Cupid shoots his darts,
Whence Cupid shoots his darts and woundeth those
That honor you, and never were his foes.
—1594

John Davies of Hereford (1565–1618)

from The Scourge of Villany

The author loving these homely meats[5] specially, viz: cream, pancakes, buttered pippin pies[6] (laugh, good people) and tobacco; writ to that worthy and virtuous gentlewoman, whom he calleth mistress, as followeth:

---

[1] holy shrine Juliet's hand.

[2] saints That is, images or statues of saints, venerated by pilgrims.

[3] palmers' kiss Palmers were pilgrims who have been to the Holy Land; their emblem was the palm frond (hence Juliet's pun on "palm").

[4] Gulling Sonnets Davies's Gulling Sonnets, parodying the conventions and clichés of the sonnet form, circulated in manuscript.

[5] meats Foods, consumables; Davies, too, is writing parody.

[6] pippin pies Apple pies.

If there were, oh! an Hellespont[1] of cream
Between us, milk-white mistress, I would swim
To you, to show to both my love's extreme,
Leander-like—yea! dive from brim to brim.
But met I with a buttered pippin pie
Floating upon't, that would I make my boat
To waft me to you without jeopardy,
Though sea-sick I might be while it did float.
Yet if a storm should rise, by night or day,
Of sugar-snows and hail of caraways,
Then, if I found a pancake in my way,
It like a plank should bring me to your quays;
Which having found, if they tobacco kept,
The smoke should dry me well before I slept.
—1611

RICHARD BARNFIELD (1574–1620)

from Cynthia

14

Here, hold this glove (this milk-white cheverel° glove) leather
Not quaintly over-wrought with curious knots,
Not decked° with golden spangs,° nor silver spots, decorated decorative metal
Yet wholesome for thy hand as thou shalt prove.
Ah no (sweet boy)[2] place this glove near thy heart,
Wear it, and lodge it still within thy breast,
So shalt thou make me (most unhappy) blest.
So shalt thou rid my pain, and ease my smart:
How can that be (perhaps) thou wilt reply,
A glove is for the hand not for the heart,
Nor can it well be proved by common art,
Nor reason's rule. To this, thus answer I:
If thou from glove dost take away the "g,"
Then glove is love: and so I send it thee.
—1595

17

Cherry-lipped Adonis[3] in his snowy shape,
Might not compare with his pure ivory white,
On whose fair front° a poet's pen may write, forehead
Whose roseate red excels the crimson grape,
His love-enticing delicate soft limbs,
Are rarely° framed t' entrap poor gazing eyes: wonderfully
His cheeks, the lily and carnation dyes
With lovely tincture, which Apollo's dims.[4]
His lips ripe strawberries in nectar wet,
His mouth a hive, his tongue a honey-comb,
Where muses (like bees) make their mansion.
His teeth pure pearl in blushing coral set.
Oh how can such a body sin-procuring,
Be slow to love, and quick to hate, enduring?
—1595

GEORGE GASCOIGNE (1539–1578)

Gascoigne's Lullaby

Sing lullaby, as women do,
Wherewith they bring their babes to rest,
And lullaby can I sing too
As womanly as can the best.
With lullaby they still the child,
And if I be not much beguiled,
Full many wanton babes have I
Which must be stilled with lullaby.

First lullaby my youthful years,
It is now time to go to bed,
For crooked age and hoary hairs
Have won the haven within my head:
With lullaby then youth be still,
With lullaby content thy will,
Since courage quails, and comes behind,
Go sleep, and so beguile thy mind.

---

[1] Hellespont Older name for the Dardanelles, the strait between European and Asian Turkey. The Leander of line 4 is the young man in classical legend who swam across the Hellespont to meet his mistress Hero.

[2] sweet boy Barnfield's sonnets are the only extant ones in Renaissance England, other than Shakespeare's, in which a male speaker addresses another man in a homoerotic manner.

[3] Adonis The young man beloved by the goddess Venus.

[4] Apollo's dims God of the sun: the beloved's color "dims" even the sun.

Next lullaby my gazing eyes,
Which wonted were to glance apace.° directly
For every glass may now suffice,
To show the furrows in my face:
With lullaby then wink awhile,
With lullaby your looks beguile:
Let no fair face, nor beauty bright,
Entice you eft° with vain delight. again

And lullaby my wanton will,
Let reasons rule now reign thy thought,
Since all too late I find by skill,
How dear I have thy fancies bought.
With lullaby now take thine ease,
With lullaby thy doubts appease:
For trust to this, if thou be still,
My body shall obey thy will.

Eke° lullaby my loving boy, also
My little Robin[1] take thy rest,
Since age is cold, and nothing coy,
Keep close thy coin, for so is best:
With lullaby be thou content,
With lullaby thy lusts relent,
Let others pay which hath mo° pence, more
Thou art too poor for such expense.

Thus lullaby my youth, mine eyes,
My will, my ware, and all that was,
I can no mo delays devise,
But welcome pain, let pleasure pass:
With lullaby now take your leave,
With lullaby your dreams deceive,
And when you rise with waking eye,
Remember Gascoigne's lullaby.
—1573

ANONYMOUS[2]

Ode[3]

That time and absence proves[4]
Rather helps than hurts to loves.

Absence, hear thou my protestation
Against thy strength,
Distance and length:
Do what you can for alteration,
For hearts of truest mettle
Absence doth join and time doth settle.

Who loves a mistress of such quality,
He soon hath found
Affection ground[5]
Beyond time, place, and all mortality;
To hearts that cannot vary,
Absence is present, time doth tarry.

My senses want° their outward motions, lack
Which now within Reason doth win,
Redoubled in her[6] secret notions,
Like rich men that take pleasure
In hiding, more than handling, treasure.

By absence, this good means I gain:
That I can catch her,
Where none can watch her,
In some close corner of my brain.
There I embrace and kiss her,
And so I both enjoy and miss her.
—1611

---

[1] Robin Slang for penis.

[2] Anonymous The authorship is uncertain. This is one of a number of Renaissance love poems celebrating the triumph of the waking or dreaming imagination over the beloved's absence or, in some cases, rejection.

[3] Ode From Francis Davison et al., A Poetical Rhapsody (1611 ed.).

[4] That time and absence proves I.e., prove: a singular verb after a double subject was then common.

[5] Affection ground The wording is condensed, but the idea is that love for an admirable lady is a ground, a base, for an affection that does not change because of absence.

[6] her I.e., Reason's.

LITERATURE IN IRELAND, GAELIC SCOTLAND, AND WALES

Anthologies that endeavor to provide some sense of the literatures of Ireland and of Scotland and of Wales as well as of England tend to follow a similar pattern so far as the first three are concerned: to include significant representation of these literatures in the early medieval period, but then to allow them to drop almost entirely from view until the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The greatest classics of the Celtic literatures in the early medieval period—Táin Bó Cúailnge, the Mabinogion—often make an appearance, but the later medieval poet Dafydd ap Gwilym, for example, is usually omitted, despite being regarded by many as the most important Welsh poet of any era. If Dafydd deserves to be represented, so too do important late medieval poets such as Giolla Brighde Mac Con Midhe and Gofraidh Fionn Ó Dálaigh; and so too do important poets of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries such as Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn, Dáibhí Ó Bruadair, Piaras Feiritéar, and Aogán Ó Rathaille. So too do less canonical but highly interesting poets such as Isabel, Countess of Argyll. And so too do important prose works such as Geoffrey Keating's History of Ireland and Elis Gruffydd's Chronicle.

One thread above all—aside from a shared linguistic background—ties together the literatures of Ireland, Scotland, and Wales in the medieval era and the early part of the early modern period: the presence of a bardic tradition. A bard (Gaelic spelling) or bardd (Welsh spelling) was a poet and storyteller by profession; bards underwent long training in their art, and became adept at writing in a variety of genres, each with its own conventions as to meter and rhyme as well as appropriate subject matter and tone. Bards wrote elegies, eulogies and other praise poems, satires, and lyric poetry. They were well versed in history and legend, and were expected to be able to compose new work in these areas too (as well as to know and to be able to recite traditional works). Typically they worked for hire, under the patronage of a chief or nobleman—though during some eras they might move from place to place or compose work for more than one patron.

From the medieval into the early modern period in Ireland, of far more importance than the bards were the filid (singular: fili), poets who also had a role in spiritual, political, and educational matters. The system of filid had a complex hierarchical character; within the category of fili there were several sub-categories, with the highest, ollam, being accorded a status approximating that of a chieftain or king. The thirteenth century saw the rise of bardic schools, which taught traditional history and law as well as poetic technique; over the following centuries, the stature of bards increased and the duties of fili became more circumscribed, such that the position of bard and of fili became quite similar.

In Wales a pencerdd (lord of song, later a prydydd), who appears to have enjoyed a high status not far below that of an ollam in Ireland, was expected to offer praise poems to God and to the king (including, when necessary, his eulogy). The bard teulu (household bard, later called a teuluwr), who had official status at court, was tasked with performing for the queen and with entertaining the teulu (warband or household guard) with poems related to battle.

In all three of Ireland, Gaelic Scotland, and Wales the bardic traditions were eroded over the course of the late medieval era and the beginnings of the early modern period. Economic pressures, periodic depopulation (as a result of the Black Death, but also of numerous other factors), the decline of court-centered society, the adoption of new forms of schooling, the development of the printing press—all these played a role in the decline of bardic traditions.

In all three cultures the decline was certainly hastened by the periodic efforts of the English to bring Ireland, Gaelic Scotland, and Wales under their control. The invasion and partial conquest of Ireland in the late twelfth century had left Irish culture largely intact over the long run, as the conquerors adopted the culture of the conquered; the "Old English," as the invaders came to be known, were before long speaking Gaelic as their first language. And Gaelic poets appeared to have no qualms about entering the service of the Anglo-Norman patrons; as Gofraidh Fionn Ó Dalaigh wrote, "In the poem for the foreigners we promise that the Irish will be driven from Ireland; in the poem for the Irish we promise that the foreigners will be scattered eastwards across the sea."

The "New English"—the settlers who appropriated Irish land in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (following the "re-conquest" of Ireland that began under England's Henry VIII in the 1530s)—were influenced by the local culture too, but not to anything like the same degree as their Anglo-Norman predecessors. They were slower than their predecessors to intermarry with the local population, they continued to speak English, they remained fiercely Protestant in a Catholic culture—and they made frequent efforts to impose the language and the religion of England on the Irish, as well as exerting political and economic control. In doing so, they proved themselves capable on many occasions of horrendous brutality. More than once in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries they resorted to purposeful mass starvation as a means of imposing control, and when Oliver Cromwell invaded to re-assert control of the island in 1649, the result was a drop in the Irish population that has been variously estimated by many to have been over 40% (whether as a direct result of battle or through war-related starvation and disease).

Scotland enjoyed greater independence than Ireland over these centuries—though lowland (i.e., southern) Scotland came to be heavily influenced by English culture. (Middle Scots—the language of the poets known as the Scots Makars who are represented in this anthology's coverage of the medieval era—developed largely out of Old English.) For Gaels in Scotland, the conflict of greatest importance was between the Stewart kings (who were not Gaels, but of predominantly French ancestry) and the Gaelic lords. In fact, one of the most damaging turns of events for the Gaelic peoples of highland Scotland came at the hands of a Stewart—James VI, who also assumed the English crown as James I on the death of Elizabeth in 1603. James's efforts to achieve full union between England and Scotland (which would have entailed abolishing the Scottish parliament and the Scottish legal system) were frustrated, but he succeeded in enacting the 1609 Statutes of Iona; among many other provisions, the statutes outlawed bards and required that highland chiefs send their children to be educated in lowland Scotland as Protestants.

Like Ireland, Wales also suffered invasion in multiple stages, beginning with the Anglo-Norman invasion in the later eleventh century; the English title "Prince of Wales" came into existence after the 1282 vanquishing of Llywelyn ap Gruffudd and the Welsh by Edward I of England. As in Ireland, Welsh culture largely resisted the English for several centuries, though there were significant changes. Notably, the structure of the bardic system altered. The most important patrons of the bards had been kings and princes—the rulers of the several independent kingdoms that had existed within the territory of Wales; hence the chief bards of pre-conquest Wales are often referred to as the "poets of the princes" (Beirdd y Tywysogion).[1] The independent kingdoms ceased to exist with the English conquest; the bards continued their art, but now under different sorts of patrons—the Church, and even more frequently as time went on, wealthy landowners. The "poets of the gentry" (Cywyddwyr or Beirdd yr Uchelwyr) who dominated Welsh literature between roughly 1300 and 1600 inclined less towards praise poems of the old sort and more towards poems on the themes of nature and of love (including many poems dealing with sexual themes in a strikingly direct fashion)—as well as more humorous poems. New forms developed as well—perhaps most notably the cywydd, in which seven-syllable lines are rhymed, but with the rhyme alternately falling on stressed and unstressed syllables.

---

[1] The label Beirdd y Tywysogion is not applied, however, to the authors of works such as the Y Gododdin (included in volume 1 of this anthology), which may be as early as the sixth century; these poets are known as cynfeirdd, or "Early Poets."

Also around this time, cynghanedd (chiming), a system of patterns of alliteration and internal rhyme, became solidified.

Among the "poets of the gentry" Dafydd ap Gwilym stands out not only for the quality of his verse but also for his good humor in virtually all circumstances; one would never imagine from reading his poetry that life in Wales in the fourteenth century, though its politics were relatively calm, was characterized by economic hardship, insecurity, and plague. The fifteenth century, on the other hand, was a time of frequent rebellion against the English, and fifteenth-century poets such as Guto'r Glyn and Lewis Glyn Cothi gave open expression to that discontent, condemning both the English invaders and those among the gentry who collaborated with them. Poets of the fifteenth century were far less positive in other ways as well; it would be difficult to imagine a poem further in tone from the sunny humor of Dafydd's verse than Siôn Cent's "The Illusion of the World," with which this section of the anthology concludes.

By the late sixteenth century, when the literary Renaissance in England was entering full flower, the same could hardly be said of Ireland, Scotland, or Wales; in his Defense of Poesy, Sir Philip Sidney largely relies on the past tense when he speaks in 1596 of the bardic tradition:

> In Wales, the true remnant of the ancient Britons, there are good authorities to show the long time they had poets, which they called bards; so through all the conquests of Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, some of whom did seek to ruin all memory of learning among them, yet do their poets to this day, last; so as it is not more notable in soon beginning than in long continuing.

The great Welsh—and Irish, and Scottish—traditions from the twelfth through fifteenth centuries were indeed still alive at the end of the sixteenth century, but many of them only barely so. Arguably, Celtic literary culture had enjoyed a Renaissance much earlier than the English Renaissance of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries.

⌘⌘⌘

IRELAND AND GAELIC SCOTLAND

GOFRAIDH FIONN Ó DÁLAIGH (D. 1387)

One of the best-known Irish bardic poets, Gofraidh Fionn (Geoffrey the Fair) held the post of Chief Ollam of Ireland, which may be loosely translated as "great poet of Ireland"; the post of Chief Ollam carried with it far more prestige and cultural authority than do roles such as "poet laureate" today. The 73-stanza poem of praise and exhortation that is excerpted below is in the late medieval tradition of eulogy, or praise poetry; it may give some sense as well of Irish society during this period. "Domhnall," to whom the poem is addressed, was Domhnall Og Mag Carthaigh of Kerry. The English controlled portions of south-eastern Ireland through much of the late medieval period; Irish forces under chiefs such as Domhnall had been pushed to the west into Kerry, but made frequent efforts to re-take the lost land.

from To Domhnall[1] ("Domhnall Og")

Be our guide, O Domhnall, thou who soothest all affliction.
We long for guidance through Banbha.[2]
March before us, O prince

Lead not to West or South this great host setting forth.
Better lead us North-East, thou salmon of Eas Ruaidh.[3]

---

[1] To Domhnall Translated by Lambert McKenna; first published in the Irish Monthly, 1919.

[2] Banbha I.e., Ireland. Banbha was a patron goddess of Ireland, and her name came to be often used as synonymous with the island itself.

[3] Eas Ruaidh Waterfall traditionally considered to be one of the three greatest in Ireland and known for the large population of salmon who leapt up the waterfall in spawning season. In some versions of an Irish myth, the hero Fionn mac Cumhaill caught a magic salmon in the falls.

Lead us forward to the East,
O Domhnall son of Mág Carthaigh, to Corc's[1] bright-horned castle-lawn,
the bright famous blue fort.

O Son of Cormac, fresh of hue, lead the Eoghanacht of Caiseal to that land not 'neath them now; stretch forth to thy old country.

A challenge to thee are the foreigners' houses on the place of Pádraig's[2] tent.
Fight thy foes' hosts for the castle bequeathed by us to that saint.

Thou art heir to Corc of Caiseal by whom that castle was built.
The entering of its lord therein
—not by securer right stood Corc there!

Why would'st thou not follow Corc?
Thy land mourns thy exile.
Corc held that fortress whence he was called Caiseal-Corc.

Thine at length, O Domhnall, shall Caiseal be, a fence against oppression!
No man can gainsay thee
—by thy folk 'twas first held.

O Domhnall of the noble-browed eyes, the saints' prophesies state that in the East shall be thy home.
From the East came ye at first.
...

That smooth fair-treed fort,
Caiseal of Corc son of Lughaidh, thoughtlessly you left; and drank
a draught that made you forget it!

For those lands thy folk left the hills around Caiseal.
Twas wrong to prefer wild glens,
to exchange wine for small ale!

O generous-hearted Domhnall Óg, thou hast two causes for change:
Better the fruits of the land you abandoned,
And 'tis shame to cleave to chill rocks!

Strange to ever depart from those seventeen tuaths,[3]
the fair fields of royal Caiseal, lands not to be despised!

Lead us back the same road,
O curly-haired strong-armed hero.
Too long our absence from our country,
Great our misery to miss it!
...

From here to Sliabh gCrot[4]
'tis all a sea storm-swollen of foreigners, O prince of the Eirne.[5]
May God quell it before thee!

Moses' passage through the waters,[6]
as he brought home his host,
when the Red Sea ebbed before them,
—with his host were comparison fit!

The folk of Moses, Amram's son
O prince of Banbha, were long in duress far from their home till he delivered them!

---

[1] Corc Corc of Caíseal, legendary founder of the Eoghanachta, an important Irish dynasty that had been extremely powerful in southern Ireland, with its seat of power in Cashel (Caíseal). Though its strength was greatly reduced beginning in the tenth century, and in the mid-fourteenth century Cashel was under English control, the Eoghanachta survived in a line of kings that included Domhnall.

[2] Pádraig Saint Patrick.

[3] tuaths Areas of land. The Old Irish term tuath was used to refer both to the land and to its inhabitants.

[4] Sliabh gCrot Mountain near Cashel.

[5] Eirne River featuring the Eas Ruaidh.

[6] Moses ... waters The story of Moses leading the Israelites out of Egyptian slavery (recounted in the biblical book of Exodus) was a frequent reference point in literature that pointed hopefully towards the Irish throwing off the yoke of English control.

For a weary length was Israel's race in duress in Egypt.
Till the end of their woe and captivity long drawn out was their misery.

Through God's power that goodly host was saved by Moses.
Than their deliverance from exile no folk ever got greater blessing!

For saving Israel's race
Moses is now in Jesus' home.
For freeing them from slavery
he has won from God his own freedom.
...

Of the West of Banbha leave to each lord his ancestral domain.
Extend thy sway to Caiseal, fair gentle well-watered hill.

Lead O Domhnall of Dún Inbhir thy chiefs and their departing folk into that fair festive plain yew-clad, swan-haunted, lovely!
...

Passing Ciarraidhe[1] on the South, through leafy-forted Magh Coinchinn by Luachair of Síol Deadhaidh of fair banks and blue streams,

into I Chonaill Gabhra
thy warrior bands shall go, then across Claonghlais and the Daol on whose stream are white swans;

to high Dún Eochair Máighe to the center of lovely Mumha —swift onset to be ever famous!
to the Máigh of the famous yew;
...

At the rock of royal Caiseal thou shalt put away their troubles when the seventeen tuaths view from it their true land.

Set each chief in his own land of the tuaths of smooth-built Caiseal.
Let each chief's house be set on the dwelling-spot of his sires.

In the fort of stout-lanced Caiseal establish thyself, guarding it from harm
—the fort we ne'er should have left,
Mayst thou enjoy it, O Domhnall!

Thine by right is thy sires' steading;
therefore must thou go to Caiseal.
Bravest thy valor on every hill.
Thee must we ever trust!
...

Isabel, Countess of Argyll (Iseabail Ní Mheic Cailein) (b. 1437)

The official status of bardic poet was a male preserve, but at least a few women evidently wrote classical poetry in the bardic style. Notable among them is the Countess of Argyll (Gaelic: Iseabail Ní Mheic Cailein); unfortunately, nothing of her work beyond a few courtly love poems has survived. We know little of Isabel; she appears to have been either the wife or the daughter of Colin Campbell, 1st Earl of Argyll, and is said to have had eight children herself.

---

[1] Ciarraidhe The progression of place names in the following three stanzas suggests a movement eastward from Kerry toward Cashel.

Atá Fleasgach Ar Mo Thí

Atá fleasgach ar mo thí,
a Rí na ríogh go rí leis!
a bheith sínte ré mo bhroinn
agus a choim ré mo chneis:

Dá mbeith gach ní mar mo mhian, ní bhiadh cian eadrainn go bráth,
gé beag sin dá chur I gcéill,
's nach tuigeann sé féin, mar tá.

Acht ní éadtrom gan a luing, sgéal as truaighe linn 'nar ndís:
esan soir is mise siar,
mar nach dtig ar riar a rís.

There's a Young Man in Pursuit of Me[1]

There's a young man in pursuit of me,
Oh King of Kings, may he have success!
Would he were stretched out by my side with his body pressing against my breast!

If everything were as I would wish,
no distance would ever cause a separation, though that is all too little to say with him not yet knowing the situation.

But it isn't easy if his ship doesn't come,
for the two of us it's a wretched matter:
he is East and I am West,
so what we desire can never again happen.

Is Mairg Dá Ngalar An Grádh

Is mairg dá ngalar an grádh, gé bé fáth fá n-abrainn é;
deacair sgarachtainn ré pháirt;
truagh an cás i bhfeilim féin.

An grádh-soin tugas gan fhios, ó's é mo leas gan a luadh,
mara bhfaigh mé furtacht tráth,
biaidh mo bhláth go tana truagh.

An fear-soin dá dtugas grádh,
's nach féadtar a rádh ós n-aird,
dá gcuireadh sé mise i bpéin,
gomadh dó féin bhus céad mairg.

Woe to the One Whose Sickness Is Love

Woe to the one whose sickness is love,
no matter the grounds I might present, hard it is to get free of its hold,
sorry the lot I have myself.

That love I have given in secret,
it being better not to declare it, unless I find relief before long,
my flowering will grow wan, withered, and wretched.

That man to whom I have given love,
(this should not be said out loud)
if he should ever cause me hurt, may he suffer a hundred times the woe.

---

[1] There's a Young Man in Pursuit of Me Both the Gaelic text and the English translations of this and the following poem are from An Anthology of Scottish Women Poets, ed. Catherine Kerrigan, translations by Meg Bateman.

Woe to the One Whose Sickness Is Love

(alternative translation)[1]

Pity whose complaint is love,
What'er my reason thus to speak,
'Tis hard to separate from its object,
Sad's the condition I am in.
The love which I in secret gave,
Of which I'd better never speak,
Unless I quickly get relief,
Withered and thin I'll soon become.
The man whom I have so loved,
A love I never must confess;
Has me put in lasting bonds,
For me a hundred times 'tis pity.

ANONYMOUS

Though its authorship is uncertain, the elegy below is often attributed to Marion Campbell, wife of Gregor MacGregor (Griogair Ruadh), who in the 1560s was the young leader of the MacGregor clan. The Campbell and MacGregor clans had been allies before this time, and marriages such this one between a Campbell and a MacGregor were not uncommon. In 1562, however, a bitter feud between the two groups broke out after Grey Colin of the Campbell clan refused to recognize Gregor MacGregor's claims to certain lands. The MacGregors under Gregor responded aggressively, seizing Campbell lands on Loch Tay and killing several Campbells. The feud continued with sporadic violence until Gregor's capture on 1 August 1569; he was tried and convicted, then executed on 7 April 1570. Marion Campbell is believed to have been present at her husband's beheading. The Campbell and MacGregor clans ended their feud late that same year, but the MacGregors continued to be involved in violent controversies over disputed lands through the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Scottish monarchs generally sided against the MacGregors; in the early sixteenth century James I banned the use of the MacGregor name, and in the mid seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries many MacGregors fled to Ireland and to North America. (Meanwhile, the Campbells acquired the role of government agents among the clans, and in 1691 were used by King William to carry out the infamous Massacre of Glencoe, in which dozens of members of the MacDonald clan were killed for hesitating to swear allegiance to the king.)

Lament for MacGregor of Glenstrae, who was beheaded in 1570[2]

Early on Lammas[3] morning
I was sporting with my love, but before noon came upon us
my heart had been crushed.

Alas, alas, alas and alack,
sore is my heart, my child,
alas, alas, alas and alack,
your father won't hear our cries.

A curse on nobles and relations who brought me to this grief, who came on my love unawares and took him by deceit.[4]

Had there been twelve of his kindred and my Gregor at their head, my eye would not be weeping
nor my child without a friend.

They put his head on an oaken block and spilled his blood on the ground,

---

[1] Woe ... (alternative translation) This second translation is by Thomas MacLauchlan (1862).

[2] Lament for MacGregor of Glenstrae, who was beheaded in 1570 The present translation, by Meg Bateman, is from An Anthology of Scottish Women Poets, ed. Catherine Kerrigan. As the editor notes, it is impossible to be sure whether or not a poem such as this, written from a woman's point of view but of unknown authorship, was written by a woman or a man.

[3] Lammas Harvest festival; Lammas Day is celebrated on 1 August.

[4] by deceit It is not known by what means the Campbells managed to capture Gregor.

if I had had a cup there
I'd have drunk my fill down.[1]

A pity my father was not diseased and Grey Colin stricken with plague, even though Ruthven's daughter[2]
would wring her hands dismayed.

I'd put Grey Colin under lock and key and Black Duncan[3] in heavy irons, and every Campbell in Taymouth[4]
I'd set to wearing chains.

I reached the lawn of Taymouth
but for me that was no balm,
I left no hair on my head unpulled
nor skin upon my palms.

If only I had the flight of the lark with Gregor's strength in my arm, the highest stone in the castle would be the closest to the ground.

Though now I'm left without apples and the others have them all, my apple is fair and fragrant with the back of his head on the mold.

Though others' wives are safe at home
lying sound asleep,
I am at the edge of your grave beating my hands in grief.

I'd far rather be with Gregor
roaming moor and copse
than be with the niggardly Baron of Dull[5]
in a house of lime and stone.

I'd far rather be with Gregor driving the cattle to the glen than be with the niggardly Baron of Dull drinking beer and wine.

I'd far rather be with Gregor
under a rough hairy skin[6]
than be with the niggardly Baron of Dull dressed in satin and silk.

Even on a day of driving snow
when the seven elements reel
Gregor would find me a little hollow where we would snugly sleep.

Ba hu, ba hu, little waif,[7]
you are still only young, but the day when you revenge your father
I fear will never come.
—LATE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn (1550–91)

The best-known of a long family line of poets, Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn wrote in a variety of different genres and (as was the case with most bardic poets by the sixteenth century), in praise of a variety of noblemen. The forty-odd poems attributed to him include humorous poems, elegies, satires, and battle poems (notable among them "The Battle of Drumleene" and "Brian na Murratha," which calls on one Irish lord to vanquish "the Saxon tribe … so that from the proclamation of war there will never be any save Irishmen" in Ireland). The

---

[1] if I … fill down Blood-drinking as a metaphor for women's grief is commonplace in this genre of poetry, called lament or "keening" (caoineadh). It is unclear whether mourning women actually drank blood or whether such references are purely symbolic.

[2] Ruthven's daughter Kate Ruthven, Grey Colin's wife.

[3] Black Duncan Grey Colin's eldest son.

[4] Taymouth Taymouth (and Taymouth Castle) was home to the Campbell clan.

[5] with the … Dull I.e., with some stingy, boring nobleman. The village and parish of Dull are located in the Scottish county of Perth.

[6] a rough hairy skin It was common practice among the peasantry to sleep under animal skins.

[7] Ba hu … waif This verse, which reveals the poem to be a lullaby, offers a twist on literary tradition; many bardic poems were couched as lullabies from the outset, praising the deeds of the future chief still in the cradle.

"Dall" in Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn translates as "blind," and it has often been taken to mean that the poet was indeed either partially or entirely blind, though there is no evidence for that other than his name.

from The Battle of Drumleene[1]

…

Until the stars of heaven be numbered, or the great sands of the sea, it will not be possible to recount the evil deeds wrought on the brightly foliaged hill with its ancient fields.

Six royal battles 'ere now have been waged around the fair hill of Foyle,[2] by the sluggish stream, without recording any petty fray.

In short, this is the seventh battle, this mighty conflict of tomorrow, that the champion of Ulster's[3] land will wage upon this mound of which ye have heard.

It is he, moreover, who will give battle, Hugh, son of Manus, of Tara's[4] rampart; the cheery and ruddy of countenance, that is most wont to triumph over the foe.

This great battle of the morrow is the grievous, destructive plague which has set the four elements trembling throughout the spacious Rampart of Lughaidh.[5]

That is what has made flaming folds of the hills of the world, and sent the waves through the forest thickets in mighty masses of flame.

The spurting fires of heaven, a presage of conflict, have appeared, with the great maned star in a wondrous, warlike array.

The sepulchered dead will be struggling and contending, throughout Fál's[6] plain the corpses are quickening, in expectancy of the extraordinary evil.

Throughout the delightful expanses of the Field of the Fair the beasts of Banbha's[7] plain are uttering intelligent speech, simultaneously proclaiming the woes of Ireland.

Brutes are brought forth in human shape, and men in the form of brutes, many a monster has that created throughout the dyked meadow of Cobhthach.[8]

The ravenous fury of battle is inciting the great chief, passing over the isles of Ireland with crimson tresses about her head.

Until morn come, the phantom women of faery, the wolves and wild animals, will utter presage of the coming battle to the host of Macha.[9]

Many this night, throughout both armies, will be the specters, ghosts and apparitions around the spoiler of Banbha's castles.

Many a soldier in the camp of the warrior of Bregia[10] will have had his shield on his wrist since the night before; many the long fingers looped around javelins, hands clasped about swordhilts.

---

[1] The Battle of Drumleene Translated by Eleanor Knott. The battle that gives the poem its title has not yet occurred; the structure of the work is to recount the history of six previous Irish battles, taking poetic license to describe them as having been waged on the site, as inspiration for the expected battle to come. Drumleene is in the northwest of Ireland.

[2] hill of Foyle Drumleene is located near the River Foyle.

[3] Ulster Northernmost of the four provinces into which Ireland is traditionally divided.

[4] Tara According to legend, the Hill of Tara was the site of the court of the ancient high kings of Ireland, who ruled over the whole island; though it is unlikely that any kings actually had such extensive power, the site has retained its importance as both a mythological and a political symbol.

[5] Lughaidh Probably a literary name for Ireland, which is sometimes called "the land of Lughaidh."

[6] Fál Literary name for Ireland.

[7] Banbha Goddess both of fertility and of war. Banbha came to be regarded as patron goddess of Ireland; here, her name is used as synonymous with the island itself.

[8] meadow of Cobhthach I.e., Ireland.

[9] host of Macha I.e., the host of Ulster; the phrase references Emain Macha, the ancient seat of Ulster's kings.

[10] Bregia Location of Tara.

In the morn betimes[1] there will be many a meal consumed without comfort, warriors whetting their keen weapons, shrieks of scaldcrows and ravens.

Most horrifying, then, will be the clang of the clashing spears, the whistle of their sharp blades with dripping points, the harsh calling of their ivory horns.

Piteous, at the same time, will be the bellowing of the gaping brutes, the voices of the wolves from the heights of Banbha, the fluttering of strange banners.

Betimes tomorrow morn the blue assembly mound of Cruachán,[2] the woeful ridgepole of all slaughter, will be a clamorous hillock.

The battle of tomorrow morning will be gained, as is wont, by the keen-eyed host from Teach Truim and the stately race of Conall.[3] …

Enniskillen[4]

Located in what is now County Fermanagh in Northern Ireland, Enniskillen Castle was in the late seventeenth century held by Cú Chonnacht, the wealthy and powerful Lord of Fermanagh. Cú Chonnacht often received support from the English government in his conflicts with other Irish lords and—no doubt in part because of his great wealth—attracted the attention of numerous poets. The poem below was included in a duanaire (songbook) that brought together twenty-four praise-poems, written by eleven different poets. "Enniskillen," a poem that lauds the castle and all it represents rather than praising its lord (or his son) directly, is unusual in its tone as well as its content.

Alas for him who looks on Enniskillen, the gleaming water of its bays, the music of its waterfalls. To look on it is perilous for us; like a shining sword its brightness hurts our eyes, but we cannot turn away.

Long 'ere I came to the white-walled rampart amongst the blue hills, I thought that if I reached that house I should lack nothing.

I heard, alas for me that heard it, such repute of the fairy castle of surpassing treasure, and how my beguilement was in store, that it was impossible to turn me back from it.

This was what each one said of the splendid dwelling of the lion of the Erne[5]—never in Banbha[6] had there been a dwelling to equal it.

They used to say too that whoever would see the bending wood or the verdant slope, the level beach or the green field, would never walk away from it.

Once I had heard it described, I could see no other vision whenever I slept, but only the spacious splendor of this noble dwelling.

I proceed on my way, I reach Enniskillen of the overhanging oaks. Through the fair field of bending, fruit-laden branches I did not hesitate to approach.

As I neared the place I was startled at the tumult; the baying of lively hounds and hunting-dogs driving deer from the wood for hunters.

A space beyond the court, on a fairy-like bay of murmuring water, was so crowded with groves of tapering ship-masts that you could hardly make out the waves on the shore.

---

[1] betimes Early.

[2] Cruachán Another name for Drumleene.

[3] Teach Truim Probably Tara; Conall Conall Gulban, fifth-century king who founded the kingdom of Tyrconnell in northwestern Ireland.

[4] Enniskillen The present text is based on the early twentieth-century translation by Eleanor Knott; the language has been revised and modernized for this anthology. The translation does not attempt to replicate the meter or rhyme scheme of the original, in which each stanza comprises four lines, with the second and fourth of these rhyming.

[5] Erne River near which Enniskillen is located.

[6] Banbha Literary term for Ireland. It refers to the goddess Banbha, patron goddess of Ireland and goddess of fertility and war.

And hard by the enclosed courtyard I see a lovely plain of golden radiance, the grounds of the bright-hued castle, glistening with dew, the soil of Heaven, or else its very likeness.

Then I reached the green of the castle grounds—soil upturned by the hooves of steeds; no plant could compete with the horses as they pranced on the ground of the courtyard.

The horses of the castle raced against each other; I see them coursing one by one, the hills around all hidden as if by mist, the dust from thundering steeds.

I make directly for the fortress of the Lia;[1] wondrous were the people I found within the walls of the fair mansion.

I found the nobles of the race of Colla[2] handing out treasure in the thronged court, and among them were those who could show you the mysteries from the beginnings of the Grecian Gaels.[3]

And throughout the fortress I found plenty of poets and minstrels, filling the place from one bright, white wall to the other—happy the dwelling in which they find room!

In other rooms were slender-lipped, satin-clad maidens, I found many of them, weaving wondrous golden fringe, the castle with fair, sleek hounds.

All through the house there are warriors, against every wall; sharp-edged weapons hang over each fighter, warriors of fruitful Druim Caoin.[4]

On the battlements of the bright, wooded rampart a mighty band of elfin youth, whether from the fairy-mound of Bodhbh or from Ler's Hostel,[5] the eye dared not see for the brightness of their splendor.

A company of artificers making vessels, a company of smiths making weapons; a company of wrights from their different lands work upon her—fair gem of babbling streams.

Dyeing of cloth, polishing of blades, fitting of spearheads on spears, exercising of horses; negotiating over captives, drawing up of conditions, scholars surveying the list of kings.

Taking of hostages, releasing of hostages; healing of warriors, wounding of warriors; continual bringing in and giving out of treasure at the wondrous, smooth-walled castle.

Part of that day they talked of exploits, telling and thinking of battles; and time would be spent by the men of Ushnagh[6] in feasting, hearing music.

The whole fair day until supper we spent in the bright, grassy courtyard; just one hour in length did that whole day seem to us.

All began to seat themselves, smooth places in the great hall; in hardly any meeting place would you see a throng to equal them.

Cú Chonnacht Óg, son of Cú Chonnacht, supple form to which smoke clings—when all in that great hall are seated he seats himself on his royal chair.

I sat on the right hand of the champion of Tara until the circling of goblets had ended; many nobles paid court to the king, but his elbow never disdained me.

---

[1] Lia Possibly a reference to the Lia Fáil or "Stone of Destiny" at Tara, which would shriek when the rightful king stood on it.

[2] Colla According to Irish legend, Colla Uais (one of three brothers named Colla) was king of all Ireland in the fourth century; his brother, Colla da Crioch, was considered a distant descendant of Cú Chonnacht

[3] beginnings … Grecian Gaels Legend traced the beginnings of Gaelic settlement in the British Isles to a Greek general, Galethus, who lived in the era of Moses.

[4] Druim Caoin Another name for the Hill of Tara. According to legend, Tara was the site of the court of the ancient high kings of Ireland, who ruled over the whole island; though it is unlikely that any kings actually had such extensive power, the site has retained its importance as both a mythological and a political symbol.

[5] Bodhbh … Hostel In the legend of The Children of Ler, Bodhbh and Ler were rivals who made peace with each other.

[6] Ushnagh Traditionally considered the center of Ireland, where the four ancient provinces meet.

In a while it came time for those in the castle to take their rest; beds of down were prepared for the noblest among those who were gathered there, well-mannered.

Before the day could overtake them, a band of warriors were fitting spears; at daybreak horses shod, men rounding up their horses.

Shortly after sleep I see, gathered around the hawk of Síoth Truim,[1] chosen warriors in battle gear, standing in the bright stone castle courtyard.

Ere morning came the brave youths of the king's court set out, left us; a great, long, dense column, spear-armed, no thoughts of making peace.

It was not long until they returned to us, golden men of Colla, after victories everywhere; happy the kingdom that is their homeland.

That day around Loch Erne there is many a stranger woman whose husband is no more; and the figures of many wounded hostages are coming in after the conflict.

Precious treasures there were in that dwelling, which had not been there at the beginning of day: and hard by the place there were cattle which had not been near the night before.

Then were the poets of the castle rewarded by Eachaidh's descendant,[2] who never shrank from combat: their verses he paid for had caused small harm; riches had been got beyond what he allowed to them.

I sought to take leave of Maguire,[3] I and other scholars who were there; away from the lofty, bright castle, alas, he allowed me to go.

Tears flowed down his cheek when he parted from me, that warrior said he would not part from me for good, though I might travel far away from him.

I remember that the day I turned my back on the household of the king's dwelling, such sorrow lay upon them all that the grief of any one of them was not separate from the grief of others.

I am none the better now for losing that household. Would I had reached the end of my days; I would not wish long life after they have gone, I fear I shall survive too long.

Never have I heard of a household so noble as that in the castle—how splendid!—under any that sprung from Colla; so every poet will pronounce.

Castle of the bright lawns, that none ever leaves of his own free will; men are lured to that place from every quarter—alas for him who looks on Enniskillen.

---

[1] Síoth Truim Fairy mound (side) that is identified variously as the birth-place or burial-place of the ancient hero Cú Chulainn. Its mention here invites a comparison between Cú Chulainn and Cú Chonnacht.

[2] Eachaidh's descendant I.e., Cú Chonnacht; Eachaidh Doimhlen was the father of the three Collas to which Cú Chonnacht traced his descent.

[3] Maguire I.e., Cú Chonnacht; Maguire was the name of his dynasty.

A Satire[1]

Among the subgenres of bardic poetry is áer (Welsh: dychan)—usually translated as satire. Many poems in this tradition, however, are more poems of defamation or direct insult (or simply poems expressing negative or pessimistic views) than they are what we would today term satire. The spirit of such verse may seem relatively harmless, but it was not always taken to be such; the satire below, written against six visitors who are accused of having taken advantage of the poet's generosity to them, is a notable case in point. The response of members of the O'Hara (Gaelic: Ó hEadhra) family he had lampooned was, according to different versions of the story, either to cut out his tongue or to murder as well as mutilate him; it is believed that he is the "Teige Dall O Higgen" who was (along with his wife and one of his children) reported to have been murdered in 1591 by members of the Ó hEadhra family.

A troop of six that came to my house, I shall give a description of them; scarce of milk was I the next morning, from the thirst of the six vagabonds.

It's been a long time, seemingly, since a bit of cow's produce had entered their bodies, the twice three whom I have mentioned.

I was able—'tis a pity—to bring them from death to life; they must needs drink my milk, so great was their thirst from the dry bread.

I in want, and they in necessity—I am in a strait between the two; it is hard for me to repress these verses, yet is it sinful for me to make them.

It is best not to conceal the satire if any deserve censure; since I satirized the troop of six it is unfitting not to tell it.

The first that I saw, he was the best equipped of the band, a youth whose vest was not worth more than a groat; one whom feasting or gaming never impoverished.

The second man, as I found, coming in front of the company, was a miserable fellow whose marrow had gone from him, I shall not leave him out of the reckoning.

The weapons of the third wretch were an old javelin and an untempered, gapped[2] ax; were he and his makings-of-an-ax in an encounter, I pity one with such a battle-equipment.

The equipment of the fourth fellow who marched with them? Four shafts,[3] that never knocked a splinter out of target, were slung across his rear end.

At the heels of the four others comes the fifth rogue, in a short smock not worth a groat; I do not think his mantle was any better.

The appearance of the last one, a fellow not worth a fleshworm[4] was along the lines of the other five; a gaunt, pale fellow, he was a poor commodity on inspection.

I beseech God who shed His blood, since it is but decay for them to be alive—it is scarcely to be called living—that none may slay the troop of six.

---

[1] A Satire Translated by Eleanor Knott; the English has been slightly modernized for this anthology.

[2] untempered Tempered metal has been subjected to a process of repeated heating that makes the metal stronger and more resilient as a weapon; gapped With a notched, unsharpened blade.

[3] shafts Arrows.

[4] fleshworm Maggot.

GEOFFREY KEATING (SÉATHRÚN CÉITINN)
(C 1569–1644)

Irish poet, historian, priest, and theologian, Geoffrey Keating (Gaelic: Séathrún Céitinn) was one of the most significant Irish authors of his time. Born in Tipperary to a family of "old English" (i.e., Anglo-Norman) ancestry, Keating is believed to have been educated first at a bardic school in Tipperary; he then lived overseas (in Rheims and later Bordeaux) for many years, and did not return to Ireland until c. 1610. He then seems to have been active as a priest in the area of Tipperary for some years. According to legend, he also spent some years in hiding from the English authorities, though it is not clear when that may have occurred, or whether he spent another period abroad. He must have lived for much of the 1620s and early 1630s in a center with a good library; it would not otherwise have been possible for him to write his major work, Foras Feasa ar Éirinn (History of Ireland, completed c. 1634). That work is a history of Ireland from the Creation to the Anglo-Norman conquest. It is a history with a particular focus on invasions—Geoffrey was clearly keen to examine all historical precedents, real or imagined, for outsiders invading Ireland. One of the work's literary models is evidently the Bible, and Keating wrote it in the tradition of Lebor Gabála Érenn (The Book of the Taking of Ireland), which extends and reconciles Biblical chronology with the mythology of Ireland's settlement. The English authorities did not allow the work to be printed, but it circulated widely in manuscript, and was published in Latin translation in 1660; it came to be regarded as a foundational work of Irish history.

O Woman Full of Wiles[1]
(A bhean lán de stuaim)

O woman full of wiles
Take your hand away from there
I can't do what you want
Though sick with love we are.

My hair has fallen out
My blood has turned to dust
My body's lost its youth
Is it after this you lust?

Don't think that I've gone daft
Or toss your head again,
Our loving must be chaste
O slender fairy one.

Take your mouth away from mine
For I pity you your plight—
When your skin rubs on mine
The heat sets us alight.

Your lovely curly hair,
Your dew-bright green eyes
Your flower-white rounded breasts
Only my eyes can please.

My body can't speak the words
Yours hears beneath the quilt—
All else I'll do for love
O woman full of wiles.

O fair lady, so gentle, accomplished, refined,
With cascading hair flowing down in ringlets and curls;
I cannot look at you without suddenly catching my breath
You must give me up, however hard it may be.

I swear that if all the rest were drowned in the flood
That Venus let down when she shook out her wet hair,
You are the one I would want to be left with me,
To enjoy forever your fingers, your figure, your breasts.
—EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

---

[1] O Woman Full of Wiles The translation here, by Michael Doheny, appears in the early twentieth-century edition of The History of Ireland and other Keating works edited by Edward Comyn and Patrick S. Dineen.

Bear with Thee, O Letter, My Blessing[1] (Mo bheannácht leat a sgribhinn)

Forced by fraud and by Saxon oppression
Beyond its green border to rest;
Bear with thee, O letter, my blessing
For the beautiful isle of the west.

To the nobles who cherish the bard,
Bear with thee my grateful farewell,
And my peace be thy clergy's reward—
Not laws that proscribe and expel.

To thy valleys, thy fields, and thy hills
My heart sends a thousand farewells.
To thy smooth lakes and swift rushing rills,
To thy mountains—their crags and their dells.

Farewell to the fruits of your trees,
Farewell to your murmuring streams
That give a sweet voice to the breeze,
Like the song of the women of tears.

Dear island—may plenty be always thine,
May the sky that is o'er thee be calm,
Thy mornings with dew freshly shine
And thy evenings breathe only of balm.

Holy isle—though within thee now dwell
False traitors to God, as to me,
Take my blessing—my fondest farewell—
Across the broad waves of the sea.

—EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

On the Miseries of Ireland[2] (On sgeoil do chradh Magh Fail ni chodlaim oidhche)

The news I hear from distant Erin[3]
Destroys my peace and breaks my sleep:
Fresh chains and fetters for her wearing
Are forged, and she must wear and weep.
...

Strong armed soldiers boldly seize on
Every chieftain's hall—his ancient home;
If sword be drawn 'tis death or treason—
Outlawed the rightful lord must roam.
...

Be still, be still, my heart's high pounding,
Gone is the race of Eògan Mòr;[4]
Vanquished spirits now are found in
My country—all her pride is over.

Oh! to the strangers this is glory
But shame it is for me to sing:
Now all the fame of Finnian's story[5]
Is bubble-like—an empty thing.
...

Oh that my voice could rouse each valley,
Then would I make its children free!
Oh that mine eyes could see them rally—
But that my eyes shall never see.
...

—EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

---

[1] Bear with Thee, O Letter, My Blessing The present text is a lightly modernized version of the translation by T. Crofton Croker (originally published in Fraser's Magazine No. 7, August 1830, reprinted in Croker, ed., Specimens of the Keen of the South of Ireland as Illustrative of Irish Political and Domestic History). Though Keating did not give the poem any title other than "Mo bheannácht leat a sgribhinn," Croker gives it the title "The Exile's Farewell"; others have sometimes given it the title "Farewell to Ireland."

[2] On the Miseries of Ireland The present text is a lightly modernized version of the translation by T. Crofton Croker (originally published in Fraser's Magazine, No. 7, August 1830, reprinted in Croker, ed., Specimens of the Keen of the South of Ireland as Illustrative of Irish Political and Domestic History). The excerpts below comprise approximately one third of the full poem, which bears the Gaelic title "On sgeoil do chradh Magh Fail ni chodlaim oidhche."

[3] The news … Erin Like the previous poem, this was evidently written during one of the periods when Keating was living abroad. The news he writes of is likely the enforcement of the various penal laws against Catholics in Ireland that were enacted under James I.

[4] Eògan Mòr Second-century CE king of Munster, celebrated for his many victories in battle, and often said to possess supernatural powers.

[5] Finnian's story Saint Finnian of Clonard (470–549) was one of the most important founding figures of the Irish church.

from History of Ireland[1] (Foras Feasa ar Éirinn) from "THE AUTHOR TO THE READER"

I

Whosoever proposes to trace and follow up the ancient history and origin of any country ought to determine on setting down plainly the method which reveals most clearly the truth of the state of the country, and the condition of the people who inhabit it: and forasmuch as I have undertaken to investigate the groundwork of Irish historical knowledge, I have thought at the outset of deploring some part of her affliction and of her unequal contest; especially the unfairness which continues to be practised on her inhabitants, alike the old foreigners[2] who are in possession more than four hundred years from the Norman invasion down, as well as the native Irish[3] who have had possession during almost three thousand years. For there is no historian of all those who have written on Ireland from that epoch that has not continuously sought to cast reproach and blame both on the old foreign settlers and on the native Irish.

Whereof the testimony given by Cambrensis, Spenser, Stanihurst, Hanmer, Camden, Barckly, Moryson, Davies, Campion, and every other new foreigner[4] who has written on Ireland from that time, may bear witness; inasmuch as it is almost according to the fashion of the beetle they act, when writing concerning the Irish. For it is the fashion of the beetle, when it lifts its head in the summertime, to go about fluttering, and not to stoop towards any delicate flower that may be in the field, or any blossom in the garden, though they be all roses or lilies, but it keeps bustling about until it meets with dung of horse or cow, and proceeds to roll itself therein. Thus it is with the set above-named; they have displayed no inclination to treat of the virtues or good qualities of the nobles among the old foreigners and the native Irish who then dwelt in Ireland; such as to write on their valor and on their piety, on the number of abbeys they had founded, and what land and endowments for worship they had bestowed on them; on the privileges they had granted to the learned professors of Ireland, and all the reverence they manifested towards churchmen and prelates: on every immunity they secured for their sages, and the maintenance they provided for the poor and for orphans; on each donation they were wont to bestow on the learned and on petitioners, and on the extent of their hospitality to guests, insomuch that it cannot truthfully be said that there ever existed in Europe folk who surpassed them, in their own time, in generosity or in hospitality according to their ability. Bear witness the literary assemblies which were proclaimed by them, a custom not heard of among any other people in Europe, so that the stress of generosity and hospitality among the old foreigners and the native Irish of Ireland was such that they did not deem it sufficient to give to any who should come seeking relief, but issued a general invitation summoning them, in order to bestow valuable gifts and treasure on them.

However, nothing of all this is described in the works of the present-day foreigners, but they take notice of the ways of inferiors and wretched little hags, ignoring the worthy actions of the gentry: yet as far as regards the old Irish, who were inhabiting this island before the Norman invasion, let it appear whether there has been in Europe any people more valiant than they, contending with the Romans for the defense of Scotland. For they compelled the Britons to make a dyke between their portion of Britain and Scotland,[5] to protect [Roman] Britain from the incursion of the Gaels; and notwithstanding that there were usually fifty-two thousand of a Roman army defending the dyke, and two hundred (scouts) riding about, and twenty-three thousand foot and thirteen hundred horse with them (besides), defending the frontier and harbors of the country against the violent attacks of the Scots[6] and of the Picts;[1] yet, with all that, the Irish would burst over the dyke, and the country would be harried by them, despite these great hosts, according to Samuel Daniel in his chronicle. Cormac, son of Cuileannan, says also in his saltair,[2] that, as a result of the violence of the Irish (or Scots) and of the Crutheni (who are called Picts) against Britain, the Britons three times conspired against the Roman governors set over them, as a means of purchasing peace with the Scots and Picts. Observe, moreover, the straits in which the Irish had placed the Britons whilst Vortigern[3] was king over them, whence it arose that he subsidised Hengist, with his German host, as may be read in Geoffrey of Monmouth.

---

[1] History of Ireland This is the English title usually given to the work; a literal translation of the Gaelic is "Foundation of Knowledge on Ireland." The translation here is that of Edward Comyn and Patrick S. Dinneen (1901).

[2] old foreigners The "old foreigners" or "Old English" were those of Anglo-Norman background—descendants of the twelfth century invaders.

[3] native Irish The word Keating uses is Gaedhil (English: Gaels).

[4] Cambrensis ... foreigner Notable in this list is Edmund Spenser, whose A View of the Present State of Ireland is excerpted in the website component of this section of the anthology.

[5] a dyke ... Scotland Hadrian's Wall, a fortification built just south of present-day Scotland by the Roman Empire in the second century CE.

[6] Scots Keating, like other medieval writers, often uses the term Scots to refer interchangeably to the Gaelic peoples of Ireland and of Scotland.

DÁIBHÍ Ó BRUADAIR (1625–98)

Ó Bruadair, arguably the leading Irish poet of the seventeenth century, is a figure whose practice harks back to that of the bards of earlier centuries. He looked for the patronage of wealthy nobles; he wrote elegies, satires, religious verse, and poems on historical subjects. His poetry is highly accomplished, but Ó Bruadair could not succeed in worldly terms as had the bards of earlier centuries; he ended his life in poverty as a farm worker.

Gone Are All the Noble Poets[4]
(D'Aithle na bhFileadh n-Uasal)

Gone are all the noble poets
Sad the darkness of the world:
The children of high-ranking wise ones

Are now empty of keen words.

Sad their books with gray dust covered,

Bookbags never versed in delight:
Mystic lore lost—forgotten

By those born of wisdom drinkers.
—MID TO LATE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

After the Death of the Poets

After the death of the poets, whose riches were poems and wit—
Woe unto the foreseer of the fate that has come upon us:
The poets' books unheeded in corners, mouldered, covered in dust.
Their sons possess nothing of their storied treasures.
—MID TO LATE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

GEOFFREY O'DONOGHUE OF THE GLENS (SEAFRAIDH Ó DONNCHADHA AN GHLEANNA)
(C. 1615–?C. 1670)

Geoffrey was both a prolific poet and a hereditary chief of his clan. Though he was born into privilege, his family lost their lands in the English-Irish conflicts of the 1640s (in which he fought). Many of his poems deal with those conflicts—and with the results of Cromwell's invasion and re-conquest of Ireland.

---

[1] Picts Keating uses the Gaelic word for the Pictish people, Cruithnigh.

[2] saltair Psalter; book of songs or poems.

[3] Vortigern Briton king who, according to Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain, invited the Germanic brothers Hengist and Horsa to Britain to help him defeat the Picts. His invitation brought about the Anglo-Saxon invasion.

[4] Gone Are All the Noble Poets Two short poems on this subject have been ascribed to Dáibhí Ó Bruadair; both are included here. Dating of the poems is uncertain, though the verses are addressed in one manuscript to the children of Cú Chonnacht Ó Dálaigh, who died in 1642. The translation provided here, based on the early twentieth-century translation of John C. MacErlean, has been revised and modernized for this anthology.

This caps all their tricks, this statute from overseas[1]

This caps all their tricks, this statute from overseas[2]
That lays the whip on the people of Heber
the Fair;[3]
A crooked deal has robbed us of our land
And all our rights in Ireland are swept away.

The Gaels are now stripped at last of all they had in Ireland;
Now let the grave be dug of every man
Or else he gets a pass to cross the waves
And promise to stay gone till death.

The English are stronger now than the Gaels
And their fortunes better for who knows how long.
Relying on their title, they will not till the fields:
On their backs God's anger will rain down in streams.
—1661

WALES

DAFYDD AP GWILYM (C. 1320–?C. 1370)

Dafydd was born into a noble family near Aberystwyth, but we know little with any certainty of his life. Though various authorities have estimated his death to have occurred c. 1370, others have argued that he died in the wake of the Black Death, c. 1350. His poetry has powerful links to the traditions of medieval Welsh poetry, but it points forward at least as strongly, creating new traditions that run through much of the early modern period. Dafydd's early poems are written largely in traditional fixed forms (such as the englyn and the awdl[4]), and largely in traditional genres (praise poems for noble patrons, elegies, and so on). He became a truly distinctive poet as he turned more and more to the cywdd, a poetic form typically used for subject matter of an unelevated variety, and began to write subjectively and irreverently about the world around him, and about love—erotic love, in particular. At times he may have had the classical poetry of Ovid as a model, but much of Dafydd's work is highly original; at roughly the same time as Petrarch was popularizing fresh forms of love poetry and emotional introspective in Renaissance Florence, Dafydd ap Gwilym, in his own distinctive fashion, was doing the same in Wales.

The translations here are from a variety of sources; the first four endeavor to capture the meaning as closely as possible, but without approximating Dafydd's rhymes; the translations of "The Mirror" and "The Ruin," on the other hand, try to capture something of the feel of the rhymes, even if the sense strays here and there from the literal meaning of the original.

The Skylark[5] (Yr Ehedydd)

The powerful prayers of the skylark turn upwards from his house every day, world's early-riser, agitation of bright song,
towards the sky, April's gatekeeper.
Gracious voice, director of rhymes,
sweet path, yours is fair labour:
making song above hazel groves,
tasteful masterpiece of the brown-winged one.
You have a mind intent on preaching,
dear office, and excellence of language,
a strong tune from the fountain of the faith, deep privileges before God.

---

[1] This caps … overseas The translation is by Patrick Dineen, from Poems of Geoffrey Donohue (Da´nta She´afraidh Ui´ Dhonnchadha an ghleanna, 1902).

[2] this statute from overseas A series of laws enacted both under Cromwell and following the Restoration of the English monarchy in 1660 (accompanied by the unification of the English, Scottish, and Irish monarchies) resulted in the confiscation of large amounts of land from Irish landowners. It is not clear which of these statutes is being referred to here.

[3] people of Heber the Fair I.e., Irish Gaelic people. According to legend, Heber the Fair and his brothers conquered Ireland. (They came from Iberia, now Spain and Portugal, and later still their people were also said to have settled in the Hebrides.) Many Irish kings were said to be descended from the family.

[4] englyn … awdl The awdl takes its name from the Welsh word for rhyme (also spelled "odl"); poems written in this form are usually fairly long, but use only one end-rhyme throughout the poem. An englyn is a short poem (in some variants of the form, only three lines), with a fixed number of syllables in each line.

[5] The Skylark Translated by Dafydd Johnston for the Dafydd ap Gwilym.net website.

Up on high you go, true Kay's[1] attribute,
and on high you sing every song.

My fair brown bird, my love-messenger,
and my fellow author, if you will go,
greet her of the comely features, bright her endowment, moon of Gwynedd,[2]
and seek one of her kisses to bring here to me, or two.
Splendid incantation by the stars' partition, long twisting journey to the heights, seizing a portion, you've climbed high enough, you got a reward.
Teacher of praise from dawn to dusk,
come down, God save your wings.

Let every good creature praise its creator, pure radiant governor.
Praising God as He says,
thousands hear him, he is famous, he never stops.
Manner of a love author, where are you?
The voice is gentle and clear in brown-grey cloth.
Yours is a lovely pure singing voice, songbird, bay-coloured muse.
Cantor in God's chapel,
the omen will be fair, you are skilful.
Right to an allotment of land, frequent exquisite song,
a crest, and the cape is brown.
Make for the familiar sky,
poet, to the wild moorland.
You are to be seen up above, indeed, when the day is longest.
When you come to worship,
a talent given to you by God who is One and Three,
no tree branch supports you above the world, you possess language, but the grace of the true Father and His frequent miracle and His providence.

Dedicated one of the wild sky sea,
go yonder to the environs of her court.
If I be with her, the Jealous One's anger will be a small matter one morning.
The fine for sad [act] of killing you is so great that no one dares to kill you.
Were anyone to try it, bold turmoil,
boo to the Jealous One if you don't survive.
The firmament is your great perch,
you are so far from a hand bow.
Harsh trampled ground, the bowman is sad, he will be clumsy with his great aim.
His rage is evil, turn above his reach as his hobby-hawk passes by.

The Gull[3] (Yr Wylan)

Fair gull on the tide, indeed, of the same hue as snow or the white moon,
your beauty is without blemish,
a piece like the sun, gauntlet of the brine.
You are light on the ocean wave,
swift proud fish-eating bird.
You'd go close by the anchor hand-in-hand with me, sea lily.
Just like a letter you are painted silver,
You're a nun on the crest of the sea tide.

Perfect praise of a girl, you are praised afar,
make for the curve of fortress and castle.
Gull, look for one of the colour of Eigr on the lovely fortress.
Say my ardent words,
may she choose me, go to the girl.
If she's alone, make bold to greet her,
be courteous to the dainty maid
for gain; say I will not live, noble refined youth, unless I have her.
I love her, strength of complete passion,
oh men, neither Myrddin[4]
with his fine wheaten lips

---

[1] Kay King Arthur's nephew who, in the Arthurian prose tale Culhwch and Olwen, "could make himself as tall as the highest tree in the forest."

[2] Gwynedd Region in northwestern Wales.

[3] The Gull Translated by Dafydd Johnston for the Dafydd ap Gwilym.net website.

[4] Myrddin Myrddin Wyllt, legendary figure of early Wales, who is said to have retreated into the forest after a battle and there received the gift of prophecy. In Arthurian legend in English, he typically appears as Merlin.

nor Taliesin[1] ever loved a fairer one.
A sought-after girl [dressed in] fine linen under copper [hair], exquisite visage perfectly formed.

Ah gull, if you get to see the cheek of the fairest girl in Christendom, unless I get a most gentle response
the girl will be the death of me.

Trouble at an Inn[2]
(Trafferth mewn Tafarn)

I came to a choice town followed by my handsome page-boy.
Fine merry expense, an excellent place for dinner,
I took a pretty dignified public lodging,
I was a proud / fine[3] young man,
and I had some wine.
I spotted a fair slender maid in the house, my one fair sweetheart.
I set my mind entirely upon my slender darling, colour of the rising sun,
I bought roast and expensive wine,
(not to show off) [for] me and the beauty over there.
Young men love playing games,
I called the girl, a modest maid, to [me on] the bench,
and we had a very grand dinner,
greater than a wedding feast.
I whispered (I was a bold diligent man, that's for sure) two alluring words.
After the obstacle was cleared
by the whispering (close fate),
I made an agreement (love was not idle / easy)
to come to the lovely girl when the crowds had gone to sleep; she was a dark-browed beauty.
When everyone except me and the girl had gone to sleep (exceedingly piteous),
I tried most adeptly to make my way to the girl's bed, [but] it turned out disastrously.
I had a nasty fall making a commotion there,
there were no good feats.
I hurt my shin (my poor leg!),
I didn't jump safely, above the ankle,
on the edge of a stupid shrill stool,
because of the inn-keeper.
I hit my forehead (excessive desire is bad),
where I ended up, without any free leap, frequent confusion of wild crashing,
on the end of the table,
where there was a loose basin now
and a noisy brass pan.
The table fell, a heavy piece,
and the two trestles and all the utensils.
The pan let out a clang,
it could be heard a long way behind me.
The basin boomed (I was a vain man) and the dogs barked.

It's easier to get up awkwardly
(foolish wickedness) than swiftly.
I came up (it was a remorseful tale)
—Welshmen love me!—
by thick walls where there were three Englishmen in one stinking bed worrying about their three packs,
Hickin and Jenkin and Jack.
The churlish slobber-chops
(cruel hate) hissed to the [other] two:

"There's a Welshman, fierce deceitful commotion, roaming around here most cunningly;
he's a thief, if we allow it,
watch out, keep clear of him."

The inn-keeper roused up all the host,
and it was a woeful tale.

---

[1] Taliesin Legendary poet of early Wales.

[2] Trouble at an Inn Translated by Dafydd Johnston for the Dafydd ap Gwilym.net website.

[3] proud / fine Here and at line 21 a slash is used to indicate a point of semantic ambiguity in the original; "proud" and "fine" are both possible here. (The translator discusses the poem's ambiguities at length in a 2008 article in Cambrian Medieval Celtic Studies.)

Nine at a time they searched for me scowling all around me,
whilst I, covered in painful bruises,
kept quiet in the darkness.
I prayed, not in fearless fashion,
in hiding, like one afraid,
and through the power of dear sincere prayer,
and through the grace of Jesus,
I got back (sleepless confusion)
without any gain to my own lair.
I escaped (thank goodness that saints are close by),
I beg to God for forgiveness.

Morfudd Like the Sun[1]
(Morfudd fel yr Haul)

I am waiting for a soft-spoken girl, sheen of fine snow on a stony field.
See, O God, that she is a radiant girl, brighter than a crest of foam,
colour of a bright resounding wave,
an ardently bright girl, she is modest.
She knows how to earn a love song from my lips,
best aspect of the sun beside a cloud,
the people's mistress [or dawn] in mantle of fine fur,
she knows well how to mock an ugly man, lovely Morfudd, pity the weak frivolous poet who loves her, beautiful Gwenhwyfar.[2]
The girl's appearance is a golden web, woe to that handsome man crying out in anguish.

Her deceit and trickery is enormous,
worse than anything, and [yet] she is my darling.
One time my white girl appears between church and court, and another time, proud clever girl on fortress battlements, bright shining Morfudd hides,
like the sun with its bountiful fringes,
foster-mother of the principality of fine weather,
her skilled work is worthy of praise,
May's merchantess freely giving light,
brilliant Morfudd's great countenance,
the radiant and exquisite semblance of Mary.

Over the earth's immense expanse
the sun comes like a dazzling girl beautifully within the body of a single day, shepherdess of the sky from end to end.
When the sun which dazzles sight is needed (we feel great pain) after a thick cloud passes over it, fierce elemental war,
it escapes before the darkening
when the night comes, sense of harsh pain.
The dark blue sky will be completely filled,
Eluned's[3] image, the planet's place.
No one has any idea then where it goes, it is God's ball.
No hand can touch it
nor take hold of its edge.
The next day it will raise up again,
igniting from afar the firmament of the world.

Not dissimilar, apportioning of grief,
is the way in which Morfudd leaves me by setting:
after coming from the sky above,
running across the firmament below,
she of the lovely frown sets beneath the lintel of the wicked cold man.

I pursued passion around the land of Penrhyn,[4] abode of love.
Every day the clever shining girl is to be seen there, and every night she disappears.
It's no easier to touch her on hall's floor (I have been slain) than it is (girl freely praised and lavishly spending) for people's hands to catch the sun.
The blazing sun with its sparkling sheen

---

[1] Morfudd Like the Sun Translated by Dafydd Johnston, for the Dafyyd ap Gwilym.net website.

[2] Gwenhwyfar King Arthur's beautiful wife in Arthurian legend.

[3] Eluned Possibly Saint Eluned, a legendary princess and virgin martyr, or Luned, a handmaiden of Arthurian legend who aids the knight Sir Ywain.

[4] Penrhyn Village near Dafydd's home.

has no better face than her.
If either one is most fair this year, it is our sun, of noble lineage, which is the fairest.

Why (appearance which is a step greatly to be desired)
does one of them not take possession of the night, whilst the other as splendid warmth,
good light, colours the day?
If the two faces were to appear in rotation in the four corners of the world, it would be a wonder [like that found in] a stiff-leaved book if night ever came during this girl's lifetime.

The Mirror[1] (Y Drych)

It never occurred to me—what a thought!—
That my fine and handsome face might not Be so good-looking. Then one day I could see
A mirror—nasty thing! It looked right back at me
And paused, and then at last it told
Me to my face: what was there was not so fair.

Sunken cheeks, pining away, wanting love
That will not ever come, and skin above
All stretched, and parched, yellow
And lined all through, just like the skin below.
How astonishing—the length of the nose—
Pointy as a razor, you might suppose.
And who could see my lively soul
In those eyes—each lost in its hollow hole?

Is there something there I've missed?
Perhaps I'm too much the pessimist.
Is this ugly, mottled face a guise?
Is it, perchance, the mirror who lies?
If I'm at fault, love's pining's done
This to me, and I'll soon die—but none
Of that will be ever be the case
If all the ugliness is in the mirror's face.

Circle of silver, like a moon—real magic?
Or is it false, mere bringer of tragic
News that no one should believe?
Men of magic made him: magic can deceive.
Dreams fly; the cruel and speedy dream betrays;
Icy brother to the truth—his coldness stays.
Cold, false, and truly ugly creature—
Into the fire you go: I'll burn your every feature.

But if what's there is really mine?
I'm not to blame for every wrinkle, every line.
It's the girl from Gwynedd[2] who made me pine away—
It's not my fault, whatever the mirror may say.

The Ruin[3] (Yr Adfail)

Nothing but a ruin now
Between moorland and meadow,
Once the owners saw in you
A comely cottage, bright, new,
Now roof, rafters, ridge-pole, all
Broken down by a broken wall.

A day of delight was once there
For me, long ago, no care
When I had a glimpse of her
Fair in an ingle-corner.
Beside each other we lay
In the delight of that day.

Her forearm, snowflake-lovely,
Softly white, pillowing me,
Proffered a pleasant pattern
For me to give in my turn,
And that was our blessing for
The new-cut lintel and door.

Now the wild wind, wailing by,
Crashes with curse and with cry
Against my stones, a tempest
Born and bred in the East,
Or south ram-batterers break
The shelter that folk forsake.

---

[1] The Mirror This rhymed translation has been prepared for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature.

[2] Gwynedd Region in northwestern Wales.

[3] The Ruin This translation is from Gwynn Jones, The Oxford Book of Welsh Verse in English.

Life is illusion and grief;
A tile whirls off, as a leaf
Or a lath goes sailing, high
In the keening of kite-kill cry.
Could it be our couch once stood
Sturdily under that wood?
Pillar and post, it would seem
Now are less than a dream.
Are you that, or only the lost
Wreck of a fiddle, rune-ghost?

"Dafydd, the cross on their graves
Marks what little it saves,
Says, They did well in their lives."

The Poet and the Grey Friar[1]
(Y Bardd a'r Brawd Llwyd)

Woe is me that the celebrated maiden, whose court is in the grove, does not know about the conversation with the mouse-coloured friar about her today.

I went to the Friar to confess my sin.
I did admit to him, indeed,
that I was a sort of poet,
and that I had long loved a white–faced black–browed girl, and that for the life of me
I could get no favour or satisfaction from the lady, but only loving her constantly and pining greatly for her love, and carrying her praise throughout Wales and being without her for all that,
and longing to feel her in my bed between me and the wall.

The Friar said to me,
"I will give you good council.
If you have loved the foam–hued one,
colour of paper, for a long time until now, reduce the pain of the day to come,
it is good for your soul to stop,
and leave your cywyddau
and start saying your prayers.
God did not redeem man's soul for the sake of a cywydd or an englyn.
Your songs, you minstrels, are nothing but nonsense and vain voices, and inciting men and women to sin and falsehood.
Praise of the flesh which carries the soul to the devil is no good thing."

I did answer the Friar for every word that he said.
"God is not as cruel
as old men say.
God will not let a gentle man's soul be lost for loving a woman or a maiden.
Three things are loved throughout the world:
woman and fine weather and health.
A girl is the fairest flower in heaven besides God himself.
Every man was born of woman of all the peoples except three men.
And for that reason it is no wonder that girls and women are loved.
All gaiety comes from heaven and all sadness from hell.

"Song gladdens the hearts of old and young, sick and healthy.
It is just as fitting for me to sing poems as it is for you to preach sermons, and just as right for me to live by minstrelsy
as it is for you to live by begging.
What are the hymns and sequences[2]
but englynion and odes, and are not the psalms of the Prophet David[3]
cywyddau to holy God?

---

[1] The Poet and the Grey Friar Translated by A. Cynfael Lake for the Dafyyd ap Gwilym.net website.

[2] sequences Words recited or sung after the Alleluia in Catholic services.

[3] David Biblical king to whom many of the psalms in the Bible are attributed.

"God does not feed every man with the same food and delicacies.
There is a time for food
and a time for prayer, and a time for preaching
and a time for making merry.
Song is sung in every feast to entertain young girls, and a pater noster in church to seek the land of Paradise.

"It is true what Ystudfach[1] said when carousing with his poets,
'The joyful man will have a full house,
and misfortune will come to the sad man.'
Though some love holiness others love merriment.
Very few know a sweet cywydd
and everyone knows his pater.[2]
And therefore, you dogmatic Friar, song is not the greatest sin.

"When everyone is as glad to hear a pater to harp accompaniment as the young girls of Gwynedd[3] are to hear a merry cywydd
I will sing, by my hand,
the pater without end.
Until then shame on Dafydd
if he sings a pater rather than a cywydd."

Tudur Penyllyn (c. 1420–c. 1485)

Born in northwest Wales to a family of high standing, Tudur Penyllyn appears to have been a professional poet under the sometime patronage of Welsh nobles. Evidently this was insufficient to provide him with a steady living, however; he is also known to have worked in the wool trade. The poem included here is the only known cywydd of his; the other poems of his that have survived include praise poems, religious poems, and love poems. The following appears in facing column translation to show the dual-language original, in which the Welshman speaks Welsh and the Englishwoman speaks Middle English.

Ymddiddan Rhwyng Cymro a Saesnes

"Dydd daed Saesnes gyffes, gain, yr wyf i'th garu, riain."

"What saist, mon?" ebe honno,
"for truthe, harde Welsman I tro."

Conversation between a Welshman and an Englishwoman[4]

"Good day, fine, nimble Englishwoman,
I do love you, maiden."

"What are you saying, man?" she said,
"for truth, I believe you are a bold Welshman."

---

[1] Ystudfach Early Welsh poet who is an oft-quoted source of maxims and sayings; according to tradition, he was poet to the legendary fifth-century King Vortimer.

[2] pater The Paternoster (Latin: Our Father), a well-known Christian prayer.

[3] Gwynedd Region in northwestern Wales.

[4] Conversation between a Welshman and an Englishwoman This translation is copyright © Patricia Malone.

"Dyro wenferch loywserch lân, amau gas, imi gusan."

"Kyste dyfyl, what kansto doe, sir, let alone with sorowe."

"Gad i'r law dan godi'r llen dy glywyd, ddyn deg lawen."

"I am not Wels, thow Welsmon, for byde the, lete me alone."

"Na fydd chwimwth i'm gwthiaw, cai arian llydan o'm llaw."

"I holde thi mad byrladi, forth, I wyl do non for thi."

"Pes meddwn, mi a roddwn rod, myn dyn, er myned ynod."

"Tis harm to be thy parmwr, howld hain, I shalbe kalde hwr."

"Gad ym Saesnes gyffes, gu, fondew fun, fynd i fyny."

"Owt, owt! Bisherewe thy twtile, sir, how, ware my sore hile."

"Na fydd ddig, Seisnig Saesnes, yn wâr gad ddyfod yn nes."

"By the rode I'll make the blodei, anon, I wyle plucke out thyn ei."

"Gad ym fyned i'th gedor hyd y groes onid oes dôr?"

"Thowe shalt not pas, be Saynte Asaf, for thy lyf, I have a knyfe knave."

"Io ddyn, ai caniadu'dd wyd
i Dudur, ai nad ydwyd?"

"Fair girl, pure, bright love, give me a kiss, distrust your hatred."

"Kiss the devil, what are you trying to do?
Sir, leave it alone, with sorrow."

"Let my hand go under your skirt to feel you, beautiful, glad girl."

"I am not Welsh, you Welshman.
I forbid you, leave me alone."

"Don't be so quick to repulse me, you'll get plenty of money from my hand."

"I think you are mad, by our lady.
Get out, I will do nothing for you."

"If I had it, I would give a coin, indeed, to get into you."

"It's harmful to be your paramour.
Stop, wretch, I shall be called whore."

"Nimble Englishwoman, dear one, fat-bottomed maid, let me go up."

"Out, out! Evil befall your whispering, sir, ho, beware my hard heel."

"Don't be angry, English Englishwoman, gently, let me come near."

"By the cross I'll make you bloody, this instant, I will pluck out your eye."

"Let me get up into your crotch, up to the cross, isn't there a door?"

"You shall not pass, by Saint Asaph;[1] for your life, I have a knife, knave."

"Oh girl, are you going to let Tudur do it, or aren't you?"

---

[1] Saint Asaph Sixth-century Welsh bishop.

GWERFUL MECHAIN (FL. 1460–1500)

Gwerful Mechain is among the most important Welsh poets of her time, but we know little of her life other than that she lived in Mechain in northeast Wales. She wrote largely in traditional formal bardic meters. Among the many poems of hers that have survived are several on religious themes (including a cywydd about Christ on the cross). Some of her most famous poems (including "To Jealous Wives" ["Wragedd Eiddigus"] and "Conversation between Two Poets" ["Ymddioldan Rhwng Dau Fardd"]) deal with erotic themes; "To the Vagina" ("Cywydd y Cedor"), one of her best-known works in this category, is included below. The poem is part of a brief tradition of poems addressed to genitalia—one in which Dafydd ap Gwilym (with his poem "Y Gal" ["The Penis"]) also participated.

To the Vagina[1] (Cywydd y Cedor)

Every poet, drunken fool
Thinks he's just the king of cool,
(Every one is such a boor,
He makes me sick, I'm so demure),
He always declaims fruitless praise
Of all the girls in his man's gaze.
He's at it all day long, by God,
Omitting the best bit, silly sod:
He praises the hair, gown of fine love,
And all the girl's bits up above,
Even lower down he praises merrily
The eyes which glance so sexily;
Daring more, he extols the lovely shape
Of the soft breasts which leave him all agape,
And the beauty's arms, bright drape,
Even her perfect hands do not escape.
Then with his finest magic,
Before night falls, it's tragic,
He pays homage to God's might,
An empty eulogy: it's not quite right:
For he's left the girl's middle unpraised,
That place where children are upraised,
The warm bright quim he does not sing,
That tender, plump, pulsating broken ring,
That's the place I love, the place I bless,
The hidden quim below the dress.
You female body, you're strong and fair,
A faultless, fleshy court plumed with hair.
I proclaim that the quim is fine,
Circle of broad-edged lips divine,
It's a valley, longer than a spoon or hand,
A cwm to hold a penis strong and grand;
A vagina there by the swelling bum,
Two lines of red to song must come.
And the churchmen all, the radiant saints,
When they get the chance, have no restraints,
They never fail their chance to steal,
By Saint Beuno, to give it a good feel.
So I hope you feel well and truly told off,
All you proud male poets, you dare not scoff,
Let songs to the quim grow and thrive
Find their due reward and survive.
For it is silky soft, the sultan of an ode,
A little seam, a curtain on a hole bestowed,
Neat flaps in a place of meeting,
The sour grove, circle of greeting,
Superb forest, faultless gift to squeeze,
Fur for a fine pair of balls, tender frieze,
A girl's thick glade, it is full of love,
Lovely bush, blessed be it by God above.

—LATE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

To Her Husband, for Beating Her[2]
(I'w Gwr am ei Churo)

May a dagger pierce your heart
And plunge right through to your breastbone.
May your knee be broken, your hand sorely hurt;
May your sword dig deep in your bowels' dirt.

—LATE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

---

[1] To the Vagina The present translation is by Katie Gramich.

[2] To Her Husband, for Beating Her Translated for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature.

White Flour, Earthflesh, Cold Fleece[1]
(Gwynflawd, daergnawd, oergnu)

White flour, earthflesh, black mountain with cold fleece,
Cold black snow-laden horizon;
A plate of snow, frozen feathers,
A soft snare set to trap me.
—LATE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

Elis Gruffydd (c. 1490–?c. 1540)

Born and raised in Llanasa in northern Wales, Elis Gruffydd spent the first part of his career in the English army, then worked as an administrator for an English nobleman in Calais and in London. His Chronicle is divided into two parts, the first covering the history of the world from the Creation to the beginnings of Christianity, the second covering the histories of Wales and of England from 1066 to 1552. The work is an important source of knowledge about the early myths and legends of Wales as well as about its later history.

from Chronicle

Llywelyn and the Fool[2]

After the death of Iorwerth Drwyndwn ab Owain,[3] Llywelyn, his son, took the crown of the principality of Wales. In the fifth year of the reign of King John, Llywelyn or Lord Llywelyn was engaged and married to Elsabeth, the second daughter of King John, as the English chronicle says. But the Welsh chronicle says that it was Sioned, the youngest of the three daughters that he married.[4] But indeed, it scarcely matters which of the two it was, since all the books say clearly that he married one of King John's daughters and that the prince made great preparations to go to England for the marriage. At the time, as the story says, the prince's fool begged and pleaded with his master to be allowed to go on that journey with his master the prince, but the fool's request was denied.

Soon, Lord Llywelyn mounted his horse and rode from Maenan to Rhuddlan. The next day he continued his journey from there to Caerleon on Dyfrdwy.[5] It was then, as some of the books of Wales say, that the prince encountered a spirit that looked and acted like the fool he had left behind, and who followed him to Caerleon. There, he handed him over to his innkeeper to keep under close guard until he could find someone to take him back to Trefriw.[6]

Then the prince mounted his horse and rode on, pushing forward determinedly until he had nearly arrived at the king's court. Then suddenly the fool appeared in the presence of the prince and his company. The fool, as the text says at great length, had the prince dress him in flamboyant clothes, as was proper for a person of that sort of learning.

Soon thereafter the prince arrived at the court and married the king's daughter. At the wedding feast, as my copy says, there was no shortage or lack of every sort of species of rare and excellent provisions to place before the rustic and lowly Welsh. These were consumed amid merriment and entertainment by every kind of minstrel and magician, the sort that were at that time very much in vogue in the courts of kings and princes.

Then one of the king's magicians stepped forward to demonstrate the power of his art for the entertainment of the people at the feast. To mock the ignorant Welsh, he conjured up through the magic of his art two or three men in Welsh boots and frocks, driving a herd of goats before them into the hall or the chamber where the wedding was taking place. As soon as they had come into the upper part of the hall or chamber, the goats began leaping on the seats and benches and tables, running from one place to another, with the people laughing and shouting, "Look! Here's an offering from Wales!" This stunned the prince, causing the blood to rise in his cheeks from embarrassment as he asked the magician why the goats signified the Welsh rather than some other people.

---

[1] White Flour, Earthflesh, Cold Fleece Translated by Katie Gramich.

[2] Llywelyn and the Fool Translated by Patrick Ford, in The Celtic Poets.

[3] Iorwerth Drwyndwn ab Owain Also called Iowerth ab Owain Gwynedd (1145–74). Though he would have been first in the line of succession to rule the Kingdom of Gwynedd, in northern Wales, he was denied the rulership because of a birth defect; his son, Llewelyn ap Iorwerth (c. 1172–1240), did become ruler of Gwynedd—and, eventually, of much of the rest of Wales.

[4] In the fifth … married Llywelyn married Siwan (also called Joan, c. 1191–1237), a daughter of King John of England (r. 1199–1216). Peace between Llywelyn and John lasted about a decade, but relations eventually deteriorated.

[5] from Maenan … Dyfrdwy Llywelyn travels across the eastern half of northern Wales to a point just across the present-day border between Wales and England.

[6] Trefriw Site of Llywelyn's hunting lodge, near Maenan.

The magician answered and said, "because they're ready to leap and run about from one place to another all over this kingdom and over land and sea to other realms to do the wretched things that goats do." On hearing this the prince lowered his head and fell silent. Just then the prince's fool came and stood beside his master and asked permission to show the crowd the power of his magic. The prince answered, saying, "Indeed, I have cause enough to be embarrassed here without giving you permission to give me more reason to be red-faced."

But anyway, the story says that by the fool pleading and others pleading for him the prince gave permission to the fool to do what he thought appropriate. As my copy says, the fool, through his magic, conjured some men driving a herd of pigs before them into the hall or chamber in the same way the other magician had made men driving goats earlier. As soon as they came into the upper part of the chamber, they began to root up the ground and overturn tables and do other piggish activities which would be too long to rehearse here. And the Welsh laughed at that, saying, "Look! Here's a fine offering of English pigs for the prince to send to Llanrhychwin[1] to root up bracken!" This stunned the English, who asked the fool what the pigs indicated.

He answered them saying that that they signified the English people, whom he said were pigs, unmindful of their faith, and who were turning up the ground to make fields and ditches to put the land into the hands of a small number of them, all of whom were stranger to each other than dogs and pigs are to each other. All this cheered the prince.

Eventually the prince took his leave from the king and began the journey back to Wales. He pushed on steadily until he came to Y berth Ddu above Llan Eurgain.[2] There the fool said to the prince, "Sire, 'tis here I met you and 'tis here I leave you. Know and be assured that I am not the same as nor akin to your own fool, whom you suppose I am. You'll find him in your court, from which he hasn't moved, when you return home." And so saying, he vanished abruptly from their midst.

The prince continued on his journey from there to Trefriw, where he found the fool, who had never left home. The prince and his people were amazed at all that.

SIÔN CENT (?C. 1390–?C. 1440)

Little is known with any certainty about this fifteenth-century poet (who is also known as Sion Gwent and Sion Y Kent). Siôn Cent is believed to have lived in Brecknockshire in south-central Wales, to have worked as a chaplain, and to have been fluent in several languages. He wrote often in the cywydd form, but used it for religious rather than secular subjects. A distinctive feature of his cywyddau is the repetition of the same line at the end of each stanza.

---

[1] Llanrhychwin Village near Trefriw.

[2] Llan Eurgain Village just west of Caerleon on Dyfrdwy.

Hud a Lliw y Byd

Un fodd yw'r byd, cyngyd cêl â phaentiwr delw â phwyntel, yn paentiaw delwau lawer,
â llu o saint a lliw sêr.
Fal hudol â'i fol hoywdew yn bwrw hud, i angwr glud glew dangos a wna, da diddim dwys ei dâl, lle nid oes dim.
Felly'r byd hwn, gwn ganwaith, hud a lliw, nid gwiw ein gwaith.
. . .

Pan ddêl Crist, poen ddial cred, parth y gaer porth agored
Dduw Sul i farn yn ddisom ar dda drwg, a'r ddôr drom, rhai'n crynu fal maeddu mab, eraill yn llawen arab;
rhai a gaiff nefoedd i gyd
rhai boenau, rhyfawr benyd.
Yno y gwelwm, iôn gwiwlaith,
hud a lliw, nid gwiw ein gwaith.

from The Illusion of the World[1]

The world's purpose hides from us;
What we see is as if made with a paintbrush
By one who has made many images—nothing real, nothing sure,
Like the saints all colored like stars on the ceiling—
a picture.
Even all that brave warriors see, and seem to have done,
Is as if done by the trick of a fat magician
Casting his spells: worthless things we cling
To, bought dear, a seeming world of nothing
In a magic of color all dressed.
See and see through: our works are useless.
. . .

O, when Christ comes! With avenging pain
The castle gate one Sunday will open:
Judge with never a fault to confess
Will judge good and bad, and doubtless
Some shall cower, or cringe, or try to flee,
And some will strangely make merry.
For some there will be pain, and pain, and pain again,
For others pain will end, and end in heaven:
The Lord of Death shall show His blessedness.
See and see through: our works are useless.

---

[1] The Illusion of the World The present translation, prepared for this anthology, endeavors to capture the feel of the rhymes of the original, in which alternating rhymes fall on stressed and unstressed syllables.

BALDASSARE CASTIGLIONE

1478 – 1529

THOMAS HOBY

1530 – 1566

Baldassare Castiglione's Il Cortegiano (The Courtier), first published in 1528, is the most influential and widely read account of the courtly ideals of the Renaissance. Written as a conversation involving a number of the leading men and women at the court of Urbino in the early years of the century, The Courtier includes discussions of the education of a perfect courtier, the activities proper to such a person (from military arts and physical sports to painting and poetry), the art of love, the nature of and importance of beauty, the style appropriate to the courtier, and the sorts of behavior appropriate to women of the court. The Courtier ranges widely in tone as well, from amusing conversational exchanges to extended and highly serious set-piece discussions. In its discussion of courtly manners, the work touches on ethical considerations, and also on religious ones; a frequent reference point is the concept of grace—both the gracefulness that should be exhibited by the courtier and the grace of God.

A number of the book's strands are brought together in the work's conclusion, in which Count Pietro Bembo puts forward an extended discourse on love that encompasses the aesthetic, the ethical, the metaphysical, and the religious; in Bembo's neoplatonic vision, the human soul may come to be purified as it seeks higher forms of beauty and of love.

Castiglione was himself a nobleman and courtier in the duchy of Urbino in Tuscany (now part of northern Italy); though now remembered chiefly for The Courtier, he was also an accomplished poet (of love sonnets in Italian, and other poems in Latin) and a skilled diplomatic correspondent. Learned in many subjects, he spoke several languages and served as an ambassador to Rome and later to Spain. It was he was while he was in Spain that he was asked to write a manual for the education of the nobility—the work that became The Courtier.

The Courtier was translated into several other languages in the decades following its first publication, and became enormously popular throughout most of Europe. The work's first English translator, Thomas Hoby, was one of the first Englishmen to travel extensively in the Italian peninsula and to write about his experiences there; his autobiography, A Book of the Travail and Life of Me, Thomas Hoby, with Diverse Things Worth the Noting, focuses largely on Hoby's years of travel (beginning in 1548) in Italy and elsewhere in Europe. He translated Castiglione's work in the early 1550s and completed it in Italy, where he lived for much of the decade. (As a Protestant, he did not feel at home in England during Queen Mary's reign.) The translation was published in 1561; in Hoby's spirited if slightly eccentric rendering, The Courtier became a highly influential text at Elizabeth's court, and among poets and dramatists of the Elizabethan era—Shakespeare not least among them.

⌘⌘⌘

from The Courtier[1]

from BOOK I

"Bound I am not" (quoth the Count[2]) "to teach you to have a good grace, nor anything else, saving only to show you what a perfect Courtier ought to be.… [Just as] a good soldier can speak his mind to an armourer [concerning] what temper and goodness he will have his harness, and for all that cannot teach him to make it, nor to hammer or temper it, so perhaps I am able to tell you what a perfect Courtier ought to be, but not able to teach you how ye should do[3] to be one. Notwithstanding, to fulfill your request in what I am able, although it be (in manner) in a proverb that Grace is not to be learned,[4] I say unto you, whoso mindeth to be gracious or to have a good grace in the exercises of the body, (presupposing first that he be not of nature unapt[5]) ought to begin betimes,[6] and to learn his principles of cunning men.[7] … [O]f men whom we know nowadays, mark how well and with what a good grace Sir Galiazzo Sanseverino, master of the horse to the French king, doth all exercises of the body; and that because, besides the natural disposition of person that is in him, he hath applied all his study to learn of cunning men, and to have continually excellent men about him, and of every one to choose the best of that they have skill in. For as in wrestling, in vaulting, and in learning to handle sundry kind of weapons he hath taken for his guide our Master Peter Mount, who (as you know) is the true and only master of all artificial force and sleight;[8] so in riding, in jousting, and in every other feat he hath always had before his eyes the most perfectest that hath been known to be in those professions.

THE COVRTYER OF COVNT BALDESSAR CAſtilio diuided into foure bookes.
Very neceſſary and profitatable for yonge Gentilmen and Gentilwomen abiding in Court, Palaice or Place, done into Englyſhe by Thomas Ho-
by.
Imprinted at London by wyllyam Seres at the ſigne of the Hedg-hogge. 1561.

Title page, The Courtier, 1561.

[26][9] "He therefore that will be a good scholar, beside the practising of good things, must evermore set all his diligence to be like his master, and (if it were possible) change himself into him. And when he hath had some entry,[10] it profiteth him much to behold sundry men of that profession.… And even as the bee in the green

---

[1] The Courtier Please note that a further excerpt from The Courtier on the subject of laughter appears in Contexts: Tudor and Stuart Humor.

[2] the Count Count Ludovico Canossa (1476–1532), friend and relative of Castiglione who served in various important roles, including Bishop of Tricarico, Bishop of Bayeux, and servant of both Leo X and Francis I. Hoby Anglicizes the name to Count Lewis throughout.

[3] do Act; behave.

[4] Grace is not to be learned The grace usually referred to in this sort of proverbial expression is the grace of God—through which means alone human beings (according to Protestant doctrine) could be saved. This sort of grace was absolutely not something that could be "learned" or acquired through human effort. The issue being discussed at this point, of course, is not divine grace but the sort of gracefulness that humans may themselves exhibit here on earth; the different sorts of grace is the subject of frequent wordplay in English texts of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries.

[5] of nature unapt Lacking in natural aptitude.

[6] betimes Early in life.

[7] of cunning men From knowledgeable and intelligent men.

[8] artificial force and sleight Strength and agility acquired with artifice or skill.

[9] [26] These reference numbers do not appear either in the original Italian or in Hoby's original English translation; since they are provided in many modern translations, however, they are helpful for those interested in comparing different versions.

[10] hath had some entry Is no longer a beginner.

meadows flyeth always about the grass choosing out flowers [and taking their nectar], so shall our Courtier steal this grace from them that to his seeming have it.[1] …

"But I, imagining with myself oftentimes how this grace cometh, leaving apart such as have it from above,[2] find one rule that is most general which in this part methink taketh place in all things[3] belonging to man in word or deed above all other. And that is to eschew as much as a man may, and as[4] a sharp and dangerous rock, affectation …, and (to speak a new word) to use in everything a certain recklessness,[5] to cover art withal,[6] and seem whatsoever he doth and sayeth to do it without pain,[7] and (as it were) not minding it.[8] And of this do I believe grace is much derived, for in rare matters and well brought to pass every man knoweth the hardness of them,[9] so that a readiness[10] therein maketh great wonder. And contrariwise to use force … giveth a great disgrace, and maketh every thing how great soever it be, to be little esteemed.

"Therefore that may be said to be a very[11] art that appeareth not to be art, neither ought a man to put more dilgence in anything than in covering it,[12] for in case it be open, it loseth credit clean, and maketh a man little set by.[13] And I remember that I have read in my days that there were some excellent orators, which among other their cares, enforced themselves to make every man believe that they had no sight in letters, and dissembling their cunning, made semblant their orations to be made very simply, and rather as nature and truth led them, than study and art, the whiche if it had been openly known, would have put a doubt in the people's mind for fear lest he beguiled them. You may see then how to show art and such bent study taketh away the grace of everything. Which of you is it that laugheth not when our Master Peterpaul danceth after his own fashion with such … skips and on tiptoe without moving his head, as though he were all of wood, so heedfully,[14] that truly a man would ween he counted his paces? …"

from BOOK 4

… [49] Then the L. Gaspar:[15] "I remember" (quoth he) "that these Lords yesternight reasoning of the Courtiers qualities, did allow him to be a lover, and in making rehearsal of as much as hitherto hath been spoken, a man may pick out a conclusion, that the Courtier (which with his worthiness and credit must incline his Prince to virtue) must in manner of necessity be aged, for knowledge comes very seldom times before years, and especially in matters that be learned with experience: I cannot see, when he is well drawn in years, how it will stand well with him to be a lover, considering (as it hath been said the other night) Love frameth not with[16] old men, and the tricks that in young men be gallantness, courtesy and preciseness so acceptable to women, in them are mere follies and fondness to be laughed at, and purchase him that uses them hatred of women and mockery of others. Therefore in case this your Aristotle an old Courtier were a lover, and practised the feats that young lovers do (as some that we have seen in our days) I fear me, he would forget to teach his Prince: and peradventure boys would mock him behind his back, and women would have none other delight in him but to make him a jesting-stock."[1]

---

[1] that to … have it Who seem to him to have it.

[2] leaving … from above Leaving aside the matter of those who have received the grace of God.

[3] in this … all things In this matter seem to me to apply universally.

[4] as Just as one would.

[5] recklessness There is no precise one word translation for the Italian word that Castiglione coined here—sprezzatura. The expressions confident cool and studied nonchalance both capture something of the concept. One is exhibiting sprezzatura if one is, in some sense, showing off one's gracefulness or elegance but one is acting as if one were not being noticed. One is exhibiting sprezzatura if one affects not to care what others may think of the appearance one is giving off.

[6] to cover art withal To hide all the skill (which one may have acquired through considerable effort).

[7] without pain Without painful exertion; without effort.

[8] not minding it Not thinking about it; seeming not to think about it.

[9] in rare … of them Everyone knows how difficult it is to achieve something that is very unusual and to do it very well.

[10] readiness Facility.

[11] very True.

[12] put more … covering it Put more effort into doing something than he does into disguising that effort.

[13] set by Regarded.

[14] heedfully In a studied fashion; obviously self-conscious.

[15] L. Gaspar Gasparo Pallavicino (1486–1511), Lombard nobleman and friend of Castiglione.

[16] frameth not with Does not suit.

Then said the L. Octavian:[2] "Since all the other qualities appointed to the Courtier are meet for him, although he be old, me think we should not then bar him from this happiness to love."

"Nay rather," quoth the L. Gaspar, "to take this love from him, is a perfection over and above, and a making him to live happily out of misery and wretchedness."

[50] M. Peter Bembo[3] said: "Remember you not (my L. Gaspar) that the L. Octavian declared the other night in his device of pastimes,[4] although he be not skilful in love, to know yet that there be some lovers, which reckon the disdains, the angers, the debates and torments which they receive of their Ladies, sweet? Whereupon he required to be taught the cause of this sweetness. Therefore in case our Courtier (though he be old) were kindled with those loves that be sweet without any bitter smack,[5] he should feel no misery nor wretchedness at all. And being wise, as we set case[6] he is, he should not be deceived in thinking to be meet for him whatsoever were meet for young men, but in loving should perhaps love after a sort, that might not only not bring him in slander but to much praise and great happiness, without any loathsomeness at all, the which very seldom or (in manner) never happens to young men: and so should he neither lay aside the teaching of his Prince, nor yet commit anything that should deserve the mocking of boys."

Then spoke the Duchess:[7] "I am glad (M. Peter) that you have not been much troubled, in our reasonings this night, for now we may be the bolder[8] to give you in charge to speak, and to teach the Courtier this so happy a love, which bringeth with it neither slander, nor any inconvenience: for perhaps it shall be one of the necessariest and profitablest qualities that hitherto hath been given him, therefore speak of good fellowship as much as you know therein."

M. Peter laughed and said: "I would be loath (Madam) where I say that it is lawful for old men to love, it should be an occasion for these Ladies to think me old: therefore hardly give ye this enterprise to another."

The Duchess answered: "You ought not to refuse to be counted old in knowledge, though ye be young in years. Therefore say on,[9] and excuse yourself no more." M. Peter said: "Surely (madam) if I must entreat upon this matter, I must first go ask counsel of my hermit Lavinello."[10]

The L. Emilia[11] said then half in anger: "There is never a one in all the company so disobedient as you be (M. Peter) therefore should the Duchess do well to chastise you somewhat for it."

M. Peter said smiling: "For love of God (Madam) be not angry with me, for I will say whatever you will have me."

"Good to, say on then," answered the L. Emilia.

[51] Then M. Peter after a while of silence, somewhat settling himself as though he should entreat upon a weighty matter, said thus: "My Lords, to show that old men may love not only without slander, but otherwhile more happily than young men, I must be enforced to make a little discourse to declare what love is, and wherein consisteth the happiness that lovers may have. Therefore I beseech ye give the hearing with heedfulness, for I hope to make you understand, that it were not unfitting for any man here to be a lover, in

---

[1] jesting-stock Object of ridicule; laughing stock.

[2] L. Octavian Ottaviano Fregoso (1470–1524), Doge of Genoa and nephew to the Duke of Urbino.

[3] Peter Bembo Pietro Bembo (1470–1547), Venetian-born scholar, poet, and prolific man of letters. He resided at the court of Urbino in 1506; later he became a cardinal and papal secretary to Leo X. In addition to his work developing Italian language, Bembo wrote about Platonic love.

[4] his device of pastimes His games.

[5] smack Taste.

[6] set case Have determined.

[7] the Duchess Elisabetta Gonzaga (1471–1526), Duchess of Urbino and wife of Duke Guidobaldo da Montefeltro. The court of Urbino is the setting of The Book of the Courtier.

[8] be the bolder Be more confident.

[9] say on Continue speaking.

[10] hermit Lavinello In Bembo's Gli Asolani (1505) Lavinello, the central character of Book III and a promoter of platonic love, has this doctrine of love explained to him by a hermit.

[11] L. Emilia Emilia Pia (d. 1528). Widowed in 1500, she then lived in Urbino as a companion to the Duchess.

case he were XV or XX years older than M. Morello."[1]

And here after they had laughed a while, M. Peter proceeded: "I say therefore that according as it is defined of the wise men of old time, Love is nothing else but a certain coveting to enjoy beauty: and forsomuch as coveting longeth for nothing, but for things known, it is requisite that knowledge go evermore before coveting, which of his own nature willeth the good, but of himself is blind, and knoweth it not. Therefore hath nature so ordained, that to every virtue of knowledge there is annexed a virtue of longing. And because in our soul there be three manner ways to know, namely, by sense,[2] reason, and understanding: of sense, there ariseth appetite or longing, which is common to us with brute beasts: of reason ariseth election or choice, which is proper to man: of understanding, by the which man may be partner with angels, ariseth will. Even as therefore the sense knoweth not but sensible matters and that which may be felt, so the appetite, or coveting only desireth the same: and even as the understanding is bent but to behold things that may be understood, so is that will only fed with spiritual goods. Man of nature endowed with reason, placed (as it were) in the middle between these two extremities, may through his choice inclining to sense, or reaching to understanding, come nigh to the coveting sometime of the one sometime of the other part. In these sorts therefore may beauty be coveted, the general name whereof may be applied to all things, either natural or artificial, that are framed in good proportion, and due temper, as their nature beareth.

[52] "But speaking of the beauty that we mean, which is only it that appeareth in bodies, and especially in the face of man, and moveth this fervent coveting which we call Love, we will term it an influence of the heavenly bountifulness, the which for all it stretcheth over all things that be created (like the light of the sun) yet when it findeth out a face well proportioned, and framed with a certain lively agreement of several colours, and set forth with lights and shadows, and with an orderly distance and limits of lines, thereinto it distilleth itself and appeareth most well favoured, and decketh out and lighteneth the subject where it shineth with a marvelous grace and glistening (like the sun beams that strike against beautiful plate of fine gold wrought and set with precious jewels) so that it draweth unto it men's eyes with pleasure, and piercing through them imprinteth himself in the soul, and with an unwonted sweetness all to stirreth her and delighteth, and setting her on fire maketh her to covet him. When the soul then is taken with coveting to enjoy this beauty as a good thing, in case she suffer herself to be guided with the judgement of sense, she falleth into most deep errors, and judgeth the body in which beauty is discerned, to be the principal cause thereof: whereupon to enjoy it, she reckoneth it necessary to join as inwardly as she can with that body, which is false: and therefore who so thinketh in possessing the body to enjoy beauty, he is far deceived, and is moved to it, not with true knowledge by the choice of reason, but with false opinion by the longing of sense. Whereupon the pleasure that followeth it, is also false and of necessity full of errors. And therefore into one of the two vices run all those lovers that satisfy their unhonest lusts with the women whom they love: for either as soon as they be come to the coveted end, they not only feel a fullness and loathsomeness, but also conceive a hatred against the white beloved, as though longing repented him of his offence and acknowledged the deceit wrought him by the false judgement of sense, that made him believe the ill to be good: or else they continue in the very same coveting and greediness, as though they were not in deed come to the end, which they sought for. And albeit through the blind opinion that hath made them drunken (to their seeming) in that instant they feel a contentation,[3] as the diseased otherwhile, that dream they drink of some clear spring, yet be they not satisfied, nor leave of so. And because of possessing coveted goodness there ariseth always quietness and satisfaction in the possessor's mind, in case this were the true and right end of their coveting, when they possess it they would be at quietness and thoroughly satisfied, which they be not: but rather deceived through that likeness, they forthwith return again to unbridled coveting, and with the very same trouble, which they felt at the first, they fall again into the raging and most burning thirst of the thing, that they hope in vain to possess perfectly.

---

[1] M. Morello Sigismondo Morello da Ortona, soldier for the Duke of Urbino, and later a court retainer. Little is known about his life, but he is purportedly the oldest of the interlocutors.

[2] by sense Through our faculties of perception (sight, touch, etc.).

[3] contentation Satisfaction; feeling of contentment.

These kind of lovers therefore love most unluckily, for either they never come by their covetings,[1] which is a great unluckiness: or else if they do come by them, they find they come by their hurt, and end their miseries with other greater miseries, for both in the beginning and middle of this love, there is never other thing felt, but afflictions, torments, griefs, pining, travail,[2] so that to be wan,[3] vexed with continual tears, and sighs, to live with a discontented mind, to be always dumb,[4] or to lament, to covet death, in conclusion to be most unlucky are the properties which (they say) belong to lovers.

[53] "The cause therefore of this wretchedness in men's minds, is principally sense, which in youthful age beareth most sway, because the lustiness of the flesh and of the blood, in that season addeth unto him even so much force, as it withdraweth from reason: therefore doeth it easily train the soul to follow appetite or longing, for when she seeth herself drowned in the earthly prison, because she is set in the office to govern the body, she cannot of herself understand plainly at first the truth of spiritual beholding. Wherefore to compass the understanding of things, she must go beg the beginning at the senses,[5] and therefore she believeth them, and giveth ear to them, and is contented to be lead by them, especially when they have so much courage, that (in a manner) they enforce her and because they be deceitful they fill her with errors and false opinions. Whereupon most commonly it happeneth, that young men be wrapped in this sensual love, which is a very rebel against reason, and therefore they make themselves unworthy to enjoy the favours and benefits, which love bestoweth upon his true subjects, neither in love feel they any other pleasure, than what beasts without reason do, but much more grievous afflictions. Setting the case therefore this to be so, which is most true, I say, that the contrary chances to them of a more ripe age. For in case they, when the soul is not now so much weighed down with the bodily burden, and when the natural burning assuageth and draweth to a warmth, if they be inflamed with beauty, and to it bend their coveting guided by reasonable choice, they be not deceived, and possess beauty perfectly, and therefore through the possessing of it, always goodness ensueth to them: because beauty is good and consequently the true love of it is most good and holy, and evermore bringeth forth good fruits in the souls of them, that with the bridle of reason restrains the ill disposition of sense, the which old men can much sooner do then young.

[54] "It is not therefore out of reason to say, that old men may also love without slander and more happily than young men: taking notwithstanding this name 'Old,' not for the age at the pit's-brink,[6] nor when the channels of the body be so feeble, that the soul cannot through them work her feats, but when knowledge in us is in his right strength. And I will not also hide this from you: namely, that I suppose, where sensual love in every age is naught, yet in young men it deserveth excuse, and perhaps in some case leeful: for although it putteth them in afflictions, dangers, travails, and the unfortunateness that is said, yet are there many that to win them the good will of their Ladies practise virtuous things, which for all they be not bent to a good end, yet are they good of themselves, and so of that much bitterness they pick out a little sweetness, and through the adversities which they sustain, in the end they acknowledge their error. As I judge therefore those young men that bridle their appetites, and love with reason, to be godly: so do I hold excused such as yield to sensual love, whereunto they be so inclined through the weakness and frailty of man: so they show therein meekness, courtesy, and prowess, and the other worthy conditions that these Lords have spoken of, and when those youthful years be gone and passed, leave it of clean, keeping aloof from this sensual coveting as from the lowermost step of the stairs, by the which a man may ascend to true love. But in case after they draw in years once they reserve in their cold heart the fire of appetites, and bring stout reason in subjection to feeble sense, it cannot be said how much they are to be blamed: for like men without sense they deserve with an everlasting shame to be put in the number of unreasonable living creatures, because the thoughts and ways of sensual love be far unfitting for ripe age."

---

[1] come by their covetings Attain their desires.

[2] travail Troublesome and painful labor.

[3] wan Lacking enthusiasm or luster.

[4] dumb Stricken with inarticulateness.

[5] beg the beginning at the senses Turn to the senses as the initial source of knowledge.

[6] pit's-brink Edge of a pit, i.e., near to the grave.

[55] Here Bembo paused a while as though he would breathe him,[1] and when all things were whist[2] M. Morello of Ortona said: "And in case there were some old man more fresh and lusty and of a better complexion then many young men, why would you not have it lawful for him to love with the love that young men love?"

The Duchess laughed and said: "If the love of young men be so unlucky, why would you (M. Morello) that old men should also love with this unluckiness? But in case you were old (as these men say you be) you would not thus procure the hurt of old men."

M. Morello answered: "The hurt of old men (me seemeth) M. Peter Bembo procureth, who will have them to love after a sort, that I for my part understand not: and (me think) the possessing of this beauty, which he praiseth so much, without the body, is a dream."

"Do you believe M. Morello," quoth then Count Lewis, "that beauty is always so good a thing as M. Peter Bembo speaketh of?"

"Not I in good sooth,"[3] answered M. Morello: "but I remember rather that I have seen many beautiful women of a mostly ill inclination, cruel, and spiteful, and it seemeth that (in a manner) it happeneth always so, for beauty maketh them proud: and pride, cruel."

Count Lewis said smiling: "To you perhaps they seem cruel, because they content you not with it, that you would have. But cause M. Peter Bembo to teach you in what sort old men ought to covet beauty and what to seek at their Lady's hands, and what to content themselves withal: and in not passing out of these bounds, ye shall see that they shall be neither proud nor cruel: and will satisfy you with what you shall require."

M. Morello seemed then somewhat out of patience, and said: "I will not know the thing that toucheth me not. But cause you to be taught how the young men ought to covet this beauty, that are not so fresh and lusty as old men be."

[56] Here Sir Frederick[4] to pacify M. Morello and to break their talk, would not suffer Count Lewis to make answer, but interrupting him said: "Perhaps M. Morello is not altogether out of the way in saying that beauty is not always good, for the beauty of women is many times cause of infinite evils in the world, hatred, war, mortality, and destruction, whereof the razing of Troy can be a good witness:[5] and beautiful women for the most part be either proud and cruel (as is said) or unchaste, but M. Morello would find no fault with that. There be also many wicked men that have the comeliness of a beautiful countenance, and it seemeth that nature hath so shaped them, because they may be the readier to deceive, and that this amiable look were like a bait that covereth the hook."

Then M. Peter Bembo: "Believe not" (quoth he) "but beauty is always good."

Here Count Lewis, because he would return again to his former purpose, interrupted him and said: "Since M. Morello passeth not to understand that, which is so necessary for him, teach it me, and show me how old men may come by this happiness of love, for I will not care to be counted old, so it may profit me."

[57] M. Peter Bembo laughed and said: "First will I take the error out of these gentlemen's mind: and afterward will I satisfy you also." So beginning afresh: "My Lords" (quoth he) "I would not that with speaking ill of beauty, which is a holy thing, any of us as profane and wicked should purchase him the wrath of God. Therefore to give M. Morello and Sir Frederick warning, that they lose not their sight, as Stesichorus did,[6] a pain most meet for who so dispraiseth beauty, I say, that beauty commeth of God, and is like a circle, the goodness whereof is the centre. And therefore, as there can be no circle without a centre, no more can beauty be without goodness. Whereupon doeth very seldom an ill soul dwell in a beautiful body. And therefore is the outward beauty a true sign of the inward goodness, and in bodies this comeliness is imprinted more and less (as it were) for a mark of the soul, whereby she is outwardly known: as in trees, in which

---

[1] breathe him Take a moment's breath.

[2] whist Silent.

[3] sooth Truth.

[4] Sir Frederick Federico Fregoso (1480–1541), younger brother of Ottaviano, scholar of languages, and friend of both Bembo and Castiglione.

[5] Troy … witness Refers to Helen of Troy (also known as Helen of Sparta). In Homer's Iliad she is said to be the most beautiful woman in the world; her abduction by Paris leads to the Trojan war, and ultimately to the razing of Troy.

[6] as Stesichorus did Renowned as the first lyric poet of the West, Stesichorus was said to be stricken blind for writing against Helen of Troy, and then cured upon his recantation.

the beauty of the buds giveth a testimony of the goodness of the fruit. And the very same happeneth in bodies, as it is seen, that palmisters[1] by the visage know many times the conditions, and otherwhile the thoughts of men. And which is more, in beasts also a man may discern by the face the quality of the courage, which in the body declareth itself as much as it can. Judge you how plainly in the face of a lion, a horse and an eagle, a man shall discern anger, fierceness and stoutness: in lambs and doves simpleness and very innocence: the crafty subtlety in foxes and wolves, and the like (in a manner) in all other living creatures.

[58] "The foul therefore for the most part be also evil and the beautiful, good. Therefore it may be said that beauty is a face pleasant, merry, comely, and to be desired for goodness: and foulness a face dark, uglesome, unpleasant and to be shunned for ill. And in case you will consider all things, ye shall find, that whatsoever is good and profitable hath also evermore the comeliness of beauty. Behold the state of this great engine of the world, which God created for the health and preservation of everything that was made. The heaven round beset with so many heavenly lights: and in the middle, the Earth environed with the elements, and upheld with the very weight of itself: the sun, that compassing about giveth light to the whole, and in winter season draweth to the lowermost sign, afterward by tittle and little[2] climbeth again to the other part: the moon, that of him taketh her light, according as she draweth nigh, or goith farther from him: and the other five stars, that diversely keep the very same course. These things among themselves have such force by the knitting together of an order so necessarily framed, that with altering them any one jot, they should be all loosed, and the world would decay. They have also such beauty and comeliness, that all the wits men have, cannot imagine a more beautiful matter.

"Think now of the shape of man, which may be called a little world: in whom every parcel of his body is seen to be necessarily framed by art and not by hap,[3] and then the form altogether most beautiful, so that it were a hard matter to judge, whether the members, as the eyes, the nose, the mouth, the ears, the arms, the breast and in like manner the other parts: give either more profit to the countenance and the rest of the body, or comeliness. The like may be said of all other living creatures. Behold the feathers of fouls, the leaves and bows of trees, which be given them of nature to keep them in their being, and yet have they withal a very great sightliness. Leave nature, and come to art. What thing is so necessary in sailing vessels, as the forepart, the side, the mainyards, the mast, the sails, the stern, oars, anchors, and tackling? All these things notwithstanding are so well favoured in the eye, that unto who so beholdeth them they seem to have been found out as well for pleasure, as for profit. Pillars and great beams uphold high buildings and palaces, and yet are they no less pleasureful unto the eyes of the beholders, than profitable to the buildings. When men began first to build, in the middle of temples and houses they reared the ridge of the roof, not to make the works to have a better show, but because the water might the more commodiously[4] avoid on both sides: yet unto profit there was forthwith adjoined a faire sightliness, so that if under the sky where there falleth neither hail nor rain a man should build a temple, without a reared ridge, it is to be thought, that it could have neither a sightly show nor any beauty.

[59] "Beside other things therefore, it giveth a great praise to the world, in saying that it is beautiful. It is praised, in saying, the beautiful heaven, beautiful earth, beautiful sea, beautiful rivers, beautiful woods, trees, gardens, beautiful cities, beautiful churches, houses, armies. In conclusion this comely and holy beauty is a wondrous setting out of every thing. And it may be said that good and beautiful be after a sort one self thing, especially in the bodies of men: of the beauty whereof the nighest cause (I suppose) is the beauty of the soul: the which as a partner of the right and heavenly beauty, maketh sightly and beautiful whatever she toucheth, and most of all, if the body, where she dwelleth, be not of so vile a matter, that she cannot imprint in it her property. Therefore beauty is the true monument and spoil of the victory of the soul, when she with heavenly influence beareth rule over material and gross nature, and with her light overcommeth the darkness of the body. It is not

---

[1] palmisters Practitioners of palmistry, the art of supposedly reading a person's character or future by examining the lines of the hands.

[2] by tittle and little Little by little.

[3] hap Luck; happenstance.

[4] commodiously Conveniently.

then to be spoken that beauty maketh women proud or cruel, although it seem so to M. Morello. Neither yet ought beautiful women to bear the blame of that hatred, mortality, and destruction, which the unbridled appetites of men are the cause of. I will not now deny, but it is possible also to find in the world beautiful women unchaste, yet not because beauty inclineth them to unchaste living, for it rather plucketh them from it, and leadeth them into the way of virtuous conditions, through the affinity that beauty hath with goodness: but otherwhile ill bringing up, the continual provocations of lovers, poverty, hope, deceits, fear, and a thousand other matters overcome the steadfastness, yea of beautiful and good women: and for these and like causes may also beautiful men become wicked."

[60] Then said the L. Cesar:[1] "In case the L. Gaspar's saying be true of yesternight, there is no doubt but the fair women be more chaste than the foul."

"And what was my saying?" quoth the L. Gaspar.

The L. Cesar answered; "If I do well bear in mind, your saying was, that the women that are sued to,[2] always refuse to satisfy him that sueth to them, but those that are not sued to, sue to others. There is no doubt but the beautiful women have always more suitors, and be more instantly laid at[3] in love, then the foul. Therefore the beautiful always deny, and consequently be more chaste, than the foul, which not being sued to, sue unto others."

M. Peter Bembo laughed and said: "This argument cannot be answered to."

Afterward he proceeded: "It chanceth also oftentimes, that as the other senses, so the sight is deceived, and judgeth a face beautiful, which in deed is not beautiful. And because in the eyes and in the whole countenance of some women, a man beholdeth otherwhile a certain lavish wantonness painted with dishonest flickerings, many, whom that manner delighteth because it promiseth them an easiness to come by the thing, that they covet, call it beauty: but indeed it is a cloaked unshamefastnes,[4] unworthy of so honorable and holy a name."

M. Peter Bembo held his peace, and those Lords still were earnest upon him to speak somewhat more of this love and of the way to enjoy beauty aright, and at the last: "Me think" (quoth he) "I have showed plainly enough, that old men may love more happily than young, which was my drift, therefore it belongeth not me to enter any farther."

Count Lewis answered: "You have better declared the unluckiness of young men, than the happiness of old men, whom you have not as yet taught, what way they must follow in this love of theirs: only you have said, that they must suffer themselves to be guided by reason, and the opinion of many is, that it is impossible for love to stand with reason."

[61] Bembo notwithstanding sought to make an end of reasoning, but the Duchess desired him to say on, and he began thus afresh: "Too unlucky were the nature of man, if our soul (in the which this so fervent coveting may lightly arise) should be driven to nourish it with that only, which is commune to her with beasts,[5] and could not turn it to the other noble part,[6] which is proper to her. Therefore since it is so your pleasure, I will not refuse to reason upon this noble matter. And because I know myself unworthy to talk of the most holy mysteries of love, I beseech him to lead my thought and my tongue so, that I may show this excellent courtier how to love contrary to the wonted manner of the common ignorant sort. And even as from my childhood I have dedicated all my whole life unto him, so also now that my words may be answerable to the same intent, and to the praise of him: I say therefore, that since the nature of man in youthful age is so much inclined to sense, it may be granted the courtier, while he is young, to love sensually. But in case afterward also in his riper years, he chance to be set on fire with this coveting of love, he ought to be good and circumspect, and heedful that he beguile not himself, to be led willfully into the wretchedness, that in young men deserveth more to be pitied then blamed: and contrariwise in old men, more to be blamed than pitied.

[62] "Therefore when an amiable countenance of a beautiful woman cometh in his sight, that is accompanied with noble conditions and honest

---

[1] L. Cesar Cesare Gonzaga (1475–1512), a cousin and friend of Castiglione.

[2] sued to Pursued (in this case romantically, as by a suitor).

[3] laid at Approached; urged.

[4] unshamefastnes Shamelessness; immodesty.

[5] that only ... beasts Only that which the human soul holds in common with that of other animals (e.g., the physical senses).

[6] other noble part Reason.

behaviors, so that as one practised in love, he wotteth[1] well that his hue hath an agreement with hers, as soon as he is aware that his eyes snatch that image and carrry it to the hart, and that the soul beginneth to behold it with pleasure, and feeleth within herself the influence that stirreth her and by little and little setteth her in heat, and that those lively spirits, that twinkle out through the eyes, put continually fresh nourishment to the fire: he ought in this beginning to seek a speedy remedie and to raise up reason, and with her, to fence the fortress of his heart, and to shut in such wise the passages against sense and appetites, that they may enter neither with force nor subtle practise. Thus if the flame be quenched, the jeopardy is also quenched. But in case it continue or increase, then must the courtier determine (when he perceiveth he is taken) to shun throughly all filthiness of common love, and so enter into the holy way of love with the guide of reason, and first consider that the body, where that beautye shineth, is not the fountain from whence beauty springeth, but rather because beauty is bodiless and (as we have said) an heavenly shining beam, she loseth much of her honour when she is coupled with that vile subject and full of corruption, because the less she is partner thereof, the more perfect she is, and clean sundered from it, is most perfect.[2]

"And as a man heareth not with his mouth, nor smelleth with his ears: no more can he also in any manner wise enjoy beauty, nor satisfy the desire that she stirreth up in our minds, with feeling, but with the sense, unto whom beauty is the very butt to level at: namely, the virtue of seeing. Let him lay aside therefore the blind judgement of the sense, and enjoy with his eyes the brightness, the comeliness, the loving sparkles, laughters, gestures and all other pleasant furnitures of beauty:[3] especially with hearinge the sweetness of her voice, the tunableness[4] of her words, the melody of her singing and playing on instruments (in case the woman beloved be a musician) and so shall he with most dainty[5] food feed the soul through the means of these two senses, which have little bodily substance in them, and be the ministers of reason, without entering farther toward the body with coveting unto any longing otherwise than honest. Afterward let him obey, please, and honour with all reverence his woman, and reckon her more dear to him then his own life, and prefer all her commodities and pleasures before his own, and love no less in her the beauty of the mind, then of the body: therefore let him have a care not to suffer her to run into any error, but with lessons and good exhortations seek always to frame her to modesty, to temperance, to true honesty, and so to work that there may never take place in her other than pure thoughts and far wide from all filthiness of vices. And thus in sowing of virtue in the garden of that mind, he shall also gather the fruits of most beautiful conditions, and savour them with a marvelous good relish. And this shall be the right engendering and imprinting of beauty, the which some hold opinion to be the end of love. In this manner shall our courtier be most acceptable to his lady, and she will always show herself toward him tractable, lovely and sweet in language, and as willing to please him, as to be beloved of him: and the wills of them both shall be most honest and agreeable, and they consequently shall be most happy."

[63] Here M. Morello: "The engendering" (quoth he) "of beauty in beauty aright, were the engendering of a beautiful child in a beautiful woman, and I would think it a more manifest token a great deal that she loved her lover, if she pleased him with this, then with the sweetness of language that you speak of."

M. Peter Bembo laughed and said: "You must not (M. Morello) pass your bounds. I may tell you, it is not a small token that a woman loveth, when she giveth unto her lover her beauty, which is so precious a matter: and by the ways that be a passage to the soul (that is to say, the sight and the hearing) sendeth the looks of her eyes, the image of her countenance, and the voice of her words, that pierce into the lovers heart, and give a witness of her love."

M. Morello said: "Looks and words may be, and oftentimes are, false witnesses. Therefore whoso hath not a better pledge of love (in my judgement) he is in an ill assurance. And surely I looked still that you would have made this woman of yours somewhat more courteous and free toward the courtier, then my L. Julian[1] hath made his: but (me seemeth) ye be both of the property of those judges, that (to appear wise) give sentence against their own."

---

[1] wotteth Knows.

[2] [Hoby's note] Beauty severed from the body is most perfect.

[3] furnitures of beauty Decorations, accouterments, or embellishments of looks.

[4] tunableness Harmony; concord.

[5] dainty Delightful; worthy of esteem.

[64] Bembo said: "I am well pleased to have this woman much more courteous toward my courtier not young, then the L. Julian's is to the young: and that with good reason, because mine coveteth but honest matters, and therefore may the woman grant him them all without blame. But my L. Julian's woman that is not so assured of the modesty of the young man, ought to grant him the honest matters only, and deny him the dishonest. Therefore more happy is mine, that hath granted him whatsoever he requireth, than the other, that hath part granted and parte denied. And because you may moreover the better understand, that reasonable love is more happy than sensual, I say unto you, that selfsame things in sensual [love] ought to be denied otherwhile, and in reasonable, granted: because in the one, they be honest, and in the other dishonest. Therefore the woman to please her good lover, beside the granting him merry countenances, familiar and secret talk, jesting, dallying, hand in hand, may also lawfully and without blame come to kissing: which in sensual love, according to the L. Julian's rules, is not lawful. For since a kiss is a knitting together both of body and soul, it is to be feared, least the sensual lover will be more inclined to the part of the body, than of the soul: but the reasonable lover wotteth well, that although the mouth be a parcel of the body, yet is it an issue for the words, that be the interpreters of the soul, and for the inward breath, which is also called the soul: and therefore hath a delight to join his mouth with the woman's beloved with a kiss: not to stir him to any unhonest desire, but because he feeleth that, that bond is the opening of an entry to the souls, which drawn with a coveting the one of the other, power themselves by turn, the one into the other's body, and be so mingled together, that each of them hath two souls, and one alone so framed of them both ruleth (in a manner) two bodies. Whereupon a kiss may be said to be rather a coupling together of the soul, than of the body, because it hath such force in her, that it draweth her unto it, and (as it were) separateth her from the body. For this do all chaste lovers covet a kiss, as a coupling of souls together. And therefore Plato the divine lover saith, that in kissing, his soul came as far as his lips to depart out of the body. And because the separating of the soul from the matters of the sense and the through coupling her with matters of understanding may be betokened by a kiss, Solomon saith in his heavenly book of ballads,[2] 'Oh that he would kiss me with a kiss of his mouth,' to express the desire he had, that his soul might be ravished through heavenly love to the beholding of heavenly beauty in such manner, that coupling herself inwardly with it, she might forsake the body."

[65] They stood all harkening heedfully to Bembo's reasoning, and after he had staid a while and saw that none spoke, he said: "Since you have made me to begin to show our not young courtier this happy love, I will lead him somewhat farther forwards, because to stand still at this stay were somewhat perilous for him, considering (as we have often times said) the soul is most inclined to the senses, and for all reason with discourse chooseth well, and knoweth that beauty not to spring of the body, and therefore setteth a bridle to the unhonest desires, yet to behold it always in that body, doeth oftentimes corrupt the right judgment. And where no other inconvenience ensueth upon it, one's absence from the white beloved carieth a great passion with it: because the influence of that beauty when it is present, giveth a wondrous delight to the lover, and setting his heart on fire, quickeneth and melteth certain virtues in a trance and congealed in the soul, the which nourished with the heat of love, flow about and go bubbling nigh the heart, and thrust out through the eyes those spirits, which be most fine vapors made of the purest and clearest part of the blood, which receive the image of beauty, and deck it with a thousand sundry furnitures. Whereupon the soul taketh a delight, and with a certain wonder is aghast, and yet enjoyeth she it, and (as it were) astonied[3] together with the pleasure, feeleth the fear and reverence that men accustomably[4] have toward holy matters, and thinketh herself to be in paradise.

---

[1] L. Julian Giuliano de Medici (1479–1516), youngest son of Lorenzo 'Il Magnifico' de Medici and brother to Pope Leo X. While in exile from Florence Giuliano lived at the court of Urbino.

[2] Solomon ... ballads See Song of Solomon 1.2.

[3] astonied Rendered powerless or paralyzed; stunned.

[4] accustomably Customarily.

[66] "The lover therefore that considereth only the beauty in the body, loseth this treasure and happiness, as soon as the woman beloved with her departure leaveth the eyes without their brightness, and consequently the soul, as a widow without her joy. For sins beauty is far off, that influence of love setteth not the heart on fire, as it did in presence. Whereupon the pores be dried up and withered, and yet doeth the remembrance of beauty somewhat stir those virtues of the soul in such ways, that they seek to scatter abroad the spirits, and they finding the ways closed up, have no issue, and still they seek to get out, and so with those shootings enclosed prick the soul, and torment her bitterly, as young children, when in their tender gums they begin to breed teeth. And hence come the tears, sighs, vexations and torments of lovers: because the soul is always in affliction and travail and (in a manner) waxeth wood,[1] until the beloved beauty cometh before her once again, and then is she immediately pacified and taketh breath, and thoroughly bent to it, is nourished with most dainty food, and by her will, would never depart from so sweet a sight. To avoid therefore the torment of this absence, and to enjoy beauty without passion, the courtier by the help of reason must full and wholly call back again the coveting of the body to beauty alone, and (in what he can) behold it in itself simple and pure, and frame it within in his imagination sundered from all matter, and so make it friendly and loving to his soul, and there enjoy it, and have it with him day and night, in every time and place, without mistrust ever to lose it: keeping always fast in mind, that the body is a most diverse thing from beauty, and not only not increaseth, but diminisheth the perfection of it. In this wise shall our not young courtier be out of all bitterness and wretchedness that young men feel (in a manner) continually, as jealousies, suspicions, disdains, angers, desperations and certain rages full of madness, whereby many times they be led into so great error, that some do not only beat the women whom they love: but rid themselves out of their life. He shall do no wrong to the husband, father, brethren or kinsfolk of the woman beloved. He shall not bring her in slander. He shall not be in case with much ado otherwhile to refrain his eyes and tongue from discovering his desires to others. He shall not take thought at departure or in absence, because he shall evermore carry his precious treasure about with him shut fast within his heart.

[67] "And besides, through the virtue of imagination he shall fashion within himself that beauty much more faire, than it is in deed. But among these commodities the lover shall find another yet far greater, in case he will take this love for a stair, as it were, to climb up to another far higher than it. The which he shall bring to pass, if he will go and consider with himself, what a strict bond it is to be always in the trouble to behold the beauty of one body alone. And therefore to come out of this so narrow a room, he shall gather in his thought by little and little so many ornaments, that meddling[2] all beauties together, he shall make an universal concept, and bring the multitude of them to the unity of one alone, that is generally spread over all the nature of man. And thus shall he behold no more the particular beauty of one woman, but an universal, that decketh out all bodies. Whereupon being dim with this greater light, he shall not pass upon the lesser, and burning in a more excellent flame, he shall little esteem it, that he set great store by at the first. This stair of love, though it be very noble, and such as few arrive at it, yet is it not in this sort to be called perfect, forsomuch as where the imagination is of force to make conveyance and hath no knowledge, but through those beginnings that the senses help her withal, she is not clean purged from gross darkness: and therefore though she do consider that universal beauty in sunder and in itself alone, yet doeth she not well and clearly discern it, nor without some doubtfulness, by reason of the agreement that the fancies have with the body. Wherefore such as come to this love, are like young birds almost flush, which for all they flutter a little their tender wings, yet dare they not stray far from the nest, nor commit themselves to the wind and open weather.

[68] "When our Courtier therefore shall be come to this point, although he may be called a good and happy lover, in respect of them that he drowned in the misery of sensual love, yet will I not have him to set his heart at rest, but boldly proceed farther, following the high way after his guide, that leadeth him to the point of true happiness. And thus instead of going out of his wit with thought, as he must do that will consider the bodily beauty, he may come into his wit, to behold the beauty that is seen with the eyes of the mind, which then begin to be sharp and thorough seeing, when the eyes of the body lose the flower of their sightliness. Therefore the soul rid of vices, purged with the studies of true philosophy, occupied in spiritual [matters], and exercised in matters of understanding, turning her to the beholding of her own substance, as it were raised out of a most deep sleep, openeth the eyes that all men have, and few occupy, and seeth in herself a shining beam of that light, which is the true image of the angelic beauty partened[1] with her, whereof she also partneth with the body a feeble shadow: therefore waxed blind about earthly matters,[2] is made most quick of sight about heavenly. And otherwhile when the stirring virtues of the body are withdrawn alone through earnest beholding, either fast bound through sleep, when she is not hindered by them, she feeleth a certain privy smell of the right angelic beauty, and ravished with the shining of that light, beginneth to be inflamed, and so greedily followeth after, that (in a manner) she waxeth drunken and beside herself, for coveting to couple herself with it, having found (to her weaning) the footsteps of God in the beholding of whom (as in her happy end) she seeketh to settle herself. And therefore burning in this most happy flame, she ariseth to the noblest part of her (which is the understanding) and there no more shadowed with the dark night of earthly matters, seeth the heavenly beauty: but yet doeth she not for all that enjoy it altogether perfectly, because she behouldeth it only in her particular understanding, which cannot conceive the passing great universal beauty: whereupon not thoroughly satisfied with this benefit, love giveth unto the soul a greater happiness. For like as through the particular beauty of one body he guideth her to the universal beauty of all bodies: even so in the last degree of perfection through particular understanding he guideth her to the universal understanding. Thus the soul kindled in the most holy fire of true heavenly love, fleeth to couple herself with the nature of angels, and not only clean forsaketh sense, but hath no more need of the discourse of reason, for being changed into an angel, she understandeth all things that may be understood: and without any veil or cloud, she seeth the main sea of the pure heavenly beauty and receiveth it into her, and enjoyeth that sovereign happiness, that cannot be comprehended of the senses.

---

[1] waxeth wood Grows crazy.

[2] meddling Blending.

[69] "Since therefore the beauties, which we daily see with these our dim eyes in bodies subject to corruption, that nevertheless be nothing else but dreams and most thin shadows of beauty, seem unto us so well favoured and comely, that oftentimes they kindle in us a most burning fire, and with such delight, that we reckon no happiness may be compared to it, that we feel otherwhile through the only look which the beloved countenance of a woman casteth at us: what happy wonder, what blessed abasement may we reckon that to be, that taketh the souls, which come to have a sight of the heavenly beauty? What sweet flame? What soote[3] incense may a man believe that to be, which ariseth of the fountain of the sovereign and right beauty? Which is the origin of all other beauty, which never increaseth nor diminisheth, always beautiful, and of itself, as well on the one part as on the other, most simple, only like itself, and partner of none other, but in such wise beautiful, that all other beautiful things, be beautiful, because they be partners of the beauty of it. This is the beauty inseparable from the high bounty, which with her voice calleth and draweth to her all things: and not only to the endowed with understanding giveth understanding, to the reasonable reason, to the sensual sense and appetite to live, but also partaketh with the plants and stones (as a print of herself) stirring, and the natural provocation of their properties. So much therefore is this love greater and happier than others, as the cause that stirreth it, is more excellent. And therefore, as common fire trieth gold and maketh it fine, so this most holy fire in souls destroyeth and consumeth whatsoever there is mortal in them, and relieveth and maketh beautiful the heavenly part, which at the first by reason of the sense was dead and buried in them. This is the great fire in the which (the poets write) that Hercules was burned on the top of the mountain Oeta:[4] and through that consuming with fire, after his death was holy and immortal. This is the fiery bush of Moses: the divided tongues of fire: the inflamed chariot of

---

[1] partened Likened.

[2] waxed blind … matters Grew blind to physical concerns.

[3] soote Sweet smelling.

[4] [Hoby's note] A mountain between Thessalia and Macedonia where is the sepulcher of Hercules.

Elias:[1] which doubleth grace and happiness in their souls that be worthy to see it, when they forsake this earthly baseness and flee up into heaven. Let us therefore bend all our force and thoughts of soul to this most holy light, that showeth us the way which leadeth to heaven: and after it, putting of the affections we were clad withal at our coming down, let us climb up the stairs, which at the lowermost step have the shadow of sensual beauty, to the high mansion place where the heavenly, amiable and right beauty dwelleth, which lieth hid in the innermost secrets of God, lest unhallowed eyes should come to the sight of it: and there shall we find a most happy end for our desires, true rest for our travails, certain remedy for miseries, a most healthful medicine for sickness, a most sure haven in the troublesome storms of the tempestuous sea of this life.

[70] "What tongue mortal is there then (O most holy love) that can sufficiently praise thy worthiness? Thou most beautiful, most good, most wise, art derived of the unity of heavenly beauty, goodness and wisdom, and therein doeth thou abide, and unto it through it (as in a circle) turnest about. Thou the most sweet bond of the world, a mean betwixt heavenly and earthly things, with a bountiful temper bendest the high virtues to the government of the lower, and turning back the minds of mortal men to their beginning, coolest them with it. Thou with agreement bringest the elements in one, stirrest nature to bring forth, and that, which ariseth and is borne for the succession of the life. Thou bringest severed matters into one, to the unperfect givest perfection, to the unlike likeness, to enmity amity, to the earth fruit, to the sea calmness, to the heaven lively light. Thou art the father of true pleasures, of grace, peace, lowliness and good will, enemy to rude wildness and sluggishness, to be short, the beginning and end of all goodness. And forsomuch as thou delightest to dwell in the flower of beautiful bodies and beautiful souls, I suppose that thy abiding place is now here among us, and from above otherwhile showest thyself a little to the eyes and minds of them that be worthy to see thee. Therefore vouchsafe (Lord) to harken to our prayers, power thyself into our hearts, and with the brightness of thy most holy fire lighten our darkness, and like a trusty guide in this blind maze, show us the right way: reform the falsehood of the senses, and after long wandering in vanity give us the right and sound joy. Make us to smell those spiritual savours that relieve the virtues of the understanding, and to hear the heavenly harmony so tunable, that no discord of passion take place anymore in us. Make us drunken with the bottomless fountain of contentation that always doeth delight, and never giveth fill, and that giveth a smack of the right bliss unto who so drinketh of the running and clear water thereof. Purge with the shining beams of thy light our eyes from misty ignorance, that they may no more set by mortal beauty, and well perceive that the things which at the first they thought themselves to see, be not in deed, and those that they saw not, to be in effect. Accept our souls, that be offered unto thee for a sacrifice. Burn them in the lively flame that wasteth all gross filthiness, that after they be clean sundered from the body, they may be coupled with an everlasting and most sweet bond to the heavenly beauty. And we severed from our selves, may be changed like right lovers into the beloved, and after we be drawn from the earth, admitted to the feast of the angels, where fed with immortal ambrosia and nectar,[2] in the end we may dye a most happy and lively death, as in times past died the fathers of old time, whose souls with most fervent zeal of beholding thou didst hail from the body and coupledst them with God."

[71] When Bembo had hitherto spoken with such vehemence, that a man would have thought him (as it were) ravished and beside himself, he stood still without once moving, holding his eyes toward heaven as astonied, when the Lady Emilia, which together with the rest gave most diligent care to this talk, took him by the plait of his garment and plucking him a little, said: "Take heed (M. Peter) that these thoughts make not your soul also to forsake the body."

"Madam," answered M. Peter, "it should not be the first miracle that love hath wrought in me."

Then the Duchess and all the rest began afresh to be instant upon M. Bembo that he would proceed once more in his talk, and everyone thought he felt in his mind (as it were) a certain sparkle of that godly love that pricked him, and they all coveted to hear farther: but M. Bembo: "My Lords" (quoth he) "I have spoken what the holy fury of love hath (unsought for) indited[1] to me: now that (it seemeth) he inspireth me no more, I wot not[2] what to say. And I think verily that love will not have his secrets discovered and farther, nor that the courtier should pass the degree that his pleasure is I should show him, and therefore it is not perhaps lawful to speak any more in this matter."

---

[1] fiery bush See Exodus 3.2; tongues of fire See Acts 2.3–4; inflamed chariot of Elias See 2 Kings 2.11.

[2] [Hoby's note] The poets feign to be the meat and drink of the Gods [in classical legend].

[72] "Surely," quoth the Duchess, "if the not young courtier be such a one that he can follow this way which you have showed him, of right he ought to be satisfied with so great a happiness, and not to envy the younger."

Then the L. Cesar Gonzaga: "The way" (quoth he) "that leadeth to this happiness is so steep (in my mind) that (I believe) it will be much ado to get to it."

The L. Gaspar said: "I believe it to be hard to get up for men, but impossible for women."

The L. Emilia laughed and said: "If ye fall so often to offend us, I promise you, ye shall be no more forgiven."

The L. Gaspar answered: "It is no offence to you, in saying, that women's souls be not so purged from passions as men's be, nor accustomed in beholdings, as M. Peter hath said, is necessary for them to be, that will taste of the heavenly love. Therefore it is not read that ever woman hath had this grace: but many men have had it, as Plato, Socrates, Plotinus,[3] and many other: and a number of our holy fathers, as Saint Francis,[4] in whom a fervent spirit of love imprinted the most holy seal of the five wounds. And nothing but the virtue of love could hail up Saint Paul the Apostle[5] to the sight of those secrets, which is not lawful for man to speak of: nor show Saint Stephen[6] the heavens open."

Here answered the L. Julian: "In this point men shall nothing pass women, for Socrates himself doeth confess that all the mysteries of love which he knew, were opened unto him by a woman, which was Diotima.[7] And the angel that with the fire of love imprinted the five wounds in Saint Francis, hath also made some women worthy of the same print in our age. You must remember moreover that S. Mary Magdalen[8] had many faults forgiven her, because she loved much: and perhaps with no less grace than Saint Paul, was she many times through angelic love hailed up to the third heaven. And many other (as I showed you yesterday more at large) that for love of the name of Christ have not passed upon life, nor feared torments, nor any other kind of death, how terrible and cruel ever it were. And they were not (as M. Peter will have his courtier to be) aged, but soft and tender maidens, and in the age, when he saith that sensual love ought to be borne withal in men."

The L. Gaspar began to prepare himself to speak, but the Duchess: "Of this" (quoth she) "let M. Peter be judge, and the matter shall stand to his verdict, whether women be not as meet for heavenly love as men. But because the plead between you may happen to be too long, it shall not be amiss to defer it until tomorrow."

"Nay, tonight," quoth the L. Cesar Gonzaga.

"And how can it be tonight?" quoth the Dutchesse.

The L. Cesar answered: "Because it is day already," and showed her the light that began to enter in at the clifts[9] of the windows. Then every man arose upon his feet with much wonder, because they had not thought that the reasonings had lasted longer than the accustomed wont, saving only that they were begun much later, and with their pleasantness had deceived so the Lords minds, that they wist[10] not of the going away of the hours. And not one of them felt any heaviness of sleep in his eyes, the which often happeneth when a man is up after his accustomed hour to go to bed. When the windows then were opened on the side of the palace that hath his prospect toward the high top of Mount Catri, they saw already risen in the east a fair morning like unto the colour of roses, and all stars voided,[1] saving only the sweet governess of the heaven, Venus, which keepeth the bounds of the night and the day, from which appeared to blow a sweet blast, that filling the air with a biting cold, began to quicken the tunable notes of the pretty birds, among the hushing woods of the hills at hand. Whereupon they all, taking their leave with reverence of the Duchess, departed toward their lodgings without torch, the light of the day sufficing.

---

[1] indited Dictated by way of inspiration.

[2] wot not Know not.

[3] Plato, Socrates, Plotinus Ancient Greek philosophers, all of whom considered the subject of love.

[4] Saint Francis St. Francis of Assisi (c. 1182–1226), founder of the Franciscan monastic order. He supposedly received the stigmata, marking the five wounds of Christ on his body.

[5] Paul the Apostle The first gentile apostle, who, after converting to Christianity, preached to other gentiles. His praise of love is in 1 Corinthians 13.

[6] Saint Stephen Considered to be the first martyr of Christianity. Before his death he is reported to have said, "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God" (Acts 7.56).

[7] Diotima In the Symposium, Plato's dialog on love, Socrates' speech is a retelling of a lesson he received from his teacher Diotima of Mantinea, a woman.

[8] Mary Magdalen Woman who was cured by Christ of "seven devils" (Mark 16.9) and became one of his most devoted followers. Many consider her to have been a reformed prostitute, though she is not described in the Bible as such.

[9] clifts Joints or seams.

[10] wist Knew.

And as they were now passing out at the great chamber door, the L. General[2] turned him to the Duchess, and said: "Madam, to take up the variance between the L. Gaspar and the L. Julian, we will assemble this night with the judge sooner than we did yesterday."

The Lady Emilia answered: "Upon condition, that in case my L. Gaspar will accuse women, and give them (as his wont is) some false report, he will also put us in surety to stand to trial,[3] for I reckon him a wavering starter."[4]

—1561

---

[1] all stars voided The sky emptied of stars.

[2] L. General Francesco Maria della Rovere (1490–1538), nephew and adopted heir of Duke Guidobaldo. He was made Prefect of Rome by both Sixtus IV and Julius II.

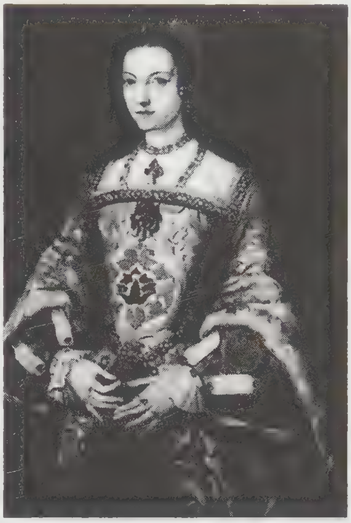
[3] Upon condition … to stand to trial I.e., on the condition that if he is going to make more false accusations against women, he will put up some collateral ("surety") as assurance that he will remain long enough to be tried—to have the accusations put to the test.

[4] wavering starter One whose argument starts with confidence but falters by the end.

LADY JANE GREY

1537 – 1554

Lady Jane Grey's short, tragic life and nine-day reign as Queen of England have provided matter for novels, plays, and films. These events have enough adventure and intrigue to warrant such attention, but the sensational facts often overshadow the writings that provide a window into the young woman's character and into the political conditions under which she lived.



Jane was the eldest child of Lord Henry and Lady Frances Grey, the Duke and Duchess of Suffolk. Born in October 1537 in Bradgate Park, near Leicester, she was raised in the highest aristocratic circles: her maternal grandmother was Mary Tudor, sister of Henry VII and widow of Louis XII of France. As a granddaughter of Henry VII she was in the line of succession to the throne of England after Henry's children Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, a situation complicated by political and religious controversies concerning the legitimacy and hence the rights of Henry's two daughters (Protestants might think Mary born to an invalid union, and Catholics might think Elizabeth illegitimate). Jane's position as a possible heir to the throne proved catastrophic.

Although she was raised in luxury, Jane's life was unhappy. A bookish child, she was not close to her unsympathetic parents, whom she called "sharp and severe." They and other members of the aristocracy saw her as a possible bride for her cousin, Edward VI, who became king at a young age upon the death of Henry VIII in 1547. Edward did not want to marry Jane, however, so her parents betrothed her to Guildford Dudley, the youngest son of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland. Jane tried to refuse the match, but was beaten until she submitted, and was married to Guildford in May 1553 at the age of fifteen. On the urging of her parents, a month after the ceremony she and Guildford consummated their marriage (thus making it legally binding), but the two lived apart.

In July 1553 Jane's life was thrown into chaos. Young Edward VI, who had long been sickly, died before his sixteenth birthday on July 6. A firm Protestant, he did not want his Catholic sister Mary to inherit the throne, so on July 3, three days before he died, he complied with a request by the Duke of Northumberland, Jane's father-in-law and Lord Chamberlain, to name Jane as his successor. Jane opposed the idea at first but finally consented. She was made Queen of England on 10 July 1553, but her coronation was extremely unpopular with the English people, most of whom regarded Mary as the rightful heir. It soon became apparent, moreover, that Jane had been set up as a puppet queen through whom the Duke of Northumberland could rule the country. Mary herself was of course outraged. She declared herself queen on 9 July, as soon as she heard of her brother's death, and raised an army to march on London. Northumberland responded by raising his own army and leaving London to meet Mary's forces in battle. In his absence, his scheme fell apart when the royal council wavered, naming Mary queen instead of Jane. Jane was abandoned by her parents and by Northumberland, who attempted (unsuccessfully) to save his own life by pledging allegiance to Mary and converting to Catholicism. Jane and her husband were charged with treason and imprisoned in the Tower of London.

On 13 November 1553, Jane and Guildford were sentenced to death. Jane expected a pardon from her cousin, Queen Mary, but a revolt in early February 1554 and perhaps an understanding of political necessity hardened the new queen's heart and she signed the couple's death warrants. Mary offered Jane a reprieve if she converted to Catholicism, but the young woman refused, and she was beheaded on 12 February 1554. In his Book of Martyrs (1563), John Foxe quotes her final prayers and conversations and describes her execution, including her pathetic request for help as, blindfolded, she groped for the block on which to lay her head.

Jane's surviving letters and other writings document both her domestic life and taste for learning, as well as her experiences as the "nine days' queen." They vividly show the terror felt by a teenage girl caught up in a political power struggle, but they also show that same girl's remarkable clarity of vision and the firmness with which she held to her own convictions in the face of death.

⌘⌘⌘

Letters

LADY JANE GREY TO HER FATHER[1]

9 February 1554

Father, although it hath pleased God to hasten my death by you, by whom my life should rather have been lengthened;[2] yet can I so patiently take it, that I yield God more hearty thanks for shortening my woeful days, than if the world had been given unto my possession, with life lengthened at my own will, and albeit I am very well assured of your impatient dolours,[3] redoubled in many ways, both in bewailing your own woe, and especially, as I am informed, my woeful state, yet, my dear father, if I may without offence rejoice in my own mishap, herein I may account myself blessed, that, washing my hands with the innocence of my fact, my guiltless blood may cry before the Lord, "Mercy to the innocent."

And yet though I must needs acknowledge that being constrained, and, as you know well enough, continually assayed,[4] yet in taking upon me I seemed to consent, and therein grievously offended the queen and her laws; yet do I assuredly trust that this my offence towards God is so much the less, in that, being in so royal estate as I was, mine enforced honour blended never with mine innocent heart. And thus, good father, I have opened unto you the state wherein I at present stand; my death at hand, although to you perhaps it may seem woeful, yet to me there is nothing that can be more welcome than from this vale of misery to aspire to that heavenly throne of all joy and pleasure, with Christ our Saviour; in whose steadfast faith, if it may be lawful for the daughter so to write to the father, the Lord that hitherto hath so strengthened you, so continue to keep you, that at the last we may meet in heaven with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

I am,
Your obedient daughter till death,
JANE DUDLEY

A LETTER WRITTEN BY THE LADY JANE IN THE END OF THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GREEK, THE WHICH SHE SENT UNTO HER SISTER LADY KATHERINE[5] IMMEDIATELY BEFORE SHE SUFFERED

I have here sent you, good sister Katherine, a book: which although it be not outwardly trimmed with gold, yet inwardly it is more worth than precious stones. It is the book, dear sister, of the law of the Lord. It is His testament and last will, which He bequeathed unto us wretches, which shall lead you to the path of eternal joy. And if you with a good mind read it, and with an earnest mind do follow it, it shall bring you to an immortal and everlasting life. It will teach you to live, and learn you to die. It shall win you more, than you should have gained by the possession of your woeful father's lands. For, as if God had prospered him, you should have inherited his lands, so if you apply diligently this book, seeking to direct your life after it, you shall be an inheritor of such riches, as neither the covetous shall withdraw from you, neither the thief shall steal, neither yet the moths corrupt.

---

[1] Lady Jane Grey to Her Father Here and throughout, the titles given to Grey's writings are those used by John Foxe when they were first published, in Foxe's Book of Martyrs.

[2] by you … lengthened I.e., as his daughter, Jane should have outlived him. He should, she suggests, have nurtured and protected her.

[3] dolours Sorrows, sufferings.

[4] assayed Tried, i.e., experiencing trials.

[5] Greek Refers to the language of the book Jane Grey sends, and not the language in which her letter was written; Katherine Jane's middle sister, born in 1540.

Desire with David,[1] good sister, to understand the law of the Lord your God. Live still[2] to die, that you (by death) may purchase eternal life. And trust not, that the tenderness of your age shall lengthen your life. For as soon (if God call) goeth the young, as the old: and labour always to learn to die, defy the world, deny the devil, and despise the flesh, and delight yourself only in the Lord. Be penitent for your sins, and yet despair not. Be strong in faith, and yet presume not. And desire with Saint Paul, to be dissolved and to be with Christ,[3] with whom even in death there is life. Be like the good servant, and even at midnight be waking, lest when death cometh and stealeth upon you like a thief in the night, you be with the evil servant found sleeping, and lest for lack of oil ye be found like the five foolish women, and like him that had not on the wedding garment, and then ye be cast out from the marriage.[4] Rejoice in Christ, as I trust I do. Follow the steps of your master Christ, and take up your cross, lay your sins on His back, and always embrace Him. And as touching my death, rejoice as I do (good sister) that I shall be delivered of this corruption, and put on incorruption. For I am assured, that I shall for losing of a mortal life, win an immortal life. The which I pray God grant you, send you of His grace to live in His fear, and to die in the true Christian faith: from the which (in God's name) I exhort you, that you never swerve, neither for hope of life, nor fear of death. For if ye will deny His truth to lengthen your life, God will deny you, and yet shorten your days. And if you will cleave[5] to Him, He will prolong your days to your comfort and his glory. To the which glory God bring me now, and you hereafter, when it pleaseth Him to call you. Fare you well (good sister) and put your only trust in God, who only must help you.

—PUBLISHED 1563

A Certain Prayer of the Lady Jane in the Time of Her Trouble

O Lord thou God and Father of my life, hear me poor and desolate woman, which fleeth unto thee only in all troubles and miseries. Thou O Lord art the only defender and deliverer of those that put their trust. And therefore, I, being defiled with sin, encumbered with afflictions, unquieted with troubles, wrapped in cares, overwhelmed with miseries, vexed with temptation, and grievously tormented with the long imprisonment of this vile mass of clay, my sinful body, do come unto Thee, O merciful Saviour, craving Thy mercy and help, without the which so little hope of deliverance is left, that I may utterly despair of my liberty. Albeit, it is expedience, that seeing our life standeth upon trying, we should be visited some time with some adversity, whereby we might both be tried whether we be of Thy flock or no, and also know Thee and ourselves the better: yet Thou that saidst Thou wouldst not suffer us to be tempted above our power, be merciful unto me, now a miserable wretch, I beseech Thee; which, with Solomon, do cry unto Thee, humbly desiring Thee, that I may neither be too much puffed up with prosperity, neither too much depressed with adversity; lest I, being too full, should deny Thee, my God; in being too low brought, should despair and blaspheme Thee, my Lord and Saviour.[6] O merciful God, consider my misery, best known unto Thee; and be Thou now unto me a strong tower of defence, I humbly require Thee. Suffer me not to be tempted above my power, but wither be Thou a deliverer unto me out of this great misery, or else give me grace patiently to bear Thy heavy hand and sharp correction. It was Thy right hand that delivered the people of Israel out of the hands of Pharaoh, which for the space of four hundred years did oppress them, and

---

[1] David Cf. 2 Samuel 11.

[2] still Always.

[3] Saint Paul ... Christ Cf. Philippians 1.23.

[4] good servant ... sleeping Cf. Mark 13.33–37; lack ... women Cf. Matthew 25.1–13; him ... marriage Cf. Matthew 22.1–14 and Luke 14.16–24.

[5] cleave Cling.

[6] Solomon ... Saviour Cf. Proverbs 30.7–9.

keep them in bondage; let it therefore likewise seem good to Thy fatherly goodness, to deliver me, sorrowful wretch, for whom Thy son Christ shed His precious blood on the cross, out of this miserable captivity and bondage, wherein I am now. How long wilt Thou be absent? Forever? Oh, Lord hast Thou forgotten to be gracious, and hast Thou shut up Thy loving kindness in displeasure? Wilt Thou be no more entreated? Is Thy mercy clear gone forever, and Thy promise come utterly to an end forevermore? Why dost Thou make so long tarrying? Shall I despair of Thy mercy? Oh God, far be that from me; I am Thy workmanship, created in Christ Jesus; give me grace therefore to tarry at Thy leisure, and patiently to bear Thy works, assuredly knowing, that as Thou canst, so Thou wilt deliver me, when it shall please Thee, nothing doubting or mistrusting Thy goodness towards me; for Thou knowest better what is good for me than I do; therefore do with me in all things what Thou wilt, and plague me what way Thou wilt. Only, in the meantime, arm me, I beseech Thee, with Thy armour, that I may stand fast, my loins being girded with verity, having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and shod with the shoes prepared by the gospel of peace; above all things, taking to me the shield of faith, wherewith I may be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked; and taking the helmet of salvation, and the sword of Thy spirit, which is Thy most holy word; praying always, with all manner of prayer and supplication, that I may refer myself wholly to Thy will, abiding Thy pleasure, and comforting myself in those troubles that it shall please Thee to send me; seeing such troubles be profitable for me, and seeing I am assuredly persuaded that it cannot but be well all Thou doest. Hear me, O merciful Father, for His sake, whom thou wouldst should be a sacrifice for my sins; to whom with Thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory. Amen!
—1563

Certain Pretty Verses Written by the Said Lady Jane with a Pin

Non aliena putes homini quae obtingere possunt,
Sors hodierna mihi, tunc erit illa tibi.[1]

Do never think it strange,
Though now I have misfortune
For if that fortune change,
The same to thee may happen.
JANE DUDLEY

Deo juvante nil nocet livor malus.
Et non juvante nil juvat labor gravis;
Post tenebras spero lucem.[2]

If God do help thee,
Hate shall not hurt thee.
If God do fail thee,
Then shall not labour prevail thee.
—1563

---

[1] Non … tibi Latin; paraphrased below.

[2] Deo … lucem Again, a paraphrase of the Latin follows.

IN CONTEXT

Lady Jane Grey

from John Foxe, Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days (1563)

In November the Archbishop Cranmer[1] (notwithstanding he had earnestly refused to subscribe to the King's will, in disinheriting his sister Mary, alleging many and pithy reasons for her legitimation) was in the Guildhall of London, arraigned and attainted of high treason, with the Lady Jane, and three of the Duke of Northumberland's sons, which all at the entreaty of certain persons were had again to the Tower.

In this mean while Cardinal Poole[2] being sent for by Queen Mary, was by the Emperor[3] requested to stay with him, to the intent (as some think) that his presence in England should not be a let[4] to the marriage, which he intended between Philip[5] his son and Queen Mary: for the making whereof, he sent a most ample ambassade,[6] with full power to make up the marriage betwixt them: which took such success, that after they had communed of the matter a few days, they knit up the knot.

This was done about the beginning of January, and was very evil taken of the people, and of many of the nobility: who for this and for religion, conspiring among themselves, made a rebellion, whereof Sir Thomas Wyatt,[7] knight, was one of the chief beginners: who being in Kent, said, that the Queen and the counsel would by foreign marriages bring upon this realm most miserable servitude, and establish popish religion. About the 25 of January, news came to London of this stir in Kent, and shortly after of the Duke of Suffolk, who was fled into Warwickshire and Leicestershire, there to gather a power. The Queen, therefore, caused them both with the two Carews of Devonshire to be proclaimed traitors: and sent into Kent against Wyatt, Thomas Duke of Norfolk,[8] who being about Rochester bridge, forsaken of them that went with him, returned safe again to London, without any harm done unto him, and without bloodshed of either party. After the Duke of Norfolk was sent the Earl of Huntington in post, who entering the city of Coventry before the Duke, disappointed[9] him of his purpose. Wherefore the Duke in great distress committed himself to the keeping of a servant of his own in a park, who like a false traitor betrayed him. And so he was brought up to the Tower of London.

In the mean while Peter Carew,[10] hearing of that was done, fled into France: but the other were taken, and Wyatt came towards London in the beginning of February, from whom the Emperor's ambassadors sped themselves away in haste all by water. The Queen, hearing of Wyatt's coming, came into the city into the Guildhall, where she made a vehement oration against Wyatt, declaring that she neither had, not would consent to marry otherwise than should seem to the Council to be for the wealth of the realm. Wherefore she desired them of the city to stick to her in the suppressing of rebellious Traitors, and defending her royal estate.

---

[1] Archbishop Cranmer Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556), Archbishop of Canterbury who, against his better judgment, signed the document making Jane Grey the successor to Edward VI's throne.

[2] Cardinal Poole Reginald Pole (1500–58), Roman Catholic Cardinal and near relative of the Tudor monarchs.

[3] Emperor Charles V (1500–58), Holy Roman Emperor (1519–58), and King of Spain (1516–56).

[4] let Hindrance.

[5] Philip Prince of Spain (1527–98), son of Charles V.

[6] ambassade Emissary and his staff.

[7] Sir Thomas Wyatt Son of the poet famous for developing the English sonnet, Wyatt (1521?–54) organized an armed rebellion against Queen Mary's marriage to Philip of Spain.

[8] Thomas … Norfolk Thomas Howard (1473–1554), leader of Mary's forces against Wyatt.

[9] disappointed Thwarted.

[10] Peter Carew British nobleman (1514?–75) who supported the Wyatt rebellion.

As concerning Wyatt, after that he coming to Southwark could not be received that way into London, returning another way by Kingston with his army, he came up through the streets to Ludgate, whereas returning thence, was resisted at Temple Bar and there apprehended, which was upon Ash Wednesday: at what time at the apprehension of the said Wyatt there was a general pardon by the Herald proclaimed, promising generally pardon of life. Yet that notwithstanding, gallows and gibbets were erected in all parts of the city and suburbs of London to the number of twenty or thereabouts (three being set up in Cheapside). Whereupon, diverse of the captains and soldiers of Wyatt were hanged, and he himself afterward executed at Tower Hill and then quartered, whose head after being set up upon the gallows at Hayhill, was there stolen away, and great search made for the same: concerning whose cause and matter I partly refer them to the English Chronicles, such as list more fully to be satisfied therein, and partly hereafter more shall be touched among other things done in the month of April.

The 12 day of February was beheaded the Lady Jane, to whom was sent Master Fecknam alias Howman,[1] from the Queen, two days before her death, to commune with her, and to reduce[2] her from the doctrine of Christ to Queen Mary's religion, the effect of which communication here followeth.

THE COMMUNICATION HAD BETWEEN THE LADY JANE AND FECKNAM

FECKNAM. Madame, I lament your heavy case,[3] and yet I doubt not but that you bear out this sorrow of yours with a constant and patient mind.

JANE. You are welcome unto me, Sir, if your coming be to give Christian exhortation. And as for my heavy case, (I thank God) I do so little lament it, that rather I accompt[4] the same for a more manifest declaration of God's favour toward me, than ever He showed me any time before. And therefore there is no cause why either you or other which bear me good will, should lament or be grieved with this my case, being a thing so profitable for my soul's health.

FECKNAM. I am here come to you at this present sent from the Queen and her Council, to instruct you in the true doctrine of the right faith: although I have so great confidence in you, that I shall have (I trust) little need to travail with you much therein.

JANE. Forsooth, I heartily thank the Queen's Highness, which is not unmindful of her humble subject: and I hope likewise that you no less will do your duty therein both truly and faithfully, according to that you were sent for.

FECKNAM. What is then required of a Christian?

JANE. That he should believe in God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three persons and one God.

FECKNAM. What? Is there nothing else to be required or looked for in a Christian, but to believe in God?

JANE. Yes, we must believe in Him, we must love Him with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our mind, and our neighbour as ourself.

FECKNAM. Why? Then faith justifieth not, nor saveth not.

---

[1] Fecknam ... Howman John de Feckenham (1515?–85), prominent clergyman sent to give spiritual counsel to Jane Grey in the final hours before her execution.

[2] reduce Restore (to Catholicism).

[3] case Circumstance.

[4] accompt Account.

JANE. Yes verily, faith (as Saint Paul[1] sayeth) only justifieth.

FECKNAM. Why? Saint Paul sayeth, if I have all faith without love, it is nothing.

JANE. True it is, for how can I love him, whom I trust not, or how can I trust him whom I love not? Faith and love goeth both together, and yet love is comprehended in faith.

FECKNAM. How shall we love our neighbour?

JANE. To love our neighbour, is to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, and give drink to the thirsty, and to do to him as we would do to ourselves.

FECKNAM. Why? Then it is necessary unto salvation to do good works also, and it is not sufficient only to believe.[2]

JANE. I deny that, and I affirm that faith only saveth, but it is mete[3] for a Christian, in token that he doth follow his master Christ, to do good works: yet may we not say that they profit to salvation. For when we have done all, yet we be unprofitable servants, and faith only in Christ's blood saveth.

FECKNAM. How many sacraments are there?

JANE. Two. The one, the sacrament of Baptism, and the other the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

FECKNAM. No, there are seven.[4]

JANE. By what scripture find ye that?

FECKNAM. Well, we will talk of that hereafter, but what is signified by your two sacraments?

JANE. By the sacrament of Baptism, I am washed with water, and regenerated by the spirit, and that washing is a token to me that I am the child of God. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper offered unto me, is a sure seal and testimony that I am by the blood of Christ, which He shed for me on the cross, made partaker of the everlasting Kingdom.

FECKNAM. Why? What do you receive in that sacrament? Do you not receive the very body and blood of Christ?

JANE. No surely I do not so believe. I think that in the supper, I neither receive flesh nor blood, but only bread and wine:[5] which bread when it is broken, and the wine when it is drunken, putteth me in remembrance how that for my sins the body of Christ was broken, and His blood shed on the cross. And with that bread and wine I receive the benefits that cometh by the breaking of His body, and shedding of His blood for our sins on the cross.

FECKNAM. Why? Doth not Christ speak these words: "Take, eat, this is my body?"[6] Require we any plainer words? Doth He not say it is his body?

JANE. I grant He sayeth so: and so He sayeth I am the vine, I am the door,[7] but He is never the more for that the door nor the vine. Doth not Saint Paul say that He calleth things that are not, as though they were? [8] God forbid that I should say that I eat the very natural body or blood of Christ. For then either I should pluck away my redemption, either else there were two bodies, or two Christs, or else twelve bodies. One body was tormented on the cross. And then if they did eat another body: then either He had two bodies, either else if His body were eaten, then it was not broken upon the cross: or else if it were broken upon the cross, it was not eaten of His disciples.

---

[1] Saint Paul The Apostle Paul, author of a number of epistles in the new Testament, spread Christian teachings and helped unite congregations of Christians into a unified Church.

[2] good works … believe The primacy of faith vs good works in the salvation of the soul was a major point of contention between Protestants and Catholics.

[3] mete Appropriate, fitting.

[4] seven Catholicism recognizes seven sacraments: Baptism, Confirmation, Confession, the Eucharist, Marriage, Holy Orders, and Last Rites.

[5] the supper … wine This refers to the Protestant denial of transubstantiation (the Catholic belief that the bread and wine of communion physically become the body and blood of Christ when consecrated). Protestant belief varied, with Lutherans affirming Christ's "real presence" in the bread and wine and Calvinists claiming they are sacramental signs only.

[6] Take … body Cf. Mark 14.22.

[7] I am … door Cf. John 10.9 and 15.1–10.

[8] He calleth … were Cf. Romans 4.17.

FECKNAM. Why? Is it not as possible that Christ by his power could make His body both to be eaten and broken, as to be borne of a woman without seed of a man, and as to walk upon the sea having a body, and other such like miracles as He wrought by His power only?

JANE. Yes verily: if God would have done at His supper any miracle He might have done so: but I say that then He minded no work nor miracle, but only to break His body, and shed His blood on the cross for our sins. But I pray you answer me to this one question: where was Christ when He said, "Take, eat, this is my body?" was He not at table when He said so? He was at that time alive, and suffered not till the next day. Well, what took He but bread, what brake[1] He but bread, and what gave He but bread? Look what He took, He brake, and look what He brake He gave, and look what He gave, they did eat, and yet all this while He Himself was alive and at supper before His disciples, or else they were deceived.

FECKNAM. You ground your faith upon such authors as say and unsay both with a breath, and not upon the church to whom ye ought to give credit.

JANE. No, I ground my faith on God's word, and not upon the church, for if the church be a good church, the faith of the church must be tried by God's word, and not God's word by the church, neither yet my faith. Shall I believe the church because of antiquity, or shall I give credit to the church that taketh away from me the half part of the Lord's Supper, and will not let any layman receive it in both kinds but themselves: which thing if they deny to us, then deny they to us part of our salvation? And I say that is an evil church, and not the spouse of Christ, but the spouse of the devil that altereth the Lord's Supper, and both taketh from it and addeth to it. To that church (say I) God will add plagues, and from that church will he take their part out of the book of life. Do they learn that of St. Paul when he ministered to the Corinthians in both kinds? Shall I believe this church? God forbid.

FECKNAM. That was done for a good intent of the church, to avoid an heresy that sprung on it.

JANE. Why shall the church alter God's will and ordinance for a good intent? How did King Saul?[2] God the Lord defend.

With these and such like persuasions he would have had her lean to the church, but it would not be. There were many more things whereof they reasoned, but these were the chiefest.

These words following were spoken openly.

After this Fecknam took his leave saying that he was sorry for her. "For I am sure," quoth he, "that we two shall never meet."

JANE. "True it is," said she, "that we shall never meet, except[3] God turn your heart. For I am assured, unless you repent and turn to God, ye are in an evil case: and I pray God in the bowels of His mercy to send you His holy spirit, for He hath given you His great gift of utterance, if it please Him to open the eyes of your heart."

---

[1] brake Broke.

[2] King Saul King of Israel who persecuted David, violated God's commandments, and had his kingdom taken away.

[3] except Unless.

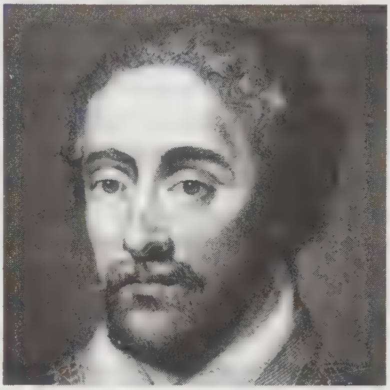
EDMUND SPENSER

1552? – 1599



Edmund Spenser has consistently been accorded a special place in the history of English literature. In the seventeenth century John Milton, as much impressed by The Faerie Queene's subtle treatment of the moral virtues as by its aesthetic charm, called him "our sage and serious Spenser, whom I dare to name a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas." In the nineteenth, Wordsworth wrote of "Sweet Spenser, moving through his clouded heaven / With the moon's beauty and the moon's soft pace." And in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries poets and critics have continued to hold Spenser and The Fairie Queene in extraordinarily high regard.

Spenser's career as a servant of the Crown was less glorious. He was not the moping failure some have thought him (he had steady work in Ireland helping the English govern its often rebellious and resentful population), but in England he was never the courtier that he seems to have wanted to be. His bid for more direct royal patronage was the first part of The Faerie Queene (1590). This is an allegorical epic poem with debts to Virgil, elements of Arthurian and Italian epic or romance, traces of medieval pilgrimage allegory, Chaucerian moments, and passages indebted to a range of other genres from the fabliau to the pastoral. The central if often absent figure is Prince Arthur, the future British king, who is seeking the always absent heroine, Gloriana, queen of Fairyland and an allegorical "mirror," Spenser told his friend Sir Walter Ralegh in a letter published at the end of the volume, of Queen Elizabeth in her public role as ruler. Modern scholars may perceive veiled criticisms of Elizabeth in the poetry, but the queen either did not notice or thought it wise to read the epic as purely complimentary, so she gave the author a generous yearly pension of fifty pounds.

Little is known with any certainty of Spenser's early life, although his writings provide some information. He was born, probably in London, to parents of modest means, and it was as an "impoverished" student that he entered the Merchant Taylors' School, headed by the scholar Richard Mulcaster, remembered today for his impassioned defense of the English language. There Spenser studied Latin, Greek, and possibly Hebrew; he also learned French and Italian. From there he went to Pembroke Hall (now Pembroke College) at Cambridge University, where he was registered as a "sizar," a poor student who was required to work for his keep, earning his bachelor's degree in 1573 and his M.A. in 1576. While at Pembroke, Spenser made friends with Gabriel Harvey, soon to be a prominent Cambridge don, who introduced him to useful patrons and whose correspondence with the young poet demonstrates a shared interest in poetic theory, genres, and metrics.

In 1579 Spenser produced his first significant, if pseudonymous, publication, The Shepheardes Calender, a set of illustrated pastoral poems for each month of the year and written, says a prefatory poem, by one "Immerito." The work, dedicated to Philip Sidney, comes with a preface and annotations by the still unidentified "E.K." In this innovative work, which saw a number of editions, Spenser exploits a genre that hearkened back to Theocritus and Virgil in the third and first centuries BCE but that had since added the potential for religious and political commentary because of the Christian associations of "pastor" and "flock." The book's presentation is fashionably Continental and the metrical variation innovative, yet the language is deliberately old-fashioned, reminiscent of Chaucer and with a name for the protagonist—Colin Clout—taken from the work of an earlier poet, John Skelton.

In that same year, 1579, Spenser was in the service, as secretary, of the Earl of Leicester, an important royal advisor and at one point suitor to Queen Elizabeth. There he would have met Sidney, Leicester's nephew, and Edward Dyer, both poets and both eventually knighted, whose friendship, or at least notice, would have seemed valuable. Sidney may have helped Spenser later gain an appointment as secretary to Lord Grey, the Lord Deputy of Ireland. It is not quite clear how Spenser regarded Grey's brutality against the Spanish troops who supported the Irish rebels, but his later tract, A Vewe of the Present State of Ireland (printed 1633—see the anthology's online component, Literature in Ireland, Gaelic Scotland, and Wales for excerpts), whatever the ambiguities of its dialogue form and a few residual doubts about its authorship, displays little regard for the Irish and even less for the insurgents. After Grey was recalled to England, Spenser remained in Ireland and continued to work as a civil servant, gaining considerable acreage and a small castle.

In 1589 Spenser traveled with Sir Walter Ralegh to England, where in 1590 he published the first three books of The Faerie Queene, on which he had been working for about a decade. Politically as well as poetically motivated, this Protestant, but hardly "Puritan," epic creates a romance world filled with monsters, giants, knights, and enchanters, allegorical personifications who enact a subtle, complex, and often elusive interplay between the Aristotelian or Christian virtues and their enemies, both those active out in the world and those operating within the leading figures' own souls. According to his letter to Ralegh, Spenser hoped to write twelve books, but only six were completed (the second set being published in the 1596 edition): the "legends" of holiness, temperance, chastity, friendship, justice, and courtesy, as well as a fragment on "Mutabilitie." Spenser won his pension, but Elizabeth's patronage seems to have gone no further, perhaps because his satirical "Mother Hubberds Tale," included in his Complaints (1591), angered the authorities.

In between the first and second installments of The Faerie Queene Spenser published his Complaints, a collection of poems; Colin Clouts Come Home Againe (1595), a sometimes satirical anti-court pastoral; Astrophel, an elegy for Philip Sidney (1596); and Amoretti and Epithalamion (1595), sonnets that commemorate Spenser's courtship of Elizabeth Boyle, followed by a magnificently stately marriage hymn celebrating their wedding. The sonnets, which depart from the Petrarchan tradition of adulterous or futile desire, are structured by allusions to the liturgical year; the twenty-four stanzas of the "Epithalamion" allude to the day (June 11, then the summer solstice), and its 365 long lines recall the year.

In 1597 Spenser became Sheriff of Cork, but later that year Irish rebels ransacked and burned his castle. He returned to London carrying dispatches for the Privy Council, but his time there was to be short. He died early in 1599 and is buried in Westminster Abbey, next to Chaucer. A memorial erected in 1620 reads, in part, "Heare lyes … the body of Edmond Spencer, the prince of poets in his tyme; whose divine spirit needs noe other witnesse then the works which he left behinde him."

⌘⌘⌘

The Faerie Queene

In a letter to his friend Sir Walter Ralegh, Spenser writes that his unfinished Faerie Queene aimed to "fashion" a gentleman or noble person who would combine the virtues represented by twelve knightly heroes. In his epic poem, each of the books features one of these knights, who represents a virtue and who struggles to fight the specific vices that threaten his quest. The hero of Book 1's "Legend of Holinesse," is Saint George (the Redcrosse Knight), patron saint of England and, with God's help, slayer of a satanic dragon that has been threatening a royal family and its kingdom, Eden. In the legend as it came down to Spenser, George rescues the royal maiden and the kingdom by defeating the dragon but then leaves, soon to be martyred. In Spenser's Protestant version, however, the knight will marry the princess, Una (representing the One, the Truth, and the True Church), although not until his earthly service to the Fairy Queen, Gloriana (who represents, among other things, Queen Elizabeth), is finished. Then, at the end of human time, the marriage of Christ and his Church can be completed.

The somewhat chilly hero of Book 2 is Sir Guyon, Knight of Temperance, who with the intermittent guidance of a Palmer (usually a religious figure, but here signifying rectified reason) seeks not so much a middle way as a dynamic mixture of positive and negative energies, fire and water, excess and lack—a mixture that parallels the healthy body's balance of elements and the cosmos's own tense harmony. The villain is the seductively beautiful but murderous Acrasia ("Excess") who, like Homer's Circe, turns men to beasts. After a journey recalling that of Odysseus, Guyon arrives at her island, a pseudo-paradise of sensuous but sterile pleasures and largely artificial beauty.

The Garden of Adonis is the Bower's parallel and correction, made beautiful by Nature's own art. To this garden will come the lovely Amoret to be raised by Venus in "goodly womanhed." The Garden is the center, structurally and conceptually, of Book 3, the Legend of Chastity. For Spenser, Chastity (represented by the armed lady knight, Britomart) is an energetic love that embraces a sexuality culminating in faithful marriage. In Book 3's last two cantos Britomart sets out to liberate Amoret from the enchanter Busirane, who holds her in a house furnished with artworks and a procession illustrating what many see as literary and mythical eros, not the genuine love of faithful spouses. Rescued, Amoret and her beloved Scudamore embrace, although in the 1596 edition Spenser undoes that moment so he can send the pair on more adventures. After Book 4, on friendship, comes the Book of Justice, starring Britomart's beloved Sir Artegall. One challenge to Justice is offered by "The Equality Giant," as he is now often called, who demands the abolition of private property and a return to humanity's primal equality. The scene has provoked debate on Spenser's attitude toward the longing, felt by some radicals in his day, to restore a supposedly lost social and economic justice. In all the books, the epic's chief hero is Prince Arthur, a Briton who is in love with Gloriana and who will, in Spenser's version of the tale, establish the royal line from which will eventually derive the Welsh Tudor dynasty.

Book 1 derives from a saint's legend, a genre that many Protestants contemptuously dismissed as medieval and Catholic. It is also a dynastic epic, as loosely defined in the Renaissance: its opening lines signal Spenser's aims, and his ambition to be a national poet, through paraphrasing the canceled start of Virgil's Aeneid and the opening of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. Spenser takes his structure of twelve books, each consisting of twelve cantos, from Virgil's Aeneid, but his rhyme scheme is distinctly his own. Each nine-line stanza (later referred to as the Spenserian stanza) consists of eight lines of iambic pentameter and a final line of iambic hexameter (an alexandrine) with an interlocking rhyme scheme (ababbcbcc). Structurally, the poem follows a pattern set by St. Bernard of Clairvaux 1090–1153) in a sermon that allegorizes the parable of the Prodigal Son: a young man on an impatient horse journeys with a number of personifications through Error, to Pride, to Despair, and finally to a house where he recovers and is ready for Heaven. Spenser also borrows heavily from Ariosto, Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, Virgil, Chaucer, Arthurian legend, and Tudor anti-Catholic polemic, so that the poem incorporates epic, romance, legend, personification allegory, satire, and pastoral. The Bible figures too, for the narrative moves from a besieged Eden through a fall into error and eventually by way of a victory over the old dragon Satan to the promise of the New Jerusalem and the union of God and humanity at the end of time. George's very name, from the Greek for farmer, or "earth-worker," parallels that of Adam (Hebrew for "red earth"), because the Legend of Holinesse also narrates the conversion by God's grace of earthy flesh into Saint George of "merry" England.

Book 1 also allegorizes England's loss of the true Church to Catholicism—just when this had occurred, historically, was a matter of debate at the time, and Spenser is not clear on that point—and its recovery under the Protestant Tudors. In this regard, Spenser's poem exemplifies the anti-Catholicism common in his time and place. Yet he also incorporates a number of Catholic touches, from the hermit who instructs Redcrosse to elements of the Catholic Easter Eve liturgy that deepen the concluding betrothal ceremony. Indeed, in recent years Spenser has seemed less urgently Protestant, and although there can be no doubt that he feared and detested the might of Catholic Spain (allegorized by the giant Orgoglio) and what he saw as the mendaciously seductive powers of the Papacy (allegorized by the magician Archimago and the witch Duessa), his theology has been read as less rigidly Calvinist, with at least a little more room for a free human will than strict Protestants would have liked, and with an acceptance of formal and communal ceremony that would make radical Puritans wince.

In recent years, then, Spenser's moral and religious understanding has come to seem more flexible. Similarly, his treatment of the virtues that his knightly heroes represent has been seen as less illustrative or demonstrative and more interrogative or exploratory. In all the books, even Book 1 (which deals with a virtue hard to live by but easy for readers to value), Spenser is willing to show the problems and paradoxes attendant upon the six virtues he examines: holiness, temperance, chastity, friendship, justice, and courtesy. Although few at his time would deny the virtue of holiness, Spenser can still suggest that it might need, or lead to, the other virtues, and when he comes to the remaining five he is willing to show their limits and their need of correction by yet others. In all cases his knights, and especially the usually less than brilliant St. George, make terrible mistakes. Through these knights' errors Spenser implies that we live in a world that makes virtuous action difficult because perceiving what is good, or even simply knowing what is going on, is often harder than wanting to be good. Spenser's readers may (and perhaps should) find his allegory confusing, but his knights are usually just as confused. Eventually both hero and reader realize what is happening, but each experiences the error and puzzlement that, for Spenser, characterize human life.

The first three books of The Faerie Queene were published in 1590 with an appended letter to Sir Walter Ralegh in which Spenser outlines his designs for the epic; some modern editions print it as a preface and others, including this anthology, as the "annex" Spenser himself called it.

from The Faerie Queene

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE FAERIE QUEENE CONTAYNING THE LEGENDE OF THE KNIGHT OF THE RED CROSSE, OR OF HOLINESSE

1

Lo I the man, whose Muse[1] whilome° did maske, formerly
As time her taught, in lowly Shepheards weeds,° garments
Am now enforst a far unfitter taske,
For trumpets sterne to chaunge mine Oaten reeds,[2]
And sing of Knights and Ladies gentle° deeds; noble
Whose prayses having slept in silence long,
Me, all too meane,° the sacred Muse areeds° common / advises
To blazon° broad° emongst her learned throng: proclaim / abroad
Fierce warres and faithfull loves shall moralize my song.

2

Helpe then, O holy Virgin chiefe of nine,
Thy weaker° Novice to performe thy will, weak
Lay forth out of thine everlasting scryne[3]
The antique rolles, which there lye hidden still,
Of Faerie knights and fairest Tanaquill,[4]
Whom that most noble Briton Prince° so long Arthur
Sought through the world, and suffered so much ill,
That I must rue his undeservèd wrong:
O helpe thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong.

---

[1] Muse One of the nine goddesses who preside over the arts and sciences. In line 10 it seems that Spenser is referring either to Clio, the Muse of history, or Calliope, the Muse of epic.

[2] Oaten reeds I.e, the shepherd's pipe, the symbol of pastoral poetry. Spenser exchanges these pipes for the trumpet, the symbol of heroic poetry.

[3] scryne Chest for valuables, especially sacred objects such as saints' relics.

[4] Tanaquill I.e., Gloriana, a symbolic representation of Queen Elizabeth I.

3

And thou most dreaded impe° of highest Jove,[1] child
Faire Venus sonne, that with thy cruell dart
At that good knight so cunningly didst rove,° shoot
That glorious fire it kindled in his hart,
Lay now thy deadly Heben° bow apart, ebony
And with thy mother milde come to mine ayde:
Come both, and with you bring triumphant Mart,[2]
In loves and gentle jollities arrayd,
After his murdrous spoiles and bloudy rage allayd.

4

And with them eke,° O Goddesse heavenly bright, also Mirrour of grace and Majestie divine,
Great Lady of the greatest Isle, whose light
Like Phoebus lampe[3] throughout the world doth shine,
Shed thy faire beames into my feeble eyne,° eyes
And raise my thoughts too humble and too vile,
To thinke of that true glorious type[4] of thine,
The argument° of mine afflicted° stile:° topic / humble / work
The which to heare, vouchsafe, O dearest dred[5] a-while.

CANTO I

The Patron of true Holinesse,
Foule Errour doth defeate:
Hypocrisie him to entrappe,
Doth to his home entreate.

1

A Gentle Knight was pricking° on the plaine, galloping
Y cladd in mightie armes and silver shielde,
Wherein old dints of deepe wounds did remaine,
The cruell markes of many a bloudy fielde;
Yet armes till that time did he never wield:[6]
His angry steede did chide his foming bitt,
As much disdayning to the curbe to yield:
Full jolly° knight he seemd, and faire did sitt, handsome
As one for knightly giusts° and fierce encounters fitt. jousts

2

But on his brest a bloudie Crosse he bore,
The deare remembrance of his dying Lord,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he wore,
And dead as living ever him ador'd:
Upon his shield the like was also scor'd,
For soveraine° hope, which in his helpe he had: greatest
Right faithfull true he was in deede and word,
But of his cheere° did seeme too solemne sad;° demeanor serious
Yet nothing did he dread, but ever was ydrad.° dreaded

3

Upon a great adventure he was bond,
That greatest Gloriana to him gave,
That greatest Glorious Queene of Faerie lond,
To winne him worship,° and her grace to have, renown
Which of all earthly things he most did crave;
And ever as he rode, his hart did earne° yearn
To prove his puissance° in battell brave strength
Upon his foe, and his new force to learne;
Upon his foe, a Dragon horrible and stearne.

4

A lovely Ladie rode him faire beside,
Upon a lowly Asse more white then snow,
Yet she much whiter, but the same did hide
Under a vele, that wimpled° was full low, folded
And over all a blacke stole she did throw,
As one that inly mournd: so was she sad,
And heavie sat upon her palfrey slow:
Seemèd in heart some hidden care she had,
And by her in a line a milke white lambe she lad.

5

So pure and innocent, as that same lambe,
She was in life and every vertuous lore,
And by descent from Royall lynage came
Of ancient Kings and Queenes, that had of yore
Their scepters stretcht from East to Westerne shore,

---

[1] And thou … Jove Here Cupid is the son of Jove, Roman King of the gods, and Venus, goddess of beauty and love. Cupid's father is sometimes said to be Hermes or Mars rather than Jove.

[2] Mart Mars, god of war and one of Venus's lovers.

[3] Phoebus lampe I.e., the sun (Phoebus Apollo is god of the sun).

[4] that … type Gloriana.

[5] dred Object of reverence.

[6] Y cladd … wield The knight wears the "whole armor of God" (Ephesians 13–17), worn by those who struggle against sin. Though the armor itself bears marks from many battles, this particular knight has never fought in it before.

And all the world in their subjection held;
Till that infernall feend with foule uprore
Forwasted° all their land, and them expeld: lay waste
Whom to avenge, she had this Knight from far compeld.

6

Behind her farre away a Dwarfe did lag,
That lasie seemd in being ever last,
Or wearied with bearing of her bag
Of needments at his backe. Thus as they past,
The day with cloudes was suddeine overcast,
And angry Jove an hideous storme of raine
Did poure into his Lemans lap[1] so fast,
That every wight° to shrowd° it did constrain,° creature / cover impel
And this faire couple eke to shroud themselves were fain.° eager

7

Enforst to seeke some covert° nigh at hand, shelter
A shadie grove not far away they spide,
That promist ayde° the tempest to withstand: aid
Whose loftie trees yclad with sommers pride,
Did spred so broad, that heavens light did hide,
Not perceable[2] with power of any starre:
And all within were pathes and alleies wide,
With footing worne, and leading inward farre:
Faire harbour that them seemes; so in they entred arre.

8

And foorth they passe, with pleasure forward led,
Joying to heare the birdes sweete harmony,
Which therein shrouded from the tempest dred,
Seemd in their song to scorne the cruell sky.
Much can° they prayse the trees so straight and hy, did
The sayling Pine, the Cedar proud and tall,
The vine-prop Elme, the Poplar never dry,
The builder Oake, sole king of forrests all,
The Aspine good for staves, the Cypresse funerall.

9

The Laurell, meed° of mightie Conquerours reward
And Poets sage, the Firre that weepeth[3] still,° continuously
The Willow worne of forlorne Paramours,
The Eugh° obedient to the benders will, yew
The Birch for shaftes,° the Sallow for the mill, lances
The Mirrhe sweete bleeding in the bitter wound,
The warlike Beech, the Ash for nothing ill,
The fruitfull Olive, and the Platane° round, plane-tree
The carver Holme,° the Maple seeldom inward sound. holly

10

Led with delight, they thus beguile the way,
Untill the blustring storme is overblowne;
When weening° to returne, whence they did stray, expecting
They cannot finde that path, which first was showne,
But wander too and fro in wayes unknowne,
Furthest from end then, when they neerest weene,
That makes them doubt, their wits be not their owne:
So many pathes, so many turnings seene,
That which of them to take, in diverse doubt they been.

11

At last resolving forward still to fare,
Till that some end they finde or in or out,
That path they take, that beaten seemd most bare,
And like to lead the labyrinth about;° out from
Which when by tract they hunted had throughout,
At length it brought them to a hollow cave,
Amid the thickest woods. The Champion stout
Eftsoones° dismounted from his courser brave, soon afterwards
And to the Dwarfe a while his needlesse spere he gave.

12

Be well aware, quoth then that Ladie milde,
Least suddaine mischiefe ye too rash provoke:
The danger hid, the place unknowne and wilde,
Breedes dreadfull doubts: Oft fire is without smoke,
And perill without show: therefore your stroke
Sir knight with-hold, till further triall made.
Ah Ladie (said he) shame were to revoke° withdraw
The forward footing for° an hidden shade: because of Vertue gives her selfe light, through darkenesse for to wade.

---

[1] his Lemans lap His beloved's lap; i.e., the earth.

[2] perceable Able to be perceived.

[3] weepeth I.e., by exuding resin.

13

Yea but (quoth she) the perill of this place
I better wot° then you, though now too late know
To wish you backe returne with foule disgrace,
Yet wisedome warnes, whilest foot is in the gate,
To stay the steppe, ere forcèd to retrate.
This is the wandring wood, this Errours den,
A monster vile, whom God and man does hate:
Therefore I read° beware. Fly fly (quoth then declare
The fearefull Dwarfe:) this is no place for living men.

14

But full of fire and greedy hardiment,° daring
The youthfull knight could not for ought be staide,
But forth unto the darksome hole he went,
And looked in: his glistring armor made
A litle glooming light, much like a shade,
By which he saw the ugly monster plaine,
Halfe like a serpent horribly displaide,
But th'other halfe did womans shape retaine,
Most lothsom, filthie, foule, and full of vile disdaine.° loathsomeness

15

And as she lay upon the durtie ground,
Her huge long taile her den all overspred,
Yet was in knots and many boughtes° upwound, coils
Pointed with mortall sting. Of her there bred
A thousand yong ones, which she dayly fed,
Sucking upon her poisonous dugs, each one
Of sundry shapes, yet all ill favorèd:
Soone as that uncouth° light upon them shone, unfamiliar
Into her mouth they crept, and suddain all were gone.

16

Their dam° upstart, out of her den effraide,° mother / alarmed
And rushèd forth, hurling her hideous taile
About her cursèd head, whose folds displaid
Were stretcht now forth at length without entraile.° coil
She lookt about, and seeing one in mayle
Armèd to point,° sought backe to turne againe; completely
For light she hated as the deadly bale,° injury
Ay° wont° in desert darknesse to remaine, ever / accustomed
Where plaine° none might her see, nor she see any plaine. plainly

17

Which when the valiant Elfe[1] perceiv'd, he lept
As Lyon fierce upon the flying pray,
And with his trenchand° blade her boldly kept cutting
From turning backe, and forcèd her to stay:
Therewith enrag'd she loudly gan to bray,
And turning fierce, her speckled taile advaunst,
Threatning her angry sting, him to dismay:° defeat
Who nought aghast, his mightie hand° enhaunst: raised up
The stroke down from her head vnto her shoulder glaunst.

18

Much daunted with that dint, her sence was dazd,
Yet kindling rage, her selfe she gathered round,
And all attonce° her beastly body raizd at once
With doubled forces high above the ground:
Tho° wrapping up her wrethèd° sterne arownd, then / coiled
Lept fierce upon his shield, and her huge traine° tail
All suddenly about his body wound,
That hand or foot to stirre he strove in vaine:
God helpe the man so wrapt in Errours endlesse traine.

19

His Lady sad to see his sore constraint,
Cride out, Now now Sir knight, shew what ye bee,
Add faith unto your force, and be not faint:
Strangle her, else she sure will strangle thee.
That when he heard, in great perplexitie,
His gall° did grate for griefe and high disdaine,° spirit anger
And knitting all his force got one hand free,
Wherewith he grypt her gorge with so great paine,
That soone to loose her wicked bands did her constraine.

20

Therewith she spewd out of her filthy maw° mouth
A floud of poyson horrible and blacke,
Full of great lumpes of flesh and gobbets raw,

---

[1] valiant Elfe I.e., the Redcrosse Knight (who is from Fairyland, and not yet discovered to be English).

Which stunck so vildly,° that it forst him slacke vilely
His grasping hold, and from her turne him backe:
Her vomit full of bookes and papers was,[1]
With loathly frogs and toades, which eyes did lacke,
And creeping sought way in the weedy gras:
Her filthy parbreake° all the place defilèd has. vomit

21

As when old father Nilus° gins to swell Nile river
With timely° pride above the Aegyptian vale, seasonal
His fattie° waves do fertile slime outwell,° rich / gush forth
And overflow each plaine and lowly dale:
But when his later spring gins to avale,° subside
Huge heapes of mudd he leaves, wherein there breed
Ten thousand kindes of creatures, partly male
And partly female of his fruitfull seed;
Such ugly monstrous shapes elswhere may no man reed.° see

22

The same so sore annoyèd has the knight,
That welnigh chokèd with the deadly stinke,
His forces faile, ne can no longer fight.
Whose corage when the feend perceiv'd to shrinke,
She pourèd forth out of her hellish sinke
Her fruitfull cursèd spawne of serpents small,
Deformèd monsters, fowle, and blacke as inke,
Which swarming all about his legs did crall,
And him encombred sore, but could not hurt at all.

23

As gentle Shepheard in sweete even-tide,
When ruddy Phoebus gins to welke° in west, set
High on an hill, his flocke to vewen wide,
Markes° which do byte their hasty supper best; notes
A cloud of combrous gnattes do him molest,
All striving to infixe their feeble stings,
That from their noyance he no where can rest,
But with his clownish° hands their tender wings rustic
He brusheth oft, and oft doth mar their murmurings.

24

Thus ill bestedd,° and fearefull more of shame, situated
Then of the certaine perill he stood in,
Halfe furious unto his foe he came,
Resolv'd in minde all suddenly to win,
Or soone to lose, before he once would lin;° cease
And strooke at her with more then manly force,
That from her body full of filthie sin
He raft° her hatefull head without remorse; cut off
A streame of cole black bloud forth gushed from her corse.

25

Her scattred brood, soone as their Parent deare
They saw so rudely° falling to the ground, violently
Groning full deadly, all with troublous feare,
Gathred themselves about her body round,
Weening° their wonted entrance to have found believing
At her wide mouth: but being there withstood
They flockèd all about her bleeding wound,
And suckèd up their dying mothers blood,
Making her death their life, and eke her hurt their good.

26

That detestable sight him much amazde,
To see th'unkindly Impes° of heaven accurst, unnatural offspring
Devoure their dam; on whom while so he gazd,
Having all satisfide their bloudy thurst,
Their bellies swolne he saw with fulnesse burst,
And bowels gushing forth: well worthy end
Of such as drunke her life, the which them nurst;
Now needeth him no lenger labour spend,
His foes have slaine themselves, with whom he should contend.

27

His Ladie seeing all, that chaunst, from farre
Approcht in hast to greet his victorie,
And said, Faire knight, borne under happy starre,
Who see your vanquisht foes before you lye:
Well worthy be you of that Armorie,° armor
Wherein ye have great glory wonne this day,
And proov'd your strength on a strong enimie,
Your first adventure: many such I pray,
And henceforth ever wish, that like succeed it may.

28

Then mounted he upon his Steede againe,
And with the Lady backward sought to wend;° travel

---

[1] Her vomit … was I.e., works of Roman Catholic propaganda.

That path he kept, which beaten was most plaine,
Ne ever would to any by-way bend,
But still did follow one unto the end,
The which at last out of the wood them brought.
So forward on his way (with God to° frend°) as / friend
He passèd forth, and new adventure sought;
Long way he travellèd, before he heard of ought.

29

At length they chaunst to meet upon the way
An agèd Sire, in long blacke weedes yclad,
His feete all bare, his beard all hoarie gray,
And by his belt his booke he hanging had;
Sober he seemde, and very sagely sad,° serious
And to the ground his eyes were lowly bent,
Simple in shew, and voyde of malice bad,
And all the way he prayèd, as he went,
And often knockt his brest, as one that did repent.

30

He faire the knight saluted, louting° low, bowing
Who faire him quited,° as that courteous was: returned
And after askèd him, if he did know
Of straunge adventures, which abroad did pas.
Ah my deare Sonne (quoth he) how should, alas,
Silly° old man, that lives in hidden cell, simple
Bidding his beades[1] all day for his trespas,
Tydings of warre and worldly trouble tell?
With holy father sits not with such things to mell.° meddle

31

But if of daunger which hereby doth dwell,
And homebred evill ye desire to heare,
Of a straunge man I can you tidings tell,
That wasteth all this countrey farre and neare.
Of such (said he) I chiefly do inquere,
And shall you well reward to shew the place,
In which that wicked wight his dayes doth weare:° spend
For to all knighthood it is foule disgrace,
That such a cursèd creature lives so long a space.

32

Far hence (quoth he) in wastfull° wildernesse barren
His dwelling is, by which no living wight
May ever passe, but thorough great distresse.
Now (sayd the Lady) draweth toward night,
And well I wote,° that of your later° fight know / recent
Ye all forwearied be: for what so strong,
But wanting rest will also want of might?
The Sunne that measures heaven all day long,
At night doth baite° his steedes the Ocean refresh
waves emong.

33

Then with the Sunne take Sir, your timely rest,
And with new day new worke at once begin:
Untroubled night they say gives counsell best.
Right well Sir knight ye have advisèd bin,
(Quoth then that agèd man;) the way to win
Is wisely to advise:° now day is spent; consider
Therefore with me ye may take up your In
For this same night. The knight was well content:
So with that godly father to his home they went.

34

A little lowly Hermitage it was,
Downe in a dale, hard by a forests side,
Far from resort of people, that did pas
In travell to and froe: a little wyde° apart
There was an holy Chappell edifyde,° built
Wherein the Hermite dewly wont° to say was accustomed
His holy things each morne and eventyde:
Thereby a Christall streame did gently play,
Which from a sacred fountaine wellèd forth alway.

35

Arrivèd there, the little house they fill,
Ne looke for entertainement, where none was:
Rest is their feast, and all things at their will;
The noblest mind the best contentment has.
With faire discourse the evening so they pas:
For that old man of pleasing wordes had store,
And well could file his tongue as smooth as glas;
He told of Saintes and Popes, and evermore
He strowd an Ave-Mary[2] after and before.

---

[1] Bidding his beades I.e., praying with the aid of rosary beads. These beads, each of which represents a prayer, are counted off as each prayer is completed.

[2] Ave-Mary I.e., "Hail, Mary!," a prayer to the Virgin Mary.

36

The drouping Night thus creepeth on them fast,
And the sad humour[1] loading their eye liddes,
As messenger of Morpheus on them cast
Sweet slombring deaw,° the which to sleepe them biddes. dew
Unto their lodgings then his guestes he riddes:° leads
Where when all drownd in deadly° sleepe he findes, death-like
He to his study goes, and there amiddes
His Magick bookes and artes of sundry kindes,
He seekes out mighty charmes, to trouble sleepy mindes.

37

Then choosing out few wordes most horrible,
(Let none them read) thereof did verses frame,
With which and other spelles like terrible,
He bad awake blacke Plutoes griesly Dame,[2]
And cursèd heaven, and spake reprochfull shame
Of highest God, the Lord of life and light;
A bold bad man, that dar'd to call by name
Great Gorgon,[3] Prince of darknesse and dead night,
At which Cocytus quakes, and Styx[4] is put to flight.

38

And forth he cald out of deepe darknesse dred
Legions of Sprights, the which like little flyes
Fluttring about his ever damnèd hed,
A-waite whereto their service he applyes,
To aide his friends, or fray° his enimies: frighten
Of those he chose out two, the falsest twoo,
And fittest for to forge true-seeming lyes;
The one of them he gave a message too,
The other by him selfe staide other worke to doo.

39

He making speedy way through spersèd° ayre, dispersed
And through the world of waters wide and deepe,
To Morpheus house doth hastily repaire.
Amid the bowels of the earth full steepe,
And low, where dawning day doth never peepe,
His dwelling is; there Tethys[5] his wet bed
Doth ever wash, and Cynthia[6] still° doth steepe continually
In silver deaw his ever-drouping hed,
Whiles sad° Night over him her mantle black doth spred. grave

40

Whose double gates he findeth lockèd fast,
The one faire fram'd of burnisht Yvory,
The other all with silver overcast;
And wakefull dogges before them farre do lye,
Watching to banish Care their enimy,
Who oft is wont to trouble gentle Sleepe.
By them the Sprite doth passe in quietly,
And unto Morpheus comes, whom drownèd deepe
In drowsie fit he findes: of nothing he takes keepe.° notice

41

And more, to lulle him in his slumber soft,
A trickling streame from high rocke tumbling downe
And ever-drizling raine upon the loft,
Mixt with a murmuring winde, much like the sowne° sound
Of swarming Bees, did cast him in a swowne:° swoon
No other noyse, nor peoples troublous cryes,
As still are wont t'annoy the wallèd towne,
Might there be heard: but carelesse° Quiet lyes, without care
Wrapt in eternall silence farre from enemyes.

42

The messenger approching to him spake,
But his wast° wordes returnd to him in vaine: wasted
So sound he slept, that nought mought° him awake. might
Then rudely he him thrust, and pusht with paine,
Whereat he gan to stretch: but he againe
Shooke him so hard, that forcèd him to speake.
As one then in a dreame, whose dryer braine
Is tost with troubled sights and fancies weake,
He mumbled soft, but would not all his silence breake.

---

[1] sad humour Heavy moisture, sent by Morpheus, god of sleep.

[2] Plutoes griesly Dame Persephone, or Proserpine, wife of Pluto and goddess of the underworld.

[3] Gorgon Demogorgon, a pseudo-classical demon of the underworld, associated with the early days of creation.

[4] Cocytus ... Styx Two rivers of the underworld.

[5] Tethys Goddess of the sea.

[6] Cynthia Goddess of the moon.

43

The Sprite then gan more boldly him to wake,
And threatned unto him the dreaded name
Of Hecate:[1] whereat he gan to quake,
And lifting up his lumpish head, with blame
Halfe angry asked him, for what he came.
Hither (quoth he) me Archimago[2] sent,
He that the stubborne Sprites can wisely tame,
He bids thee to him send for his intent
A fit false dreame, that can delude the sleepers sent.

44

The God obayde, and calling forth straight way
A diverse° dreame out of his prison darke, diverting
Delivered it to him, and downe did lay
His heavie head, devoide of carefull carke,[3]
Whose sences all were straight benumbd and starke.
He backe returning by the Yvorie dore,
Remounted up as light as chearefull Larke,
And on his litle winges the dreame he bore
In hast unto his Lord, where he him left afore.

45

Who all this while with charmes and hidden artes,
Had made a Lady of that other Spright,
And fram'd of liquid ayre her tender partes
So lively, and so like in all mens sight,
That weaker sence it could have ravisht quight:
The maker selfe for all his wondrous witt,
Was nigh beguilèd with so goodly sight:
Her all in white he clad, and over it
Cast a blacke stole, most like to seeme for Una[4] fit.

46

Now when that ydle dreame was to him brought,
Unto that Elfin knight he bad him fly,
Where he slept soundly void of evill thought,
And with false shewes abuse his fantasy,
In sort as he him schoolèd privily:
And that new creature borne without her dew,[5]
Full of the makers guile, with usage sly
He taught to imitate that Lady trew,
Whose semblance she did carrie under feignèd hew.° figure

47

Thus well instructed, to their worke they hast,
And comming where the knight in slomber lay,
The one upon his hardy head him plast,
And made him dreame of loves and lustfull play,
That nigh his manly hart did melt away,
Bathèd in wanton blis and wicked joy:
Then seemèd him his Lady by him lay,
And to him playnd,° how that false wingèd boy,[6] complained
Her chast hart had subdewd, to learne Dame pleasures toy.° play

48

And she her selfe of beautie soveraigne Queene,
Faire Venus seemde unto his bed to bring
Her, whom he waking evermore did weene,
To be the chastest flowre, that ay° did spring ever
On earthly braunch, the daughter of a king,
Now a loose Leman to vile service bound:
And eke the Graces[7] seemèd all to sing,
Hymen iô Hymen, dauncing all around,
Whilst freshest Flora[8] her with Yvie girlond crownd.

49

In this great passion of unwonted lust,
Or wonted feare of doing ought amis,
He started up, as seeming to mistrust,
Some secret ill, or hidden foe of his:
Lo there before his face his Lady is,
Under blake stole hyding her bayted hooke,
And as halfe blushing offred him to kis,
With gentle blandishment and lovely looke,

---

[1] Hecate Greek goddess of the crossroads, often perceived as evil and linked to witchcraft.

[2] Archimago Meaning both arch-image maker and arch-magician in Latin.

[3] carefull I.e., full of care; carke Anxiety, distress.

[4] Una From unus, the Latin word for one or unity.

[5] without her dew I.e., unnaturally.

[6] wingèd boy I.e., Cupid.

[7] the Graces Handmaids of Venus who personify pleasure, courtesy, and beauty. Here they sing a hymn to Hymen, the god of weddings, in celebration of the pleasures of the marriage bed.

[8] Flora Goddess of flowers.

Most like that virgin true, which for her knight him took.

50

All cleane dismayd to see so uncouth sight,
And halfe enragèd at her shamelesse guise,
He thought have slaine her in his fierce despight:° indignation
But hasty heat tempring with sufferance wise,
He stayde his hand, and gan himselfe advise
To prove his sense, and tempt her faignèd truth.
Wringing her hands in wemens pitteous wise,
Tho can° she weepe, to stirre up gentle ruth,° did / compassion
Both for her noble bloud, and for her tender youth.

51

And said, Ah Sir, my liege Lord and my love,
Shall I accuse the hidden cruell fate,
And mightie causes wrought in heaven above,
Or the blind God, that doth me thus amate,° dismay
For° hopèd love to winne me certaine hate? in place of Yet thus perforce he bids me do, or die.
Die is my dew:° yet rew° my wretched state due / pity
You, whom my hard avenging destinie
Hath made judge of my life or death indifferently.

52

Your owne deare sake forst me at first to leave
My Fathers kingdome,—There she stopt with teares;
Her swollen hart her speach seemd to bereave,
And then againe begun, My weaker yeares
Captiv'd to fortune and frayle worldly feares,
Fly to your faith for succour and sure ayde:
Let me not dye in languor° and long teares. distress
Why Dame (quoth he) what hath ye thus dismayd?
What frayes° ye, that were wont to comfort me affrayd? frightens

53

Love of your selfe, she said, and deare° constraint dire
Lets me not sleepe, but wast the wearie night
In secret anguish and unpittied plaint,
Whiles you in carelesse sleepe are drownèd quight.
Her doubtfull words made that redoubted° knight distinguished
Suspect her truth: yet since no untruth he knew,
Her fawning love with foule disdainefull spight
He would not shend,° but said, Deare dame I rew, reprove
That for my sake unknowne such griefe unto you grew.

54

Assure your selfe, it fell not all to ground;
For all so deare as life is to my hart,
I deeme your love, and hold me to you bound;
Ne let vaine feares procure your needlesse smart,° suffering
Where cause is none, but to your rest depart.
Not all content, yet seemd she to appease
Her mournefull plaintes, beguilèd° of her art, foiled
And fed with words, that could not chuse but please,
So slyding softly forth, she turnd as to her ease.

55

Long after lay he musing at her mood,
Much griev'd to thinke that gentle Dame so light,° immoral
For whose defence he was to shed his blood.
At last dull wearinesse of former fight
Having yrockt a sleepe his irkesome° spright,° weary / spirit
That troublous dreame gan freshly tosse his braine,
With bowres, and beds, and Ladies deare delight:
But when he saw his labour all was vaine,
With that misformèd spright[1] he backe returnd againe.

CANTO 2

The guilefull great Enchaunter parts
The Redcrosse Knight from Truth:
Into whose stead faire falshood steps,
And workes him wofull ruth.

1

By this the Northerne wagoner[2] had set
His sevenfold teme behind the stedfast starre,
That was in Ocean waves yet never wet,

---

[1] that misformèd spright I.e., the spirit disguised as Una.

[2] Northerne wagoner Constellation, probably Ursa Major (in England also called "Charles's Wain," or cart), imagined as a farmer guiding a wagon. The "steadfast starre" that never sets in the ocean, however, is the North Star, in the nearby Ursa Minor.

But firme is fixt, and sendeth light from farre
To all, that in the wide deepe wandring arre:
And chearefull Chaunticlere° with his note shrill rooster
Had warned once, that Phoebus fiery carre° chariot
In hast was climbing up the Easterne hill,
Full envious that night so long his roome did fill.

2

When those accursèd messengers of hell,
That feigning dreame, and that faire-forgèd Spright
Came to their wicked maister, and gan tell
Their bootelesse° paines, and ill succeeding night: useless
Who all in rage to see his skilfull might Deluded so, gan threaten hellish paine
And sad Proserpines wrath, them to affright.
But when he saw his threatning was but vaine,
He cast about, and searcht his balefull° bookes againe. destructive

3

Eftsoones he tooke that miscreated faire,
And that false other Spright, on whom he spred
A seeming body of the subtile aire,
Like a young Squire, in loves and lusty-hed
His wanton dayes that ever loosely led,
Without regard of armes and dreaded fight:
Those two he tooke, and in a secret bed,
Covered with darknesse and misdeeming° night, misleading
Them both together laid, to joy in vaine delight.

4

Forthwith he runnes with feignèd faithfull hast
Unto his guest, who after troublous sights
And dreames, gan now to take more sound repast,° repose
Whom suddenly he wakes with fearefull frights,
As one aghast with feends or damnèd sprights,
And to him cals, Rise rise unhappy Swaine,° lover
That here wex° old in sleepe, whiles wicked wights grow
Have knit themselves in Venus shamefull chaine;
Come see, where your false Lady doth her honour staine.

5

All in amaze he suddenly up start
With sword in hand, and with the old man went;
Who soone him brought into a secret part,
Where that false couple were full closely ment° joined
In wanton lust and lewd embracèment:
Which when he saw, he burnt with gealous fire,
The eye of reason was with rage yblent,° blinded
And would have slaine them in his furious ire,
But hardly was restreinèd of° that agèd sire. by

6

Returning to his bed in torment great,
And bitter anguish of his guiltie sight,
He could not rest, but did his stout heart eat,
And wast his inward gall with deepe despight,
Yrkesome of life, and too long lingring night.
At last faire Hesperus[1] in highest skie
Had spent his lampe, and brought forth dawning light,
Then up he rose, and clad him hastily;
The Dwarfe him brought his steed: so both away do fly.

7

Now when the rosy-fingred Morning faire,
Weary of agèd Tithones[2] saffron bed,
Had spred her purple robe through deawy aire,
And the high hils Titan° discovered, the sun
The royall virgin shooke off drowsy-hed,
And rising forth out of her baser bowre,
Lookt for her knight, who far away was fled,
And for her Dwarfe, that wont to wait each houre;
Then gan she waile and weepe, to see that woefull stowre.° plight

8

And after him she rode with so much speede
As her slow beast could make; but all in vaine:
For him so far had borne his light-foot steede,
Prickèd with wrath and fiery fierce disdaine,
That him to follow was but fruitlesse paine;
Yet she her weary limbes would never rest,
But every hill and dale, each wood and plaine

---

[1] Hesperus Venus as the morning or evening star.

[2] agèd Tithones Husband of the goddess of the dawn, Aurora. Aurora asked Jupiter to give the mortal Tithonus eternal life, but forgot to ask for eternal youth.

Did search, sore grievèd in her gentle brest,
He so ungently left her, whom she lovèd best.

9

But subtill Archimago, when his guests
He saw divided into double parts,
And Una wandring in woods and forrests,
Th'end of his drift,° he praisd his divelish arts, scheme
That had such might over true meaning harts;
Yet rests not so, but other meanes doth make,
How he may worke unto her further smarts:
For her he hated as the hissing snake,
And in her many troubles did most pleasure take.

10

He then devisde himselfe how to disguise;
For by his mightie science° he could take knowledge
As many formes and shapes in seeming wise,[1]
As ever Proteus[2] to himselfe could make:
Sometime a fowle, sometime a fish in lake,
Now like a foxe, now like a dragon fell,° fierce
That of himselfe he oft for feare would quake,
And oft would flie away. O who can tell
The hidden power of herbes, and might of Magicke spell?

11

But now seemde best, the person to put on
Of that good knight, his late beguilèd guest:
In mighty armes he was yclad anon,
And silver shield upon his coward brest
A bloudy crosse, and on his craven° crest° cowardly / head
A bounch of haires discolourd diversly:
Full jolly knight he seemde, and well addrest,° armed
And when he sate upon his courser free,
Saint George himself ye would have deemèd him to be.

12

But he the knight, whose semblaunt he did beare,
The true Saint George was wandred far away,
Still flying from his thoughts and gealous feare;
Will was his guide, and griefe led him astray.
At last him chaunst to meete upon the way
A faithlesse Sarazin[3] all arm'd to point,
In whose great shield was writ with letters gay
Sans foy:[4] full large of limbe and every joint
He was, and carèd not for God or man a point.

13

He had a faire companion of his way,
A goodly Lady clad in scarlot red,
Purfled° with gold and pearle of rich assay,° decorated / quality
And like a Persian mitre° on her hed headdress
She wore, with crownes and owches° garnishèd, brooches
The which her lavish lovers to her gave;
Her wanton palfrey all was overspred
With tinsell trappings, woven like a wave,
Whose bridle rung with golden bels and bosses° brave.° studs / handsome

14

With faire disport° and courting dalliaunce amusement
She intertainde her lover all the way:
But when she saw the knight his speare advaunce,
She soone left off her mirth and wanton play,
And bad her knight addresse him to the fray:
His foe was nigh at hand. He prickt with pride
And hope to winne his Ladies heart that day,
Forth spurrèd fast: adowne his coursers side
The red bloud trickling staind the way, as he did ride.

15

The knight of the Redcrosse when him he spide,
Spurring so hote with rage dispiteous,° merciless
Gan fairely couch his speare, and towards ride:
Soone meete they both, both fell and furious,
That daunted with their forces hideous,
Their steeds do stagger, and amazed stand,
And eke themselves too rudely rigorous,
Astonied with the stroke of their owne hand,
Do backe rebut,° and each to other yeeldeth land. retreat

16

As when two rams stird with ambitious pride,
Fight for the rule of the rich fleecèd flocke,
Their hornèd fronts so fierce on either side

---

[1] in seeming wise In the matter of seeming; i.e., in appearance.

[2] Proteus Sea god able to change his shape at will.

[3] Sarazin I.e., Saracen, a Muslim (but representing Catholicism).

[4] Sans foy French: Without faith.

Do meete, that with the terrour of the shocke
Astonied both, stand sencelesse as a blocke,
Forgetfull of the hanging victory:
So stood these twaine, unmovèd as a rocke,
Both staring fierce, and holding idely
The broken reliques of their former cruelty.

17

The Sarazin sore daunted with the buffe
Snatcheth his sword, and fiercely to him flies;
Who well it wards, and quyteth° cuff with cuff: requites
Each others equall puissaunce envies,
And through their iron sides with cruell spies° glances
Does seeke to perce: repining courage yields
No foote to foe. The flashing fier flies
As from a forge out of their burning shields,
And streames of purple bloud new dies the verdant fields.

18

Curse on that Crosse (quoth then the Sarazin)
That keepes thy body from the bitter fit;[1]
Dead long ygoe I wote thou haddest bin,
Had not that charme from thee forwarnèd° it: prevented
But yet I warne thee now assurèd sitt,
And hide thy head. Therewith upon his crest
With rigour so outrageous he smitt,
That a large share it hewd out of the rest,
And glauncing downe his shield, from blame° him fairely blest.° harm protected

19

Who thereat wondrous wroth, the sleeping spark
Of native vertue° gan eftsoones revive, strength
And at his haughtie helmet making mark,
So hugely stroke, that it the steele did rive,° rend
And cleft his head. He tumbling downe alive,
With bloudy mouth his mother earth did kis,
Greeting his grave: his grudging ghost did strive
With the fraile flesh; at last it flitted is,
Whither the soules do fly of men, that live amis.

20

The Lady when she saw her champion fall,
Like the old ruines of a broken towre,
Staid not to waile his woefull funerall,
But from him fled away with all her powre;
Who after her as hastily gan scowre,° run
Bidding the Dwarfe with him to bring away
The Sarazins shield, signe of the conqueroure.
Her soone he overtooke, and bad to stay,
For present cause was none of dread her to dismay.

21

She turning backe with ruefull countenaunce,
Cride, Mercy mercy Sir vouchsafe to show
On silly Dame, subiect to hard mischaunce,
And to your mighty will. Her humblesse low
In so ritch weedes° and seeming glorious show, clothes
Did much emmove his stout heroicke heart,
And said, Deare dame, your suddein overthrow
Much rueth° me; but now put feare apart, grieves
And tell, both who ye be, and who that tooke your part.

22

Melting in teares, then gan she thus lament;
The wretched woman, whom unhappy howre
Hath now made thrall° to your commandèment, slave
Before that angry heavens list to lowre,° scowl
And fortune false betraide me to your powre,
Was, (O what now availeth that I was!)
Borne the sole daughter of an Emperour,
He that the wide West under his rule has,
And high hath set his throne, where Tiberis doth pas.[2]

23

He in the first flowre of my freshest age,
Betrothèd me unto the onely haire
Of a most mighty king, most rich and sage;
Was never Prince so faithfull and so faire,
Was never Prince so meeke and debonaire;
But ere my hopèd day of spousall shone,
My dearest Lord fell from high honours staire,
Into the hands of his accursèd fone,° foes
And cruelly was slaine, that shall I ever mone.

---

[1] bitter fit I.e., death.

[2] where … pas Rome (the seat of Roman Catholicism), through which the river Tiber runs. The prince to whom the lady claims to have been betrothed is Christ.

24

His blessed body spoild of lively breath,
Was afterward, I know not how, convaid
And fro me hid: of whose most innocent death
When tidings came to me unhappy maid,
O how great sorrow my sad soule assaid.° assailed
Then forth I went his woefull corse to find,
And many yeares throughout the world I straid,
A virgin widow, whose deepe wounded mind
With love, long time did languish as the striken hind.° female deer

25

At last it chauncèd this proud Sarazin
To meete me wandring, who perforce° me led by force
With him away, but yet could never win
The Fort, that Ladies hold in soveraigne dread.
There lies he now with foule dishonour dead,
Who whiles he liv'de, was callèd proud Sans foy,
The eldest of three brethren, all three bred
Of one bad sire, whose youngest is Sans joy,° without joy
And twixt them both was borne the bloudy bold Sans loy.° without law

26

In this sad plight, friendlesse, unfortunate,
Now miserable I Fidessa[1] dwell,
Craving of you in pitty of my state,
To do none ill, if please ye not do well.
He in great passion all this while did dwell,
More busying his quicke eyes, her face to view,
Then his dull eares, to heare what she did tell;
And said, Faire Lady hart of flint would rew
The undeservèd woes and sorrowes, which ye shew.

27

Henceforth in safe assuraunce may ye rest,
Having both found a new friend you to aid,
And lost an old foe, that did you molest:
Better new friend then an old foe is said.
With chaunge of cheare the seeming simple maid
Let fall her eyen, as shamefast to the earth,
And yeelding soft, in that she nought gain-said,
So forth they rode, he feining seemely merth,
And she coy lookes: so dainty° they say maketh derth.° valuable rare

28

Long time they thus together traveilèd,
Till weary of their way, they came at last,
Where grew two goodly trees, that faire did spred
Their armes abroad, with gray mosse overcast,
And their greene leaves trembling with every blast,° gust of wind
Made a calme shadow far in compasse round:
The fearefull Shepheard often there aghast° frightened
Under them never sat, ne wont there sound
His mery oaten pipe, but shund th'unlucky ground.

29

But this good knight soone as he them can° spie, did
For the coole shade him thither hastly got:
For golden Phoebus now ymounted hie,
From fiery wheeles of his faire chariot
Hurlèd his beame so scorching cruell hot,
That living creature mote it not abide;
And his new Lady it endured not.
There they alight, in hope themselves to hide
From the fierce heat, and rest their weary limbs a tide.

30

Faire seemely pleasaunce° each to other makes, pleasantry
With goodly purposes there as they sit:
And in his falsèd° fancy he her takes deceived
To be the fairest wight, that livèd yit;
Which to expresse, he bends his gentle wit,
And thinking of those braunches greene to frame
A girlond for her dainty forehead fit,
He pluckt a bough; out of whose rift there came
Small drops of gory bloud, that trickled downe the same.

31

Therewith a piteous yelling voyce was heard,
Crying, O spare with guilty hands to teare
My tender sides in this rough rynd embard,° enclosed
But fly, ah fly far hence away, for feare
Least° to you hap, that happened to me heare, lest
And to this wretched Lady, my deare love,
O too deare love, love bought with death too deare.

---

[1] Fidessa Fidelity.

Astond he stood, and up his haire did hove,° raise
And with that suddein horror could no member move.

32

At last whenas the dreadfull passion
Was overpast, and manhood well awake,
Yet musing at the straunge occasiön,
And doubting much his sence, he thus bespake;
What voyce of damnèd Ghost from Limbo lake,[1]
Or guilefull spright wandring in empty aire,
Both which fraile men do oftentimes mistake,° mislead
Sends to my doubtfull eares these speaches rare,
And ruefull plaints, me bidding guiltlesse bloud to spare?

33

Then groning deepe, Nor damned Ghost, (quoth he,) Nor guilefull sprite, to thee these wordes doth speake,
But once a man Fradubio,[2] now a tree,
Wretched man, wretched tree; whose nature weake,
A cruell witch her cursèd will to wreake,
Hath thus transformd, and plast in open plaines,
Where Boreas[3] doth blow full bitter bleake,
And scorching Sunne does dry my secret vaines:
For though a tree I seeme, yet cold and heat me paines.

34

Say on Fradubio then, or man, or tree,
Quoth then the knight, by whose mischievous arts
Art thou misshapèd thus, as now I see?
He oft finds med'cine, who his griefe imparts;
But double griefs afflict concealing harts,
As raging flames who striveth to suppresse.
The author then (said he) of all my smarts,
Is one Duessa[4] a false sorceresse,
That many errant° knights hath brought to wretchednesse. wandering

35

In prime of youthly yeares, when corage hot
The fire of love and joy of chevalree
First kindled in my brest, it was my lot
To love this gentle Lady, whom ye see,
Now not a Lady, but a seeming tree;
With whom as once I rode accompanyde,
Me chauncèd of a knight encountred bee,
That had a like faire Lady by his syde,
Like a faire Lady, but did fowle Duessa hyde.

36

Whose forgèd beauty he did take in hand,[5]
All other Dames to have exceeded farre;
I in defence of mine did likewise stand,
Mine, that did then shine as the Morning starre:
So both to battell fierce arraungèd arre,
In which his harder fortune was to fall
Under my speare: such is the dye of warre:
His Lady left as a prise martiall,
Did yield her comely person, to be at my call.

37

So doubly lov'd of Ladies unlike° faire, differently
Th'one seeming such, the other such indeede,
One day in doubt I cast° for to compare, resolved
Whether in beauties glorie did exceede;
A Rosy girlond was the victors meede:
Both seemde to win, and both seemde won to bee,
So hard the discord was to be agreede.
Frælissa[6] was as faire, as faire mote bee,
And ever false Duessa seemde as faire as shee.

38

The wicked witch now seeing all this while
The doubtfull ballaunce equally to sway,
What not by right, she cast to win by guile,
And by her hellish science raisd streightway
A foggy mist, that overcast the day,
And a dull blast, that breathing on her face,
Dimmed her former beauties shining ray,
And with foule ugly forme did her disgrace:
Then was she faire alone, when none was faire in place.

39

Then cride she out, Fye, fye, deformèd wight,
Whose borrowed beautie now appeareth plaine
To have before bewitchèd all mens sight;
O leave her soone, or let her soone be slaine.

---

[1] Limbo lake Afterlife realm to which the unbaptized are sent.

[2] Fradubio Italian: literally, Brother Doubt.

[3] Boreas North wind.

[4] Duessa Implies two, doubleness.

[5] take in hand Maintain.

[6] Frælissa Frailty.

Her loathly visage viewing with disdaine,
Eftsoones I thought her such, as she me told,
And would have kild her; but with faignèd paine,
The false witch did my wrathfull hand with-hold;
So left her, where she now is turnd to treen mould.

40

Thensforth I tooke Duessa for my Dame,
And in the witch unweeting° joyd long time, unknowingly
Ne ever wist, but that she was the same,
Till on a day (that day is every Prime,[1]
When Witches wont do penance for their crime)
I chaunst to see her in her proper hew,
Bathing her selfe in origane and thyme:
A filthy foule old woman I did vew,
That ever to have toucht her, I did deadly rew.

41

Her neather partes misshapen, monstruous,
Were hidd in water, that I could not see,
But they did seeme more foule and hideous,
Then womans shape man would beleeve to bee.
Thensforth from her most beastly companie
I gan refraine, in minde to slip away,
Soone as appeard safe opportunitie:
For danger great, if not assur'd decay
I saw before mine eyes, if I were knowne to stray.

42

The divelish hag by chaunges of my cheare
Perceiv'd my thought, and drownd in sleepie night,
With wicked herbes and ointments did besmeare
My bodie all, through charmes and magicke might,
That all my senses were bereavèd quight:
Then brought she me into this desert waste,
And by my wretched lovers side me pight,° planted
Where now enclosd in wooden wals full faste,
Banisht from living wights, our wearie dayes we waste.

43

But how long time, said then the Elfin knight,
Are you in this misformèd house to dwell?
We may not chaunge (quoth he) this evil plight,
Till we be bathèd in a living well;[2]
That is the terme prescribèd by the spell.
O how, said he, mote I that well out find,
That may restore you to your wonted well?° well-being
Time and suffisèd° fates to former kind satisfied
Shall us restore, none else from hence may us unbynd.

44

The false Duessa, now Fidessa hight,° called
Heard how in vaine Fradubio did lament,
And knew well all was true. But the good knight
Full of sad feare and ghastly dreriment,° gloom
When all this speech the living tree had spent,
The bleeding bough did thrust into the ground,
That from the bloud he might be innocent,
And with fresh clay did close the wooden wound:
Then turning to his Lady, dead with feare her found.

45

Her seeming dead he found with feignèd feare,
As all unweeting° of that well she knew, unknowing
And paynd himselfe with busie care to reare
Her out of carelesse° swowne. Her eylids blew unconscious
And dimmèd sight with pale and deadly hew
At last she up gan lift: with trembling cheare
Her up he tooke, too simple and too trew,
And oft her kist. At length all passèd feare,
He set her on her steede, and forward forth did beare.

CANTO 3

Forsaken Truth long seekes her love,
And makes the Lyon mylde,
Marres blind Devotions mart,° and fals trade
In hand of leachour vylde.

1

Nought there under heav'ns wilde hollownesse,
That moves more deare compassiön of mind,
Then beautie brought t'unworthy wretchednesse
Through envies snares or fortunes freakes unkind:
I, whether lately through her brightnesse blind,

---

[1] Prime First day of a new moon.

[2] Till … well See 1 John 4.14, which describes Christ as the Well of Life, a "well of water, springing up into eternal life," for those who believe in Christ and follow his teachings.

Or through alleageance and fast fealtie,
Which I do owe unto all woman kind,
Feele my heart perst with so great agonie,
When such I see, that all for pittie I could die.

2

And now it is empassionèd so deepe,
For fairest Unaes sake, of whom I sing,
That my fraile eyes these lines with teares do steepe,
To thinke how she through guilefull handeling,
Though true as touch, though daughter of a king,
Though faire as ever living wight was faire,
Though nor in word nor deede ill meriting,
Is from her knight divorcèd in despaire
And her due loves deriv'd to that vile witches share.

3

Yet she most faithfull Ladie all this while Forsaken, wofull, solitarie mayd
Farre from all peoples prease,° as in exile, press
In wildernesse and wastfull deserts strayd,
To seeke her knight; who subtilly betrayd
Through that late vision, which th'Enchaunter wrought,
Had her abandond. She of nought affrayd,
Through woods and wastnesse wide him daily sought;
Yet wishèd tydings none of him unto her brought.

4

One day nigh wearie of the yrkesome way,
From her unhastie beast she did alight,
And on the grasse her daintie limbes did lay
In secret shadow, farre from all mens sight:
From her faire head her fillet° she undight,° headband undid
And laid her stole aside. Her angels face
As the great eye of heaven shyned bright,
And made a sunshine in the shadie place;
Did never mortall eye behold such heavenly grace.

5

It fortuned out of the thickest wood
A ramping Lyon rushed suddainly,
Hunting full greedie after salvage° blood; savage
Soone as the royall virgin he did spy,
With gaping mouth at her ran greedily,
To have attonce devour'd her tender corse:
But to the pray when as he drew more ny,
His bloudie rage aswaged with remorse,
And with the sight amazd, forgat his furious forse.

6

In stead thereof he kist her wearie feet,
And lickt her lilly hands with fawning tong,
As he her wrongèd innocence did weet.° understand
O how can beautie maister the most strong,
And simple truth subdue avenging wrong?
Whose yeelded pride and proud submissiön,
Still dreading death, when she had markèd long,
Her hart gan melt in great compassiön,
And drizling teares did shed for pure affection.

7

The Lyon Lord of everie beast in field,
Quoth she, his princely puissance doth abate,
And mightie proud to humble weake does yield,
Forgetfull of the hungry rage, which late
Him prickt, in pittie of my sad estate:° state
But he my Lyon, and my noble Lord,
How does he find in cruell hart to hate
Her that him lov'd, and ever most adord,
As the God of my life? why hath he me abhord?

8

Redounding° teares did choke th'end of her plaint, overflowing
Which softly ecchoed from the neighbour wood;
And sad to see her sorrowfull constraint
The kingly beast upon her gazing stood;
With pittie calmd, downe fell his angry mood.
At last in close hart shutting up her paine,
Arose the virgin borne of heavenly brood,
And to her snowy Palfrey got againe,
To seeke her strayèd Champion, if she might attaine.° overtake

9

The Lyon would not leave her desolate,
But with her went along, as a strong gard
Of her chast person, and a faithfull mate
Of her sad troubles and misfortunes hard:
Still° when she slept, he kept both watch and ward, always

And when she wakt, he waited diligent,
With humble service to her will prepard:
From her faire eyes he tooke commaundèment,
And ever by her lookes conceivèd her intent.

10

Long she thus traveilèd through deserts wyde,
By which she thought her wandring knight shold pas,
Yet never shew of living wight espyde;
Till that at length she found the troden gras,
In which the tract of peoples footing was,
Under the steepe foot of a mountaine hore;° grey
The same she followes, till at last she has
A damzell spyde slow footing her before,
That on her shoulders sad° a pot of water bore. stooped

11

To whom approching she to her gan call,
To weet, if dwelling place were nigh at hand;
But the rude wench her answer'd nought at all,
She could not heare, nor speake, nor understand;[1]
Till seeing by her side the Lyon stand,
With suddaine feare her pitcher downe she threw,
And fled away: for never in that land
Face of faire Ladie she before did vew,
And that dread Lyons looke her cast in deadly hew.

12

Full fast she fled, ne ever lookt behynd,
As if her life upon the wager lay,
And home she came, whereas her mother blynd
Sate in eternall night: nought could she say,
But suddaine catching hold, did her dismay
With quaking hands, and other signs of feare:
Who full of ghastly fright and cold affray,° fear
Gan shut the dore. By this arrivèd there
Dame Una, wearie Dame, and entrance did requere.° request

13

Which when none yeelded, her unruly Page
With his rude° clawes the wicket open rent, rough
And let her in; where of his cruell rage
Nigh dead with feare, and faint astonishment,
She found them both in darkesome corner pent;
Where that old woman day and night did pray
Upon her beades devoutly penitent;
Nine hundred Pater nosters[2] every day,
And thrise nine hundred Aves she was wont to say.

14

And to augment her painefull pennance more,
Thrise every weeke in ashes she did sit,
And next her wrinkled skin rough sackcloth wore,
And thrise three times did fast from any bit:
But now for feare her beads she did forget.
Whose needlesse dread for to remove away,
Faire Una framèd words and count'nance fit:
Which hardly° doen, at length she gan them pray, with difficulty
That in their cotage small, that night she rest her may.

15

The day is spent, and commeth drowsie night,
When every creature shrowded is in sleepe;
Sad Una downe her laies in wearie plight,
And at her feet the Lyon watch doth keepe:
In stead of rest, she does lament, and weepe
For the late losse of her deare lovèd knight,
And sighes, and grones, and evermore does steepe
Her tender brest in bitter teares all night,
All night she thinks too long, and often lookes for light.

16

Now when Aldeboran was mounted hie
Above the shynie Cassiopeias chaire,[3]
And all in deadly sleepe did drownèd lie,
One knockèd at the dore, and in would fare;
He knockèd fast,° and often curst, and sware, vigorously
That readie entrance was not at his call:
For on his backe a heavy load he bare
Of nightly stelths and pillage severall,
Which he had got abroad by purchase criminall.

17

He was to weete° a stout and sturdie thiefe, wit
Wont to robbe Churches of their ornaments,

---

[1] She … understand The girl is both deaf and mute.

[2] Pater nosters Latin: Our Fathers; i.e., repetitions of the Lord's Prayer.

[3] Aldeboran … chaire Aldeboran, a star in the constellation Taurus, rises above the northern constellation Cassiopeia.

And poore mens boxes of their due reliefe,
Which given was to them for good intents;
The holy Saints of their rich vestiments
He did disrobe, when all men carelesse slept,
And spoild the Priests of their habiliments,° robes
Whiles none the holy things in safety kept;
Then he by cunning sleights in at the window crept.

18

And all that he by right or wrong could find,
Unto this house he brought, and did bestow
Upon the daughter of this woman blind,
Abessa daughter of Corceca[1] slow,
With whom he whoredome usd, that few did know,
And fed her fat with feast of offerings,
And plentie, which in all the land did grow;
Ne sparèd he to give her gold and rings:
And now he to her brought part of his stolen things.

19

Thus long the dore with rage and threats he bet,° beat
Yet of those fearefull women none durst rize,
The Lyon frayèd° them, him in to let: frightened
He would no longer stay him to advize,° consider
But open breakes the dore in furious wize,
And entring is; when that disdainfull° beast indignant
Encountring fierce, him suddaine doth surprize,
And seizing cruell clawes on trembling brest,
Under his Lordly foot him proudly hath supprest.

20

Him booteth not resist,[2] nor succour call,
His bleeding hart is in the vengers hand,
Who streight him rent in thousand peeces small,
And quite dismembred hath: the thirstie land
Drunke up his life; his corse° left on the strand.° body ground
His fearefull friends weare out the wofull night,
Ne dare to weepe, nor seeme to understand
The heavie hap,° which on them is alight, occurrence
Affraid, least to themselves the like mishappen might.[3]

21

Now when broad day the world discovered has,
Up Una rose, up rose the Lyon eke,
And on their former journey forward pas,
In wayes unknowne, her wandring knight to seeke,
With paines farre passing that long wandring Greeke,
That for his love refusèd deitie;[4]
Such were the labours of this Lady meeke,
Still seeking him, that from her still did flie,
Then furthest from her hope, when most she weenèd° nie. believed

22

Soone as she parted thence, the fearefull twaine,° pair
That blind old woman and her daughter deare
Came forth, and finding Kirkrapine[5] there slaine,
For anguish great they gan to rend their heare,° hair
And beat their brests, and naked flesh to teare.
And when they both had wept and wayld their fill,
Then forth they ranne like two amazèd deare,
Halfe mad through malice, and revenging will,
To follow her, that was the causer of their ill.

23

Whom overtaking, they gan loudly bray,
With hollow howling, and lamenting cry,
Shamefully at her rayling° all the way, insulting
And her accusing of dishonesty,° lewdness
That was the flowre of faith and chastity;
And still amidst her rayling, she° did pray, Corceca
That plagues, and mischiefs, and long misery
Might fall on her, and follow all the way,
And that in endlesse error° she might ever stray. roaming

24

But when she saw her prayers nought prevaile,
She backe returnèd with some labour lost;

---

[1] Abessa ... Corceca Abessa's name derives from the word abbess and associates her with Roman Catholic abbies, monasteries, and absence (from the Latin abesse, to be absent). Corceca suggests blindness of heart.

[2] Him ... resist It did no good for him to resist.

[3] least ... might I.e., lest the same mishap befall them.

[4] that long ... deitie Odysseus, King of Ithaca who, according to Homer's Odyssey, wandered for ten years seeking his home after the Trojan War. On the way, he was detained by the sea nymph Calypso, who offered him immortality if he would stay with her.

[5] Kirkrapine Church robber.

And in the way as she did weepe and waile,
A knight her met in mighty armes embost,° covered
Yet knight was not for all his bragging bost,° boast
But subtill Archimag, that Una sought
By traynes into new troubles to have tost:
Of that old woman tydings he besought,
If that of such a Ladie she could tellen ought.° anything

25

Therewith she gan her passion to renew,
And cry, and curse, and raile, and rend her heare,
Saying, that harlot she too lately knew,
That causd her shed so many a bitter teare,
And so forth told the story of her feare:
Much seemèd he to mone her haplesse chaunce,
And after for that Ladie did inquere;
Which being taught, he forward gan advaunce
His fair enchaunted steed, and eke his charmèd launce.

26

Ere long he came, where Una traveild slow,
And that wilde Champion wayting her besyde:
Whom seeing such, for dread he durst not show
Himselfe too nigh at hand, but turnèd wyde
Unto an hill; from whence when she him spyde,
By his like seeming shield, her knight by name
She weend it was, and towards him gan ryde:
Approching nigh, she wist it was the same,
And with faire fearefull humblesse° towards him shee came. humility

27

And weeping said, Ah my long lackèd Lord,
Where have ye bene thus long out of my sight?
Much fearèd I to have bene quite abhord,
Or ought° have done, that ye displeasen might, aught
That should as death unto my deare° hart light:° heavy descend
For since mine eye your joyous sight did mis,
My chearefull day is turnd to chearelesse night,
And eke my night of death the shadow is;
But welcome now my light, and shining lampe of blis.

28

He thereto meeting[1] said, My dearest Dame,
Farre be it from your thought, and fro my will,
To thinke that knighthood I so much should shame,
As you to leave, that have me lovèd still,
And chose in Faery court of meere° goodwill, absolute
Where noblest knights were to be found on earth:
The earth shall sooner leave her kindly° skill natural
To bring forth fruit, and make eternall derth,° famine
Then I leave you, my liefe,° yborne of heavenly berth. beloved

29

And sooth to say, why I left you so long,
Was for to seeke adventure in strange place,
Where Archimago said a felon strong
To many knights did daily worke disgrace;
But knight he now shall never more deface:
Good cause of mine excuse; that mote° ye please may
Well to accept, and evermore embrace
My faithfull service, that by land and seas
Have vowd you to defend. Now then your plaint appease.° cease

30

His lovely words her seemd due recompence
Of all her passèd paines: one loving howre° hour
For many yeares of sorrow can dispence:° compensate
A dram of sweet is worth a pound of sowre:
She has forgot, how many a wofull stowre° time of turmoil
For him she late endur'd; she speakes no more
Of past: true is, that true love hath no powre
To looken backe; his eyes be fixt before.
Before her stands her knight, for whom she toyld° so sore. toiled

31

Much like, as when the beaten marinere,
That long hath wandred in the Ocean wide,
Oft soust° in swelling Tethys saltish teare, soaked
And long time having tand his tawney hide
With blustring breath of heaven, that none can bide,

---

[1] thereto meeting Meeting her manner; i.e., answering in a like fashion.

And scorching flames of fierce Orions hound,[1]
Soone as the port from farre he has espide,
His chearefull whistle merrily doth sound,
And Nereus crownes with cups;[2] his mates him
pledg° around. toast

32

Such joy made Una, when her knight she found;
And eke th'enchaunter joyous seemd no lesse,
Then the glad marchant, that does vew from ground
His ship farre come from watrie wildernesse,
He hurles out vowes, and Neptune oft doth blesse:
So forth they past, and all the way they spent
Discoursing of her dreadfull late distresse,
In which he askt her, what the Lyon ment:
Who told her all that fell in journey as she went.

33

They had not ridden farre, when they might see
One pricking° towards them with hastie heat, galloping
Full strongly armd, and on a courser free,
That through his fiercenesse fomed all with sweat,
And the sharpe yron° did for anger eat, bit
When his hot ryder spurd his chauffed° side; chafed
His looke was sterne, and seemèd still to threat
Cruell revenge, which he in hart did hyde,
And on his shield Sans loy in bloudie lines was dyde.

34

When nigh he drew unto this gentle payre
And saw the Red-crosse, which the knight did beare,
He burnt in fire, and gan eftsoones prepare
Himselfe to battell with his couchèd speare.
Loth was that other, and did faint through feare,
To taste th'untryed dint of deadly steele;
But yet his Lady did so well him cheare,
That hope of new good hap he gan to feele;
So bent his speare, and spurnd his horse with yron heele.

35

But that proud Paynim° forward came so fierce, pagan
And full of wrath, that with his sharp-head speare
Through vainely crossèd shield[3] he quite did pierce,
And had his staggering steede not shrunke for feare,
Through shield and bodie eke he should him beare:
Yet so great was the puissance of his push,
That from his saddle quite he did him beare:
He tombling rudely downe to ground did rush,
And from his gorèd wound a well of bloud did gush.

36

Dismounting lightly from his loftie steed,
He to him lept, in mind to reave° his life, take
And proudly said, Lo there the worthie meed° recompense
Of him, that slew Sans foy with bloudie knife;
Henceforth his ghost freed from repining strife,
In peace may passen over Lethe[4] lake,
When morning altars purgd with enemies life,
The blacke infernall Furies[5] doen aslake:° appease
Life from Sansfoy thou tookst, Sansloy shall from thee take.

37

Therewith in haste his helmet gan unlace,
Till Una cride, O hold that heavie hand,
Deare Sir, what ever that thou be in place:
Enough is, that thy foe doth vanquisht stand
Now at thy mercy: Mercie not withstand:
For he is one the truest knight alive,
Though conquered now he lie on lowly land,
And whilest him fortune favourd, faire did thrive
In bloudie field: therefore of life him not deprive.

38

Her piteous words might not abate his rage,
But rudely rending up his helmet, would
Have slaine him straight: but when he sees his age,
And hoarie head of Archimago old,
His hastie hand he doth amazèd hold,

---

[1] Orions hound Sirius, the dog star, brightest star in the constellation Canis Major. The ancient Egyptians, who observed the star shining for most of the summer months, believed its rays caused the extreme heat, hence the "dog days" of summer.

[2] Nereus ... cups He toasts Nereus, a sea god.

[3] vainely ... shield "Vainely" bearing the mere image of a cross and not accompanied by true faith, the shield does not offer Archimago protection.

[4] Lethe River in Hades whose waters bring forgetfulness.

[5] Furies Three terrible winged goddesses who punish those who commit unavenged crimes.

And halfe ashamèd, wondred at the sight:
For the old man well knew he, though untold,[1]
In charmes and magicke to have wondrous might,
Ne ever wont in field, ne in round lists[2] to fight.

39

And said, Why Archimago, lucklesse syre,
What doe I see? what hard mishap is this,
That hath thee hither brought to taste mine yre?
Or thine the fault, or mine the error is,
In stead of foe to wound my friend amis?
He answered nought, but in a traunce still lay,
And on those guilefull dazed eyes of his
The cloud of death did sit. Which doen away,
He left him lying so, ne would no lenger stay.

40

But to the virgin comes, who all this while Amasèd stands, her selfe so mockt to see
By him, who has the guerdon° of his guile, recompense
For so misfeigning her true knight to bee:
Yet is she now in more perplexitie,
Left in the hand of that same Paynim bold,
From whom her booteth not at all to flie;
Who by her cleanly° garment catching hold, pure
Her from her Palfrey pluckt, her visage to behold.

41

But her fierce servant full of kingly awe
And high disdaine, whenas his soveraine Dame
So rudely handled by her foe he sawe,
With gaping jawes full greedy at him came,
And ramping° on his shield, did weene° the same charging / hope
Have reft away with his sharpe rending clawes:
But he was stout, and lust did now inflame
His corage more, that from his griping pawes
He hath his shield redeem'd, and foorth his sword he drawes.

42

O then too weake and feeble was the forse
Of salvage beast, his puissance to withstand:
For he was strong, and of so mightie corse,
As ever wielded speare in warlike hand,
And feates of armes did wisely understand.
Eftsoones he perced through his chaufed° chest angry
With thrilling° point of deadly yron brand, piercing
And launcht° his Lordly hart: with death opprest slit
He roar'd aloud, whiles life forsooke his stubborne brest.

43

Who now is left to keepe the forlorne maid
From raging spoile of lawlesse victors will?
Her faithfull gard remov'd, her hope dismaid,
Her selfe a yeelded pray to save or spill.° ruin
He now Lord of the field, his pride to fill,
With foule reproches, and disdainfull spight
Her vildly° entertaines, and will or nill,[3] vilely
Beares her away upon his courser light:° quick
Her prayers nought prevaile, his rage is more of might.

44

And all the way, with great lamenting paine,
And piteous plaints she filleth his dull° eares, deaf
That stony hart could riven have in twaine,
And all the way she wets with flowing teares:
But he enrag'd with rancor, nothing heares.
Her servile beast[4] yet would not leave her so,
But followes her farre off, ne ought he feares,
To be partaker of her wandring woe,
More mild in beastly kind,° then that her beastly foe. nature

CANTO 4

To sinfull house of Pride, Duessa
Guides the faithfull knight,
Where brothers death to wreak° Sansjoy avenge
Doth chalenge him to fight.

I

Young knight, what ever that dost armes professe,
And through long labours huntest after fame,
Beware of fraud, beware of ficklenesse,
In choice, and change of thy deare lovèd Dame,

---

[1] though untold I.e., without being told.

[2] round lists Arenas in which tournaments were held.

[3] will or nill Expression meaning willingly or not; i.e., whether she will or won't.

[4] Her ... beast I.e., her palfrey.

Least thou of her beleeve too lightly blame,
And rash misweening doe thy hart remove:
For unto knight there is no greater shame,
Then lightnesse and inconstancie in love;
That doth this Redcrosse knights ensample° plainly prove. example

2

Who after that he had faire Una lorne,° deserted
Through light misdeeming of her loialtie,
And false Duessa in her sted had borne,
Called Fidess', and so supposd to bee;
Long with her traveild, till at last they see
A goodly building, bravely garnishèd,
The house of mightie Prince it seemd to bee:
And towards it a broad high way that led,
All bare through peoples feet, which thither traveilèd.

3

Great troupes of people traveild thitherward
Both day and night, of each degree and place,
But few returnèd, having scapèd hard,° with difficulty
With balefull° beggerie, or foule disgrace, miserable
Which ever after in most wretched case,
Like loathsome lazars,° by the hedges lay. lepers
Thither Duessa bad him bend his pace:
For she is wearie of the toilesome way,
And also nigh consumèd is the lingring day.

4

A stately Pallace built of squarèd bricke,
Which cunningly was without morter laid,
Whose wals were high, but nothing strong, nor thick,
And golden foile[1] all over them displaid,
That purest skye with brightnesse they dismaid:
High lifted up were many loftie towres,
And goodly galleries farre over laid,
Full of faire windowes, and delightfull bowres;
And on the top a Diall° told the timely howres. clock, timepiece

5

It was a goodly heape° for to behould, edifice
And spake the praises of the workmans wit;
But full great pittie, that so faire a mould
Did on so weake foundation ever sit:
For on a sandie hill, that still did flit,° shift
And fall away, it mounted was full hie,
That every breath of heaven shakèd it:
And all the hinder parts, that few could spie,
Were ruinous and old, but painted cunningly.

6

Arrivèd there they passèd in forth right;
For still to all the gates stood open wide,
Yet charge of them was to a Porter hight° designated
Cald Maluenù, who entrance none denide:
Thence to the hall, which was on every side
With rich array and costly arras dight:° decorated
Infinite sorts of people did abide
There waiting long, to win the wishèd sight
Of her, that was the Lady of that Pallace bright.

7

By them they passe, all gazing on them round,
And to the Presence[2] mount; whose glorious vew
Their frayle amazèd senses did confound:
In living Princes court none ever knew
Such endlesse richesse, and so sumptuous shew;
Ne Persia selfe, the nourse° of pompous pride nurse
Like ever saw. And there a noble crew
Of Lordes and Ladies stood on every side
Which with their presence faire, the place much beautifide.

8

High above all a cloth of State was spred,
And a rich throne, as bright as sunny day,
On which there sate most brave° embellished handsomely
With royall robes and gorgeous array,
A mayden Queene, that shone as Titans ray,
In glistring gold, and peerelesse pretious stone:
Yet her bright blazing beautie did assay
To dim the brightnesse of her glorious throne,
As envying her selfe, that too exceeding shone.

---

[1] golden foile Thin layer of gold.

[2] Presence Presence-chamber, where members of the royalty receive guests.

9
Exceeding shone, like Phoebus fairest childe,[1]
That did presume his fathers firie wayne,° chariot
And flaming mouthes of steedes unwonted° wilde unusually
Through highest heaven with weaker hand to rayne;
Proud of such glory and advancement vaine,
While flashing beames do daze his feeble eyen,
He leaves the welkin° way most beaten plaine, heavenly
And rapt with whirling wheeles, inflames the skyen,
With fire not made to burne, but fairely for to shyne.

10
So proud she shynèd in her Princely state,
Looking to heaven; for earth she did disdayne,
And sitting high; for lowly she did hate:
Lo underneath her scornefull feete, was layne
A dreadfull Dragon with an hideous trayne,° tail
And in her hand she held a mirrhour bright,
Wherein her face she often vewèd fayne,° gladly
And in her selfe-lov'd semblance tooke delight;
For she was wondrous faire, as any living wight.

11
Of griesly Pluto she the daughter was,
And sad Proserpina the Queene of hell;
Yet did she thinke her pearelesse worth to pas
That parentage, with pride so did she swell,
And thundring Jove, that high in heaven doth dwell,
And wield the world, she claymèd for her syre,
Or if that any else did Jove excell:
For to the highest she did still aspyre,
Or if ought higher were then that, did it desyre.

12
And proud Lucifera men did her call,
That made her selfe a Queene, and crownd to be,
Yet rightfull kingdome she had none at all,
Ne heritage of native soveraintie,
But did usurpe with wrong and tyrannie
Upon the scepter, which she now did hold:
Ne ruld her Realmes with lawes, but pollicie,° political cunning
And strong advizement of six wisards old,
That with their counsels bad her kingdome did uphold.

13
Soone as the Elfin knight in presence came,
And false Duessa seeming Lady faire,
A gentle Husher,° Vanitie by name usher
Made rowme, and passage for them did prepaire:
So goodly brought them to the lowest staire
Of her high throne, where they on humble knee
Making obeyssance, did the cause declare,
Why they were come, her royall state to see,
To prove° the wide report of her great Majestee. confirm

14
With loftie eyes, halfe loth to looke so low,
She thankèd them in her disdainefull wise,° fashion
Ne other grace vouchsafèd them to show
Of Princesse worthy, scarse them bad arise.
Her Lordes and Ladies all this while devise° prepare Themselves to setten forth to straungers sight:
Some frounce° their curlèd haire in courtly guise, frizz
Some prancke° their ruffes, and others trimly dight pleat
Their gay attire: each others greater pride does spight.

15
Goodly they all that knight do entertaine,
Right glad with him to have increast their crew:
But to Duess' each one himselfe did paine
All kindnesse and faire courtesie to shew;
For in that court whylome° her well they knew: previously
Yet the stout Faerie mongst the middest° crowd central Thought all their glorie vaine in knightly vew,
And that great Princesse too exceeding prowd,
That to strange knight no better countenance allowd.

16
Suddein upriseth from her stately place
The royall Dame, and for her coche doth call:
All hurtlen° forth, and she with Princely pace, rush
As faire Aurora in her purple° pall,° crimson / robe
Out of the East the dawning day doth call:
So forth she comes: her brightnesse brode° doth blaze; abroad
The heapes of people thronging in the hall,

---

[1] Phoebus ... childe Phaeton, son of Apollo, tried to drive his father's chariot (by which the sun was pulled across the sky), but he lost control of the horses and was hurled down by Jove.

Do ride each other, upon her to gaze:
Her glorious glitterand light doth all mens eyes amaze.

17

So forth she comes, and to her coche does clyme,
Adornèd all with gold, and girlonds gay,
That seemd as fresh as Flora in her prime,
And strove to match, in royall rich array,
Great Junoes golden chaire, the which they say
The Gods stand gazing on, when she does ride
To Joves high house through heavens bras-pavèd way
Drawne of faire Pecocks, that excell in pride,
And full of Argus eyes[1] their tailes dispredden wide.

18

But this was drawne of six unequall beasts,[2]
On which her six sage Counsellours did ryde,
Taught to obay their bestiall beheasts,
With like conditions to their kinds° applyde: natures
Of which the first, that all the rest did guyde,
Was sluggish Idlenesse thē nourse of sin;
Upon a slouthfull Asse he chose to ryde,
Arayd in habit blacke, and amis[3] thin,
Like to an holy Monck, the service to begin.

19

And in his hand his Portesse° still he bare, prayer book
That much was worne, but therein little red,
For of devotion he had little care,
Still drownd in sleepe, and most of his dayes ded;
Scarse could he once uphold his heavie hed,
To looken, whether it were night or day:
May seeme the wayne was very evill led,
When such an one had guiding of the way,
That knew not, whether right he went, or else astray.

20

From worldy cares himselfe he did esloyne,° remove
And greatly shunnèd manly exercise,
From every worke he chalengèd° essoyne,° claimed / exemption
For contemplation sake: yet otherwise,
His life he led in lawlesse riotise;° riot
By which he grew to grievous malady;
For in his lustlesse limbs through evill guise
A shaking fever raignd continually:
Such one was Idlenesse, first of this company.

21

And by his side rode loathsome Gluttony,
Deformèd creature, on a filthie swyne,
His belly was up-blowne with luxury,° indulgence
And eke with fatnesse swollen were his eyne,
And like a Crane[4] his necke was long and fyne,
With which he swallowd up excessive feast,
For want whereof poore people oft did pyne;
And all the way, most like a brutish beast,
He spuèd° up his gorge, that° all did him deteast. vomited / so that

22

In greene vine leaves he was right fitly clad;
For other clothes he could not weare for heat,
And on his head an yvie girland had,
From under which fast trickled downe the sweat:
Still as he rode, he somewhat still did eat,
And in his hand did beare a bouzing° can, drinking
Of which he supt so oft, that on his seat
His dronken corse he scarse upholden can,
In shape and life more like a monster, then a man.

23

Unfit he was for any worldy thing,
And eke unhable once to stirre or go,
Not meet to be of counsell to a king,
Whose mind in meat and drinke was drownèd so,
That from his friend he seldome knew his fo:
Full of diseases was his carcas blew,

---

[1] full of Argus eyes The monster Argus, who had one hundred eyes, was sent by Juno to watch Io, who was loved by Juno's husband, Jove. When Argus was killed, Juno placed his eyes in the tail-feathers of a peacock.

[2] six unequall beasts Lucifera, the personification of Pride, worst of the Seven Deadly Sins, leads her counselors, who personify the other six. They ride symbolically relevant animals.

[3] amis I.e., amice, priestly vestment.

[4] Crane Symbol of gluttony; it was thought the crane's long neck gave it increased pleasure in swallowing.

And a dry dropsie[1] through his flesh did flow:
Which by misdiet daily greater grew:
Such one was Gluttony, the second of that crew.

24

And next to him rode lustfull Lechery,
Upon a bearded Goat, whose rugged haire,
And whally° eyes (the signe of gelosy,) glaring
Was like the person selfe, whom he did beare:
Who rough, and blacke, and filthy did appeare,
Unseemely man to please faire Ladies eye;
Yet he of Ladies oft was lovèd deare,
When fairer faces were bid standen by:° away
O who does know the bent of womens fantasy?

25

In a greene gowne he clothèd was full faire,
Which underneath did hide his filthinesse,
And in his hand a burning hart he bare,
Full of vaine follies, and new fanglenesse:
For he was false, and fraught with ficklenesse,
And learnèd had to love with secret lookes,
And well could daunce, and sing with ruefulnesse,° dejection
And fortunes tell, and read in loving° bookes, erotic
And thousand other wayes, to bait his fleshly hookes.

26

Inconstant man, that lovèd all he saw,
And lusted after all, that he did love,
Ne would his looser life be tide to law,
But joyd weake wemens hearts to tempt, and prove° test
If from their loyall loves he might then move;
Which lewdnesse fild him with reprochfull paine
Of that fowle evill, which all men reprove,
That rots the marrow, and consumes the braine:[2]
Such one was Lecherie, the third of all this traine.

27

And greedy Avarice by him did ride,
Upon a Camell loaden all with gold;
Two iron coffers hong on either side,
With precious mettall full, as they might hold,
And in his lap an heape of coine he told;° counted
For of his wicked pelfe° his God he made, riches
And unto hell him selfe for money sold;
Accursèd usurie was all his trade,
And right and wrong ylike in equall ballaunce waide.

28

His life was nigh unto deaths doore yplast,
And thred-bare cote, and cobled shoes he ware,
Ne scarse good morsell all his life did tast,
But both from backe and belly still did spare,
To fill his bags, and richesse to compare;° obtain
Yet chylde ne kinsman living had he none
To leave them to; but thorough daily care
To get, and nightly feare to lose his owne,
He led a wretched life unto him selfe unknowne.

29

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffise,
Whose greedy lust did lacke in greatest store,° plenty
Whose need had end, but no end covetise,° covetousness
Whose wealth was want, whose plenty made him pore,
Who had enough, yet wishèd ever more;
A vile disease, and eke in foote and hand
A grievous gout tormented him full sore,
That well he could not touch, nor go, nor stand:
Such one was Avarice, the fourth of this faire band.

30

And next to him malicious Envie rode,
Upon a ravenous wolfe, and still did chaw° chew
Betweene his cankred° teeth a venemous tode, infected
That all the poison ran about his chaw;° jaw
But inwardly he chawèd his owne maw° guts
At neighbours wealth, that made him ever sad;
For death it was, when any good he saw,
And wept, that cause of weeping none he had,
But when he heard of harme, he wexèd wondrous glad.

31

All in a kirtle° of discolourd° say[3] tunic / multicolored
He clothed was, ypainted full of eyes;
And in his bosome secretly there lay
An hatefull Snake, the which his taile uptyes
In many folds, and mortall sting implyes.

---

[1] dropsie I.e., dropsy, disease in which fluid accumulates in the bodily tissue and causes bloating.

[2] that fowle … braine I.e., syphilis.

[3] say Fine cloth, usually made of a mixture of silk and wool.

Still as he rode, he gnasht his teeth, to see
Those heapes of gold with griple° grasping
Covetyse,° avarice
And grudgèd at the great felicitie
Of proud Lucifera, and his owne companie.

32

He hated all good workes and vertuous deeds,
And him no lesse, that any like did use,° perform
And who with gracious bread the hungry feeds,
His almes for want of faith he doth accuse;[1]
So every good to bad he doth abuse:° misrepresent
And eke the verse of famous Poets witt
He does backebite, and spightfull poison spues
From leprous mouth on all, that ever writt:
Such one vile Envie was, that fifte in row did sitt.

33

And him beside rides fierce revenging Wrath,
Upon a Lion, loth for to be led;
And in his hand a burning brond° he hath, sword
The which he brandisheth about his hed;
His eyes did hurle forth sparkles fiery red,
And starèd sterne on all, that him beheld,
As ashes pale of hew and seeming ded;
And on his dagger still his hand he held,
Trembling through hasty rage, when choler° anger
in him sweld.

34

His ruffin° raiment all was staind with blood, disordered
Which he had spilt, and all to rags yrent,
Through unadvizèd rashnesse woxen° grew
wood;° mad
For of his hands he had no governement,° control
Ne car'd for bloud in his avengement:
But when the furious fit was overpast,
His cruell facts° he often would repent; deeds
Yet wilfull man he never would forecast,° foresee
How many mischieves should ensue his heedlesse hast.

35

Full many mischiefes follow cruell Wrath;
Abhorrèd bloudshed, and tumultuous strife,
Unmanly murder, and unthrifty° scath,° wasteful / damage
Bitter despight,° with rancours rusty knife, contempt
And fretting griefe the enemy of life;
All these, and many evils moe haunt ire,
The swelling Splene,[2] and Frenzy raging rife,
The shaking Palsey, and Saint Fraunces fire:[3]
Such one was Wrath, the last of this ungodly tire.° procession

36

And after all, upon the wagon beame
Rode Sathan, with a smarting whip in hand,
With which he forward lasht the laesie teme,
So oft as Slowth still in the mire did stand.
Huge routs° of people did about them band, crowds
Showting for joy, and still° before their way always
A foggy mist had covered all the land;
And underneath their feet, all scattered lay
Dead sculs & bones of men, whose life had gone astray.

37

So forth they marchen in this goodly sort,
To take the solace of the open aire,
And in fresh flowring fields themselves to sport;
Emongst the rest rode that false Lady faire,
The fowle Duessa, next unto the chaire
Of proud Lucifera, as one of the traine:
But that good knight would not so nigh repaire,° approach
Him selfe estraunging from their joyaunce vaine,
Whose fellowship seemd far unfit for warlike swaine.

38

So having solacèd themselves a space
With pleasaunce of the breathing° fields yfed fragrant
They backe returned to the Princely Place;
Whereas° an errant knight in armes ycled, where
And heathnish shield, wherein with letters red
Was writ Sans joy, they new arrivèd find:
Enflam'd with fury and fiers hardy-hed,° hardihood
He seemd in hart to harbour thoughts unkind,
And nourish bloudy vengeaunce in his bitter mind.

---

[1] His almes … accuse Envy accuses those who give to the poor of doing so in an attempt to hide their lack of faith.

[2] Splene I.e., spleen, ill-humor or violent temper.

[3] Saint Fraunces fire Erysipelas; also known as wildfire or St. Anthony's fire, an inflammatory disease of the skin which produces a red rash.

39

Who when the shamèd shield of slaine Sans foy
He spide with that same Faery champions page,
Bewraying him, that did of late destroy
His eldest brother, burning all with rage
He to him leapt, and that same envious° gage° envied token
Of victors glory from him snatcht away:
But th'Elfin knight, which ought° that warlike° wage,° owned of war / spoil
Disdaind to loose the meed° he wonne in fray, prize
And him rencountring fierce, reskewd° the noble pray. rescued

40

Therewith they gan to hurtlen° greedily, rush
Redoubted battaile ready to darrayne,° engage
And clash their shields, and shake their swords on hy,
That with their sturre they troubled all the traine;
Till that great Queene upon eternall paine
Of high displeasure, that ensewen might,
Commaunded them their fury to refraine,
And if that either to that shield had right,
In equall lists they should the morrow next it fight.

41

Ah dearest Dame, (quoth then the Paynim bold,)
Pardon the errour of enragèd wight,
Whom great griefe made forget the raines to hold
Of reasons rule, to see this recreant° knight, faint-hearted
No knight, but treachour° full of false despight traitor
And shamefull treason, who through guile hath slayn
The prowest knight, that ever field did fight,
Even stout Sans foy (O who can then refrayn?)
Whose shield he beares renverst, the more to heape disdayn.[1]

42

And to augment the glorie of his guile,
His dearest love the faire Fidessa loe° look
Is there possessèd of° the traytour vile, by
Who reapes the harvest sowen by his foe,
Sowen in bloudy field, and bought with woe:
That brothers hand shall dearely well requight
So be,[2] O Queene, you equall favour showe.
Him litle answerd th'angry Elfin knight;
He never meant with words, but swords to plead his right.

43

But threw his gauntlet as a sacred pledge,
His cause in combat the next day to try:
So been they parted both, with harts on edge,
To be aveng'd each on his enimy.
That night they pas in joy and jollity,
Feasting and courting both in bowre and hall;
For Steward was excessive Gluttonie,
That of his plenty poured forth to all:
Which doen, the Chamberlain Slowth did to rest them call.

44

Now whenas darkesome night had all displayd
Her coleblacke curtein over brightest skye,
The warlike youthes on dayntie couches layd,
Did chace away sweet sleepe from sluggish eye,
To muse on meanes of hopèd victory.
But whenas Morpheus had with leaden mace
Arrested[3] all that courtly company,
Up-rose Duessa from her resting place,
And to the Paynims lodging comes with silent pace.

45

Whom broad awake she finds, in troublous fit,
Forecasting, how his foe he might annoy,° harm
And him amoves° with speaches seeming fit: arouses
Ah deare Sans joy, next dearest to Sans foy,
Cause of my new griefe, cause of my new joy,
Joyous, to see his ymage in mine eye,
And greev'd, to thinke how foe did him destroy,
That was the flowre of grace and chevalrye;
Lo his Fidessa to thy secret faith I flye.

46

With gentle wordes he can° her fairely greet, did
And bad° say on the secret of her hart. bade
Then sighing soft, I learne that litle sweet

---

[1] Whose … disdayn Carrying a shield upside down was considered a great insult.

[2] So be If.

[3] Arrested I.e., put to sleep.

Oft tempred is (quoth she) with muchell° smart:° much pain
For since my brest was launcht with lovely° dart of love
Of deare Sans foy, I never joyèd howre,
But in eternall woes my weaker° hart too weak
Have wasted, loving him with all my powre,
And for his sake have felt full many an heavie stowre.° turmoil

47

At last when perils all I weenèd past,
And hop'd to reape the crop of all my care,
Into new woes unweeting I was cast,
By this false faytor,° who unworthy ware imposter
His worthy shield, whom he with guilefull snare
Entrappèd slew, and brought to shamefull grave.
Me silly° maid away with him he bare, helpless
And ever since hath kept in darksome cave,
For that I would not yeeld, that to Sans-foy I gave.

48

But since faire Sunne hath sperst° that lowring clowd, dispersed
And to my loathèd life now shewes some light,
Under your beames I will me safely shrowd,
From dreaded storme of his disdainfull spight:
To you th'inheritance belongs by right
Of brothers prayse, to you eke longs° his love. belongs
Let not his love, let not his restlesse spright° spirit
Be unreveng'd, that calles to you above
From wandring Stygian shores,[1] where it doth endlesse move.

49

Thereto said he, Faire Dame be nought dismaid
For sorrowes past; their griefe is with them gone:
Ne yet of present perill be affraid;
For needlesse feare did never vantage none,
And helplesse hap it booteth not to mone.° bemoan
Dead is Sans-foy, his vitall° paines are past, living
Though greevèd ghost for vengeance deepe do grone:
He lives, that shall him pay his dewties° last, rites
And guiltie Elfin bloud shall sacrifice in hast.

50

O but I feare the fickle° freakes° (quoth shee) unpredictable / whims
Of fortune false, and oddes° of armes in field. advantages
Why dame (quoth he) what oddes can ever bee,
Where both do fight alike, to win or yield?
Yea but (quoth she) he beares a charmèd shield,
And eke enchaunted armes, that none can perce,
Ne none can wound the man, that does them wield.
Charmd or enchaunted (answerd he then ferce)° fiercely
I no whit reck,° ne you the like need to reherce.° care recount

51

But faire Fidessa, sithens fortunes guile,
Or enimies powre hath now captivèd you,
Returne from whence ye came, and rest a while
Till morrow next, that I the Elfe subdew,
And with Sans-foyes dead dowry you endew.
Ay me, that is a double death (she said)
With proud foes sight my sorrow to renew:
Where ever yet I be, my secrete aid
Shall follow you. So passing forth she him obaid.

CANTO 5

The faithfull knight in equall field
Subdewes his faithlesse foe,
Whom false Duessa saves, and for
His cure to hell does goe.

1

The noble hart, that harbours vertuous thought,
And is with child of glorious great intent,
Can never rest, untill it forth have brought Th'eternall brood of glorie excellent:
Such restlesse passion did all night torment
The flaming corage of that Faery knight,
Devizing, how that doughtie° tournament worthy
With greatest honour he atchieven might;
Still did he wake, and still did watch for dawning light.

---

[1] Stygian shores Shores of the river Styx, across which (according to classical mythology) all souls had to travel to reach Hades. Those who were not given a proper funeral were condemned to wander the banks of the river for one hundred years.

2

At last the golden Orientall° gate eastern
Of greatest heaven gan to open faire,
And Phoebus fresh, as bridegrome to his mate,
Came dauncing forth, shaking his deawie haire:
And hurld his glistring° beames through gloomy aire. glistening
Which when the wakeful Elfe perceiv'd, streight way
He started up, and did him selfe prepaire,
In sun-bright armes, and battailous array:
For with that Pagan proud he combat will that day.

3

And forth he comes into the commune hall,
Where earely waite him many a gazing eye,
To weet what end to straunger knights may fall.
There many Minstrales maken melody,
To drive away the dull melancholy,
And many Bardes, that to the trembling chord
Can tune their timely voyces cunningly,
And many Chroniclers, that can record
Old loves, and warres for Ladies doen by many a Lord.

4

Soone after comes the cruell Sarazin,
In woven maile all armèd warily,
And sternly lookes at him, who not a pin
Does care for looke of living creatures eye.
They bring them wines of Greece and Araby,
And daintie spices fetcht from furthest Ynd,° India
To kindle heat of corage privily:° internally
And in the wine a solemne oth they bynd
T'observe the sacred lawes of armes, that are assynd.

5

At last forth comes that far renowmèd Queene,
With royall pomp and Princely majestie;
She is ybrought unto a palèd° greene, enclosed
And placèd under stately canapee,
The warlike feates of both those knights to see.
On th'other side in all mens open vew
Duessa placèd is, and on a tree
Sans-foy his shield is hangd with bloudy hew:
Both those the lawrell girlonds[1] to the victor dew.

6

A shrilling trompet sownded from on hye,
And unto battaill bad them selves addresse:
Their shining shieldes about their wrestes° they tye, wrists
And burning blades about their heads do blesse,[2]
The instruments of wrath and heavinesse:
With greedy force each other doth assayle,
And strike so fiercely, that they do impresse
Deepe dinted furrowes in the battred mayle;
The yron walles[3] to ward their blowes are weake & fraile.

7

The Sarazin was stout, and wondrous strong,
And heapèd blowes like yron hammers great:
For after bloud and vengeance he did long.
The knight was fiers, and full of youthly heat:
And doubled strokes, like dreaded thunders threat:
For all for prayse and honour he did fight.
Both stricken strike, and beaten both do beat,
That from their shields forth flyeth firie light,
And helmets hewen deepe, shew marks of eithers might.

8

So th'one for wrong, the other strives for right:
As when a Gryfon[4] seizèd° of his pray, having seized
A Dragon fiers encountreth in his flight,
Through widest ayre making his ydle way,
That would his rightfull ravine° rend away: spoils
With hideous horrour both together smight,
And souce° so sore, that they the heavens affray: smite
The wise Southsayer seeing so sad sight,
Th'amazèd vulgar tels of warres and mortall fight.

9

So th'one for wrong, the other strives for right,
And each to deadly shame would drive his foe:
The cruell steele so greedily doth bight
In tender flesh, that streames of bloud down flow,
With which the armes, that earst so bright did show,
Into a pure vermillion now are dyde:

---

[1] lawrell girlonds Laurel wreaths were awarded to victorious athletes.

[2] blesse Brandish (by making the sign of the cross).

[3] yron walles I.e., of their armor.

[4] Gryfon I.e., griffin, gryphon, or griffon: mythical monster with the head and wings of an eagle and the body of a lion.

Great ruth° in all the gazers harts did grow, compassion
Seeing the gorèd woundes to gape so wyde,
That victory they dare not wish to either side.

10

At last the Paynim chaunst to cast his eye,
His suddein° eye, flaming with wrathfull fyre, quickly glancing
Upon his brothers shield, which hong thereby:
Therewith redoubled was his raging yre,
And said, Ah wretched sonne of wofull syre,
Doest thou sit wayling by black Stygian lake,
Whilest here thy shield is hangd for victors hyre,° reward
And sluggish german° doest thy forces slake, brother
To after-send his foe, that him may overtake?

11

Goe caytive° Elfe, him quickly overtake, servile
And soone redeeme from his long wandring woe;
Goe guiltie ghost,° to him my message make, spirit
That I his shield have quit from dying foe.
Therewith upon his crest he stroke him so,
That twise he reelèd, readie twise to fall;
End of the doubtfull battell deemèd tho
The lookers on, and lowd to him gan call
The false Duessa, Thine the shield, and I, and all.

12

Soone as the Faerie heard his Ladie speake,
Out of his swowning dreame he gan awake,
And quickning faith, that earst was woxen weake,
The creeping deadly cold away did shake:
Tho mov'd with wrath, and shame, and Ladies sake,
Of all attonce he cast° avengd to bee, resolved
And with so'exceeding furie at him strake,
That forcèd him to stoupe upon his knee;
Had he not stoupèd so, he should have cloven bee.

13

And to him said, Goe now proud Miscreant,° infidel
Thy selfe thy message doe° to german deare, bring
Alone he wandring thee too long doth want:
Goe say, his foe thy shield with his doth beare.
Therewith his heavie hand he high gan reare,
Him to have slaine; when loe a darkesome clowd
Upon him fell: he no where doth appeare,
But vanisht is. The Elfe him cals alowd,
But answer none receives: the darknes him does shrowd.

14

In haste Duessa from her place arose,
And to him running said, O prowest knight,
That ever Ladie to her love did chose,
Let now abate the terror of your might,
And quench the flame of furious despight,
And bloudie vengeance; lo th'infernall powres
Covering your foe with cloud of deadly night,
Have borne him hence to Plutoes balefull° bowres. deadly
The conquest yours, I yours, the shield, and glory yours.

15

Not all so satisfide, with greedie eye
He sought all round about, his thirstie blade
To bath in bloud of faithlesse enemy;
Who all that while lay hid in secret shade:
He standes amazèd, how he thence should fade.
At last the trumpets Triumph sound on hie,
And running Heralds humble homage made,
Greeting him goodly with new victorie,
And to him brought the shield, the cause of enmitie.

16

Wherewith he goeth to that soveraine Queene,
And falling her before on lowly knee,
To her makes present of his service seene:
Which she accepts, with thankes, and goodly gree,° favor
Greatly advauncing° his gay chevalree. extolling
So marcheth home, and by her takes the knight,
Whom all the people follow with great glee,
Shouting, and clapping all their hands on hight,
That all the aire it fils, and flyes to heaven bright.

17

Home is he brought, and laid in sumptuous bed:
Where many skilfull leaches° him abide,° doctors / attend
To salve his hurts, that yet still freshly bled.
In wine and oyle they wash his woundes wide,
And softly can embalme on every side.
And all the while, most heavenly melody
About the bed sweet musicke did divide,° play

Him to beguile of griefe and agony:
And all the while Duessa wept full bitterly.

18

As when a wearie traveller that strayes
By muddy shore of broad seven-mouthèd Nile,
Unweeting of the perillous wandring wayes,
Doth meet a cruell craftie Crocodile,
Which in false griefe hyding his harmefull guile,
Doth weepe full sore, and sheddeth tender teares:
The foolish man, that pitties all this while
His mournefull plight, is swallowd up unwares,
Forgetfull of his owne, that mindes anothers cares.

19

So wept Duessa untill eventide,
That shyning lampes in Joves high house were light:
Then forth she rose, ne lenger would abide,
But comes unto the place, where th'Hethen knight
In slombring swownd° nigh voyd of vitall spright, swoon
Lay cover'd with inchaunted cloud all day:
Whom when she found, as she him left in plight,[1]
To wayle his woefull case she would not stay,
But to the easterne coast of heaven makes speedy way.

20

Where griesly Night, with visage deadly sad,
That Phoebus chearefull face durst never vew,
And in a foule blacke pitchie mantle clad,
She findes forth comming from her darkesome mew,° den
Where she all day did hide her hated hew.
Before the dore her yron charet stood,
Alreadie harnessèd for journey new;
And coleblacke steedes yborne of hellish brood,
That on their rustie bits did champ, as they were wood.° crazy

21

Who when she saw Duessa sunny bright,
Adornd with gold and jewels shining cleare,
She greatly grew amazèd at the sight,
And th'unacquainted light began to feare:
For never did such brightnesse there appeare,
And would have backe retyred to her cave,
Untill the witches speech she gan to heare,
Saying, Yet O thou dreaded Dame, I crave
Abide, till I have told the message, which I have.

22

She stayd, and foorth Duessa gan proceede,
O thou most auncient Grandmother of all,[2]
More old then Jove, whom thou at first didst breede,
Or that great house of Gods cælestiall,
Which wast begot in Dæmogorgons[3] hall,
And sawst the secrets of the world unmade,
Why suffredst thou thy Nephewes° deare to fall grandsons
With Elfin sword, most shamefully betrade?
Lo where the stout Sansjoy doth sleepe in deadly shade.

23

And him before, I saw with bitter eyes
The bold Sansfoy shrinke underneath his speare;
And now the pray of fowles in field he lyes,
Nor wayld of friends, nor laid on groning beare,[4]
That whylome was to me too dearely deare.
O what of Gods then boots it to be borne,
If old Aveugles sonnes so evill heare?[5]
Or who shall not great Nightes children scorne,
When two of three her Nephews are so fowle forlorne?

24

Up then, up dreary Dame, of darknesse Queene,
Go gather up the reliques of thy race,
Or else goe them avenge, and let be seene,
That dreaded Night in brightest day hath place,
And can the children of faire light deface.
Her feeling speeches some compassion moved
In hart, and chaunge in that great mothers face:
Yet pittie in her hart was never proved° known
Till then: for evermore she hated, never loved.

---

[1] in plight In the same condition in which she found him.

[2] O … all According to myth, Night existed before the world was formed and the rest of the gods were born.

[3] Dæmogorgons I.e., Demogorgons.

[4] groning beare That is, the bier would be attended by moaning or weeping mourners.

[5] If … heare If the sons of Aveugle are so poorly thought of. Aveugle (French for blind) is the son of Night and the father of Sansfoy, Sansjoy, and Sansloy.

25

And said, Deare daughter rightly may I rew
The fall of famous children borne of mee,
And good successes, which their foes ensew:
But who can turne the streame of destinee,
Or breake the chayne of strong necessitee,
Which fast is tyde to Joves eternall seat?
The sonnes of Day he favoureth, I see,
And by my ruines thinkes to make them great:
To make one great by others losse, is bad excheat.° exchange

26

Yet shall they not escape so freely all;
For some shall pay the price of others guilt:
And he the man that made Sansfoy to fall,
Shall with his owne bloud price° that he hath spilt. pay for
But what art thou, that telst of Nephews kilt?
I that do seeme not I, Duessa am,
(Quoth she) how ever now in garments gilt,
And gorgeous gold arayd I to thee came;
Duessa I, the daughter of Deceipt and Shame.

27

Then bowing downe her agèd backe, she kist
The wicked witch, saying; In that faire face
The false resemblance of Deceipt, I wist° knew
Did closely° lurke; yet so true-seeming grace secretly
It carried, that I scarse in darkesome place
Could it discerne, though I the mother bee
Of falshood, and root of Duessaes race.
O welcome child, whom I have longd to see,
And how have seene unwares. Lo now I go with thee.

28

Then to her yron wagon she betakes,
And with her beares the fowle welfavourd witch:
Through mirkesome° aire her readie way she makes. murky
Her twyfold° Teme, of which two blacke as pitch, twofold
And two were browne, yet each to each unlich,° unlike
Did softly swim away, ne ever stampe,
Unlesse she chaunst their stubborne mouths to twitch;
Then foming tarre, their bridles they would champe,
And trampling the fine element,° would fiercely rampe.° air rear

29

So well they sped, that they be come at length
Unto the place, whereas the Paynim lay,
Devoid of outward sense, and native strength,
Coverd with charmèd cloud from vew of day,
And sight of men, since his late luckelesse fray.
His cruell wounds with cruddy bloud congealed,
They binden up so wisely,° as they may, skillfully
And handle softly, till they can be healed:
So lay him in her charet, close in night concealed.

30

And all the while she stood upon the ground,
The wakefull dogs did never cease to bay,
As giving warning of th'unwonted° sound, unaccustomed
With which her yron wheeles did them affray,
And her darke griesly looke them much dismay;
The messenger of death, the ghastly Owle
With drearie shriekes did also her bewray;° expose
And hungry Wolves continually did howle,
At her abhorred face, so filthy and so fowle.

31

Thence turning backe in silence soft they stole,
And brought the heavie corse with easie pace
To yawning gulfe of deepe Avernus hole.[1]
By that same hole an entrance darke and bace° low
With smoake and sulphure hiding all the place,
Descends to hell: there creature never past,
That backe returnèd without heavenly grace;
But dreadfull Furies, which their chaines have brast,° burst
And damnèd sprights sent forth to make ill men aghast.

32

By that same way the direfull° dames doe drive dreadful
Their mournefull charet, fild° with rusty blood, defiled
And downe to Plutoes house are come bilive:° immediately
Which passing through, on every side them stood
The trembling ghosts with sad amazèd mood,
Chattring their yron teeth, and staring wide
With stonie eyes; and all the hellish brood

---

[1] Avernus hole Hell.

Of feends infernall flockt on every side,
To gaze on earthly wight, that with the Night durst° ride. dared

33

They pas the bitter waves of Acheron,
Where many soules sit wailing woefully,
And come to fiery flood of Phlegeton,[1]
Whereas the damnèd ghosts in torments fry,
And with sharpe shrilling shriekes doe bootlesse cry,
Cursing high Jove, the which them thither sent.
The house of endlesse paine is built thereby,
In which ten thousand sorts of punishment
The cursèd creatures doe eternally torment.

34

Before the threshold dreadfull Cerberus[2]
His three deformèd heads did lay along,
Curled with thousand adders venemous,
And lillèd° forth his bloudie flaming tong: lolled
At them he gan to reare his bristles strong,
And felly gnarre,° untill dayes enemy fiercely snarl
Did him appease; then downe his taile he hong
And suffered them to passen quietly:
For she in hell and heaven had power equally.

35

There was Ixion turnèd on a wheele,
For daring tempt the Queene of heaven to sin;
And Sisyphus an huge round stone did reele
Against an hill, ne might from labour lin;° cease
There thirstie Tantalus hong by the chin;
And Tityus fed a vulture on his maw;
Typhoeus joynts were stretchèd on a gin,° rack
Theseus condemned to endlesse slouth° by law, sloth
And fifty sisters[3] water in leake vessels draw.

36

They all beholding worldly° wights in place, mortal
Leave off their worke, unmindfull of their smart,
To gaze on them; who forth by them doe pace,
Till they be come unto the furthest part:
Where was a Cave ywrought by wondrous art,
Deepe, darke, uneasie, dolefull, comfortlesse,
In which sad Æsculapius[4] farre a part
Emprisond was in chaines remedilesse,
For that Hippolytus rent corse he did redresse.° restore

37

Hippolytus a jolly huntsman was,
That wont° in charet chace the foming Bore;° was accustomed to boar
He all his Peeres in beautie did surpas,
But Ladies love as losse of time forbore:° abstained from
His wanton stepdame[5] lovèd him the more,
But when she saw her offred sweets refused
Her love she turnd to hate, and him before
His father fierce of treason false accused,
And with her gealous° termes his open eares abused. causing jealousy

38

Who all in rage his Sea-god syre[6] besought,
Some cursèd vengeance on his sonne to cast:
From surging gulf two monsters straight were brought,
With dread whereof his chasing steedes aghast,
Both charet swift and huntsman overcast.
His goodly corps on ragged cliffs yrent,
Was quite dismembred, and his members chast
Scattered on every mountaine, as he went,
That of Hippolytus was left no moniment.

---

[1] Acheron … Phlegeton Two rivers of the underworld.

[2] Cerberus Three-headed dog that guards the entrance to the underworld.

[3] Ixion King of Thessaly who attempted to seduce Hera and, as punishment, was bound to an ever-revolving wheel; Sisyphus Punished for his greed and cruelty by being forced to push a boulder continually up a hill, only to have it roll back down whenever he reached the top; Tantalus After committing a variety of sins, Tantalus was forced to stand chin-deep in water that receded whenever he attempted to drink and with branches of fruit that receded when he attempted to grasp them; Tityus A vulture constantly fed on Tityus's liver as punishment for his attempted seduction of Leto; Theseus Greek hero who tried to steal Persephone from Hades and instead was trapped in a chair of forgetfulness; fifty sisters Daughters of King Danaus who all killed their husbands on their wedding nights, and for this were condemned to forever collect water in leaky vessels.

[4] Æsculapius God of medicine.

[5] His wanton stepdame I.e., his stepmother, Phaedra, wife of Theseus.

[6] Sea-god syre I.e., Poseidon.

39

His cruell stepdame seeing what was donne,
Her wicked dayes with wretched knife did end,
In death avowing th'innocence of her sonne.
Which hearing his rash Syre, began to rend
His haire, and hastie tongue, that did offend:
Tho° gathering up the relicks of his smart then
By Dianes[1] meanes, who was Hippolyts frend,
Them brought to Æsculape, that by his art
Did heale them all againe, and joyned every part.

40

Such wondrous science in mans wit to raine
When Jove avizd,° that could the dead revive, observed
And fates expirèd could renew againe,
Of endlesse life he might him not deprive,
But unto hell did thrust him downe alive,
With flashing thunderbolt ywounded sore:
Where long remaining, he did alwaies strive
Himselfe wilth salves to health for to restore,
And slake the heavenly fire, that raged evermore.

41

There auncient Night arriving, did alight
From her nigh wearie waine, and in her armes
To Æsculapius brought the wounded knight:
Whom having softly disarayd of armes,
Tho gan to him discover all his harmes,
Beseeching him with prayer, and with praise,
If either salves, or oyles, or herbes, or charmes
A fordonne° wight from dore of death mote raise, overcome
He would at her request prolong her nephews daies.

42

Ah Dame (quoth he) thou temptest me in vaine,
To dare the thing, which daily yet I rew,
And the old cause of my continued paine
With like attempt to like end to renew.
Is not enough, that thrust from heaven dew° due
Here endlesse penance for one fault I pay,
But that redoubled crime with vengeance new Thou biddest me to eeke?° Can Night defray° augment appease
The wrath of thundring Jove, that rules both night and day?

43

Not so (quoth she) but sith that heavens king
From hope of heaven hath thee excluded quight,
Why fearest thou, that canst not hope for thing,
And fearest not, that more thee hurten might,
Now in the powre of everlasting Night?
Goe to then, O thou farre renowmèd sonne
Of great Apollo, shew thy famous might
In medicine, that else° hath to thee wonne already Great paines, & greater praise, both never to be donne.° finished

44

Her words prevaild: And then the learnèd leach
His cunning hand gan to his wounds to lay,
And all things else, the which his art did teach:
Which having seene, from thence arose away
The mother of dread darknesse, and let stay
Aveugles sonne there in the leaches cure,° care
And backe returning tooke her wonted way,
To runne her timely race, whilst Phoebus pure
In westerne waves his wearie wagon did recure.

45

The false Duessa leaving noyous° Night, noxious
Returnd to stately pallace of dame Pride;
Where when she came, she found the Faery knight
Departed thence, albe his woundès wide
Not throughly heald, unreadie were to ride.
Good cause he had to hasten thence away;
For on a day his wary Dwarfe had spide,
Where in a dongeon deepe huge numbers lay
Of caytive wretched thrals,° that waylèd night and day. slaves

46

A ruefull sight, as could be seene with eie;° eyes
Of whom he learnèd had in secret wise° manner
The hidden cause of their captivitie,
How mortgaging their lives to Covetise,
Through wastfull Pride, and wanton Riotise,
They were by law of that proud Tyrannesse
Provokt with Wrath, and Envies false surmise,

---

[1] Dianes Virgin goddess of the hunt and of the moon.

Condemned to that Dongeon mercilesse,
Where they should live in woe, & die in wretchednesse.

47

There was that great proud king of Babylon,[1]
That would compell all nations to adore,
And him as onely God to call upon,
Till through celestiall doome throwne out of dore,
Into an Oxe he was transform'd of yore:
There also was king Croesus,[2] that enhaunst° exalted
His heart too high through his great riches store;
And proud Antiochus,[3] the which advaunst
His cursèd hand gainst God, and on his altars daunst.

48

And them long time before, great Nimrod[4] was,
That first the world with sword and fire warrayd;° ravaged
And after him old Ninus[5] farre did pas
In princely pompe, of all the world obayd;
There also was that mightie Monarch[6] layd
Low under all, yet above all in pride,
That name of native syre did fowle upbrayd,
And would as Ammons sonne be magnifide,
Till scornd of God and man a shamefull death he dide.

49

All these together in one heape were throwne,
Like carkases of beasts in butchers stall.
And in another corner wide were strowne
The antique ruines of the Romaines fall:
Great Romulus the Grandsyre of them all,
Proud Tarquin, and too lordly Lentulus,
Stout Scipio, and stubborne Hanniball,
Ambitious Sylla, and sterne Marius,
High Cæsar, great Pompey, and fierce Antonius.[7]

50

Amongst these mighty men were wemen mixt,
Proud wemen, vaine, forgetfull of their yoke:° place
The bold Semiramis,[8] whose sides transfixt
With sonnes owne blade, her fowle reproches spoke;
Faire Sthenoboea,[9] that her selfe did choke
With wilfull cord, for wanting of her will;
High minded Cleopatra,[10] that with stroke
Of Aspes sting her selfe did stoutly kill:
And thousands moe the like, that did that dongeon fill.

51

Besides the endlesse routs of wretched thralles,
Which thither were assembled day by day,
From all the world after their wofull falles,
Through wicked pride, and wasted wealthes decay.
But most of all, which in the Dongeon lay
Fell from high Princes courts, or Ladies bowres,
Where they in idle pompe, or wanton play,
Consumèd had their goods, and thriftlesse howres,
And lastly throwne themselves into these heavy stowres.° troubles

52

Whose case when as the carefull° Dwarfe had tould, troubled
And made ensample of their mournefull sight
Unto his maister, he no lenger would
There dwell in perill of like painefull plight,

---

[1] great … Babylon I.e., Nebuchadnezzar, who made his people worship a golden image of himself. See Daniel 3–4.

[2] king Croesus Ancient king of Lydia, famous for his wealth.

[3] Antiochus King of Syria (215–164 BCE).

[4] Nimrod First tyrant to rule after the flood. He ordered the building of the Tower of Babylon. See Genesis 10–11.

[5] Ninus Founder of Ninevah, the wicked city. See the Book of Jonah.

[6] that mightie Monarch Alexander the Great (356–323 BCE), who claimed to be descended from Jupiter (also called Jupiter Ammon).

[7] Romulus Traditional founder of Rome; Tarquin Cruel Roman tyrant and the last king of Rome (534–510 BCE); Lentulus Roman who conspired against Rome (d. 63 BCE); Scipio Roman general who conquered Africa (236–183 BCE); Hanniball Renowned general from Carthage (247–183/182 BCE); Sylla Sulla, a Roman general who engaged in civil war with Marius (138–78 BCE); Cæsar Roman (100–44 BCE) who fought with, and defeated, Pompey (106–47 BCE); Antonius Marc Antony (83 –31 BCE), who fought Caesar's heir, Octavian, for control of the Roman Empire.

[8] Semiramis Wife of King Ninus who disguised herself as her son in an attempt to gain the throne, but was then killed by her son.

[9] Sthenoboea Wife of King Proteus of Argos who committed suicide when her brother-in-law refused her advances.

[10] Cleopatra Queen of Egypt who committed suicide by allowing herself to be bitten by poisonous snakes when her kingdom was defeated by the Romans (c. 69–30 BCE).

But early rose, and ere that dawning light
Discovered had the world to heaven wyde,
He by a privie° Posterne° tooke his flight, secret / back door
That of no envious eyes he mote be spyde:
For doubtlesse death ensewd, if any him descryde.

53

Scarse could he footing find in that fowle way,
For many corses, like a great Lay-stall
Of murdred men which therein strowèd° lay, strewn
Without remorse, or decent funerall:
Which all through that great Princesse pride did fall
And came to shamefull end. And them beside Forth ryding underneath the castell wall,
A donghill of dead carkases he spide,
The dreadfull spectacle of that sad house of Pride.

CANTO 6

From lawlesse lust by wondrous grace
Fayre Una is releast:
Whom salvage° nation does adore, savage
And learnes her wise beheast.

1

As when a ship, that flyes faire under saile,
An hidden rocke escapèd hath unwares,° unexpectedly
That lay in waite her wrack° for to bewaile, destruction
The Marriner yet halfe amazèd stares
At perill past, and yet in doubt ne dares
To joy at his foole-happie oversight:
So doubly is distrest twixt joy and cares
The dreadlesse° courage of this Elfin knight, fearless
Having escapt so sad ensamples in his sight.

2

Yet sad he was that his too hastie speed
The faire Duess' had forst him leave behind;
And yet more sad, that Una his deare dreed[1]
Her truth had staind with treason so unkind;° unnatural
Yet crime in her could never creature find,
But for his love, and for her owne selfe sake,
She wandred had from one to other Ynd,[2]
Him for to seeke, ne ever would forsake,
Till her unwares the fierce Sansloy did overtake.

3

Who after Archimagoes fowle defeat,
Led her away into a forrest wilde,
And turning wrathfull fire to lustfull heat,
With beastly sin thought her to have defilde,
And made the vassall of his pleasures vilde.
Yet first he cast by treatie,° and by traynes,° entreaty / tricks
Her to perswade, that stubborne fort to yilde:
For greater conquest of hard love he gaynes,
That workes it to his will, then he that it constraines.° forces

4

With fawning wordes he courted her a while,
And looking lovely,° and oft sighing sore, lovingly
Her constant hart did tempt with diverse guile:
But wordes, and lookes, and sighes she did abhore,
As rocke of Diamond stedfast evermore.
Yet for to feed his fyrie lustfull eye,
He snatcht the vele, that hong her face before;
Then gan her beautie shine, as brightest skye,
And burnt his beastly hart t'efforce° her chastitye. force

5

So when he saw his flatt'ring arts to fayle,
And subtile engines bet° from batteree, beaten
With greedy force he gan the fort assayle,
Whereof he weend possessèd soone to bee,
And win rich spoile of ransackt chastetee.
Ah heavens, that do this hideous act behold,
And heavenly virgin thus outragèd see,
How can ye vengeance just so long withhold,
And hurle not flashing flames upon that Paynim bold?

6

The pitteous maiden carefull° comfortlesse, troubled
Does throw out thrilling° shriekes, & shrieking cryes, penetrating
The last vaine helpe of womens great distresse,
And with loud plaints importuneth the skyes,

---

[1] dreed Object of reverence.

[2] from … Ynd From one India to the other; i.e., from the East to the West Indies.

That molten starres do drop like weeping eyes;
And Phoebus flying so most shamefull sight,
His blushing face in foggy cloud implyes,° enfolds
And hides for shame. What wit of mortall wight
Can now devise to quit a thrall° from such a plight? victim

7

Eternall providence exceeding thought,
Where none appeares can make her selfe a way:
A wondrous way it for this Lady wrought,
From Lyons clawes to pluck the gripèd pray.
Her shrill outcryes and shriekes so loud did bray,
That all the woodes and forestes did resownd;
A troupe of Faunes and Satyres[1] far away
Within the wood were dauncing in a rownd,
Whiles old Sylvanus[2] slept in shady arber sownd.

8

Who when they heard that pitteous strainèd voice,
In hast forsooke their rurall meriment,
And ran towards the far rebownded° noyce,° reverberating noise
To weet, what wight so loudly did lament.
Unto the place they come incontinent:° headlong
Whom when the raging Sarazin espide,
A rude, misshapen, monstrous rablement,
Whose like he never saw, he durst not bide,
But got his ready steed, and fast away gan ride.

9

The wyld woodgods arrivèd in the place,
There find the virgin dolefull desolate,
With ruffled rayments, and faire blubbred° face, teary
As her outrageous foe had left her late,
And trembling yet through feare of former hate;
All stand amazed at so uncouth° sight, strange
And gin to pittie her unhappie state,
All stand astonied at her beautie bright,
In their rude eyes unworthie of so wofull plight.

10

She more amaz'd, in double dread doth dwell;
And every tender part for feare does shake:
As when a greedie Wolfe through hunger fell
A seely° Lambe farre from the flocke does take, innocent
Of whom he meanes his bloudie feast to make,
A Lyon spyes fast running towards him,
The innocent pray in hast he does forsake,
Which quit from death yet quakes in every lim
With chaunge of feare, to see the Lyon looke so grim.

11

Such fearefull fit assaid° her trembling hart, assailed
Ne word to speake, ne joynt to move she had:
The salvage nation feele her secret smart,
And read her sorrow in her count'nance sad;
Their frowning forheads with rough hornes yclad,
And rusticke horror° all a side doe lay, roughness
And gently grenning, shew a semblance glad
To comfort her, and feare to put away,
Their backward bent knees teach her humbly to obay.

12

The doubtfull Damzell dare not yet commit
Her single person to their barbarous truth,
But still twixt feare and hope amazd does sit,
Late learnd what harme to hastie trust ensu'th,
They in compassion of her tender youth,
And wonder of her beautie soveraine,
Are wonne with pitty and unwonted ruth,
And all prostrate upon the lowly plaine,
Do kisse her feete, and fawne on her with count'nance faine.° joyful

13

Their harts she ghesseth by their humble guise,
And yieldes her to extremitie of time;
So from the ground she fearelesse doth arise,
And walketh forth without suspect of crime:
They all as glad, as birdes of joyous Prime,° spring
Thence lead her forth, about her dauncing round,
Shouting, and singing all a shepheards ryme,
And with greene braunches strowing all the ground,
Do worship her, as Queene, with olive girlond cround.

14

And all the way their merry pipes they sound,
That all the woods with doubled Eccho ring,
And with their hornèd feet do weare the ground,
Leaping like wanton kids in pleasant Spring.

---

[1] Satyres Wood deities that are half man and half goat.

[2] Sylvanus God of the forest.

So towards old Sylvanus they her bring;
Who with the noyse awakèd, commeth out,
To weet° the cause, his weake steps governing, know
And agèd limbs on Cypresse stadle[1] stout,
And with an yvie twyne his wast is girt about.

15

Far off he wonders, what them makes so glad,
If Bacchus merry fruit[2] they did invent,° find
Or Cybeles franticke rites[3] have made them mad;
They drawing nigh, unto their God present
That flowre of faith and beautie excellent.
The God himselfe vewing that mirrhour[4] rare,
Stood long amazd, and burnt in his intent;° concentration
His owne faire Dryope[5] now he thinkes not faire,
And Pholoe[6] fowle, when her to this he doth compaire.

16

The woodborne people fall before her flat,
And worship her as Goddesse of the wood;
And old Sylvanus selfe bethinkes not, what
To thinke of wight so faire, but gazing stood,
In doubt to deeme her borne of earthly brood;
Sometimes Dame Venus selfe he seemes to see,
But Venus never had so sober mood;
Sometimes Diana he her takes to bee,
But misseth bow, and shaftes, and buskins° to her knee. boots

17

By vew of her he ginneth to revive
His ancient love, and dearest Cyparisse,[7]
And calles to mind his pourtraiture alive,° when alive
How faire he was, and yet not faire to this,
And how he slew with glauncing dart amisse
A gentle Hynd, the which the lovely boy
Did love as life, above all worldly blisse;
For griefe whereof the lad n'ould° after joy, never would
But pynd away in anguish and selfe-wild° annoy. self-willed

18

The wooddy Nymphes, faire Hamadryades[8]
Her to behold do thither runne apace,
And all the troupe of light-foot Naiades,
Flocke all about to see her lovely face:
But when they vewèd have her heavenly grace,
They envie her in their malitious mind,
And fly away for feare of fowle disgrace:
But all the Satyres scorne their woody kind,
And henceforth nothing faire, but her on earth they find.

19

Glad of such lucke, the luckelesse lucky maid,
Did her content to please their feeble eyes,
And long time with that salvage people staid,
To gather breath in many miseries.
During which time her gentle wit she plyes,
To teach them truth, which worshipt her in vaine,
And made her th'Image of Idolatryes;
But when their bootlesse zeale she did restraine
From her own worship, they her Asse would worship fayn.

20

It fortunèd a noble warlike knight
By just occasion to that forrest came,
To seeke his kindred, and the lignage right,
From whence he tooke his well deservèd name:
He had in armes abroad wonne muchell fame,
And fild far landes with glorie of his might,
Plaine, faithfull, true, and enimy of shame,
And ever lov'd to fight for Ladies right,
But in vaine glorious frayes he litle did delight.

21

A Satyres sonne yborne in forrest wyld,
By straunge adventure as it did betyde,
And there begotten of a Lady myld,
Faire Thyamis the daughter of Labryde,[9]
That was in sacred bands of wedlocke tyde

[1] stadle Young tree or tree trunk; here probably a staff.

[2] Bacchus merry fruit Wine grapes (Bacchus is the god of wine).

[3] Cybeles franticke rites Cybele is goddess of the harvest and fertility whose worshipers celebrated her with frenzied dances.

[4] mirrhour I.e., of heaven's beauty.

[5] Dryope Greek wood nymph.

[6] Pholoe Naiad, or water nymph.

[7] Cyparisse Young boy loved by Sylvanus. When Sylvanus accidentally killed the boy's doe, Apollo turned Cyparisse into a Cyprus tree to alleviate his pain.

[8] Hamadryades Tree spirits.

[9] Thyamis Passion; Labryde Turbulence.

To Therion,[1] a loose unruly swayne;
Who had more joy to raunge the forrest wyde,
And chase the salvage beast with busie payne,
Then serve his Ladies love, and wast in pleasures vayne.

22

The forlorne mayd did with loves longing burne,
And could not lacke° her lovers company, go without
But to the wood she goes, to serve her turne,
And seeke her spouse, that from her still does fly,
And followes other game and venery:
A Satyre chaunst her wandring for to find,
And kindling coles of lust in brutish eye,
The loyall links of wedlocke did unbind,
And made her person thrall unto his beastly kind.

23

So long in secret cabin there he held
Her captive to his sensuall desire,
Till that with timely fruit her belly sweld,
And bore a boy unto that salvage sire:
Then home he suffred her for to retire,
For ransome leaving him the late borne childe;
Whom till to ryper yeares he gan aspire,
He noursled° up in life and manners wilde, raised
Emongst wild beasts and woods, from lawes of men exilde.

24

For all he taught the tender ymp,° was but child
To banish cowardize and bastard° feare; base
His trembling hand he would him force to put Upon the Lyon and the rugged Beare,
And from the she Beares teats her whelps to teare;
And eke wyld roring Buls he would him make
To tame, and ryde their backes not made to beare;
And the Robuckes[2] in flight to overtake,
That every beast for feare of him did fly and quake.

25

Thereby so fearelesse, and so fell° he grew, deadly
That his owne sire and maister of his guise
Did often tremble at his horrid vew,
And oft for dread of hurt would him advise,
The angry beasts not rashly to despise,
Nor too much to provoke; for he would learne° teach
The Lyon stoup to him in lowly wise,
(A lesson hard) and make the Libbard° sterne leopard
Leave roaring, when in rage he for revenge did earne.° yearn

26

And for to make his powre approvèd° more, clear
Wyld beasts in yron yokes he would compell;
The spotted Panther, and the tuskèd Bore,
The Pardale° swift, and the Tigre cruell; female leopard
The Antelope, and Wolfe both fierce and fell;
And them constraine in equall teme to draw.
Such joy he had, their stubborne harts to quell,
And sturdie courage tame with dreadfull aw,
That his beheast they feared, as tyrans law,

27

His loving mother came upon a day
Unto the woods, to see her little sonne;
And chaunst unwares to meet him in the way,
After his sportes, and cruell pastime donne,
When after him a Lyonesse did runne,
That roaring all with rage, did lowd requere
Her children deare, whom he away had wonne:° stolen
The Lyon whelpes she saw how he did beare,
And lull in rugged armes, withouten childish feare.

28

The fearefull Dame all quakèd at the sight,
And turning backe, gan fast to fly away,
Untill with love revokt° from vaine affright, recalled
She hardly yet perswaded was to stay,
And then to him these womanish words gan say;
Ah Satyrane, my dearling, and my joy,
For love of me leave off this dreadfull play;
To dally thus with death, is no fit toy,° pastime
Go find some other play-fellowes, mine own sweet boy.

29

In these and like delights of bloudy game
He traynèd was, till ryper yeares he raught,° reached
And there abode, whilst any beast of name
Walkt in that forest, whom he had not taught
To feare his force: and then his courage haught° high

---

[1] Therion Wild beast.

[2] Robuckes Bucks of the roe species of deer, known for their speed.

Desird of forreine foemen to be knowne,
And far abroad for straunge adventures sought:
In which his might was never overthrowne,
But through all Faery lond his famous worth was blown.° proclaimed

30

Yet evermore it was his manner faire,
After long labours and adventures spent,
Unto those native woods for to repaire,
To see his sire and ofspring° auncient. lineage
And now he thither came for like intent;
Where he unwares the fairest Una found,
Straunge Lady, in so straunge habiliment,° clothing
Teaching the Satyres, which her sat around,
Trew sacred lore, which from her sweet lips did redound.° flow

31

He wondred at her wisedome heavenly rare,
Whose like in womens wit he never knew;
And when her curteous deeds he did compare,
Gan her admire, and her sad sorrowes rew,
Blaming of Fortune, which such troubles threw,
And joyd to make proofe of her crueltie
On gentle Dame, so hurtlesse,° and so trew: innocent
Thenceforth he kept her goodly company,
And learnd her discipline of faith and veritie.

32

But she all vowd unto the Redcrosse knight,
His wandring perill closely° did lament, secretly
Ne in this new acquaintaunce could delight,
But her deare° heart with anguish did torment, loving
And all her wit in secret counsels spent,
How to escape. At last in privie° wise° private / manner
To Satyrane she shewèd her intent:
Who glad to gain such favour, gan devise,
How with that pensive Maid he best might thence arise.° depart

33

So on a day when Satyres all were gone,
To do their service to Sylvanus old,
The gentle virgin left behind alone
He led away with courage stout and bold.
Too late it was, to Satyres to be told,
Or ever hope recover her againe:
In vaine he seekes that having cannot hold.
So fast he carried her with carefull paine,
That they the woods are past, & come now to the plaine.

34

The better part now of the lingring day,
They traveild had, when as they farre espide
A wearie wight forwandring by the way,
And towards him they gan in hast to ride,
To weet° of newes, that did abroad betide,° learn / occur
Or tydings of her knight of the Redcrosse.
But he them spying, gan to turne aside,
For feare as seemd, or for some feignèd losse;
More greedy they of newes, fast towards him do crosse.

35

A silly° man, in simple weedes forworne,° simple / worn
And soild with dust of the long drièd way;
His sandales were with toilesome travell torne,
And face all tand with scorching sunny ray,
As he had traveild many a sommers day,
Through boyling sands of Arabie and Ynde;
And in his hand a Jacobs° staffe, to stay pilgrim's
His wearie limbes upon: and eke behind,
His scrip° did hang, in which his needments he did bind. bag

36

The knight approching nigh, of him inquerd
Tydings of warre, and of adventures new;
But warres, nor new adventures none he herd.
Then Una gan to aske, if ought he knew,
Or heard abroad of that her champion trew,
That in his armour bare a croslet° red. small cross
Aye me, Deare dame (quoth he) well may I rew
To tell the sad sight, which mine eies have red:° seen
These eyes did see that knight both living and eke ded.

37

That cruell word her tender hart so thrild,° penetrated
That suddein cold did runne through every vaine,
And stony horrour all her sences fild
With dying° fit,° that downe she fell for paine. deathlike / faint

The knight her lightly° rearèd up againe, swiftly
And comforted with curteous kind reliefe:
Then wonne from death, she bad him tellen plaine
The further processe° of her hidden griefe; tale
The lesser pangs can beare, who hath endur'd the chiefe.

38

Then gan the Pilgrim thus, I chaunst this day,
This fatall day, that shall I ever rew,
To see two knights in travell on my way
(A sory sight) arraung'd in battell new,
Both breathing vengeaunce, both of wrathfull hew:
My fearefull flesh did tremble at their strife,
To see their blades so greedily imbrew,° stain themselves
That drunke with bloud, yet thristed after life:
What more? the Redcrosse knight was slaine with Paynim knife.

39

Ah dearest Lord (quoth she) how might that bee,
And he the stoutest knight, that ever wonne?° lived
Ah dearest dame (quoth he) how might I see
The thing, that might not be, and yet was donne?
Where is (said Satyrane) that Paynims sonne,
That him of life, and us of joy hath reft?
Not far away (quoth he) he hence doth wonne° remain
Foreby° a fountaine, where I late him left near Washing his bloudy wounds, that through° the steele were cleft. by 40

Therewith the knight thence marchèd forth in hast,
Whiles Una with huge heavinesse opprest,
Could not for sorrow follow him so fast;
And soone he came, as he the place had ghest,° guessed
Whereas that Pagan proud him selfe did rest,
In secret shadow by a fountaine side:
Even he it was, that earst would have supprest° ravished
Faire Una: whom when Satyrane espide,
With fowle reprochfull words he boldly him defide.

41

And said, Arise thou cursèd Miscreaunt,
That hast with knightlesse° guile and trecherous train° unknightly trickery
Faire knighthood fowly shamed, and doest vaunt° boast
That good knight of the Redcrosse to have slain:
Arise, and with like treason now maintain
Thy guilty wrong, or else thee guilty yield.
The Sarazin this hearing, rose amain,
And catching up in hast his three square[1] shield,
And shining helmet, soone him buckled° to the field. equipped

42

And drawing nigh him said, Ah misborne Elfe,
In evill houre thy foes thee hither sent,
Anothers wrongs to wreake upon thy selfe:
Yet ill thou blamest me, for having blent° tainted
My name with guile and traiterous intent;
That Redcrosse knight, perdie,° I never slew, by God
But had he beene, where earst his armes were lent,° borrowed
Th'enchaunter vaine his errour should not rew:
But thou his errour shalt, I hope now proven trew.

43

Therewith they gan, both furious and fell,° fierce
To thunder blowes, and fiersly to assaile
Each other bent his enimy to quell,° kill
That with their force they perst both plate and maile,
And made wide furrowes in their fleshes fraile,
That it would pitty° any living eie. cause pity in Large floods of bloud adowne their sides did raile;° run
But floods of bloud could not them satisfie:
Both hungred after death: both chose to win, or die.

44

So long they fight, and fell revenge pursue,
That fainting each, themselves to breathen let,
And oft refreshèd, battell oft renue:
As when two Bores with rancling malice met,
Their gory sides fresh bleeding fiercely fret,° gnaw
Til breathlesse both them selves aside retire,
Where foming wrath, their cruell tuskes they whet,
And trample th'earth, the whiles they may respire;
Then backe to fight againe, new breathèd and entire.° fresh

---

[1] three square Triangular.

45

So fiersly, when these knights had breathèd once,
They gan to fight returne, increasing more
Their puissant force, and cruell rage attonce,
With heapèd strokes more hugely, then before,
That with their drerie° wounds and bloudy gore gory
They both deformèd, scarsely could be known.
By this sad Una fraught with anguish sore,
Led with their noise, which through the aire was thrown:
Arriv'd, where they in erth their fruitles bloud had sown.

46

Whom all so soone as that proud Sarazin
Espide, he gan revive the memory
Of his lewd lusts, and late attempted sin,
And left the doubtfull° battell hastily, undecided
To catch her, newly offred to his eie:
But Satyrane with strokes him turning, staid,
And sternely bad him other businesse plie,
Then hunt the steps of pure unspotted Maid:
Wherewith he all enrag'd, these bitter speaches said.

47

O foolish faeries sonne, what furie mad
Hath thee incenst, to hast thy dolefull fate?
Were it not better, I that Lady had,
Then that thou hadst repented it too late?
Most sencelesse man he, that himselfe doth hate,
To love another. Lo then for thine ayd
Here take thy lovers token on thy pate.° head
So they to fight; the whiles the royall Mayd
Fled farre away, of that proud Paynim sore afrayd.

48

But that false Pilgrim, which that leasing° told, falsehood
Being in deed old Archimage, did stay
In secret shadow, all this to behold,
And much rejoycèd in their bloudy fray:
But when he saw the Damsell passe away
He left his stond,° and her pursewd apace, place
In hope to bring her to her last decay.° death
But for to tell her lamentable cace,
And eke this battels end, will need another place.

CANTO 7

The Redcrosse knight is captive made
By Gyaunt proud opprest,° vanquished
Prince Arthur meets with Una greatly
With those newes distrest.

1

What man so wise, what earthly wit so ware,° wary
As to descry° the crafty cunning traine,° perceive trickery
By which deceipt doth maske in visour° faire, mask
And cast her colours dyed deepe in graine,
To seeme like Truth, whose shape she well can faine,
And fitting gestures to her purpose frame;
The guiltlesse man with guile to entertaine?
Great maistresse of her art was that false Dame,
The false Duessa, cloked with Fidessaes name.

2

Who when returning from the drery Night,
She fownd not in that perilous house of Pryde,
Where she had left, the noble Redcrosse knight,
Her hopèd pray,° she would no lenger bide, prey
But forth she went, to seeke him far and wide.
Ere long she fownd, whereas° he wearie sate, where
To rest him selfe, foreby a fountaine side,
Disarmèd all of yron-coted Plate,
And by his side his steed the grassy forage ate.

3

He feedes upon the cooling shade, and bayes° bathes
His sweatie forehead in the breathing wind,
Which through the trembling leaves full gently playes
Wherein the cherefull birds of sundry kind
Do chaunt sweet musick, to delight his mind:
The Witch approching gan him fairely° greet, courteously
And with reproch of carelesnesse unkind
Upbrayd, for leaving her in place unmeet,° unfitting
With fowle words tempring faire, soure gall with hony sweet.

4

Unkindnesse past, they gan of solace treat,° speak
And bathe in pleasaunce of the joyous shade,
Which shielded them against the boyling heat,
And with greene boughes decking a gloomy glade,

About the fountaine like a girlond made;
Whose bubbling wave did ever freshly well,
Ne ever would through fervent sommer fade:° dry up
The sacred Nymph, which therein wont to dwell,
Was out of Dianes favour, as it then befell.° so happened

5

The cause was this: one day when Phoebe[1] fayre
With all her band was following the chace,° hunt
This Nymph, quite tyr'd with heat of scorching ayre,
Sat downe to rest in middest of the race:
The goddesse wroth° gan fowly her disgrace, angry
And bad the waters, which from her did flow,
Be such as she her selfe was then in place.
Thenceforth her waters waxèd dull and slow,
And all that drunke thereof, did faint and feeble grow.

6

Hereof this gentle knight unweeting was,
And lying downe upon the sandie graile,° gravel
Drunke of the streame, as cleare as cristall glas;
Eftsoones his manly forces gan to faile,
And mightie strong was turnd to feeble fraile.
His chaunged powres at first them selves not felt,
Till crudled° cold his corage gan assaile, curdled
And chearefull° bloud in faintnesse chill did melt, lively
Which like a fever fit through all his body swelt.° raged

7

Yet goodly court he made still to his Dame,
Pourd° out in loosnesse on the grassy grownd, stretched
Both carelesse of his health, and of his fame:[2]
Till at the last he heard a dreadfull sownd,
Which through the wood loud bellowing, did rebownd,
That all the earth for terrour seemd to shake,
And trees did tremble. Th'Elfe therewith astownd,
Upstarted lightly° from his looser make,° quickly / mate
And his unready weapons gan in hand to take.

8

But ere he could his armour on him dight,° place
Or get his shield, his monstrous enimy
With sturdie steps came stalking in his sight,
An hideous Geant horrible and hye,
That with his talnesse seemd to threat the skye,
The ground eke groned under him for dreed;
His living like saw never living eye,
Ne durst behold: his stature did exceed
The hight of three the tallest sonnes of mortall seed.

9

The greatest Earth his uncouth mother was,
And blustring Aeolus[3] his boasted sire,
Who with his breath, which through the world doth pas,
Her hollow womb did secretly inspire,° blow in to
And fild her hidden caves with stormie yre,
That she conceiv'd; and trebling the dew time,
In which the wombes of women do expire,° bring forth
Brought forth this monstrous masse of earthly slime,
Puft up with emptie wind, and fild with sinfull crime.

10

So growen great through arrogant delight
Of th'high descent, whereof he was yborne,
And through presumption of his matchlesse might,
All other powres and knighthood he did scorne.
Such now he marcheth to this man forlorne,
And left to losse: his stalking steps are stayde° supported
Upon a snaggy Oke, which he had torne
Out of his mothers bowelles, and it made
His mortall° mace,° wherewith his foemen he dismayde. deadly / weapon

11

That when the knight he spide, he gan advance
With huge force and insupportable° mayne,° irresistible / strength
And towardes him with dreadfull fury praunce;
Who haplesse, and eke hopelesse, all in vaine
Did to him pace, sad battaile to darrayne,° engage Disarmd, disgrast, and inwardly dismayde,
And eke so faint in every joynt and vaine,° vein
Through that fraile° fountaine, which him feeble made,
That scarsely could he weeld his bootlesse° single blade. useless

12

The Geaunt strooke so maynly° mercilesse, fiercely
That could have overthrowne a stony towre,

---

[1] Phoebe Diana, goddess of the moon, chastity, and the hunt.

[2] fame Good reputation or character.

[3] Aeolus Keeper of the winds.

And were not heavenly grace, that him did blesse,
He had beene pouldred° all, as thin as flowre:° pulverized flour
But he was wary of that deadly stowre,° danger
And lightly lept from underneath the blow:
Yet so exceeding was the villeins powre,
That with the wind it did him overthrow,
And all his sences stound,° that still he lay full low. stunned

13

As when that divelish yron Engin[1] wrought
In deepest Hell, and framd by Furies skill,
With windy Nitre° and quick Sulphur fraught,° gunpowder filled
And ramd with bullet round, ordaind to kill,
Conceiveth fire, the heavens it doth fill
With thundring noyse, and all the ayre doth choke,
That none can breath, nor see, nor heare at will,
Through smouldry cloud of duskish° stincking smoke, dark
That th'onely° breath° him daunts,° who hath escapt the stroke. alone / smell / overcomes

14

So daunted when the Geaunt saw the knight,
His heavie hand he heavèd up on hye,
And him to dust thought to have battred quight,
Untill Duessa loud to him gan crye;
O great Orgoglio,[2] greatest under skye,
O hold thy mortall hand for Ladies sake,
Hold for my sake, and do him not to dye,
But vanquisht thine eternall bondslave make,
And me thy worthy meed° unto° thy Leman take. prize / as 15

He hearkned, and did stay from further harmes,
To gayne so goodly guerdon, as she spake:
So willingly she came into his armes,
Who her as willingly to grace did take,
And was possessèd of his new found make.
Then up he tooke the slombred sencelesse corse,
And ere he could out of his swowne awake,
Him to his castle brought with hastie forse,
And in a Dongeon deepe him threw without remorse.

16

From that day forth Duessa was his deare,
And highly honourd in his haughtie eye,
He gave her gold and purple pall to weare,
And triple crowne[3] set on her head full hye,
And her endowd with royall majestye:
Then for to make her dreaded more of men,
And peoples harts with awfull terrour tye,° enthrall
A monstrous beast[4] ybred in filthy fen
He chose, which he had kept long time in darksome den.

17

Such one it was, as that renowned Snake
Which great Alcides in Stremona slew,[5]
Long fostred in the filth of Lerna lake,
Whose many heads out budding ever new,
Did breed him endlesse labour to subdew:
But this same Monster much more ugly was;
For seven great heads out of his body grew,
An yron brest, and backe of scaly bras,
And all embrewd° in bloud, his eyes did shine as glas. stained

18

His tayle was stretched out in wondrous length,
That to the house of heavenly gods it raught,° reached
And with extorted powre, and borrow'd strength,
The ever-burning lamps[6] from thence it braught,
And prowdly threw to ground, as things of naught;
And underneath his filthy feet did tread
The sacred things, and holy heasts° foretaught. doctrines
Upon this dreadfull Beast with sevenfold head
He set the false Duessa, for more aw and dread.

---

[1] yron Engin I.e., the cannon.

[2] Orgoglio Italian: Pride, disdain.

[3] triple crowne Like that worn by the pope.

[4] beast The description of Duessa and her beast echo several passages in the Book of Revelation (esp. 17, 3, 12.3–4, 9).

[5] Such one … slew Alcides (Hercules) had to kill the nine-headed Hydra of Lerna as one of his twelve labors. Each time he cut off one head, two more would grow in its place.

[6] ever-burning lamps I.e., the stars.

19

The wofull Dwarfe, which saw his maisters fall,
Whiles he had keeping of his grasing steed,
And valiant knight become a caytive thrall,° slave
When all was past, tooke up his forlorne weed,
His mightie armour, missing most at need;
His silver shield, now idle maisterlesse;
His poynant° speare, that many made to bleed, piercing
The ruefull moniments of heavinesse,° grief
And with them all departes, to tell his great distresse.

20

He had not travaild long, when on the way
He wofull Ladie, wofull Una met,
Fast flying from the Paynims greedy pray,° grasp
Whilest Satyrane him from pursuit did let:° prevent
Who when her eyes she on the Dwarf had set,
And saw the signes, that deadly tydings spake,
She fell to ground for sorrowfull regret,
And lively° breath her sad brest did forsake, of life
Yet might her pitteous hart be seene to pant and quake.

21

The messenger of so unhappie newes
Would faine have dyde: dead was his hart within,
Yet outwardly some little comfort shewes:
At last recovering hart, he does begin
To rub her temples, and to chaufe her chin,
And every tender part does tosse and turne:
So hardly° he the flitted life does win, with difficulty
Unto her native prison to retourne:
Then gins her grievèd ghost thus to lament and mourne.

22

Ye dreary instruments of dolefull sight,
That doe this deadly spectacle behold,
Why do ye lenger° feed on loathèd light, longer
Or liking° find to gaze on earthly mould,° pleasing / shapes
Sith cruell fates the carefull threeds unfould,
The which my life and love together tyde?
Now let the stony dart of senselesse cold
Perce to my hart, and pas through every side,
And let eternall night so sad sight fro me hide.

23

O lightsome day, the lampe of highest Jove,
First made by him, mens wandring wayes to guyde,
When darknesse he in deepest dongeon drove,
Henceforth thy hated face for ever hyde,
And shut up heavens windowes shyning wyde:
For earthly sight can nought but sorow breed,
And late repentance, which shall long abyde.
Mine eyes no more on vanitie shall feed,
But seelèd up with death, shall have their deadly meed.

24

Then downe againe she fell unto the ground;
But he her quickly rearèd up againe:
Thrise did she sinke adowne in deadly swownd,
And thrise he her reviv'd with busie paine:
At last when life recover'd had the raine,
And over-wrestled his strong enemie,
With foltring tong, and trembling every vaine,
Tell on (quoth she) the wofull Tragedie,
The which these reliques sad present unto mine eie.

25

Tempestuous fortune hath spent all her spight,
And thrilling sorrow throwne his utmost dart;
Thy sad tongue cannot tell more heavy plight,
Then that I feele, and harbour in mine hart:
Who hath endur'd the whole, can beare each part.
If death it be, it is not the first wound,
That launchèd° hath my brest with bleeding smart. pierced
Begin, and end the bitter balefull stound;[1]
If lesse, then that I feare, more favour I have found.

26

Then gan the Dwarfe the whole discourse declare,
The subtill traines of Archimago old;
The wanton loves of false Fidessa faire,
Bought with the bloud of vanquisht Paynim bold:
The wretched payre° transform'd to treen mould; pair
The house of Pride, and perils round about;
The combat, which he with Sansjoy did hould;
The lucklesse conflict with the Gyant stout,
Wherein captiv'd, of life or death he stood in doubt.

27

She heard with patience all unto the end,
And strove to maister sorrowfull assay,° tribulation

---

[1] stound Time of pain.

Which greater grew, the more she did contend,
And almost rent her tender hart in tway;° two
And love fresh coles unto her fire did lay:
For greater love, the greater is the losse.
Was never Ladie lovèd dearer day,° life
Then she did love the knight of the Redcrosse;
For whose deare sake so many troubles her did tosse.

28

At last when fervent sorrow slakèd was,
She up arose, resolving him to find
Alive or dead: and forward forth doth pas,
All as the Dwarfe the way to her assynd:° indicated
And evermore in constant carefull mind
She fed her wound with fresh renewèd bale;° misery
Long tost with stormes, and bet° with bitter wind, beaten
High over hils, and low adowne the dale,
She wandred many a wood, and measurd many a vale.

29

At last she chauncèd by good hap to meet
A goodly knight, faire marching by the way
Together with his Squire, arayèd meet:° suitably
His glitterand armour shinèd farre away,
Like glauncing° light of Phoebus brightest ray; shining
From top to toe no place appearèd bare,
That deadly dint of steele endanger may:
Athwart his brest a bauldrick[1] brave he ware,
That shynd, like twinkling stars, with stons most pretious rare.

30

And in the midst thereof one pretious stone
Of wondrous worth, and eke of wondrous mights,
Shapt like a Ladies head, exceeding shone,
Like Hesperus emongst the lesser lights,
And strove for to amaze the weaker sights;
Thereby his mortall blade full comely hong
In yvory sheath, ycarv'd with curious slights;° designs
Whose hilts were burnisht gold, and handle strong
Of mother pearle, and buckled with a golden tong.° pin

31

His haughtie° helmet, horrid° all with gold, high / bristling
Both glorious brightnesse, and great terrour bred;
For all the crest a Dragon did enfold
With greedie pawes, and over all did spred
His golden wings: his dreadfull hideous hed
Close couchèd on the bever,° seem'd to throw visor
From flaming mouth bright sparkles fierie red,
That suddeine horror to faint harts did show;
And scaly tayle was stretcht adowne his backe full low.

32

Upon the top of all his loftie crest,° helmet
A bunch of haires discolourd° diversly, dyed
With sprinded pearle, and gold full richly drest,
Did shake, and seem'd to daunce for jollity,
Like to an Almond tree ymounted hye
On top of greene Selinis[2] all alone,
With blossomes brave bedeckèd daintily;
Whose tender locks do tremble every one
At every little breath, that under heaven is blowne.

33

His warlike shield all closely cover'd was,
Ne might of mortall eye be ever seene;
Not made of steele, nor of enduring bras,
Such earthly mettals soone consumèd bene:
But all of Diamond perfect pure and cleene
It framèd was, one massie entire mould,[3]
Hewen out of Adamant rocke with engines keene,° sharp
That point of speare it never percen could,
Ne dint of direfull sword divide the substance would.

34

The same to wight he never wont disclose,
But° when as monsters huge he would dismay, except
Or daunt unequall armies of his foes,
Or when the flying° heavens he would affray; revolving
For so exceeding shone his glistring ray,
That Phoebus golden face it did attaint,° sully
As when a cloud his beames doth over-lay;

---

[1] bauldrick Belt or sash worn to support a sword.

[2] Selinis Town in Italy.

[3] one … mould I.e., one solid, unbroken piece of diamond.

And silver Cynthia wexèd pale and faint,
As when her face is staynd with magicke arts constraint.[1]

35

No magicke arts hereof had any might,
Nor bloudie wordes of bold Enchaunters call,
But all that was not such, as seemd in sight,
Before that shield did fade, and suddeine fall:
And when him list the raskall routes appall,
Men into stones therewith he could transmew,° transform
And stones to dust, and dust to nought at all;
And when him list the prouder lookes subdew,
He would them gazing blind, or turne to other hew.° shape

36

Ne let it seeme, that credence this exceedes,
For he that made the same, was knowne right well
To have done much more admirable deedes.
It Merlin was, which whylome did excell
All living wightes in might of magicke spell:
Both shield, and sword, and armour all he wrought
For this young Prince, when first to armes he fell;° came
But when he dyde, the Faerie Queene it brought
To Faerie lond, where yet it may be seene, if sought.[2]

37

A gentle youth, his dearely lovèd Squire
His speare of heben° wood behind him bare, ebony
Whose harmefull head, thrice heated in the fire,
Had riven many a brest with pikehead square;
A goodly person, and could menage° faire manage
His stubborne steed with curbèd canon bit,[3]
Who under him did trample as the aire,
And chauft, that any on his backe should sit;
The yron rowels[4] into frothy fome he bit.

38

When as this knight nigh to the Ladie drew,
With lovely° court he gan her entertaine; kindly
But when he heard her answeres loth,° he knew reluctant
Some secret sorrow did her heart distraine:° afflict
Which to allay, and calme her storming paine,
Faire feeling words he wisely gan display,
And for her humour fitting purpose° faine, manner
To tempt the cause it selfe for to bewray;° reveal
Wherewith emmov'd, these bleeding words she gan to say.

39

What worlds delight, or joy of living speach
Can heart, so plung'd in sea of sorrowes deepe,
And heapèd with so huge misfortunes, reach?
The carefull cold beginneth for to creepe,
And in my heart his yron arrow steepe,
Soone as I thinke upon my bitter bale:° sorrow
Such helplesse harmes yts better hidden keepe,
Then rip up griefe, where it may not availe,
My last left comfort is, my woes to weepe and waile.

40

Ah Ladie deare, quoth then the gentle knight,
Well may I weene, your griefe is wondrous great;
For wondrous great griefe groneth in my spright,
Whiles thus I heare you of your sorrowes treat.
But wofull Ladie let me you intrete,
For to unfold the anguish of your hart:
Mishaps are maistred by advice discrete,
And counsell mittigates the greatest smart;
Found never helpe, who never would his hurts impart.

41

O but (quoth she) great griefe will not be tould,
And can more easily be thought, then said.
Right so; (quoth he) but he, that never would,
Could never: will to might gives greatest aid.
But griefe (quoth she) does greater grow displaid,
If then it find not helpe, and breedes despaire.
Despaire breedes not (quoth he) where faith is staid.° firm
No faith so fast (quoth she) but flesh does paire.° impair
Flesh may empaire (quoth he) but reason can repaire.

---

[1] with … constraint I.e., by a lunar eclipse, believed by some to be caused by magic.

[2] But when … sought I.e., this knight's armor (and hence his virtues) can still be found in England. From the references to Merlin and the Faerie Queene, it is clear that the unnamed knight is Arthur.

[3] canon bit Type of round, smooth bit.

[4] rowels Knobs on the ends of a horse's bit.

42

His goodly reason, and well guided speach
So deepe did settle in her gratious thought,
That her perswaded to disclose the breach,
Which love and fortune in her heart had wrought,
And said; faire Sir, I hope good hap hath brought
You to inquere the secrets of my griefe,
Or that your wisedome will direct my thought,
Or that your prowesse can me yield reliefe:
Then heare the storie sad, which I shall tell you briefe.

43

The forlorne Maiden, whom your eyes have seene
The laughing stocke of fortunes mockeries,
Am th'only daughter of a King and Queene,
Whose parents deare, whilest equall destinies
Did runne about,° and their felicities their course
The favourable heavens did not envy,
Did spread their rule through all the territories,
Which Phison and Euphrates floweth by,
And Gehons[1] golden waves doe wash continually.

44

Till that their cruell cursèd enemy,
An huge great Dragon horrible in sight,
Bred in the loathly lakes of Tartary,° Hell
With murdrous ravine,° and devouring might violence
Their kingdome spoild, and countrey wasted quight:
Themselves, for feare into his jawes to fall,
He forst to castle strong to take their flight,
Where fast embard° in mightie brasen wall, imprisoned
He has them now foure yeres besiegd to make them thrall.

45

Full many knights adventurous and stout
Have enterprizd that Monster to subdew;
From every coast that heaven walks about,
Have thither come the noble Martiall crew,
That famous hard atchievements still pursew,
Yet never any could that girlond win,
But all still shronke,° and still he greater grew: cowered
All they for want of faith, or guilt of sin,
The pitteous pray of his fierce crueltie have bin.

46

At last yledd° with farre reported praise, led by
Which flying fame throughout the world had spred,
Of doughtie° knights, whom Faery land did raise, worthy
That noble order hight° of Maidenhed,° named / virginity
Forthwith to court of Gloriane I sped,
Of Gloriane great Queene of glory bright,
Whose kingdomes seat Cleopolis[2] is red,° called
There to obtaine some such redoubted knight,
That Parents deare from tyrants powre deliver might.

47

It was my chance (my chance was faire and good)
There for to find a fresh unprovèd knight,
Whose manly hands imbrew'd in guiltie blood
Had never bene, ne ever by his might
Had throwne to ground the unregarded right:
Yet of his prowesse proofe he since hath made
(I witnesse am) in many a cruell fight;
The groning ghosts of many one dismaide
Have felt the bitter dint of his avenging blade.

48

And ye the forlorne reliques of his powre,
His byting sword, and his devouring speare,
Which have endurèd many a dreadfull stowre,
Can speake his prowesse, that did earst you beare,
And well could rule: now he hath left you heare,
To be the record of his ruefull losse,
And of my dolefull disaventurous° deare:° unfortunate dear one
O heavie record of the good Redcrosse,
Where have you left your Lord, that could so well you tosse?° wield

49

Well hopèd I, and faire beginnings had,
That he my captive° langour should redeeme, inescapable
Till all unweeting, an Enchaunter bad
His sence abusd, and made him to misdeeme
My loyalty, not such as it did seeme;
That rather death desire, then such despight.° treachery
Be judge ye heavens, that all things right esteeme,
How I him lov'd, and love with all my might,
So thought I eke of him, and thinke I thought aright.

---

[1] Phison … Gehons Three of the four rivers of Eden. Thus Una's parents were Adam and Eve, the rulers of Eden.

[2] Cleopolis From Greek: famous city.

50

Thenceforth me desolate he quite forsooke,
To wander, where wilde fortune would me lead,
And other bywaies he himselfe betooke,
Where never foot of living wight did tread,
That brought not backe the balefull body dead;
In which him chauncèd false Duessa meete,
Mine onely foe, mine onely deadly dread,
Who with her witchcraft and misseeming sweete,
Inveigled° him to follow her desires deceived
unmeete.° inappropriate

51

At last by subtill sleights she him betraid
Unto his foe, a Gyant huge and tall,
Who him disarmèd, dissolute,° dismaid, weakened
Unwares surprisèd, and with mightie mall° mallet
The monster mercilesse him made to fall,
Whose fall did never foe before behold;
And now in darkesome dungeon, wretched thrall,
Remedilesse, for aie° he doth him hold; ever
This is my cause of griefe, more great, then may be told.

52

Ere she had ended all, she gan to faint:
But he her comforted and faire bespake,
Certes, Madame, ye have great cause of plaint,
That stoutest heart, I weene, could cause to quake.
But be of cheare, and comfort to you take:
For till I have acquit° your captive knight, freed
Assure your selfe, I will you not forsake.
His chearefull words reviv'd her chearelesse spright,
So forth they went, the Dwarfe them guiding ever right.

CANTO 8

Faire virgin to redeeme her deare
Brings Arthur to the fight,
Who slayes the Gyant, wounds the beast,
And strips Duessa quight.

1

Ay me, how many perils doe enfold
The righteous man, to make him daily fall?
Were not, that heavenly grace doth him uphold,
And stedfast truth acquite him out of all.
Her love is firme, her care continuall,
So oft as he through his owne foolish pride,
Or weaknesse is to sinfull bands° made thrall: bonds
Else should this Redcrosse knight in bands have dyde,
For whose deliverance she this Prince doth thither guide.

2

They sadly traveild thus, untill they came
Nigh to a castle builded strong and hie:
Then cryde the Dwarfe, lo yonder is the same,
In which my Lord my liege° doth lucklesse lie, master
Thrall to that Gyants hatefull tyrannie:
Therefore, deare Sir, your mightie powres assay.
The noble knight alighted by and by
From loftie steede, and bad the Ladie stay,
To see what end of fight should him befall that day.

3

So with the Squire, th'admirer of his might,
He marchèd forth towards that castle wall;
Whose gates he found fast shut, ne living wight
To ward° the same, nor answere commers call. guard
Then tooke that Squire an horne of bugle° small, hunting horn
Which hong adowne his side in twisted gold,
And tassels gay. Wyde wonders over all
Of that same hornes great vertues weren told,
Which had approvèd° bene in uses manifold. proven

4

Was never wight, that heard that shrilling sound,
But trembling feare did feele in every vaine;
Three miles it might be easie heard around,
And Ecchoes three answerd it selfe againe:
No false enchauntment, nor deceiptfull traine
Might once abide the terror of that blast,
But presently was voide and wholly vaine:
No gate so strong, no locke so firme and fast,
But with that percing noise flew open quite, or brast.° burst

5

The same before the Geants gate he blew,
That all the castle quakèd from the ground,
And every dore of freewill open flew.

The Gyant selfe dismaièd with that sownd,
Where he with his Duessa dalliance° fownd, amorous toying
In hast came rushing forth from inner bowre,
With staring countenance sterne, as one astownd,
And staggering steps, to weet, what suddein stowre
Had wrought that horror strange, and dar'd his dreaded powre.

6

And after him the proud Duessa came,
High mounted on her manyheaded beast,
And every head with fyrie tongue did flame,
And every head was crownèd on his creast,
And bloudie mouthèd with late cruell feast.
That when the knight beheld, his mightie shild
Upon his manly arme he soone addrest,° prepared
And at him fiercely flew, with courage fild,
And eger greedinesse° through every member thrild. readiness

7

Therewith the Gyant buckled° him to fight, engaged
Inflam'd with scornefull wrath and high disdaine,
And lifting up his dreadfull club on hight,
All arm'd with ragged snubbes° and knottie graine, stumps
Him thought at first encounter to haue slaine,
But wise and warie was that noble Pere,° peer
And lightly leaping from so monstrous maine,° force
Did faire avoide the violence him nere;
It booted nought, to thinke, such thunderbolts to beare.° withstand

8

Ne shame he thought to shunne so hideous might:
The idle stroke, enforcing furious way,
Missing the marke of his misaymèd sight
Did fall to ground, and with his heavie sway
So deepely dinted in the driven clay,
That three yardes deepe a furrow up did throw:
The sad earth wounded with so sore assay,° assault
Did grone full grievous underneath the blow,
And trembling with strange feare, did like an earthquake show.

9

As when almightie Jove in wrathfull mood,
To wreake° the guilt of mortall sins is bent, punish Hurles forth his thundring dart with deadly food,° hatred
Enrold in flames, and smouldring° dreriment,° suffocating darkness
Through riven cloudes and molten firmament;
The fierce threeforkèd engin° making way, weapon
Both loftie towres and highest trees hath rent,
And all that might his angrie passage stay,
And shooting in the earth, casts up a mount of clay.

10

His boystrous° club, so buried in the ground, unwieldy
He could not rearen up againe so light,° easily
But that the knight him at avantage found,
And whiles he strove his combred° clubbe to quight° encumbered free
Out of the earth, with blade all burning bright
He smote off his left arme, which like a blocke
Did fall to ground, depriv'd of native might;
Large streames of bloud out of the trunckèd stocke° stump
Forth gushèd, like fresh water streame from riven rocke.

11

Dismaièd with so desperate deadly wound,
And eke impatient of[1] unwonted paine,
He loudly brayd with beastly yelling sound,
That all the fields rebellowèd againe;
As great a noyse, as when in Cymbrian plaine[2]
An heard of Bulles, whom kindly° rage doth sting, natural
Do for the milkie mothers want complaine,
And fill the fields with troublous bellowing,
The neighbour woods around with hollow murmur ring.

12

That when his deare Duessa heard, and saw

---

[1] impatient of Unable to endure.

[2] Cymbrian plaine Jutland, a peninsula comprising Northern Germany and most of Denmark and formerly inhabited by the ancient European tribe the Cimbri.

The evill stownd,° that daungerd her estate,° peril condition
Unto his aide she hastily did draw
Her dreadfull beast, who swolne with bloud of late
Came ramping forth with proud presumpteous gate,
And threatned all his heads like flaming brands.° torches
But him the Squire made quickly to retrate,
Encountring fierce with single sword in hand,
And twixt him and his Lord did like a bulwarke stand.

13

The proud Duessa full of wrathfull spight,
And fierce disdaine, to be affronted so,
Enforst her purple beast with all her might
That stop° out of the way to overthroe, obstacle
Scorning the let° of so unequall foe: hindrance
But nathemore° would that courageous swayne never the more
To her yeeld passage, gainst his Lord to goe,
But with outrageous strokes did him restraine,
And with his bodie bard the way atwixt them twaine.

14

Then tooke the angrie witch her golden cup,
Which still she bore, replete with magick artes;
Death and despeyre did many thereof sup,
And secret poyson through their inner parts,
Th'eternall bale of heavie wounded harts;
Which after charmes and some enchauntments said,
She lightly sprinkled on his weaker° parts; too weak
Therewith his sturdie courage soone was quayd,° quelled
And all his senses were with suddeine dread dismayd.

15

So downe he fell before the cruell beast,
Who on his necke his bloudie clawes did seize,
That life nigh crusht out of his panting brest:
No powre he had to stirre, nor will to rize.
That when the carefull knight gan well avise,° perceived
He lightly left the foe, with whom he fought,
And to the beast gan turne his enterprise;
For wondrous anguish in his hart it wrought,
To see his lovèd Squire into such thraldome brought.

16

And high advauncing his bloud-thirstie blade,
Stroke one of those deformèd heads so sore,
That of his puissance proud ensample made;
His monstrous scalpe downe to his teeth it tore,
And that misformèd shape mis-shapèd more:
A sea of bloud gusht from the gaping wound,
That her gay garments staynd with filthy gore,
And overflowèd all the field around;
That over shoes in bloud he waded on the ground.

17

Thereat he roarèd for exceeding paine,
That to have heard, great horror would have bred,
And scourging th'emptie ayre with his long traine,
Through great impatience of his grievèd hed
His gorgeous ryder from her loftie sted
Would have cast downe, and trod in durtie myre,
Had not the Gyant soone her succoured;
Who all enrag'd with smart and franticke yre,
Came hurtling in full fierce, and forst the knight retyre.

18

The force, which wont in two to be disperst,
In one alone left hand he now unites,
Which is through rage more strong then both were erst;
With which his hideous club aloft he dites,° raises
And at his foe with furious rigour smites,
That strongest Oake might seeme to overthrow.
The stroke upon his shield so heavie lites,
That to the ground it doubleth him full low
What mortall wight could ever beare so monstrous blow?

19

And in his fall his shield, that covered was,
Did loose his vele° by chaunce, and open flew: covering
The light whereof, that heavens light did pas,° surpass
Such blazing brightnesse through the aier threw,
That eye mote not the same endure to vew.
Which when the Gyaunt spyde with staring eye,
He downe let fall his arme, and soft withdrew
His weapon huge, that heavèd was on hye
For to have slaine the man, that on the ground did lye.

20

And eke the fruitfull-headed° beast, amaz'd many-headed
At flashing beames of that sunshiny shield,
Became starke blind, and all his senses daz'd,
That downe he tumbled on the durtie field,
And seem'd himselfe as conquerèd to yield.
Whom when his maistresse proud perceiv'd to fall,
Whiles yet his feeble feet for faintnesse reeld,
Unto the Gyant loudly she gan call,
O helpe Orgoglio, helpe, or else we perish all.

21

At her so pitteous cry was much amoov'd
Her champion stout, and for to ayde his frend,° lover
Againe his wonted angry weapon proov'd:° tried
But all in vaine: for he has read his end
In that bright shield, and all their forces spend Themselves in vaine: for since that glauncing° sight, gleaming
He hath no powre to hurt, nor to defend;
As where th'Almighties lightning brond does light,
It dimmes the dazèd eyen, and daunts the senses quight.

22

Whom when the Prince, to battell new addrest,
And threatning high his dreadfull stroke did see,
His sparkling blade about his head he blest,° brandished
And smote off quite his right leg by the knee,
That downe he tombled; as an agèd tree,
High growing on the top of rocky clift,
Whose hartstrings with keene steele nigh hewen be,
The mightie trunck halfe rent, with ragged rift° split
Doth roll adowne the rocks, and fall with fearefull drift.° force

23

Or as a Castle rearèd high and round,
By subtile° engins and malitious slight° clever / strategy
Is underminèd from the lowest ground
And her foundation forst,° and feebled quight, broken
At last downe falles, and with her heapèd hight
Her hastie ruine does more heavie make,
And yields it selfe unto the victours might;
Such was this Gyaunts fall, that seemd to shake
The stedfast globe of earth, as it for feare did quake.

24

The knight then lightly leaping to the pray,
With mortall steele him smot againe so sore,
That headlesse his unweldy bodie lay,
All wallowd in his owne fowle bloudy gore,
Which flowèd from his wounds in wondrous store,° plenty
But soone as breath out of his breast did pas,
That huge great body, which the Gyaunt bore,
Was vanisht quite, and of that monstrous mas
Was nothing left, but like an emptie bladder was.

25

Whose grievous fall, when false Duessa spide,
Her golden cup she cast unto the ground,
And crownèd mitre rudely threw aside;
Such percing griefe her stubborne hart did wound,
That she could not endure that dolefull stound,
But leaving all behind her, fled away:
The light-foot Squire her quickly turnd around,
And by hard meanes enforcing her to stay,
So brought unto his Lord, as his deservèd pray.

26

The royall Virgin, which beheld from farre,
In pensive° plight, and sad perplexitie, apprehensive
The whole atchievement° of this doubtfull warre, progress
Came running fast to greet his victorie,
With sober gladnesse, and myld modestie,
And with sweet joyous cheare him thus bespake;
Faire braunch of noblesse, flowre of chevalrie,
That with your worth the world amazèd make,
How shall I quite° the paines, ye suffer for my sake? requite

27

And you fresh bud of vertue springing fast,
Whom these sad eyes saw nigh unto deaths dore,
What hath poore Virgin for such perill past,
Wherewith you to reward? Accept therefore
My simple selfe, and service evermore;
And he that high does sit, and all things see
With equall eyes, their merites to restore,° reward
Behold what ye this day have done for mee,
And what I cannot quite, requite with usuree.° interest

28

But sith the heavens, and your faire handeling° actions
Have made you maister of the field this day,
Your fortune maister° eke with governing, secure
And well begun end all so well, I pray,
Ne let that wicked woman scape away;
For she it is, that did my Lord bethrall,
My dearest Lord, and deepe in dongeon lay,
Where he his better dayes hath wasted all.
O heare, how piteous he to you for ayd does call.

29

Forthwith he gave in charge unto his Squire,
That scarlot whore to keepen carefully;
Whiles he himselfe with greedie° great desire eager
Into the Castle entred forcibly,
Where living creature none he did espye;
Then gan he lowdly through the house to call:
But no man car'd to answere to his crye.
There raignd a solemne silence over all,
Nor voice was heard, nor wight was seene in bowre or hall.

30

At last with creeping crooked pace forth came
An old old man, with beard as white as snow,
That on a staffe his feeble steps did frame,° support
And guide his wearie gate° both too and fro: steps
For his eye sight him failèd long ygo,
And on his arme a bounch of keyes he bore,
The which unusèd rust did overgrow:
Those were the keyes of every inner dore,
But he could not them use, but kept them still in store.

31

But very uncouth sight was to behold,
How he did fashion his untoward° pace, awkward
For as he forward moov'd his footing old,
So backward still was turnd his wrincled face,
Unlike to men, who ever as they trace,
Both feet and face one way are wont to lead.
This was the auncient keeper of that place,
And foster father of the Gyant dead;
His name Ignaro[1] did his nature right aread.° make known

32

His reverend haires and holy gravitie
The knight much honord, as beseemèd well,° proper
And gently° askt, where all the people bee, politely
Which in that stately building wont to dwell.
Who answerd him full soft, he could not tell.
Againe he askt, where that same knight was layd,
Whom great Orgoglio with his puissaunce fell° deadly
Had made his caytive thrall; againe he sayde,
He could not tell: ne ever other answere made.

33

Then askèd he, which way he in might pas:
He could not tell, againe he answerèd.
Thereat the curteous knight displeasèd was,
And said, Old sire, it seemes thou hast not red° noted
How ill it sits with that same silver hed
In vaine to mocke, or mockt in vaine to bee:
But if thou be, as thou art pourtrahèd° represented
With natures pen, in ages grave degree,° dignity
Aread° in graver wise, what I demaund of thee. state

34

His answere likewise was, he could not tell.
Whose senceless speach, and doted° ignorance foolish
When as the noble Prince had markèd well,
He ghest his nature by his countenance,
And calmd his wrath with goodly temperance.
Then to him stepping, from his arme did reach
Those keyes, and made himselfe free enterance.
Each dore he opened without any breach;° breakage
There was no barre to stop, nor foe him to empeach.

35

There all within full rich arayd he found,
With royall arras° and resplendent gold. tapestries
And did with store of every thing abound,
That greatest Princes presence° might behold. person
But all the floore (too filthy to be told)
With bloud of guiltlesse babes, and innocents trew,
Which there were slaine, as sheepe out of the fold,
Defilèd was, that dreadfull was to vew,
And sacred ashes over it was strowèd° new. scattered

---

[1] Ignaro Ignorance.

36

And there beside of marble stone was built
An Altare,[1] carv'd with cunning imagery,
On which true Christians bloud was often spilt,
And holy Martyrs often doen° to dye,° put / death
With cruell malice and strong tyranny:
Whose blessed sprites from underneath the stone
To God for vengeance cryde continually,
And with great griefe were often heard to grone,
That hardest heart would bleede, to heare their piteous mone.

37

Through every rowme he sought, and every bowr,
But no where could he find that wofull thrall:° slave
At last he came unto an yron doore,
That fast was lockt, but key found not at all
Emongst that bounch, to open it withall;
But in the same a little grate was pight,° placed
Through which he sent his voyce, and lowd did call
With all his powre, to weet, if living wight
Were housèd therewithin, whom he enlargen° might. liberate

38

Therewith an hollow, dreary, murmuring voyce
These piteous plaints and dolours° did resound; laments
O who is that, which brings me happy choyce° chance
Of death, that here lye dying every stound,° moment
Yet live perforce in balefull darkenesse bound?
For now three Moones have changèd thrice their hew,° shape
And have beene thrice hid underneath the ground,
Since I the heavens chearefull face did vew,
O welcome thou, that doest of death bring tydings trew.

39

Which when that Champion heard, with percing point
Of pitty deare his hart was thrillèd sore,
And trembling horrour ran through every joynt,
For ruth of gentle knight so fowle forlore:
Which shaking off, he rent that yron dore,
With furious force, and indignation fell;
Where entred in, his foot could find no flore,
But all a deepe descent, as darke as hell,
That breathèd ever forth a filthie banefull° smell. poisonous

40

But neither darkenesse fowle, nor filthy bands,° bonds
Nor noyous° smell his purpose could withhold, noxious (Entire affection hateth nicer° hands) too fastidious
But that with constant zeale, and courage bold,
After long paines and labours manifold,
He found the meanes that Prisoner up to reare;
Whose feeble thighes, unhable to uphold
His pinèd° corse, him scarse to light could beare, wasted
A ruefull spectacle of death and ghastly drere.

41

His sad dull eyes deepe sunck in hollow pits,
Could not endure th'unwonted sunne to view;
His bare thin cheekes for want of better bits,° sustenance
And empty sides deceivèd° of their dew,° deprived / due
Could make a stony hart his hap to rew;
His rawbone armes, whose mighty brawnèd bowrs° muscles
Were wont to rive steele plates, and helmets hew,
Were cleane consum'd, and all his vitall powres
Decayd, and all his flesh shronk up like withered flowres.

42

Whom when his Lady saw, to him she ran
With hasty joy: to see him made her glad,
And sad to view his visage pale and wan,
Who earst in flowres of freshest youth was clad.
Tho when her well of teares she wasted had,
She said, Ah dearest Lord, what evill starre
On you hath frownd, and pourd his influence bad,
That of your selfe ye thus berobbèd arre,
And this misseeming hew your manly looks doth marre?

43

But welcome now my Lord, in wele or woe,
Whose presence I have lackt too long a day;
And fie on Fortune mine avowèd foe,
Whose wrathfull wreakes° them selves do now alay. punishments
And for these wrongs shall treble penaunce pay

---

[1] Altare See Revelation 6.9–10. The echo reinforces the association of Arthur with Christ.

Of treble good: good growes of evils priefe.° endured
The chearelesse man, whom sorrow did dismay,
Had no delight to treaten° of his griefe; tell
His long endurèd famine needed more reliefe.

44

Faire Lady, then said that victorious knight,
The things, that grievous were to do, or beare,
Them to renew,° I wote,° breeds no delight: relate / know
Best musicke breeds delight in loathing eare:
But th'onely good, that growes of passèd feare,
Is to be wise, and ware° of like agein. wary
This dayes ensample hath this lesson deare
Deepe written in my heart with yron pen,
That blisse may not abide in state of mortall men.

45

Henceforth sir knight, take to you wonted strength,
And maister these mishaps with patient might;
Loe where your foe lyes stretcht in monstrous length,
And loe that wicked woman in your sight,
The roote of all your care, and wretched plight,
Now in your powre, to let her live, or dye.
To do her dye (quoth Una) were despight,° spiteful
And shame t'avenge so weake an enimy;
But spoile° her of her scarlot robe, and let her fly. strip

46

So as she bad,° that witch they disaraid, ordered
And robd of royall robes, and purple pall,
And ornaments that richly were displaid;
Ne sparèd they to strip her naked all.
Then when they had despoild her tire° and call,° attire headdress
Such as she was, their eyes might her behold,
That her misshapèd parts did them appall,
A loathly, wrinckled hag, ill favoured, old,
Whose secret filth good manners biddeth not be told.

47

Her craftie head was altogether bald,
And as in hate of honorable eld,° age
Was overgrowne with scurfe° and filthy scald;[1] scabs
Her teeth out of her rotten gummes were feld,° fallen
And her sowre breath abhominably smeld;
Her drièd dugs,° like bladders lacking wind, breasts
Hong downe, and filthy matter from them weld;° flowed
Her wrizled° skin as rough, as maple rind,° wrinkled / bark
So scabby was, that would have loathd all womankind.

48

Her neather parts, the shame of all her kind,
My chaster Muse for shame doth blush to write;
But at her rompe she growing had behind
A foxes taile, with dong all fowly dight;° covered
And eke her feete most monstrous were in sight;
For one of them was like an Eagles claw,
With griping talaunts armd to greedy fight,
The other like a Beares uneven° paw: rough
More ugly shape yet never living creature saw.

49

Which when the knights beheld, amazd they were,
And wondred at so fowle deformèd wight.
Such then (said Una) as she seemeth here,
Such is the face of falshood, such the sight
Of fowle Duessa, when her borrowed light
Is laid away, and counterfesaunce° knowne. fraud
Thus when they had the witch disrobèd quight,
And all her filthy feature° open showne, form
They let her goe at will, and wander wayes unknowne.

50

She flying fast from heavens hated face,
And from the world that her discovered wide,
Fled to the wastfull° wildernesse apace, barren
From living eyes her open shame to hide,
And lurkt in rocks and caves long unespide.
But that faire crew of knights, and Una faire
Did in that castle afterwards abide,
To rest them selves, and weary powres repaire,
Where store they found of all, that dainty was and rare.

---

[1] scald Disease of the skin that causes scabbing and flaking, usually on the scalp.

CANTO 9

His loves and lignage Arthur tells
The knights knit friendly bands:
Sir Trevisan flies from Despayre,
Whom Redcrosse knight withstands.

1

O goodly golden chaine, wherewith yfere° together
The vertues linkèd are in lovely wize:° ways
And noble minds of yore allyed were,
In brave poursuit of chevalrous emprize,
That none did others safety despize,
Nor aid envy to him, in need that stands,
But friendly each did others prayse devize
How to advaunce with favourable hands,
As this good Prince redeemd the Redcrosse knight from bands.

2

Who when their powres, empaird through labour long,
With dew repast they had recurèd° well, refreshed
And that weake captive wight now wexèd strong,
Them list no lenger there at leasure dwell,
But forward fare, as their adventures fell,
But ere they parted, Una faire besought
That straunger knight his name and nation tell;
Least so great good, as he for her had wrought,
Should die unknown, & buried be in thanklesse thought.

3

Faire virgin (said the Prince) ye me require
A thing without° the compas of my wit: beyond
For both the lignage and the certain Sire,
From which I sprong, from me are hidden yit.
For all so soone as life did me admit
Into this world, and shewèd heavens light,
From mothers pap I taken was unfit:[1]
And streight delivered to a Faery knight,
To be upbrought in gentle thewes° and martiall might. manners

4

Unto old Timon[2] he me brought bylive,° directly
Old Timon, who in youthly yeares hath beene
In warlike feates th'expertest man alive,
And is the wisest now on earth I weene;
His dwelling is low in a valley greene,
Under the foot of Rauran[3] mossy hore,° gray
From whence the river Dee[4] as silver cleene° clear
His tombling billowes rolls with gentle rore:
There all my dayes he traind me up in vertuous lore.

5

Thither the great Magicien Merlin came,
As was his use,° ofttimes to visit me: habit
For he had charge my discipline° to frame, education
And Tutours nouriture° to oversee. upbringing
Him oft and oft I askt in privitie,
Of what loines and what lignage I did spring:
Whose aunswere bad me still assurèd bee,
That I was sonne and heire unto a king,
As time in her just terme the truth to light should bring.

6

Well worthy impe, said then the Lady gent,° noble
And Pupill fit for such a Tutours hand.
But what adventure, or what high intent
Hath brought you hither into Faery land,
Aread° Prince Arthur, crowne of Martiall band? declare
Full hard it is (quoth he) to read aright
The course of heavenly cause, or understand
The secret meaning of th'eternall might,
That rules mens wayes, and rules the thoughts of living wight.

7

For whither he through fatall° deepe foresight fated
Me hither sent, for cause to me unghest,
Or that fresh bleeding wound, which day and night
Whilome° doth rancle in my riven brest, all the while
With forcèd fury following his° behest, its
Me hither brought by wayes yet never found,
You to have helpt I hold my selfe yet blest.

---

[1] From ... unfit He was taken from his mother's breast before he was weaned.

[2] Timon Honor.

[3] Rauran Hill in Wales.

[4] Dee River that flows along part of the boundary between England and Wales.

Ah curteous knight (quoth she) what secret wound
Could ever find, to grieve the gentlest hart on ground?

8

Deare Dame (quoth he) you sleeping sparkes awake,
Which troubled once, into huge flames will grow,
Ne ever will their fervent fury slake,
Till living moysture into smoke do flow,
And wasted life do lye in ashes low.
Yet sithens silence lesseneth not my fire,
But told it flames, and hidden it does glow,
I will revele, what ye so much desire:
Ah Love, lay downe thy bow, the whiles I may respire.° breathe

9

It was in freshest flowre of youthly yeares,
When courage first does creepe in manly chest,
Then first the coale of kindly° heat appears natural
To kindle love in every living brest;
But me had warnd old Timons wise behest,
Those creeping flames by reason to subdew,
Before their rage grew to so great unrest,
As miserable lovers use° to rew, are used
Which still wex° old in woe, whiles woe still wexeth new. grow

10

That idle name of love, and lovers life,
As losse of time, and vertues enimy
I ever scornd, and joyd to stirre up strife,
In middest of their mournfull Tragedy,
Ay wont to laugh, when them I heard to cry,
And blow the fire, which them to ashes brent:° burned
Their God° himselfe, griev'd at my libertie, Cupid
Shot many a dart at me with fiers intent,
But I them warded all with wary government.° self-discipline

11

But all in vaine: no fort can be so strong,
Ne fleshly brest can armèd be so sound,
But will at last be wonne with battrie long,
Or unawares at disavantage found;
Nothing is sure, that growes on earthly ground:
And who most trustes in arme of fleshly might,
And boasts, in beauties chaine not to be bound,
Doth soonest fall in disaventrous° fight, disastrous
And yeeldes his caytive neck to victours most° despight.° greatest / malice

12

Ensample make of him your haplesse joy,
And of my selfe now mated,° as ye see; beaten
Whose prouder° vaunt° that proud avenging boy too proud / boast
Did soone pluck downe, and curbd my libertie.
For on a day prickt° forth with jollitie spurred
Of looser life, and heat of hardiment,
Raunging the forest wide on courser free,
The fields, the floods, the heavens with one consent
Did seeme to laugh on me, and favour mine intent.

13

For-wearied with my sports, I did alight
From loftie steed, and downe to sleepe me layd;
The verdant gras my couch did goodly dight,° form
And pillow was my helmet faire displayd:
Whiles every sence the humour[1] sweet embayd,° imbued
And slombring soft my hart did steale away,
Me seemèd, by my side a royall Mayd
Her daintie limbes full softly down did lay:
So faire a creature yet saw never sunny day.

14

Most goodly glee and lovely blandishment° flattery
She to me made, and bad me love her deare,
For dearely sure her love was to me bent,
As when just time expirèd° should appeare. had expired
But whether dreames delude, or true it were,
Was never hart so ravisht with delight,
Ne living man like words did ever heare,
As she to me delivered all that night;
And at her parting said, She Queene of Faeries hight.° was called 15

When I awoke, and found her place devoyd,° empty
And nought but pressèd gras, where she had lyen,
I sorrowed all so much, as earst I joyd,
And washèd all her place with watry eyen.
From that day forth I lov'd that face divine;

---

[1] humour Dew of sleep.

From that day forth I cast in carefull° mind, care-filled
To seeke her out with labour, and long tyne,° affliction
And never vow to rest, till her I find,
Nine monethes I seeke in vaine yet ni'll° that vow unbind. never will

16

Thus as he spake, his visage wexèd pale,
And chaunge of hew great passion did bewray;° betray
Yet still he strove to cloke his inward bale,° sorrow
And hide the smoke, that did his fire display,
Till gentle Una thus to him gan say;
O happy Queene of Faeries, that hast found
Mongst many, one that with his prowesse may Defend thine honour, and thy foes confound:
True Loves are often sown, but seldom grow on ground.

17

Thine, O then, said the gentle Redcrosse knight,
Next to that Ladies love, shalbe the place,
O fairest virgin, full of heavenly light,
Whose wondrous faith, exceeding earthly race,
Was firmest fixt in mine extremest case,° plight
And you, my Lord, the Patrone° of my life, protector
Of that great Queene may well gaine worthy grace:
For onely worthy you through prowes priefe° proven
Yf living man mote° worthy be, to be her liefe.° may beloved

18

So diversly discoursing of their loves,
The golden Sunne his glistring head gan shew,
And sad remembraunce now the Prince amoves,
With fresh desire his voyage to pursew:
Als Una earnd° her traveill to renew. yearned
Then those two knights, fast friendship for to bynd,
And love establish each to other trew,
Gave goodly gifts, the signes of gratefull mynd,
And eke as pledges firme, right hands together joynd.

19

Prince Arthur gave a boxe of Diamond sure,° true
Embowd° with gold and gorgeous ornament, wrapped
Wherein were closd few drops of liquor pure,
Of wondrous worth, and vertue excellent,
That any wound could heale incontinent:° immediately
Which to requite, the Redcrosse knight him gave
A booke, wherein his Saveours testament
Was writ with golden letters rich and brave;° handsome
A worke of wondrous grace, and able soules to save.

20

Thus beene they parted, Arthur on his way
To seeke his love, and th'other for to fight
With Unaes foe, that all her realme did pray.° plunder
But she now weighing the decayèd plight,
And shrunken synewes of her chosen knight,
Would not a while her forward course pursew,
Ne bring him forth in face of dreadfull fight,
Till he recovered had his former hew:
For him to be yet weake and wearie well she knew.

21

So as they traveild, lo they gan espy
An armèd knight towards them gallop fast,
That seemèd from some fearèd foe to fly,
Or other griesly thing, that him agast.
Still as he fled, his eye was backward cast,
As if his feare still followed him behind;
Als flew his steed, as he his bands had brast,° burst
And with his wingèd heeles did tread the wind,
As he had beene a fole° of Pegasus his kind. foal

22

Nigh as he drew, they might perceive his head
To be unarmd, and curld uncombèd heares
Upstaring stiffe, dismayd with uncouth° dread; unknown
Nor drop of bloud in all his face appeares
Nor life in limbe: and to increase his feares,
In fowle reproch° of knighthoods faire degree, disgrace
About his neck an hempen rope he weares,
That with his glistring armes does ill agree;
But he of rope or armes has now no memoree.

23

The Redcrosse knight toward him crossed fast,
To weet, what mister° wight was so dismayd: sort of
There him he finds all sencelesse and aghast,
That of him selfe he seemd to be afrayd;
Whom hardly he from flying forward stayd,
Till he these wordes to him deliver might;
Sir knight, aread who hath ye thus arayd,° afflicted

And eke from whom make ye this hasty flight:
For never knight I saw in such misseeming° plight. unseemly

24

He answerd nought at all, but adding new Feare to his first amazment, staring wide
With stony° eyes, and hartlesse hollow hew, staring
Astonisht stood, as one that had aspide
Infernall furies, with their chaines untide.
Him yet againe, and yet againe bespake
The gentle knight; who nought to him replide,
But trembling every joynt did inly quake,
And foltring tongue at last these words seemd forth to shake.

25

For Gods deare love, Sir knight, do me not stay;
For loe he comes, he comes fast after mee.
Eft° looking backe would faine have runne away; again
But he him forst to stay, and tellen free
The secret cause of his perplexitie:° anxiety
Yet nathemore° by his bold hartie speach, not at all
Could his bloud-frosen hart emboldned bee,
But through his boldnesse rather feare did reach,
Yet forst, at last he made through silence suddein breach.

26

And am I now in safetie sure (quoth he)
From him, that would have forcèd me to dye?
And is the point of death now turnd fro mee,
That I may tell this haplesse history?
Feare nought: (quoth he) no daunger now is nye.
Then shall I you recount a ruefull cace,° occurrence
(Said he) the which with this unlucky eye
I late beheld, and had not greater grace
Me reft from it, had bene partaker of the place.

27

I lately chaunst (Would I had never chaunst)
With a faire knight to keepen companee,
Sir Terwin hight,° that well himselfe advaunst called
In all affaires, and was both bold and free,
But not so happie as mote happie bee:
He lov'd, as was his lot, a Ladie gent,
That him againe lov'd in the least degree:[1]
For she was proud, and of too high intent,
And joyd to see her lover languish and lament.

28

From whom returning sad and comfortlesse,
As on the way together we did fare,
We met that villen (God from him me blesse°) protect
That cursèd wight, from whom I scapt whyleare,° earlier
A man of hell, that cals himselfe Despaire:
Who first us greets, and after faire areedes° relates
Of tydings strange, and of adventures rare:
So creeping close, as Snake in hidden weedes,
Inquireth of our states, and of our knightly deedes.

29

Which when he knew, and felt our feeble harts
Embost° with bale, and bitter byting griefe, fatigued
Which love had launchèd° with his deadly darts, penetrated
With wounding words and termes of foule repriefe
He pluckt from us all hope of due reliefe,
That earst° us held in love of lingring life; first
Then hopelesse hartlesse, gan the cunning thiefe
Perswade us die, to stint° all further strife: cease
To me he lent this rope, to him a rustie knife.

30

With which sad instrument of hastie death,
That wofull lover, loathing lenger light,
A wide way made to let forth living breath.
But I more fearefull, or more luckie wight,
Dismayd with that deformèd dismall sight,
Fled fast away, halfe dead with dying feare:° fear of
Ne yet assur'd of life by you, Sir knight,
Whose like infirmitie like chaunce may beare:
But God you never let his charmèd speeches heare.

31

How may a man (said he) with idle speach
Be wonne, to spoyle the Castle of his health?
I wote (quoth he) whom triall late did teach,
That like would not for all this worldes wealth:
His subtill tongue, like dropping honny, mealt'th° melts
Into the hart, and searcheth every vaine,

---

[1] That him … degree I.e., did not return his love.

That ere one be aware, by secret stealth
His powre is reft, and weaknesse doth remaine.
O never Sir desire to try° his guilefull traine.° test / deceit

32

Certes° (said he) hence shall I never rest, certainly
Till I that treachours art have heard and tride;
And you Sir knight, whose name mote I request,
Of grace° do me unto his cabin° guide. a favor / cave
I that hight Trevisan (quoth he) will ride
Against my liking backe, to doe you grace:
But nor for gold nor glee° will I abide song
By you, when ye arrive in that same place;
For lever° had I die, then see his deadly face. rather

33

Ere long they come, where that same wicked wight
His dwelling has, low in an hollow cave,
Farre underneath a craggie clift ypight,° placed
Darke, dolefull, drearie, like a greedie grave,
That still for carrion carcases doth crave:
On top whereof aye° dwelt the ghastly Owle,[1] ever
Shrieking his balefull note, which ever drave
Farre from that haunt all other chearefull fowle;
And all about it wandring ghostes did waile and howle.

34

And all about old stockes° and stubs of trees, stumps
Whereon nor fruit, nor leafe was ever seene,
Did hang upon the ragged rocky knees;° crags
On which had many wretches hangèd beene,
Whose carcases were scattered on the greene,
And throwne about the cliffs. Arrivèd there,
That bare-head knight for dread and dolefull teene,° suffering
Would faine have fled, ne durst approchen neare,
But th'other forst him stay, and comforted in feare.

35

That darkesome cave they enter, where they find
That cursèd man, low sitting on the ground,
Musing full sadly in his sullein mind;
His griesie° lockes, long growen, and unbound, grizzled
Disordred hong about his shoulders round,
And hid his face; through which his hollow eyne
Lookt deadly dull, and starèd as astound;
His raw-bone cheekes through penurie° and pine,° poverty / starvation
Were shronke into his jawes, as he did never dine.

36

His garment nought but many ragged clouts,° rags
With thornes together pind and patchèd was,
The which his naked sides he wrapt abouts;
And him beside there lay upon the gras
A drearie corse, whose life away did pas,
All wallowd in his owne yet luke-warme blood,
That from his wound yet wellèd fresh alas;
In which a rustie knife fast fixèd stood,
And made an open passage for the gushing flood.

37

Which piteous spectacle, approving° trew proving
The wofull tale that Trevisan had told,
When as the gentle Redcrosse knight did vew,
With firie zeale he burnt in courage bold,
Him to avenge, before his bloud were cold,
And to the villein said, Thou damnèd wight,
The author of this fact,° we here behold, act
What justice can but judge against thee right,
With thine owne bloud to price° his bloud, here shed in sight. pay for

38

What franticke fit (quoth he) hath thus distraught
Thee, foolish man, so rash a doome to give?
What justice ever other judgement taught,
But he should die, who merites not to live?
None else to death this man despayring drive,° drove
But his owne guiltie mind deserving death.
Is then unjust to each his due to give?
Or let him die, that loatheth living breath?
Or let him die at ease, that liveth here uneath?° with difficulty

39

Who travels by the wearie wandring way,
To come unto his wishèd home in haste,
And meetes a flood, that doth his passage stay,
Is not great grace to helpe him over past,
Or free his feet, that in the myre sticke fast?
Most envious man, that grieves at neighbours good,

---

[1] Owle Owls were believed to bring tidings of death.

And fond,° that joyest in the woe thou hast, foolish
Why wilt not let him passe, that long hath stood
Upon the banke, yet wilt thy selfe not passe the flood?

40

He there does now enjoy eternall rest
And happie ease, which thou doest want and crave,
And further from it daily wanderest:
What if some litle paine the passage have,
That makes fraile flesh to feare the bitter wave?
Is not short paine well borne, that brings long ease,
And layes the soule to sleepe in quiet grave?
Sleepe after toyle, port after stormie seas,
Ease after warre, death after life does greatly please.

41

The knight much wondred at his suddeine wit,° intelligence
And said, The terme of life is limited,
Ne may a man prolong, nor shorten it;
The souldier may not move from watchfull sted,
Nor leave his stand, untill his Captaine bed.° bid
Who life did limit by almightie doome,
(Quoth he) knowes best the termes establishèd;
And he, that points the Centonell his roome,° position
Doth license him depart at sound of morning droome.° drum

42

Is not his deed, what ever thing is donne,
In heaven and earth? did not he all create
To die againe? all ends that was begonne.
Their times in his eternall booke of fate
Are written sure, and have their certaine date.
Who then can strive with strong necessitie,
That holds the world in his still chaunging state,
Or shunne the death ordaynd by destinie?
When houre of death is come, let none aske whence, nor why.

43

The lenger life, I wote the greater sin,
The greater sin, the greater punishment:
All those great battels, which thou boasts to win,
Through strife, and bloud-shed, and avengement,
Now praysd, hereafter deare thou shalt repent:
For life must life, and bloud must bloud repay.
Is not enough thy evill life forespent?° spent previously
For he, that once hath missed the right way,
The further he doth goe, the further he doth stray.

44

Then do no further goe, no further stray,
But here lie downe, and to thy rest betake,
Th'ill to prevent, that life ensewen may.
For what hath life, that may it lovèd make,
And gives not rather cause it to forsake?
Feare, sicknesse, age, losse, labour, sorrow, strife,
Paine, hunger, cold, that makes the hart to quake;
And ever fickle fortune rageth rife,
All which, and thousands mo° do make a loathsome life. more

45

Thou wretched man, of death hast greatest need,
If in true ballance thou wilt weigh thy state:
For never knight, that darèd warlike deede,
More lucklesse disaventures° did amate:° misfortunes dismay
Witnesse the dongeon deepe, wherein of late
Thy life shut up, for death so oft did call;
And though good lucke prolongèd hath thy date,
Yet death then, would the like mishaps forestall,
Into the which hereafter thou maiest happen fall.

46

Why then doest thou, O man of sin, desire
To draw thy dayes forth to their last degree?
Is not the measure of thy sinfull hire° work
High heapèd up with huge iniquitie,° sin
Against the day of wrath,[1] to burden thee?
Is not enough, that to this Ladie milde
Thou falsèd° hast thy faith with perjurie, betrayed
And sold thy selfe to serve Duessa vilde,° vile
With whom in all abuse thou hast thy selfe defilde?

47

Is not he just, that all this doth behold
From highest heaven, and beares an equall° eye? impartial
Shall he thy sins up in his knowledge fold,
And guiltie be of thine impietie?
Is not his law, Let every sinner die:

---

[1] day of wrath Judgment Day.

Die shall all flesh? what then must needs be donne,
Is it not better to doe willinglie,
Then linger, till the glasse be all out ronne?
Death is the end of woes: die soone, O faeries sonne.

48

The knight was much enmovèd with his speach,
That as a swords point through his hart did perse,
And in his conscience made a secret breach,
Well knowing true all, that he did reherse,° recount
And to his fresh remembrance did reverse° recall
The ugly vew of his deformèd crimes,
That all his manly powres it did disperse,
As° he were charmèd with inchaunted rimes, as if
That oftentimes he quakt, and fainted oftentimes.

49

In which amazement, when the Miscreant
Perceivèd him to waver weake and fraile,
Whiles trembling horror did his conscience dant,° daunt
And hellish anguish did his soule assaile,
To drive him to despaire, and quite to quaile,
He shew'd him painted in a table° plaine, picture
The damnèd ghosts, that doe in torments waile,
And thousand feends that doe them endlesse paine
With fire and brimstone, which for ever shall remaine.

50

The sight whereof so throughly him dismaid,
That nought but death before his eyes he saw,
And ever burning wrath before him laid,
By righteous sentence of th'Almighties law:
Then gan the villein him to overcraw,° overpower
And brought unto him swords, ropes, poison, fire,
And all that might him to perdition draw;
And bad him choose, what death he would desire:
For death was due to him, that had provokt Gods ire.

51

But when as none of them he saw him take,
He to him raught° a dagger sharpe and keene, reached
And gave it him in hand: his hand did quake,
And tremble like a leafe of Aspin greene,
And troubled bloud through his pale face was seene
To come, and goe with tydings from the hart,
As it a running messenger had beene.
At last resolv'd to worke his finall smart,
He lifted up his hand, that backe againe did start.

52

Which when as Una saw, through every vaine
The crudled° cold ran to her well of life,[1] curdled
As in a swowne: but soone reliv'd° againe, revived
Out of his hand she snatcht the cursèd knife,
And threw it to the ground, enragèd rife,° deeply
And to him said, Fie, fie, faint harted knight,
What meanest thou by this reprochfull strife?
Is this the battell, which thou vauntst to fight
With that fire-mouthèd Dragon, horrible and bright?

53

Come, come away, fraile, seely, fleshly wight,
Ne let vaine words bewitch thy manly hart,
Ne divelish thoughts dismay thy constant spright.
In heavenly mercies hast thou not a part?
Why shouldst thou then despeire, that chosen art?
Where justice growes, there grows eke greater grace,
The which doth quench the brond of hellish smart,
And that accurst hand-writing doth deface,
Arise, Sir knight arise, and leave this cursèd place.

54

So up he rose, and thence amounted° streight. mounted
Which when the carle° beheld, and saw his guest villain
Would safe depart, for° all his subtill sleight, in spite of
He chose an halter from among the rest,
And with it hung himselfe, unbid° unblest. unprayed for
But death he could not worke himselfe thereby;
For thousand times he so himselfe had drest,° prepared
Yet nathelesse it could not doe° him die, make
Till he should die his last, that is eternally.

---

[1] well of life Heart.

CANTO 10

Her faithfull knight faire Una brings
To house of Holinesse,
Where he is taught repentance, and
The way to heavenly blesse.

1

What man is he, that boasts of fleshly might,
And vaine assurance of mortality,
Which all so soone, as it doth come to fight,
Against spirituall foes, yeelds by and by,
Or from the field most cowardly doth fly?
Ne let the man ascribe it to his skill,
That thorough grace hath gainèd victory.
If any strength we have, it is to ill,
But all the good is Gods, both power and eke will.

2

By that, which lately hapned, Una saw,
That this her knight was feeble, and too faint;
And all his sinews woxen° weake and raw,° grown / inexperienced
Through long enprisonment, and hard constraint,° misfortune
Which he endurèd in his late restraint,
That yet he was unfit for bloudie fight:
Therefore to cherish° him with diets daint,° nourish / dainty
She cast to bring him, where he chearen° might, be cheered
Till he recouered had his° late decayèd plight. from his

3

There was an auntient house not farre away,
Renowmd throughout the world for sacred lore,° wisdom
And pure unspotted life: so well they say
It governd was, and guided evermore,
Through wisedome of a matrone grave and hore;° venerable
Whose onely joy was to relieve the needes
Of wretched soules, and helpe the helpelesse pore:
All night she spent in bidding of her bedes,° beads
And all the day in doing good and godly deedes.

4

Dame Cælia[1] men did her call, as thought
From heaven to come, or thither to arise,
The mother of three daughters, well upbrought
In goodly thewes, and godly exercise:
The eldest two most sober, chast, and wise,
Fidelia and Speranza[2] virgins were,
Though spousd,° yet wanting wedlocks solemnize; engaged
But faire Charissa[3] to a lovely° fere° loving / spouse
Was linckèd, and by him had many pledges° dere. children

5

Arrivèd there, the dore they find fast lockt;
For it was warely watchèd night and day,
For feare of many foes: but when they knockt,
The Porter opened unto them streight way:
He was an agèd syre, all hory gray,
With lookes full lowly cast, and gate° full slow, gait
Wont on a staffe his feeble steps to stay,
Hight Humilta.[4] They passe in stouping low;
For streight & narrow was the way, which he did show.

6

Each goodly thing is hardest to begin,
But entred in a spacious court they see,
Both plaine, and pleasant to be walkèd in,
Where them does meete a francklin[5] faire and free,
And entertaines with comely° courteous glee, appropriate
His name was Zele,[6] that him right well became,
For in his speeches and behaviour hee
Did labour lively to expresse the same,
And gladly did them guide, till to the Hall they came.

7

There fairely them receives a gentle Squire,
Of milde demeanure, and rare courtesie,
Right cleanly clad in comely sad° attire; sober
In word and deede that shew'd great modestie,
And knew his good° to all of each degree,° proper courtesy / rank

---

[1] Cælia Heavenly.

[2] Fidelia and Speranza Faith and Hope.

[3] Charissa Charity.

[4] Humilta Humility.

[5] francklin I.e., franklin; freeholder, one who owns his own land.

[6] Zele Zeal.

Hight Reverence. He them with speeches meet
Does faire entreat; no courting° nicetie,° courtly / flattery
But simple true, and eke unfainèd sweet,
As might become a Squire so great persons to greet.

8

And afterwards them to his Dame he leades,
That agèd Dame, the Ladie of the place:
Who all this while was busie at her beades:
Which doen, she up arose with seemely grace,
And toward them full matronely did pace.
Where when that fairest Una she beheld,
Whom well she knew to spring from heavenly race,
Her hart with joy unwonted° inly sweld, unaccustomed
As feeling wondrous comfort in her weaker eld.

9

And her embracing said, O happie earth,
Whereon thy innocent feet doe ever tread,
Most vertuous virgin borne of heavenly berth,
That to redeeme thy woefull parents head,
From tyrans rage, and ever-dying dread,[1]
Hast wandred through the world now long a day;
Yet ceasest not thy wearie soles to lead,
What grace hath thee now hither brought this way?
Or doen thy feeble feet unweeting hither stray?

10

Strange thing it is an errant knight to see
Here in this place, or any other wight,
That hither turnes his steps. So few there bee,
That chose the narrow path, or seeke the right:
All keepe the broad high way, and take delight
With many rather for to go astray,
And be partakers of their evill plight,
Then with a few to walke the rightest way;
O foolish men, why haste ye to your owne decay?

11

Thy selfe to see, and tyred limbs to rest,
O matrone sage (quoth she) I hither came,
And this good knight his way with me addrest,
Led with thy prayses and broad-blazèd fame,
That up to heaven is blowne. The auncient Dame
Him goodly greeted in her modest guise,
And entertaynd them both, as best became,
With all the court'sies, that she could devise.
Ne wanted ought, to shew her bounteous° or wise. generous

12

Thus as they gan of sundry things devise,° discuss
Loe two most goodly virgins came in place,
Ylinkèd arme in arme in lovely° wise,° loving / manner
With countenance demure, and modest grace,
They numberd even steps and equall pace:
Of which the eldest, that Fidelia hight,
Like sunny beames threw from her Christall face,
That could have dazd the rash beholders sight,
And round about her head did shine like heavens light.

13

She was araièd all in lilly white,
And in her right hand bore a cup of gold,
With wine and water fild up to the hight,
In which a Serpent did himselfe enfold,[2]
That horrour made to all, that did behold;
But she no whit did chaunge her constant mood:
And in her other hand she fast did hold
A booke, that was both signd and seald with blood,
Wherein darke things were writ, hard to be understood.[3]

14

Her younger sister, that Speranza hight,
Was clad in blew, that her beseemèd well;
Not all so chearefull seemèd she of sight,
As was her sister; whether dread° did dwell, fear
Or anguish in her hart, is hard to tell:
Upon her arme a silver anchor[4] lay,
Whereon she leanèd ever, as befell:° was appropriate
And ever up to heaven, as she did pray,
Her stedfast eyes were bent, ne swarvèd other way.

15

They seeing Una, towards her gan wend,° proceed
Who them encounters with like courtesie;
Many kind speeches they betwene them spend,

---

[1] ever-dying dread Ever-present fear of death.

[2] cup … enfold The cup of wine and water is the sacrament of Holy Communion, and the serpent is an ancient symbol of renewal and rebirth.

[3] A booke … understood The New Testament.

[4] silver anchor Symbol of hope.

And greatly joy each other well to see:
Then to the knight with shamefast° modestie humble
They turne themselves, at Unaes meeke request,
And him salute with well beseeming glee:
Who faire them quites,° as him beseemèd best, returns
And goodly gan discourse of many a noble gest.° deed

16

Then Una thus; But she your sister deare;
The deare Charissa where is she become?
Or wants she health, or busie is elsewhere?
Ah no, said they, but forth she may not come:
For she of late is lightned of her wombe,
And hath encreast the world with one sonne more,
That her to see should be but troublesome.
Indeede (quoth she) that should her trouble sore,
But thankt be God, and her encrease so evermore.

17

Then said the agèd Caelia, Deare dame,
And you good Sir, I wote that of your toyle,
And labours long, through which ye hither came,
Ye both forwearied be: therefore a whyle
I read° you rest, and to your bowres recoyle.° advise / retire
Then called she a Groome, that forth him led Into a goodly lodge, and gan despoile° undress
Of puissant armes, and laid in easie bed;
His name was meeke Obedience rightfully arèd.° understood

18

Now when their wearie limbes with kindly rest,
And bodies were refresht with due repast,
Faire Una gan Fidelia faire request,
To have her knight into her schoolehouse plaste,
That of her heauenly learning he might taste,
And heare the wisedome of her words divine.
She graunted, and that knight so much agraste,° favored
That she him taught celestiall discipline,
And opened his dull eyes, that light mote in them shine.

19

And that her sacred Booke, with bloud ywrit,
That none could read, except she did them teach,
She unto him disclosèd every whit,
And heavenly documents° thereout did preach, doctrines
That weaker wit of man could never reach,
Of God, of grace, of justice, of free will,
That wonder was to heare her goodly speach:
For she was able, with her words to kill,
And raise againe to life the hart, that she did thrill.° pierce

20

And when she list° poure out her larger° spright, desired to / greater
She would commaund the hastie Sunne to stay,
Or backward turne his course from heavens hight;
Sometimes great hostes of men she could dismay,
Dry-shod to passe, she parts the flouds in tway;
And eke huge mountaines from their native seat
She would commaund, themselves to beare away,
And throw in raging sea with roaring threat.
Almightie God her gave such powre, and puissance great.

21

The faithfull knight now grew in litle space,
By hearing her, and by her sisters lore,
To such perfection of all heavenly grace,
That wretched world he gan for to abhore,
And mortall life gan loath, as thing forlore,° confounded
Greev'd with remembrance of his wicked wayes,
And prickt with anguish of his sinnes so sore,
That he desirde to end his wretched dayes:
So much the dart of sinfull guilt the soule dismayes.

22

But wise Speranza gave him comfort sweet,
And taught him how to take assurèd hold
Upon her silver anchor, as was meet;
Else had his sinnes so great, and manifold
Made him forget all that Fidelia told.
In this distressèd doubtfull agonie,
When him his dearest Una did behold,
Disdeining life, desiring leave° to die, permission
She found her selfe assayld with great perplexitie.

23

And came to Caelia to declare her smart,
Who well acquainted with that commune plight,
Which sinfull horror workes in wounded hart,
Her wisely comforted all that she might,
With goodly counsell and advisement right;

And streightway sent with carefull diligence,
To fetch a Leach, the which had great insight
In that disease of grievèd conscience,
And well could cure the same; His name was Patience.

24

Who comming to that soule-diseasèd knight,
Could hardly him intreat, to tell his griefe:
Which knowne, and all that noyd° his heavie spright troubled
Well searcht,° eftsoones he gan apply reliefe examined
Of salves and med'cines, which had passing° priefe, superior
And thereto added words of wondrous might:
By which to ease he him recurèd° briefe,° cured / quickly
And much asswag'd the passion° of his plight, suffering
That he his paine endur'd, as seeming now more light.

25

But yet the cause and root of all his ill,
Inward corruption, and infected sin,
Not purg'd nor heald, behind remainèd still,
And festring sore did rankle yet within,
Close creeping twixt the marrow and the skin.
Which to extirpe,° he laid him privily remove Downe in a darkesome lowly place farre in,
Whereas he meant his corrosives to apply,
And with streight° diet tame his stubborne malady. strict

26

In ashes and sackcloth he did array
His daintie corse, proud humors to abate,
And dieted with fasting every day,
The swelling of his wounds to mitigate,
And made him pray both earely and eke late:
And ever as superfluous flesh did rot
Amendment readie still at hand did wayt,
To pluck it out with pincers firie whot,° hot
That soone in him was left no one corrupted jot.

27

And bitter Penance with an yron whip,
Was wont him once to disple° every day: discipline
And sharpe Remorse his hart did pricke and nip,
That drops of bloud thence like a well did play;
And sad Repentance usèd to embay° bathe
His bodie in salt water smarting sore,
The filthy blots of sinne to wash away.
So in short space they did to health restore
The man that would not live, but earst° lay at deathes dore. now

28

In which his torment often was so great,
That like a Lyon he would cry and rore,
And rend his flesh, and his owne synewes eat.
His owne deare Una hearing evermore
His ruefull shriekes and gronings, often tore
Her guiltlesse garments, and her golden heare,
For pitty of his paine and anguish sore;
Yet all with patience wisely she did beare;
For well she wist, his crime could else be never cleare.

29

Whom thus recover'd by wise Patience,
And trew Repentance they to Una brought:
Who joyous of his curèd conscience,
Him dearely kist, and fairely° eke besought courteously
Himselfe to chearish, and consuming thought
To put away out of his carefull brest.
By this° Charissa, late in child-bed brought, this time
Was woxen strong, and left her fruitfull nest;
To her faire Una brought this unacquainted guest.

30

She was a woman in her freshest age,
Of wondrous beauty, and of bountie rare,
With goodly grace and comely personage,
That was on earth not easie to compare;
Full of great love, but Cupids wanton snare
As hell she hated, chast in worke and will;
Her necke and breasts were ever open bare,
That ay thereof her babes might sucke their fill;
The rest was all in yellow robes arayèd still.

31

A multitude of babes about her hong,
Playing their sports, that joyd her to behold,
Whom still she fed, whiles they were weake & young,
But thrust them forth still, as they wexèd old:
And on her head she wore a tyre° of gold, headdress
Adornd with gemmes and owches wondrous faire,

Whose passing° price° uneath° was to be told; surpassing / value / scarcely
And by her side there sate a gentle paire
Of turtle doves, she sitting in an yvorie chaire.

32

The knight and Una entring, faire her greet,
And bid her joy of that her happie brood;
Who them requites with court'sies seeming meet,
And entertaines with friendly chearefull mood.
Then Una her besought, to be so good,
As in her vertuous rules to schoole her knight,
Now after all his torment well withstood,
In that sad house of Penaunce, where his spright
Had past the paines of hell, and long enduring night.

33

She was right joyous of her just request,
And taking by the hand that Faeries sonne,
Gan him instruct in every good behest,
Of love, and righteousnesse, and well to donne,[1]
And wrath, and hatred warely to shonne,
That drew on men Gods hatred, and his wrath,
And many soules in dolours had fordonne:° overcome
In which when him she well instructed hath,
From thence to heaven she teacheth him the ready° path. direct

34

Wherein his weaker wandring steps to guide,
An auncient matrone she to her does call,
Whose sober lookes her wisedome well descride:° revealed
Her name was Mercie, well knowne over all,
To be both gratious, and eke liberall:
To whom the carefull charge of him she gave,
To lead aright, that he should never fall
In all his wayes through this wide worldès wave,° changing conditions
That Mercy in the end his righteous soule might save.

35

The godly Matrone by the hand him beares° leads Forth from her presence, by a narrow way,
Scattred with bushy thornes, and ragged breares,° briars
Which still before him she remov'd away,
That nothing might his ready passage stay:
And ever when his feet encombred were,
Or gan to shrinke, or from the right to stray,
She held him fast, and firmely did upbeare,
As carefull Nourse her child from falling oft does reare.

36

Eftsoones unto an holy Hospitall,° hostel
That was fore° by the way, she did him bring, close
In which seven Bead-men[2] that had vowèd all
Their life to service of high heavens king
Did spend their dayes in doing godly thing:
Their gates to all were open evermore,
That by the wearie way were traveiling,
And one sate wayting ever them before,
To call in-commers by, that needy were and pore.

37

The first of them that eldest was, and best,° foremost
Of all the house had charge and governement,
As Guardian and Steward of the rest:
His office was to give entertainement
And lodging, unto all that came, and went:
Not unto such, as could him feast againe,° in return
And double quite,° for that he on them spent, repay
But such, as want of harbour° did constraine: shelter
Those for Gods sake his dewty was to entertaine.

38

The second was as Almner[3] of the place,
His office was, the hungry for to feed,
And thristy give to drinke, a worke of grace:
He feard not once him selfe to be in need,
Ne car'd to hoord for those, whom he did breede:
The grace of God he layd up still in store,
Which as a stocke° he left unto his seede;° inheritance children
He had enough, what need him care for more?
And had he lesse, yet some he would give to the pore.

39

The third had of their wardrobe custodie,
In which were not rich tyres,° nor garmens gay, attire

---

[1] well to donne Good deeds.

[2] seven Bead-men These men of prayer perform the seven works of charity, which are described in the following stanzas.

[3] Almner One who distributes alms.

The plumes of pride, and wings of vanitie,
But clothes meet to keepe keene could° away, cold
And naked nature seemely° to aray; appropriately
With which bare wretched wights he dayly clad,
The images of God in earthly clay;
And if that no spare cloths to give he had,
His owne coate he would cut, and it distribute glad.

40

The fourth appointed by his office was,
Poore prisoners to relieve with gratious ayd,
And captives to redeeme with price° of bras, payment
From Turkes and Sarazins, which them had stayd;° taken prisoner
And though they faultie° were, yet well he wayd,° sinful judged
That God to us forgiveth every howre
Much more then that, why° they in bands° were layd, for which / bonds
And he that harrowd hell with heavie stowre,
The faultie soules from thence brought to his heavenly bowre.[1]

41

The fift had charge sicke persons to attend,
And comfort those, in point of death which lay;
For them most needeth comfort in the end,
When sin, and hell, and death do most dismay
The feeble soule departing hence away.
All is but lost, that living we bestow,° store up
If not well ended at our dying day.
O man have mind of that last bitter throw;° throe
For as the tree does fall, so lyes it ever low.

42

The sixt had charge of them now being dead,
In seemely sort their corses to engrave,° bury
And deck with dainty flowres their bridall bed,
That to their heavenly spouse both sweet and brave° handsome
They might appeare, when he their soules shall save.
The wondrous workemanship of Gods owne mould,
Whose face he made, all beasts to feare, and gave
All in his hand, even dead we honour should.
Ah dearest God me graunt, I dead be not defould.

43

The seventh now after death and buriall done,
Had charge the tender Orphans of the dead
And widowes ayd, least they should be undone:° ruined
In face of judgement[2] he their right would plead,
Ne ought° the powre of mighty men did dread at all
In their defence, nor would for gold or fee° bribe
Be wonne their rightfull causes downe to tread:
And when they stood in most necessitee,
He did supply their want, and gave them ever free.

44

There when the Elfin knight arrivèd was,
The first and chiefest of the seven, whose care
Was guests to welcome, towardes him did pas:
Where seeing Mercie, that his steps up bare,
And alwayes led, to her with reverence rare
He humbly louted° in meeke lowlinesse, bowed
And seemely welcome for her did prepare:
For of their order she was Patronesse,
Albe° Charissa were their chiefest founderesse. although 45

There she awhile him stayes, him selfe to rest,
That to the rest more able he might bee:
During which time, in every good behest
And godly worke of Almes and charitee
She him instructed with great industree;
Shortly therein so perfect he became,
That from the first unto the last degree,
His mortall life he learnèd had to frame
In holy righteousnesse, without rebuke or blame.

46

Thence forward by that painfull way they pas,
Forth to an hill, that was both steepe and hy;
On top whereof a sacred chappell was,
And eke a litle Hermitage thereby,
Wherein an agèd holy man did lye,° live
That day and night said his devotion,

---

[1] And he ... bowre According to one Christian tradition, Christ descended into Hell after his crucifixion in order to release all the good Israelites who had lived before his earthly sufferings opened the gate of Heaven. In traditional terminology, this was known as the Harrowing of Hell, described in The Gospel of Nicodemus.

[2] judgement I.e., in a court of law.

Ne other worldly busines did apply;° conduct
His name was heavenly Contemplation;
Of God and goodnesse was his meditation.

47

Great grace that old man to him given had;
For God he often saw from heavens hight,
All° were his earthly eyen both blunt° and bad, although / dim
And through great age had lost their kindly sight,
Yet wondrous quick and persant° was his spright, keen
As Eagles eye, that can behold the Sunne:
That hill they scale with all their powre and might,
That his frayle thighes nigh wearie and fordonne
Gan faile, but by her helpe the top at last he wonne.

48

There they do finde that godly agèd Sire,
With snowy lockes adowne his shoulders shed,
As hoarie frost with spangles° doth attire icicles
The mossy braunches of an Oke halfe ded.
Each bone might through his body well be red,
And every sinew seene through his long fast:
For nought he car'd his carcas long unfed;
His mind was full of spirituall repast,
And pyn'd° his flesh, to keepe his body low° and chast. starved humble

49

Who when these two approching he aspide,
At their first presence grew agrievèd sore,° sorely
That forst him lay his heavenly thoughts aside;
And had he not that Dame respected more,° greatly
Whom highly he did reverence and adore,
He would not once have movèd for the knight.
They him saluted standing far afore;° away
Who well them greeting, humbly did requight,° return
And askèd, to what end they clomb that tedious height.

50

What end (quoth she) should cause us take such paine,
But that same end, which every living wight
Should make his marke,° high heaven to attaine? object
Is not from hence the way, that leadeth right
To that most glorious house, that glistreth bright
With burning starres, and everliving fire,
Whereof the keyes are to thy hand behight° granted
By wise Fidelia? she doth thee require,
To shew it to this knight, according° his desire. granting

51

Thrise happy man, said then the father grave,
Whose staggering steps thy steady hand doth lead,
And shewes the way, his sinfull soule to save.
Who better can the way to heaven aread,° counsel
Then thou thy selfe, that was both borne and bred
In heavenly throne, where thousand Angels shine?
Thou doest the prayers of the righteous sead° seed
Present before the majestie divine,
And his avenging wrath to clemencie incline.

52

Yet since thou bidst, thy pleasure shalbe donne.
Then come thou man of earth, and see the way,
That never yet was seene of Faeries sonne,
That never leads the traveiler astray,
But after labours long, and sad delay,
Brings them to joyous rest and endlesse blis.
But first thou must a season fast and pray,
Till from her bands the spright assoilèd° is, freed
And have her strength recur'd° from fraile infirmitis. recovered

53

That done, he leads him to the highest Mount;
Such one, as that same mighty man of God,
That bloud-red billowes like a wallèd front
On either side disparted° with his rod, parted
Till that his army dry-foot through them yod,° went Dwelt fortie dayes upon; where writ in stone
With bloudy letters by the hand of God,
The bitter doome of death and balefull mone
He did receive, whiles flashing fire about him shone.[1]

---

[1] That done ... shone References to Mount Sinai, upon which Moses lived for 40 days before receiving the Ten Commandments ("bloody letters"), to Moses's parting of the Red Sea to allow the Israelites to escape from Egypt, and to the burning bush through which God spoke to Moses. See the Book of Exodus.

54

Or like that sacred hill, whose head full hie,
Adornd with fruitfull Olives all arownd,[1]
Is, as it were for endlesse memory
Of that deare Lord, who oft thereon was fownd,
For ever with a flowring girlond crownd:
Or like that pleasaunt Mount,[2] that is for ay
Through famous Poets verse each where[3] renownd,
On which the thrise three learnèd Ladies play
Their heavenly notes, and make full many a lovely lay.° verse

55

From thence, far off he unto him did shew
A litle path, that was both steepe and long,
Which to a goodly Citie led his vew;
Whose wals and towres were builded high and strong
Of perle and precious stone, that earthly tong
Cannot describe, nor wit of man can tell;
Too high a ditty° for my simple song; theme
The Citie of the great king hight it well,
Wherein eternall peace and happinesse doth dwell.

56

As he thereon stood gazing, he might see
The blessed Angels to and fro descend
From highest heaven, in gladsome companee,[4]
And with great joy into that Citie wend,
As commonly° as friend does with his frend. familiarly
Whereat he wondred much, and gan enquere,
What stately building durst so high extend
Her loftie towres unto the starry sphere,
And what unknowen nation there empeopled were.

57

Faire knight (quoth he) Hierusalem° that is, Jerusalem
The new Hierusalem, that God has built
For those to dwell in, that are chosen his,
His chosen people purg'd from sinfull guilt,
With pretious bloud, which cruelly was spilt
On cursèd tree, of that unspotted lam,° lamb
That for the sinnes of all the world was kilt:
Now are they Saints all in that Citie sam,° same
More deare unto their God, then younglings to their dam.

58

Till now, said then the knight, I weenèd well,
That great Cleopolis, where I have beene,
In which that fairest Faerie Queene doth dwell,
The fairest Citie was, that might be seene;
And that bright towre all built of christall cleene,
Panthea, seemd the brightest thing, that was:
But now by proofe all otherwise I weene;
For this great Citie that does far surpas,
And this bright Angels towre quite dims that towre of glas.

59

Most trew, then said the holy agèd man;
Yet is Cleopolis for earthly frame,° structure
The fairest peece, that eye beholden can:
And well beseemes all knights of noble name,
That covet in th'immortall booke of fame
To be eternizèd, that same to haunt,
And doen their service to that soveraigne Dame,
That glorie does to them for guerdon graunt:
For she is heavenly borne, and heaven may justly vaunt.° boast

60

And thou faire ymp, sprong out from English race,
How ever now accompted° Elfins sonne, considered
Well worthy doest thy service for her grace,
To aide a virgin desolate foredonne.° undone
But when thou famous victorie hast wonne,
And high emongst all knights hast hong thy shield,
Thenceforth the suit of earthly conquest shonne,° shun
And wash thy hands from guilt of bloudy field:
For bloud can nought but sin, & wars but sorrowes yield.

61

Then seeke this path, that I to thee presage,° point out
Which after all to heaven shall thee send;
Then peaceably thy painefull pilgrimage

---

[1] Or like … arownd The Mount of Olives, upon which Jesus delivered the "Sermon on the Mount" (see Matthew 5–7).

[2] that pleasaunt Mount Mount Parnassus, sacred to the Nine Muses.

[3] each where Everywhere.

[4] The blessed … companee Jacob had a vision of a ladder that connected earth and heaven. See Genesis 28.12.

To yonder same Hierusalem do bend,
Where is for thee ordaind a blessed end:
For thou emongst those Saints, whom thou doest see,
Shalt be a Saint, and thine owne nations frend
And Patrone: thou Saint George shalt callèd bee,
Saint George of mery England, the signe of victoree.

62

Unworthy wretch (quoth he) of so great grace,
How dare I thinke such glory to attaine?
These that have it attaind, were in like cace
(Quoth he) as wretched, and liv'd in like paine.
But deeds of armes must I at last be faine,° willing
And Ladies love to leave so dearely bought?
What need of armes, where peace doth ay remaine,
(Said he) and battailes none are to be fought?
As for loose loves they are vaine, and vanish into nought.

63

O let me not (quoth he) then turne againe
Backe to the world, whose joyes so fruitlesse are;
But let me here for aye in peace remaine,
Or streight way on that last long voyage fare,
That nothing may my present hope empare.
That may not be (said he) ne maist thou yit
Forgo that royall maides bequeathèd care,
Who did her cause into thy hand commit,
Till from her cursèd foe thou have her freely quit.° released

64

Then shall I soone, (quoth he) so God me grace,
Abet° that virgins cause disconsolate, support
And shortly backe returne unto this place,
To walke this way in Pilgrims poore estate.
But now aread,° old father, why of late state
Didst thou behight° me borne of English blood, call
Whom all a Faeries sonne doen nominate?
That word shall I (said he) avouchen° good, prove Sith to thee is unknowne the cradle of thy brood.

65

For well I wote, thou springst from ancient race
Of Saxon kings, that have with mightie hand
And many bloudie battailes fought in place° that place
High reard° their royall throne in Britane land, erected
And vanquisht them, unable to withstand:
From thence a Faerie thee unweeting° reft, secretly
There as thou slepst in tender swadling band,
And her base Elfin brood there for thee left.
Such men do Chaungelings call, so chaungd by Faeries theft.

66

Thence she thee brought into this Faerie lond,
And in an heapèd furrow did thee hyde,
Where thee a Ploughman all unweeting fond,
As he his toylesome teme that way did guyde,
And brought thee up in ploughmans state to byde, Whereof Georgos[1] he thee gave to° name; as
Till prickt with courage, and thy forces pryde,
To Faery court thou cam'st to seeke for fame,
And prove thy puissaunt armes, as seemes thee best became.° suited

67

O holy Sire (quoth he) how shall I quight° repay
The many favours I with thee have found,
That hast my name and nation red aright,
And taught the way that does to heaven bound?
This said, adowne he lookèd to the ground,
To have returnd, but dazèd were his eyne,
Through passing° brightnesse, which did quite confound exceeding
His feeble sence, and too exceeding shyne.
So darke are earthly things compard to things divine.

68

At last whenas himselfe he gan to find,° recover
To Una back he cast him to retire;
Who him awaited still with pensive° mind. apprehensive
Great thankes and goodly meed° to that good syre, recompense
He thence departing gave for his paines hyre.° reward
So came to Una, who him joyd to see,
And after litle rest, gan him desire,
Of her adventure° mindfull for to bee. quest
So leave they take of Caelia, and her daughters three.

---

[1] Georgos Farmer.

CANTO II

The knight with that old Dragon fights
Two dayes incessantly:
The third him overthrowes, and gayns
Most glorious victory.

1

High time now gan it wex for Una faire,
To thinke of those her captive Parents deare,
And their forwasted kingdome to repaire:
Whereto whenas they now approchèd neare,
With hartie words her knight she gan to cheare,
And in her modest manner thus bespake;
Deare knight, as deare, as ever knight was deare,
That all these sorrowes suffer for my sake,
High heaven behold the tedious toyle, ye for me take.

2

Now are we come unto my native soyle,
And to the place, where all our perils dwell;
Here haunts that feend, and does his dayly spoyle,
Therefore henceforth be at your keeping well,[1]
And ever ready for your foeman fell.
The sparke of noble courage now awake,
And strive your excellent selfe to excell;
That shall ye evermore renowmèd make,
Above all knights on earth, that batteill undertake.

3

And pointing forth, lo yonder is (said she)
The brasen towre in which my parents deare
For dread of that huge feend emprisond be Whom I from far see on the walles appeare
Whose sight my feeble soule doth greatly cheare:
And on the top of all I do espye
The watchman wayting tydings glad to heare,
That O my parents might I happily
Unto you bring, to ease you of your misery.

4

With that they heard a roaring hideous sound,
That all the ayre with terrour fillèd wide,
And seemd uneath° to shake the stedfast ground. almost Eftsoones that dreadfull Dragon they espide,
Where stretcht he lay upon the sunny side
Of a great hill, himselfe like a great hill.
But all so soone, as he from far descride
Those glistring armes, that heaven with light did fill,
He rousd himselfe full blith,° and hastned them untill.° gladly towards

5

Then bad the knight his Lady yede° aloofe, go
And to an hill her selfe with draw aside,
From whence she might behold that battailles proof° outcome
And eke be safe from daunger far descryde:° observed
She him obayd, and turnd a little wyde.
Now O thou sacred Muse, most learnèd Dame,
Faire ympe of Phoebus, and his agèd bride,[2]
The Nourse of time, and everlasting fame,
That warlike hands ennoblest with immortall name;

6

O gently come into my feeble brest,
Come gently, but not with that mighty rage,
Wherewith the martiall troupes thou doest infest,° arouse
And harts of great Heroës doest enrage,
That nought their kindled courage may aswage,
Soone as thy dreadfull trompe° begins to sownd; trumpet
The God of warre with his fiers equipage
Thou doest awake, sleepe never he so sownd,
And scarèd nations doest with horrour sterne astownd.° astonish

7

Faire Goddesse lay that furious fit° aside, music
Till I of warres and bloudy Mars do sing,
And Briton fields with Sarazin bloud bedyde,
Twixt that great faery Queene and Paynim king,
That with their horrour heaven and earth did ring,
A worke of labour long, and endlesse prayse:
But now a while let downe that haughtie string,
And to my tunes thy second tenor rayse,
That I this man of God his godly armes may blaze.° proclaim

---

[1] at your keeping well Well on your guard.

[2] his agèd bride Mnemosyne, or Memory, the mother of the Muses.

8

By this the dreadfull Beast drew nigh to hand,
Halfe flying, and halfe footing in his hast,
That with his largenesse measurèd much land,
And made wide shadow under his huge wast;° girth
As mountaine doth the valley overcast.
Approching nigh, he rearèd high afore
His body monstrous, horrible, and vast,
Which to increase his wondrous greatnesse more,
Was swolne with wrath, & poyson, & with bloudy gore.

9

And over, all with brasen scales was armd,
Like plated coate of steele, so couchèd° neare,° set / closely
That nought mote perce, ne might his corse be harmd
With dint of sword, nor push of pointed speare;
Which as an Eagle, seeing pray appeare,
His aery plumes doth rouze, full rudely° dight, roughly
So shakèd he, that horrour was to heare,
For as the clashing of an Armour bright,
Such noyse his rouzèd scales did send unto the knight.

10

His flaggy° wings when forth he did display, pendulous
Were like two sayles, in which the hollow wynd
Is gathered full, and worketh speedy way:
And eke the pennes,° that did his pineons° quills / wings
bynd,
Were like mayne-yards, with flying canvas lynd,
With which whenas him list the ayre to beat,
And there by force unwonted° passage find, unaccustomed
The cloudes before him fled for terrour great,
And all the heavens stood still amazèd with his threat.

11

His huge long tayle wound up in hundred foldes,
Does overspred his long bras-scaly backe,
Whose wreathèd boughts° when ever he unfoldes, coils
And thicke entangled knots adown does slacke.
Bespotted all with shields° of red and blacke, scales
It sweepeth all the land behind him farre,
And of three furlongs[1] does but litle lacke;
And at the point two stings in-fixèd arre,
Both deadly sharpe, that sharpest steele exceeden farre.

12

But stings° and sharpest steele did far exceed spears
The sharpnesse of his cruell rending clawes;[2]
Dead was it sure, as sure as death in deed,
What ever thing does touch his ravenous pawes,
Or what within his reach he ever drawes.
But his most hideous head my toung to tell
Does tremble: for his deepe devouring jawes
Wide gapèd, like the griesly mouth of hell,
Through which into his darke abisse all ravin° fell. prey

13

And that more wondrous was, in either jaw
Three ranckes of yron teeth enraungèd were,
In which yet trickling bloud and gobbets° raw chunks
Of late devourèd bodies did appeare,
That sight thereof bred cold congealèd feare:
Which to increase, and as atonce to kill,
A cloud of smoothering smoke and sulphur seare° searing
Out of his stinking gorge forth steemèd still,
That all the ayre about with smoke and stench did fill.

14

His blazing eyes, like two bright shining shields,
Did burne with wrath, and sparkled living fyre;
As two broad Beacons, set in open fields,
Send forth their flames farre off to every shyre,° district
And warning give, that enemies conspyre,
With fire and sword the region to invade;
So flam'd his eyne with rage and rancorous yre:
But farre within, as in a hollow glade,
Those glaring lampes were set, that made a dreadfull shade.

15

So dreadfully he towards him did pas,
Forelifting up aloft his speckled brest,
And often bounding on the brusèd gras,
As for great joyance of his newcome guest.
Eftsoones he gan advance his haughtie crest,
As chauffèd° Bore his bristles doth upreare, angered
And shoke his scales to battell readie drest;
That made the Redcrosse knight nigh quake for feare,
As bidding° bold defiance to his foeman neare. inviting

---

[1] furlongs Agricultural measurement presently equal to 220 yards: originally the length of a furrow in a common field.

[2] But stings … clawes I.e., the sharpness of his claws far exceeded that of spears and the sharpest steel.

16

The knight gan fairely couch° his steadie speare, aim
And fiercely ran at him with rigorous might:
The pointed steele arriving rudely theare,
His harder hide would neither perce, nor bight,
But glauncing by forth passèd forward right;
Yet sore amovèd with so puissant push,
The wrathfull beast about him turnèd light,° swiftly
And him so rudely passing by, did brush
With his long tayle, that horse and man to ground did rush.

17

Both horse and man up lightly rose againe,
And fresh encounter towards him addrest:
But th'idle° stroke yet backe recoyld in vaine, futile
And found no place his deadly point to rest.
Exceeding rage enflam'd the furious beast,
To be avengèd of so great despight;° outrage
For never felt his imperceable brest
So wondrous force, from hand of living wight;
Yet had he prov'd the powre of many a puissant knight.

18

Then with his waving wings displayèd wyde,
Himselfe up high he lifted from the ground,
And with strong flight did forcibly divide
The yielding aire, which nigh° too feeble found almost
Her flitting partes, and element unsound,
To beare so great a weight: he cutting way
With his broad sayles, about him soarèd round:
At last low stouping with unweldie sway,° force
Snatcht up both horse & man, to beare them quite away.

19

Long he them bore above the subject plaine,
So farre as Ewghen[1] bow a shaft may send,
Till struggling strong did him at last constraine,
To let them downe before his flightès end:
As hagard° hauke presuming to contend wild
With hardie fowle, above his hable° might,° proper strength
His wearie pounces° all in vaine doth spend, talons
To trusse the pray too heavie for his flight;
Which comming downe to ground, does free it selfe by fight.

20

He so disseizèd° of his gryping° grosse,° freed / grip / heavy
The knight his thrillant° speare againe assayd penetrating
In his bras-plated body to embosse,° plunge
And three mens strength unto the stroke he layd;
Wherewith the stiffe beame quaked, as affrayd,
And glauncing from his scaly necke, did glyde
Close under his left wing, then broad displayd.
The percing steele there wrought a wound full wyde,
That with the uncouth° smart the Monster lowdly cryde. unknown

21

He cryde, as raging seas are wont to rore,
When wintry storme his wrathfull wreck does threat,
The rolling billowes° beat the ragged shore, waves
As they the earth would shoulder from her seat,
And greedie gulfe does gape, as he would eat
His neighbour element in his revenge:
Then gin the blustring brethren° boldly threat, winds
To move the world from off his stedfast henge,° hinge
And boystrous battell make, each other to avenge.

22

The steely head stucke fast still in his flesh,
Till with his cruell clawes he snatcht the wood,
And quite a sunder broke. Forth flowèd fresh
A gushing river of blacke goarie blood,
That drownèd all the land, whereon he stood;
The streame thereof would drive a water-mill.
Trebly augmented was his furious mood
With bitter sense of his deepe rooted ill,° wound
That flames of fire he threw forth from his large nosethrill.

23

His hideous tayle then hurlèd he about,
And therewith all enwrapt the nimble thyes° thighs
Of his froth-fomy steed, whose courage stout
Striving to loose the knot, that fast him tyes,
Himselfe in streighter° bandes too rash implyes,° tighter entangles
That to the ground he is perforce° constraynd thereby
To throw his rider: who can quickly ryse

---

[1] Ewghen Made of wood from the yew tree.

From off the earth, with durty bloud distaynd,° dirtied
For that reprochfull fall right fowly he disdaynd.

24

And fiercely tooke his trenchand° blade in hand, cutting
With which he stroke so furious and so fell,
That nothing seemd the puissance could withstand:
Upon his crest the hardned yron fell,
But his more hardned crest was armd so well,
That deeper dint therein it would not make;
Yet so extremely did the buffe° him quell, blow
That from thenceforth he shund the like to take,
But when he saw them come, he did them still forsake.° avoid

25

The knight was wrath to see his stroke beguyld,° foiled
And smote againe with more outrageous might;
But backe againe the sparckling steele recoyld,
And left not any marke, where it did light;
As if in Adamant° rocke it had bene pight.° hardest / pitched
The beast impatient of his smarting wound,
And of so fierce and forcible despight,
Thought with his wings to stye° above the ground; rise
But his late wounded wing unserviceable found.

26

Then full of griefe and anguish vehement,
He lowdly brayd, that like was never heard,
And from his wide devouring oven sent
A flake° of fire, that flashing in his beard, stream
Him all amazd, and almost made affeard:
The scorching flame sore swingèd° all his face, singed
And through his armour all his bodie seard,
That he could not endure so cruell cace,
But thought his armes to leave, and helmet to unlace.

27

Not that great Champion[1] of the antique world,
Whom famous Poetes verse so much doth vaunt,
And hath for twelve huge labours high extold,
So many furies and sharpe fits did haunt,
When him the poysoned garment did enchaunt
With Centaures bloud, and bloudie verses charm'd,
As did this knight twelve thousand dolours daunt,
Whom fyrie steele now burnt, that earst him arm'd,
That erst him goodly arm'd, now most of all him harm'd.

28

Faint, wearie, sore, emboylèd, grievèd, brent
With heat, toyle, wounds, armes, smart, & inward fire
That never man such mischiefes did torment;
Death better were, death did he oft desire,
But death will never come, when needes require.
Whom so dismayd when that his foe beheld,
He cast to suffer him no more respire,° live
But gan his sturdie sterne° about to weld,° tail / swing
And him so strongly stroke, that to the ground him feld.

29

It fortunèd (as faire it then befell)
Behind his backe unweeting, where he stood,
Of auncient time there was a springing well,
From which fast trickled forth a silver flood,
Full of great vertues, and for med'cine good.
Whylome, before that cursèd Dragon got
That happie land, and all with innocent blood
Defyld those sacred waves, it rightly hot° was called
The well of life, ne yet his vertues had forgot.

30

For unto life the dead it could restore,
And guilt of sinfull crimes cleane wash away,
Those that with sicknesse were infected sore,
It could recure,° and agèd long decay heal
Renew, as one were borne that very day.
Both Silo this, and Jordan did excell,
And th'English Bath, and eke the german Spau,
Ne can Cephise, nor Hebrus match this well:[2]
Into the same the knight backe overthrowèn, fell.

that great Champion Hercules, who successfully completed twelve labors. His death occurred when his wife inadvertently presented him with a poisoned shirt. The pain was so intense that he caused a funeral pyre to be built so that he could cast himself upon it. He was, however, rescued from the pyre and brought to dwell on Mount Olympus, the home of the gods.

[2] Both Silo … well These waters have all been said to have healing powers. In John 9.7 a blind man is cured in the waters of the Siloam; Christ was baptized in the river Jordan; the supposedly medicinal waters of Bath and Spa were visited by those suffering from a variety of ailments; the waters of Cephise and Hebrus are praised in classical mythology for their purifying powers.

31

Now gan the golden Phoebus for to steepe
His fierie face in billowes of the west,
And his faint steedes watred in Ocean deepe,
Whiles from their journall° labours they did rest, daily
When that infernall Monster, having kest° cast
His wearie foe into that living well,
Can° high advance his broad discoloured brest, did
Above his wonted pitch,° with countenance fell,° height fierce
And clapt his yron wings, as victor he did dwell.° stay

32

Which when his pensive Ladie saw from farre,
Great woe and sorrow did her soule assay,
As weening that the sad end of the warre,
And gan to highest God entirely° pray, earnestly
That fearèd chance from her to turne away;
With folded hands and knees full lowly bent
All night she watcht, ne once adowne would lay
Her daintie limbs in her sad dreriment,° peril
But praying still did wake, and waking did lament.

33

The morrow next gan early to appeare,
That Titan rose to runne his daily race:
But early ere the morrow next gan reare
Out of the sea faire Titans deawy face,
Up rose the gentle virgin from her place,
And lookèd all about, if she might spy
Her lovèd knight to move his manly pace:
For she had great doubt of his safety,
Since late she saw him fall before his enemy.

34

At last she where he upstarted brave
Out of the well, wherein he drenchèd lay;
As Eagle fresh out of the Ocean wave,
Where he hath left his plumes all hoary gray,
And deckt himselfe with feathers youthly gay,
Like Eyas hauke° up mounts unto the skies, young hawk
His newly budded pineons to assay,
And marveiles at himselfe, still as he flies:
So new this new-borne knight to battell new did rise.

35

Whom when the damnèd feend so fresh did spy,
No wonder if he wondred at the sight,
And doubted, whether his late enemy
It were, or other new supplièd knight.
He, now to prove his late renewèd might,
High brandishing his bright deaw-burning[1] blade,
Upon his crested scalpe so sore did smite,
That to the scull a yawning wound it made:
The deadly dint his dullèd senses all dismaid.

36

I wote not, whether the revenging steele
Were hardned with that holy water dew,
Wherein he fell, or sharper edge did feele,
Or his baptizèd hands now greater grew;
Or other secret vertue° did ensew; power
Else never could the force of fleshly arme,
Ne molten mettall in his bloud embrew:° thrust
For till that stownd° could never wight him harme, time
By subtilty, nor slight, nor might, nor mighty charme.

37

The cruell wound enragèd him so sore,
That loud he yelded for exceeding paine;
As hundred ramping Lyons seem'd to rore,
Whom ravenous hunger did thereto constraine:
Then gan he tosse aloft his stretchèd traine,° tail
And therewith scourge the buxome° aire so sore,° pliant violently
That to his force to yeelden it was faine;
Ne ought° his sturdie strokes might stand afore, aught
That high trees overthrew, and rocks in peeces tore.

38

The same advauncing high above his head,
With sharpe intended° sting so rude him smot, extended
That to the earth him drove, as stricken dead,
Ne living wight would have him life behot:° expected
The mortall sting his angry needle shot
Quite through his shield, and in his shoulder seasd,° fastened
Where fast it stucke, ne would there out be got:

---

[1] deaw-burning I.e., the sword is so bright that its light, like that of the sun, burns up the dew.

The griefe thereof him wondrous sore diseasd,
Ne might his ranckling paine with patience be appeasd.

39

But yet more mindfull of his honour deare,
Then of the grievous smart, which him did wring,° vex
From loathèd soile he can him lightly reare,
And strove to loose the farre infixèd sting:
Which when in vaine he tryde with struggeling,
Inflam'd with wrath, his raging blade he heft,° raised
And strooke so strongly, that the knotty string
Of his huge taile he quite a sunder cleft,
Five joynts thereof he hewd, and but the stump him left.

40

Hart cannot thinke, what outrage, and what cryes,
With foule enfouldred[1] smoake and flashing fire,
The hell-bred beast threw forth unto the skyes,
That all was coverèd with darknesse dire:
Then fraught° with rancour, and engorgèd ire, filled
He cast at once him to avenge for all,
And gathering up himselfe out of the mire,° mud
With his uneven wings did fiercely fall
Upon his sunne-bright shield, and gript it fast withall.

41

Much was the man encombred with his hold,
In feare to lose his weapon in his paw,
Ne wist yet, how his talants° to unfold; talons
Nor harder was from Cerberus greedie jaw
To plucke a bone, then from his cruell claw
To reave° by strength the gripèd gage away: wrest
Thrise he assayd it from his foot to draw,
And thrise in vaine to draw it did assay,
It booted nought to thinke, to robbe him of his pray.

42

Tho° when he saw no power might prevaile, then
His trustie sword he cald to his last aid,
Wherewith he fiercely did his foe assaile,
And double blowes about him stoutly laid,
That glauncing fire out of the yron plaid;° danced
As sparckles from the Andvile° use to fly, anvil
When heavie hammers on the wedge° are i.e., anvil
swaid;° struck
Therewith at last he forst him to unty° release
One of his grasping feete, him to defend thereby.

43

The other foot, fast fixèd on his shield, Whenas no strength, nor stroks mote° him could constraine
To loose, ne yet the warlike pledge to yield,
He smot thereat with all his might and maine,
That nought so wondrous puissance might sustaine;
Upon the joynt the lucky steele did light,
And made such way, that hewd it quite in twaine;
The paw yet missèd not his minisht° might, diminished
But hong still on the shield, as it at first was pight.° placed

44

For griefe thereof, and divelish despight,
From his infernall fournace forth he threw
Huge flames, that dimmèd all the heavens light, Enrold in duskish smoke and brimstone° sulphur
blew;° blue
As burning Aetna[2] from his boyling stew
Doth belch out flames, and rockes in peeces broke,
And ragged ribs of mountaines molten new,
Enwrapt in coleblacke clouds and filthy smoke,
That all the land with stench, and heaven with horror choke.

45

The heate whereof, and harmefull pestilence° injury
So sore him noyd,° that forst him to retire vexed
A little backward for his best defence,
To save his bodie from the scorching fire,
Which he from hellish entrailes did expire.° exhale
It chaunst (eternall God that chaunce did guide)
As he recoylèd backward, in the mire
His nigh forwearied feeble feet did slide,
And downe he fell, with dread of shame sore terrifide.

46

There grew a goodly tree him faire beside,
Loaden with fruit and apples rosie red,
As they in pure vermilion had beene dide,
Whereof great vertues over all were red:° told
For happie life to all, which thereon fed,

---

[1] enfouldred Charged with lightning.

[2] Aetna Volcano in eastern Sicily.

And life eke everlasting did befall:
Great God it planted in that blessed sted° place
With his almightie hand, and did it call
The tree of life,[1] the crime of our first fathers fall.

47

In all the world like was not to be found,
Save in that soile, where all good things did grow,
And freely sprong out of the fruitfull ground,
As incorrupted Nature did them sow,
Till that dread Dragon[2] all did overthrow.
Another like faire tree eke grew thereby,
Whereof who so did eat, eftsoones did know
Both good and ill: O mornefull memory:
That tree through one mans fault hath doen us all to dy.

48

From that first tree forth flowd, as from a well,
A trickling streame of Balme, most soveraine° powerful
And daintie° deare,° which on the ground still fell, particularly / precious
And overflowèd all the fertill plaine,
As it had deawèd bene with timely° raine: seasonal
Life and long health that gratious° ointment gave, pleasing
And deadly woundes could heale, and reare againe
The senselesse corse appointed for the grave.
Into that same he fell: which did from death him save.

49

For nigh thereto the ever damnèd beast
Durst not approch, for he was deadly° made, of death
And all that life preservèd, did detest:
Yet he it oft adventur'd to invade.
By this the drouping day-light gan to fade
And yeeld his roome to sad succeeding night,
Who with her sable mantle gan to shade
The face of earth, and wayes of living wight,
And high her burning torch set up in heaven bright.

50

When gentle Una saw the second fall
Of her deare knight, who wearie of long fight,
And faint through losse of bloud, mov'd not at all,
But lay as in a dreame of deepe delight,
Besmeard with pretious Balme, whose vertuous might
Did heale his wounds, and scorching heat alay,
Againe she stricken was with sore affright,
And for his safetie gan devoutly pray;
And watch the noyous° night, and wait for joyous day. harmful

51

The joyous day gan early to appeare,
And faire Aurora from the deawy bed
Of agèd Tithone gan her selfe to reare,
With rosie cheekes, for shame as blushing red;
Her golden lockes for haste were loosely shed
About her eares, when Una her did marke
Clymbe to her charet, all with flowers spred;
From heaven high to chase the chearelesse darke,
With merry note her loud salutes the mounting larke.

52

Then freshly up arose the doughtie knight,
All healèd of his hurts and woundès wide,
And did himselfe to battell readie dight;
Whose early foe awaiting him beside
To have devourd, so soone as day he spyde,
When now he saw himselfe so freshly reare,
As if late fight had nought him damnifyde,° hurt
He woxe° dismayd, and gan his fate to feare; grew
Nathlesse with wonted rage he him advauncèd neare.

53

And in his first encounter, gaping wide,
He thought attonce him to have swallowd quight,
And rusht upon him with outragious pride;
Who him r'encountring fierce, as hauke in flight,
Perforce° rebutted backe. The weapon bright forcibly
Taking advantage of his open jaw,
Ran through his mouth with so importune° might, exacting
That deepe emperst his darksome hollow maw,° mouth
And back retyrd,° his life bloud forth with all did draw. withdrawn

---

[1] tree of life This tree grows in the Garden of Eden, from which Adam and Eve were expelled for eating from the Tree of Knowledge.

[2] that dread Dragon I.e., Satan.

54

So downe he fell, and forth his life did breath,
That vanisht into smoke and cloudès swift;
So downe he fell, that th'earth him underneath
Did grone, as feeble so great load to lift;
So downe he fell, as an huge rockie clift,
Whose false° foundation waves have washt away, defective
With dreadfull poyse° is from the mayneland rift, weight
And rolling downe, great Neptune doth dismay;
So downe he fell, and like an heapèd mountaine lay.

55

The knight himselfe even trembled at his fall,
So huge and horrible a masse it seem'd;
And his deare Ladie, that beheld it all,
Durst not approch for dread, which she misdeem'd,° misjudged
But yet at last, when as the direfull feend
She saw not stirre, off-shaking vaine° affright, empty
She nigher drew, and saw that joyous end:
Then God she praysd, and thankt her faithfull knight,
That had atchiev'd so great a conquest by his might.

CANTO 12

Faire Una to the Redcrosse knight
Betrouthèd is with joy:
Though false Duessa it to barre° stop
Her false sleights doe imploy.

1

Behold I see the haven nigh at hand,
To which I meane my wearie course to bend;
Vere° the maine shete, and beare up with[1] the land, release
The which afore is fairely to be kend,° recognized
And seemeth safe from stormes, that may offend;
There this faire virgin wearie of her way
Must landed be, now at her journeyes end:
There eke my feeble barke° a while may stay, vessel
Till merry° wind and weather call her thence away. favorable

2

Scarsely had Phoebus in the glooming° East glowing
Yet harnessèd his firie-footed teeme,
Ne reard aboue the earth his flaming creast,° crest
When the last deadly smoke aloft did steeme,
That signe of last outbreathèd life did seeme,
Unto the watchman on the castle wall;
Who thereby dead that balefull° Beast did deeme, destructive
And to his Lord and Ladie lowd gan call,
To tell, how he had seene the Dragons fatall fall.

3

Uprose with hastie joy, and feeble speed
That agèd Sire, the Lord of all that land,
And lookèd forth, to weet, if true indeede
Those tydings were, as he did understand,
Which whenas true by tryall he out fond,
He bad to open wyde his brazen gate,
Which long time had bene shut, and out of hond[2]
Proclaymèd joy and peace through all his state;
For dead now was their foe, which them forrayèd° late. pillaged

4

Then gan triumphant Trompets sound on hie,
That sent to heaven the ecchoèd report
Of their new joy, and happie victorie
Gainst him, that had them long opprest with tort,° injury
And fast imprisonèd in siegèd fort.
Then all the people, as in solemne feast,
To him assembled with one full consort,[3]
Rejoycing at the fall of that great beast,
From whose eternall bondage now they were releast.

5

Forth came that auncient Lord and agèd Queene,
Arayd in antique robes downe to the ground,
And sad habiliments right well beseene;° appropriate
A noble crew about them waited round
Of sage and sober Peres,° all gravely gownd; peers
Whom farre before did march a goodly band
Of tall young men, all hable° armes to sownd,° able / wield

---

[1] beare up with Steer toward.

[2] out of hond Immediately.

[3] one full consort All at once.

But now they laurell braunches bore in hand;
Glad signe of victorie and peace in all their land.

6

Unto that doughtie° Conquerour they came, valiant
And him before themselves prostrating low,
Their Lord and Patrone° loud did him proclame, protector
And at his feet their laurell boughes did throw.
Soone after them all dauncing on a row
The comely virgins came, with girlands dight,
As fresh as flowres in medow greene do grow,
When morning deaw upon their leaves doth light:
And in their hands sweet Timbrels° all upheld on hight. tambourines

7

And them before, the fry° of children young group
Their wanton sports and childish mirth did play,
And to the Maydens sounding tymbrels sung
In well attunèd notes, a joyous lay,
And made delightfull musicke all the way,
Untill they came, where that faire virgin stood;
As faire Diana in fresh sommers day
Beholds her Nymphes, enraung'd° in shadie wood, spread out
Some wrestle, some do run, some bathe in christall flood.

8

So she beheld those maydens meriment
With chearefull vew; who when to her they came,
Themselves to ground with gratious humblesse bent,
And her ador'd by honorable name,° titles
Lifting to heaven her everlasting fame:
Then on her head they set a girland greene,
And crownèd her twixt earnest and twixt game;
Who in her selfe-resemblance well beseene,
Did seeme such, as she was, a goodly maiden Queene.

9

And after, all the raskall many ran,
Heapèd together in rude° rabblement° disorganized / swarm
To see the face of that victorious man:
Whom all admired, as from heaven sent,
And gazd upon with gaping wonderment.
But when they came, where that dead Dragon lay,
Stretcht on the ground in monstrous large extent,
The sight with idle feare did them dismay,
Ne durst approch him nigh, to touch, or once assay.

10

Some feard, and fled; some feard and well it faynd;° hid
One that would wiser seeme, then all the rest,
Warnd him not touch, for yet perhaps remaynd
Some lingring life within his hollow brest,
Or in his wombe might lurke some hidden nest
Of many Dragonets, his fruitfull seed;
Another said, that in his eyes did rest
Yet sparckling fire, and bad thereof take heed;
Another said, he saw him move his eyes indeed.

11

One mother, when as her foolehardie chyld
Did come too neare, and with his talants° play, claws
Halfe dead through feare, her litle babe revyld,° reprimanded
And to her gossips gan in counsell say;
How can I tell, but that his talants may
Yet scratch my sonne, or rend his tender hand?
So diversly themselves in vaine they fray;° frighten
Whiles some more bold, to measure him nigh stand,
To prove how many acres he did spread of land.

12

Thus flockèd all the folke him round about,
The whiles that hoarie° king, with all his traine, gray-headed
Being arrivèd, where that champion stout
After his foes defeasance° did remaine, defeat
Him goodly greetes, and faire does entertaine,
With princely gifts of yvorie and gold,
And thousand thankes him yeelds for all his paine.
Then when his daughter deare he does behold,
Her dearely doth imbrace, and kisseth manifold.° many times

13

And after to his Pallace he them brings,
With shaumes,[1] & trompets, & with Clarions sweet;
And all the way the joyous people sings,
And with their garments strowes the pavèd street:

---

[1] shaumes Older instruments resembling the oboe.

Whence mounting up, they find purveyance° meet° provisions / fitting
Of all, that royall Princes court became,° suited
And all the floore was underneath their feet
Bespred with costly scarlot[1] of great name,
On which they lowly sit, and fitting purpose° frame. conversation

14

What needs me tell their feast and goodly guize,° behavior
In which was nothing riotous nor vaine?
What needs of daintie dishes to devize,° recount
Of comely services, or courtly trayne?
My narrow leaves cannot in them containe
The large discourse of royall Princes state.
Yet was their manner then but bare and plaine:
For th'antique world excesse and pride did hate;
Such proud luxurious pompe is swollen up but late.

15

Then when with meates and drinkes of every kinde
Their fervent appetites they quenchèd had,
That auncient Lord gan fit occasion finde,
Of straunge adventures, and of perils sad,
Which in his travell him befallen had,
For to demaund of his renowmèd guest:
Who then with utt'rance grave, and count'nance sad
From point to point, as is before exprest,
Discourst his voyage long, according his request.

16

Great pleasure mixt with pittifull° regard, compassionate
That godly King and Queene did passionate,° feel
Whiles they his pittifull° adventures heard, deplorable
That oft they did lament his lucklesse state,
And often blame the too importune° fate, exacting
That heapd on him so many wrathfull wreakes:° injuries
For never gentle knight, as he of late,
So tossèd was in fortunes cruell freakes;° vagaries
And all the while salt teares bedeawd the hearers cheaks.

17

Then said that royall Pere in sober wise;
Deare Sonne, great beene the evils, which ye bore
From first to last in your late enterprise,
That I note,° whether prayse, or pitty more: could not
For never living man, I weene, so sore
In sea of deadly daungers was distrest;
But since now safe ye seisèd have the shore,
And well arrivèd are, (high God be blest)
Let us devize° of ease and everlasting rest. talk

18

Ah dearest Lord, said then that doughty knight,
Of ease or rest I may not yet devize;
For by the faith, which I to armes have plight,
I bounden am streight after this emprize,° enterprise
As that your daughter can ye well advize,
Backe to returne to that great Faerie Queene,
And her to serve six yeares in warlike wize,° ways
Gainst that proud Paynim king, that workes her teene:° sorrow
Therefore I ought crave pardon, till I there have beene.

19

Unhappie falles that hard necessitie,
(Quoth he) the troubler of my happie peace,
And vowèd foe of my felicitie;
Ne I against the same can justly preace:° contend
But since that band° ye cannot now release, bond
Nor doen undo; (for vowes may not be vaine°) empty
Soone as the terme of those six yeares shall cease,
Ye then shall hither backe returne againe,
The marriage to accomplish vowd betwixt you twain.

20

Which for my part I covet to performe,
In sort as through the world I did proclame,
That who so kild that monster most deforme,
And him in hardy battaile overcame,
Should have mine onely daughter to his Dame,
And of my kingdome heire apparaunt bee:
Therefore since now to thee perteines the same,
By dew desert of noble chevalree,
Both daughter and eke kingdome, lo I yield to thee.

21

Then forth he callèd that his daughter faire,
The fairest Un' his onely daughter deare,
His onely daughter, and his onely heyre;
Who forth proceeding with sad° sober cheare, serious

---

[1] scarlot Rich type of cloth, usually of a vivid red color.

As bright as doth the morning starre appeare
Out of the East, with flaming lockes bedight,° bedecked
To tell that dawning day is drawing neare,
And to the world does bring long wishèd light;
So faire and fresh that Lady shewd her selfe in sight.

22

So faire and fresh, as freshest flowre in May;
For she had layd her mournefull stole° aside, cloak
And widow-like sad wimple° throwne away, veil
Wherewith her heavenly beautie she did hide,
Whiles on her wearie journey she did ride;
And on her now a garment she did weare,
All lilly white, withoutten spot, or pride,° adornment
That seemd like silke and silver woven neare,° tightly
But neither silke nor silver therein did appeare.

23

The blazing brightnesse of her beauties beame,
And glorious light of her sunshyny face
To tell, were as to strive against the streame.
My ragged rimes are all too rude and bace,
Her heavenly lineaments for to enchace.° portray
Ne wonder; for her owne deare lovèd knight,
All° were she dayly with himselfe in place, although
Did wonder much at her celestiall sight:
Oft had he seene her faire, but never so faire dight.

24

So fairely dight, when she in presence came,
She to her Sire made humble reverence,
And bowèd low, that her right well became,
And added grace unto her excellence:
Who with great wisedome, and grave eloquence
Thus gan to say. But eare he thus had said,
With flying speede, and seeming great pretence,° purpose
Came running in, much like a man dismaid,
A Messenger with letters, which his message said.

25

All in the open hall amazèd stood,
At suddeinnesse of that unwarie° sight, unexpected
And wondred at his breathlesse hastie mood.
But he for nought would stay his passage right,° straight
Till fast before the king he did alight;
Where falling flat, great humblesse he did make,
And kist the ground, whereon his foot was pight;
Then to his hands that writ he did betake,° deliver
Which he disclosing,° red thus, as the paper spake.° unfolding said

26

To thee, most mighty king of Eden faire,
Her greeting sends in these sad lines addrest,
The wofull daughter, and forsaken heire
Of that great Emperour of all the West;
And bids thee be advizèd for the best,
Ere thou thy daughter linck in holy band
Of wedlocke to that new unknowen guest:
For he already plighted his right hand
Unto another love, and to another land.

27

To me sad mayd, or rather widow sad,
He was affiauncèd° long time before, engaged
And sacred pledges he both gave, and had,
False erraunt knight, infamous, and forswore:
Witnesse the burning Altars,[1] which° he swore, by which
And guiltie° heavens of his bold perjury, polluted
Which though he hath polluted oft of yore,
Yet I to them for judgement just do fly,
And them conjure t'avenge this shamefull injury.

28

Therefore since mine he is, or free or bond,
Or false or trew, or living or else dead,
Withhold, O soveraine Prince, your hasty hond
From knitting league with him, I you aread;
Ne weene° my right with strength adowne to tread, think
Through weakenesse of my widowhed, or woe:
For truth is strong, her rightfull cause to plead,
And shall find friends, if need requireth soe,
So bids thee well to fare, Thy neither friend, nor foe, Fidessa.

29

When he these bitter byting words had red,
The tydings straunge did him abashèd make,

---

[1] burning Altars In classical Greece and Rome, the union of two persons in marriage was confirmed by burning sacrifices.

That still he sate long time astonishèd
As in great muse,° ne word to creature spake. perplexity
At last his solemne silence thus he brake,
With doubtfull eyes fast fixèd on his guest;
Redoubted° knight, that for mine onely sake respected
Thy life and honour late adventurest,
Let nought be hid from me, that ought to be exprest.

30

What meane these bloudy vowes, and idle threats,
Throwne out from womanish impatient mind?
What heavens? what altars? what enragèd heates° passions
Here heapèd up with termes of love unkind,° unnatural
My conscience cleare with guilty bands would bind?
High God be witnesse, that I guiltlesse ame.
But if your selfe, Sir knight, ye faultie find,
Or wrappèd be in loves of former Dame,
With crime do not it cover, but disclose the same.

31

To whom the Redcrosse knight this answere sent,
My Lord, my King, be nought hereat dismayd,
Till well ye wote by grave intendiment,° consideration
What woman, and wherefore doth me upbrayd
With breach of love, and loyalty betrayd.
It was in my mishaps, as hitherward
I lately traveild, that unwares I strayd
Out of my way, through perils straunge and hard;
That day should faile me, ere I had them all declard.

32

There did I find, or rather I was found
Of this false woman, that Fidessa hight,
Fidessa hight the falsest Dame on ground,
Most false Duessa, royall richly dight,
That easie° was t'invegle° weaker sight: eager / blind
Who by her wicked arts, and wylie skill,
Too false and strong for earthly skill or might,
Unwares me wrought unto her wicked will,
And to my foe betrayd, when least I fearèd ill.

33

Then steppèd forth the goodly royall Mayd,
And on the ground her selfe prostrating low,
With sober countenaunce thus to him sayd;
O pardon me, my soveraigne Lord, to show
The secret treasons, which of late I know
To have bene wroght by that false sorceresse.
She onely she it is, that earst° did throw once
This gentle knight into so great distresse,
That death him did awaite in dayly wretchednesse.

34

And now it seemes, that she subornèd hath
This craftie messenger with letters vaine,
To worke new woe and improvided° scath,° unforeseen damage
By breaking of the band betwixt us twaine;
Wherein she usèd hath the practicke° paine° cunning care
Of this false footman, clokt with simplenesse,
Whom if ye please for to discover plaine,
Ye shall him Archimago find, I ghesse,
The falsest man alive; who tries shall find no lesse.

35

The king was greatly movèd at her speach,
And all with suddein indignation fraight,° laden
Bad on that Messenger rude hands to reach.
Eftsoones° the Gard, which on his state did wait, at once
Attacht° that faitor° false, and bound him strait: seized / imposter
Who seeming sorely chauffèd at his band,
As chainèd Beare, whom cruell dogs do bait,
With idle force did faine them to withstand,
And often semblaunce made to scape out of their hand.

36

But they him layd full low in dungeon deepe,
And bound him hand and foote with yron chains.
And with continuall watch did warely keepe;
Who then would thinke, that by his subtile trains
He could escape fowle death or deadly paines?
Thus when that Princes wrath was pacifide,
He gan renew the late forbidden banes,° banns
And to the knight his daughter deare he tyde,
With sacred rites and vowes for ever to abyde.

37

His owne two hands the holy knots did knit,
That none but death for ever can devide;
His owne two hands, for such a turne most fit,
The housling° fire did kindle and provide, sacramental
And holy water thereon sprinckled wide;[1]
At which the bushy Teade° a groome did light, torch
And sacred lampe in secret chamber hide,
Where it should not be quenchèd day nor night,
For feare of evill fates, but burnen ever bright.

38

Then gan they sprinckle all the posts with wine,[2]
And made great feast to solemnize that day;
They all perfumde with frankincense divine,
And precious odours fetcht from far away,
That all the house did sweat with great aray:° festivities
And all the while sweete Musicke did apply
Her curious° skill, the warbling notes to play, complex
To drive away the dull Melancholy;
The whiles one sung a song of love and jollity.

39

During the which there was an heavenly noise
Heard sound through all the Pallace pleasantly,
Like as it had bene many an Angels voice,
Singing before th'eternall maiesty,
In their trinall triplicities[3] on hye;
Yet wist no creature, whence that heavenly sweet
Proceeded, yet each one felt secretly
Himselfe thereby reft of his sences meet,
And ravishèd with rare impression in his sprite.

40

Great joy was made that day of young and old,
And solemne feast proclaimd throughout the land,
That their exceeding merth may not be told:
Suffice it heare by signes to understand
The usuall joyes at knitting of loves band.
Thrise happy man the knight himselfe did hold,
Possessèd of his Ladies hart and hand,
And ever, when his eye did her behold,
His heart did seeme to melt in pleasures manifold.

41

Her joyous presence and sweet company
In full content he there did long enioy,
Ne wicked envie, ne vile gealosy
His deare delights were able to annoy:
Yet swimming in that sea of blisfull joy,
He nought forgot, how he whilome had sworne,
In case he could that monstrous beast destroy,
Unto his Farie Queene backe to returne:
The which he shortly did, and Una left to mourne.

42

Now strike your sailes ye jolly Mariners,
For we be come unto a quiet rode,° harbor
Where we must land some of our passengers,
And light this wearie vessell of her lode.
Here she a while may make her safe abode,
Till she repairèd have her tackles spent,° worn out
And wants supplide. And then againe abroad
On the long voyage whereto she is bent:
Well may she speede and fairely finish her intent.

from The Second Booke of the Faerie Queene Contayning The Legend of Sir Guyon, or Of Temperaunce

from Canto 12[4]

42

Thence passing forth, they shortly do arrive,
Whereas° the Bowre of Blisse was situate; where
A place pickt out by choice of best alive,
That natures worke by art can imitate:[5]

---

[1] The housling … wide The king is blessing the union with sacramental fire and water, as was common in ancient Roman marriage rituals.

[2] Then gan … wine Sprinkling doorways with wine was meant to bring fertility.

[3] trinall triplicities The triple triad (nine orders) of angels, which correspond to the nine spheres of the universe. Thus the music described is that of the spheres, an extraordinarily beautiful harmony that humankind has been unable to hear since the Fall.

[4] Canto 12 So far in Book 2, Sir Guyon has tried to exemplify Temperance. To do so he has had to exercise self-control in the face of all passions. Led by his guide, the Palmer, he travels to the Bower of Bliss, ruled by the murderous witch Acrasia, in order to destroy it. Palmers were those who wore palm leaf badges to show that they had made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

[5] best alive … imitate I.e., the best artists.

In which what ever in this worldly state
Is sweet, and pleasing unto living sense,
Or that may dayntiest fantasie aggrate,° please
Was pourèd forth with plentifull dispence,° liberality
And made there to abound with lavish affluence.

43

Goodly it was enclosèd round about,
Aswell their entred guestes to keepe within,
As those unruly beasts to hold without;
Yet was the fence thereof but weake and thin;
Nought° feard their force, that fortilage° to win, naught / fortress
But wisedomes powre, and temperaunces might,
By which the mightiest things efforcèd° bin:° compelled / are
And eke° the gate was wrought of substaunce light, also Rather for pleasure, then for battery or fight.

44

Yt° framèd was of precious yvory, it
That seemd a worke of admirable wit;° skill
And therein all the famous history
Of Jason and Medæa was ywrit;
Her mighty charmes, her furious loving fit,
His goodly conquest of the golden fleece,
His falsèd° faith, and love too lightly flit,° violated / changing
The wondred Argo, which in venturous° peece° adventurous ship
First through the Euxine seas bore all the flowr of Greece.[1]

45

Ye might have seene the frothy billowes fry° foam
Under the ship, as thorough them she went,
That seemd the waves were into yvory,
Or yvory into the waves were sent;
And other where[2] the snowy substaunce sprent° sprinkled
With vermell,° like the boyes bloud[3] therein shed, vermilion
A piteous spectacle did represent,
And otherwhiles° with gold besprinkelèd; elsewhere
Yt seemd th'enchaunted flame, which did Creüsa wed.[4]

46

All this, and more might in that goodly gate
Be red; that ever open stood to all,
Which thither came: but in the Porch there sate
A comely personage of stature tall,
And semblaunce° pleasing, more then naturall, appearance
That travellers to him seemd to entize;° entice
His looser garment to the ground did fall,
And flew about his heeles in wanton wize,° manner
Not fit for speedy pace, or manly exercize.

47

They in that place him Genius did call:
Not that celestiall powre,[5] to whom the care
Of life, and generation of all
That lives, pertaines in charge particulare,
Who wondrous things concerning our welfare,
And straunge phantome° doth let us oft forsee, images
And oft of secret ill bids us beware:
That is our Selfe, whom though we do not see,
Yet each doth in him selfe it well perceive to bee.

48

Therefore a God him sage Antiquity
Did wisely make, and good Agdistes[6] call:
But this same was to that quite contrary,
The foe of life, that good envyes° to all, begrudges
That secretly doth us procure° to fall, arrange
Through guilefull semblaunts,° which he makes us see. illusions
He of this Gardin had the governall,° rule
And Pleasures porter was devizd to bee,
Holding a staffe in hand for more formalitee.

49

With diverse flowres he daintily was deckt,

---

[1] famous history … Greece Jason sailed on his ship the Argo to steal the Golden Fleece, which belonged to the King of Colchis. The King's daughter, Medea, fell in love with Jason and used her magical powers to betray her father and assist Jason. After obtaining the fleece, Jason broke his promise of fidelity to Medea.

[2] other where Elsewhere.

[3] boyes blood Referring to the blood of Medea's brother, whom she murdered and chopped into pieces. She then scattered the pieces to distract her father as she and Jason escaped with the Fleece.

[4] Yt … wed When Jason abandoned Medea in favor of Creüsa, the vengeful Medea sent Creüsa an enchanted dress that burned her to death when she put it on.

[5] celestiall powre God of birth and generation.

[6] Agdistes I.e., Agdistis, originally a mother-goddess.

And strowèd° round about, and by his side strewn
A mighty Mazer bowle° of wine was set, goblet
As if it had to him bene sacrifide;
Wherewith all new-come guests he gratifide:
So did he eke Sir Guyon passing by:
But he his idle curtesie defide,
And overthrew his bowle disdainfully;
And broke his staffe, with which he charmèd semblants sly.[1]

50

Thus being entred, they behold around
A large and spacious plaine, on every side
Strowed with pleasauns,° whose faire grassy ground pleasure-grounds
Mantled° with greene, and goodly beautified covered
With all the ornaments of Floraes pride,[2]
Wherewith her mother Art, as halfe in scorne
Of niggard° Nature, like a pompous bride stingy
Did decke her, and too lavishly adorne,
When forth from virgin bowre she comes in th'early morne.

51

Thereto the Heavens alwayes Joviall, Lookt on them lovely,° still° in stedfast state, lovingly / always
Ne suffred storme nor frost on them to fall,
Their tender buds or leaves to violate,
Nor scorching heat, nor cold intemperate
T'afflict the creatures, which therein did dwell,
But the milde air with season moderate
Gently attempred,° and disposd so well, temperate
That still it breathèd forth sweet spirit & holesome smell.

52

More sweet and holesome, then the pleasaunt hill
Of Rhodope, on which the Nimphe, that bore
A gyaunt babe, her selfe for griefe did kill;
Or the Thessalian Tempe, where of yore
Faire Daphne Phoebus hart with love did gore;
Or Ida, where the Gods lov'd to repaire,° retire
When ever they their heavenly bowres forlore;°[3] left
Or sweet Parnasse, the haunt of Muses faire;
Or Eden selfe, if ought with Eden mote compaire.

53

Much wondred Guyon at the faire aspect° appearance
Of that sweet place, yet suffred no delight
To sincke into his sence, nor mind affect,
But passèd forth, and lookt still forward right,° straight
Bridling his will, and maistering his might:
Till that he came unto another gate,
No gate, but like one, being goodly dight° decorated
With boughes and braunches, which did broad dilate° spread
Their clasping armes, in wanton wreathings intricate.

54

So fashionèd a Porch with rare device,° design
Archt over head with an embracing vine,
Whose bounches° hanging downe, seemed to entice bunches
All passers by, to tast their lushious wine,
And did themselves into their hands incline,
As freely offering to be gatherèd:
Some deepe empurpled as the Hyacint,[4]
Some as the Rubine,° laughing sweetly red, ruby
Some like faire Emeraudes, not yet well ripenèd.

55

And them amongst, some were of burnisht gold,
So made by art, to beautifie the rest,
Which did themselves emongst the leaves enfold,
As lurking from the vew of covetous guest,
That the weake bowes,° with so rich load opprest, boughs
Did bow adowne, as over-burdened.
Under that Porch a comely dame did rest,
Clad in faire weedes,° but fowle disorderèd, garments
And garments loose, that seemd unmeet° for womanhed.° unsuitable womanhood

---

[1] his staffe ... sly His magic staff, with which he raised deceitful apparitions.

[2] Floraes pride The pride of Flora, goddess of flowers.

[3] More sweet ... forlore References to Rhodope, a nymph who bore a child by Neptune and was turned into a mountain; Daphne, a nymph who was pursued by the god Phoebus Apollo, and who was turned into a laurel tree when she prayed to escape him; and Mount Ida, which was the location of Jupiter's rape of Ganymede and of the beauty contest among Juno, Venus, and Minerva.

[4] Hyacint Jacinth, a sapphire-colored stone.

56

In her left hand a Cup of gold she held,
And with her right the riper fruit did reach,
Whose sappy liquor, that with fulnesse sweld,
Into her cup she scruzd,° with daintie breach° squeezed breaking
Of her fine fingers, without fowle empeach,° injury
That so faire wine-presse made the wine more sweet:
Thereof she usd to give to drinke to each,
Whom passing by she happenèd to meet:
It was her guise,° all Straungers goodly so to greet. habit

57

So she to Guyon offred it to tast;
Who taking it out of her tender hond,
The cup to ground did violently cast,
That all in peeces it was broken fond,° found
And with the liquor stainèd all the lond:
Whereat Excesse exceedingly was wroth,
Yet no'te° the same amend, ne yet withstond,° could not prevent
But suffered him to passe, all were she loth;° reluctant
Who nought regarding her displeasure forward goth.

58

There the most daintie Paradise on ground,
It selfe doth offer to his sober eye,
In which all pleasures plenteously abound,
And none does others happinesse envye:
The painted° flowres, the trees upshooting hye, variegated
The dales for shade, the hilles for breathing space,
The trembling groves, the Christall° running by; clear water
And that, which all faire workes doth most aggrace,° add grace
The art, which all that wrought, appeared° in no place. was visible

59

One would have thought, (so cunningly, the rude,
And scornèd parts were mingled with the fine,)
That nature had for wantonesse ensude° imitated
Art, and that Art at nature did repine;° fret
So striving each th'other to undermine,
Each did the others worke more beautifie;
So diff'ring both in willes,° agreed in fine:° wills the conclusion
So all agreed through sweete diversitie,
This Gardin to adorne with all varietie.

60

And in the midst of all, a fountaine stood,
Of richest substaunce, that on earth might bee,
So pure and shiny, that the silver flood
Through every channell running one might see;
Most goodly it with curious imageree
Was over-wrought, and shapes of naked boyes,
Of which some seemd with lively jollitee,
To fly about, playing their wanton toyes,° games
Whilest others did them selves embay° in liquid joyes. bathe

61

And over all, of purest gold was spred,
A trayle of yvie in his native hew:
For the rich mettall was so colourèd,
That wight,° who did not well avis'd° it vew, creature / attentively
Would surely deeme it to be yvie trew:
Low his lascivious armes adown did creepe,
That themselves dipping in the silver dew,
Their fleecy flowres they tenderly did steepe,
Which drops of Christall seemd for wantones° to weepe. wantonness

62

Infinit streames continually did well
Out of this fountaine, sweet and faire to see,
The which into an ample laver° fell, basin
And shortly grew to so great quantitie,
That like a little lake it seemd to bee;
Whose depth exceeded not three cubits[1] hight,
That through the waves one might the bottom see,
All pav'd beneath with Jaspar[2] shining bright,
That seemd the fountaine in that sea did sayle upright.

63

And all the margent° round about was set, border
With shady Laurell trees, thence to defend° protect from

---

[1] cubits Units of measurement equal to approximately 20 inches.

[2] Jaspar Semi-precious stone.

The sunny beames, which on the billowes bet,° beat
And those which therein bathèd, mote offend.° bother
As Guyon hapned by the same to wend,° pass
Two naked Damzelles he therein espyde,
Which therein bathing, seemèd to contend,
And wrestle wantonly,° ne car'd to hyde, lasciviously
Their dainty parts from vew of any, which them eyde.

64

Sometimes the one would lift the other quight
Above the waters, and then downe againe
Her plong,° as over maisterèd by might, plunge
Where both awhile would coverèd remaine,
And each the other from to rise restraine;
The whiles their snowy limbes, as through a vele,
So through the Christall waves appearèd plaine:
Then suddeinly both would themselves unhele,° display
And th'amarous sweet spoiles to greedy eyes revele.

65

As that faire Starre, the messenger of morne,
His deawy face out of the sea doth reare:
Or as the Cyprian goddesse,[1] newly borne
Of th'Oceans fruitfull froth, did first appeare:
Such seemèd they, and so their yellow heare
Christalline° humour° droppèd downe apace. clear / water
Whom such when Guyon saw, he drew him neare,
And somewhat gan° relent his earnest pace, began
His stubborne brest gan secret pleasaunce to embrace.

66

The wanton Maidens him espying, stood Gazing a while at his unwonted° unfamiliar guise;° appearance
Then th'one her selfe low duckèd in the flood,
Abasht, that her a straunger did avise:° observe
But th'other rather higher did arise,
And her two lilly paps° aloft displayd, breasts
And all, that might his melting hart entise
To her delights, she unto him bewrayd:° revealed
The rest hid underneath, him more desirous made.

67

With that, the other likewise up arose,
And her faire lockes, which formerly were bownd
Up in one knot, he low adowne did lose:° loosen
Which flowing long and thick, her cloth'd arownd,
And th'yvorie in golden mantle gownd:° covered
So that faire spectacle from him was reft,° taken
Yet that, which reft it, no lesse faire was fownd:
So hid in lockes and waves from lookers theft,
Nought but her lovely face she for his looking left.

68

Withall she laughèd, and she blusht withall,
That blushing to her laughter gave more grace,
And laughter to her blushing, as did fall:
Now when they spide the knight to slacke his pace,
Them to behold, and in his sparkling face
The secret signes of kindled lust appeare,
Their wanton meriments they did encreace,
And to him beckned, to approch more neare,
And shewd him many sights, that courage° cold lust could reare.° arouse

69

On which when gazing him the Palmer saw,
He much rebukt those wandring eyes of his,
And counseld well, him forward thence did draw.
Now are they come nigh to the Bowre of blis
Of her fond favorites so nam'd amis:
When thus the Palmer; Now Sir, well avise;° consider
For here the end of all our travell is:
Here wonnes° Acrasia,[2] whom we must surprise, lives
Else she will slip away, and all our drift° despise. purpose

70

Eftsoones° they heard a most melodious soon afterwards
sound,
Of all that mote delight a daintie eare,
Such as attonce might not on living ground,
Save in this Paradise, be heard elswhere:
Right hard it was, for wight, which did it heare,
To read,° what manner musicke that mote bee: interpret
For all that pleasing is to living eare,

---

[1] that faire Starre ... Cyprian goddesse Venus, the morning star, referred to as the Cyprian goddess because one of her main shrines was on the island of Cyprus.

[2] Acrasia Meaning ill-tempered, or with a poor mix of humors in her body (from Greek: excess, or badly "tempered").

Was there consorted° in one harmonee, combined
Birdes, voyces, instruments, windes, waters, all agree.

71

The joyous birdes shrouded in chearefull shade,
Their notes unto the voyce attempred° sweet; attuned
Th'Angelicall soft trembling voyces made
To th'instruments divine respondence° meet:° response fitting
The silver sounding instruments did meet° join
With the base murmure of the waters fall:
The waters fall with difference discreet,° distinct
Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call:
The gentle warbling wind low answerèd to all.

72

There, whence that Musick seemèd heard to bee,
Was the faire Witch her selfe now solacing,° entertaining
With a new Lover, whom through sorceree
And witchcraft, she from farre did thither bring:
There she had him now layd a slombering,
In secret shade, after long wanton joyes:
Whilst round about them pleasauntly did sing
Many faire Ladies, and lascivious boyes,
That ever mixt their song with light licentious toyes.

73

And all that while, right over him she hong,
With her false° eyes fast fixèd in his sight, treacherous
As seeking medicine, whence she was stong,
Or greedily depasturing° delight: grazing on
And oft inclining downe with kisses light,
For feare of waking him, his lips bedewd,
And through his humid eyes did sucke his spright,
Quite molten into lust and pleasure lewd;
Wherewith she sighèd soft, as if his case she rewd.° pitied

74

The whiles some one did chaunt this lovely lay;° song
Ah see, who so faire thing doest faine° to see, desire
In springing flowre the image of thy day;
Ah see the Virgin Rose, how sweetly shee
Doth first peepe forth with bashfull modestee,
That fairer seemes, the lesse ye see her may;
Lo see soone after, how more bold and free
Her barèd bosome she doth broad display;
Loe see soone after, how she fades, and falles away.

75

So passeth, in the passing of a day,
Of mortall life the leafe, the bud, the flowre,
Ne more doth flourish after first decay,
That earst° was sought to decke both bed and bowre, formerly
Of many a Ladie, and many a Paramowre:° lover
Gather therefore the Rose, whilest yet is prime,° spring
For soone comes age, that will her pride deflowre:
Gather the Rose of love, whilest yet is time,
Whilest loving thou mayst lovèd be with equall crime.

76

He ceast, and then gan all the quire° of birdes choir
Their diverse notes t'attune unto his lay,
As in approvance of his pleasing words.
The constant paire heard all, that he did say,
Yet swarvèd° not, but kept their forward way, swerved
Through many covert groves, and thickets close,
In which they creeping did at last display° discover
That wanton Ladie, with her lover lose,° wanton
Whose sleepie head she in her lap did soft dispose.° place

77

Upon a bed of Roses she was layd,
As faint through heat, or dight° to° pleasant sin, prepared / for
And was arayd, or rather disarayd,
All in a vele of silke and silver thin,
That hid no whit her alablaster skin,
But rather shewd more white, if more might bee:
More subtile web Arachne[1] can not spin,
Nor the fine nets, which oft we woven see
Of scorchèd° deaw, do not in th'aire more lightly flee.° dried float

78

Her snowy brest was bare to readie spoyle
Of hungry eies, which n'ote° therewith be fild, could not
And yet through languour° of her late sweet toyle, fatigue

---

[1] Arachne According to myth, Arachne challenged Athena (goddess of wisdom and practical arts) to a weaving contest and was turned into a spider as punishment.

Few drops, more cleare then Nectar, forth distild,° gathered
That like pure Orient perles adowne it trild,° dripped
And her faire eyes sweet smyling in delight,
Moystened their fierie beames, with which she thrild° pierced
Fraile harts, yet quenchèd° not; like starry light killed
Which sparckling on the silent waves, does seeme more bright.

79

The young man sleeping by her, seemd to bee
Some goodly swayne° of honorable place,° young man rank
That certès it great pittie was to see
Him his nobilitie so foule deface;
A sweet regard,° and amiable grace, manner
Mixèd with manly sternnesse did appeare
Yet sleeping, in his well proportiond face,
And on his tender lips the downy heare
Did now but freshly spring, and silken blossomes beare.

80

His warlike armes, the idle instruments
Of sleeping praise,° were hong upon a tree, merit
And his brave shield, full of old moniments,° marks of honor
Was fowly ra'st,° that none the signes might see; erased
Ne for them, ne for honour carèd hee,
Ne ought, that did to his advauncement tend,
But in lewd loves, and wastfull luxuree,° licentiousness
His dayes, his goods, his bodie he did spend:
O horrible enchantment, that him so did blend.° blind

81

The noble Elfe, and carefull Palmer drew
So nigh them, minding nought, but lustfull game,
That suddein forth they on them rusht, and threw
A subtile net, which onely for the same
The skilfull Palmer formally° did frame. expressly
So held them under fast, the whiles the rest
Fled all away for feare of fowler° shame. fouler
The faire Enchauntresse, so unwares opprest,° overwhelmed
Tryde all her arts, & all her sleights, thence out to wrest.° escape

82

And eke her lover strove: but all in vaine;
For that same net so cunningly was wound,
That neither guile, nor force might it distraine.° rend
They tooke them both, & both them strongly bound
In captive bandes, which there they readie found:
But her in chaines of adamant° he tyde; diamond
For nothing else might keepe her safe and sound;
But Verdant (so he hight°) he soone untyde, was called
And counsell sage in steed[1] thereof to him applyde.

83

But all those pleasant bowres and Pallace brave,° grand
Guyon broke downe, with rigour pittilesse;
Ne ought their goodly workmanship might save
Them from the tempest of his wrathfulnesse,
But that their blisse he turn'd to balefulnesse:° sadness
Their groves he feld, their gardins did deface,
Their arbers spoyle, their Cabinets° suppresse, bowers
Their banket° houses burne, their buildings race,° banquet raze
And of the fairest late, now made the fowlest place.

84

Then led they her away, and eke that knight
They with them led, both sorrowfull and sad:
The way they came, the same retourn'd they right,
Till they arrivèd, where they lately had
Charm'd those wild-beasts, that rag'd with furie mad.
Which now awaking, fierce at them gan fly,
As in their mistresse reskew,° whom they lad;° rescue / led
But them the Palmer soone did pacify.
Then Guyon askt, what meant those beastes, which there did ly.

85

Said he, These seeming beasts are men indeed,
Whom this Enchauntresse hath transformèd thus,
Whylome° her lovers, which her lusts did feed, previously
Now turned into figures hideous,
According to their mindes like monstruous.
Sad end (quoth he) of life intemperate,
And mournefull meed° of joyes delicious: reward
But Palmer, if it mote° thee so aggrate, may
Let them returnèd be unto their former state.

---

[1] in steed Instead.

86

Streight way he with his vertuous° staffe them strooke, powerful
And streight of beasts they comely men became;
Yet being men they did unmanly looke,
And starèd ghastly, some for inward shame,
And some for wrath, to see their captive Dame:
But one above the rest in speciall,
That had an hog beene late, hight Grille[1] by name,
Repinèd° greatly, and did him miscall,° complained / abuse
That had from hoggish forme him brought to naturall.

87

Said Guyon, See the mind of beastly man,
That hath so soone forgot the excellence
Of his creation, when he life began,
That now he chooseth, with vile difference,° preference
To be a beast, and lacke intelligence.
To whom the Palmer thus, The donghill kind
Delights in filth and foule incontinence:
Let Grill be Grill, and have his hoggish mind,
But let us hence depart, whilest wether° serves and wind. weather

from The Third Booke of the Faerie Queene Contayning The Legend of Britomartis[2] or Of Chastitie

Canto 6

The birth of faire Belphoebe and
Of Amoret is told.
The Gardins of Adonis fraught
With pleasures manifold.

1

Well may I weene, faire Ladies, all this while Ye wonder, how this noble Damozell
So great perfections did in her compile,
Sith that in salvage° forests she did dwell, wild
So farre from court and royall Citadell,
The great schoolmistresse of all curtesy:
Seemeth that such wild woods should far expell
All civill usage and gentility,
And gentle sprite deforme with rude rusticity.

2

But to this faire Belphoebe[3] in her berth
The heavens so favourable were and free,° liberal
Looking with myld aspect upon the earth,
In th'Horoscope of her nativitee,[4]
That all the gifts of grace and chastitee
On her they pourèd forth of plenteous horne;[5]
Jove laught on Venus from his soveraigne see,° throne
And Phoebus[6] with faire beames did her adorne,
And all the Graces[7] rockt her cradle being borne.

3

Her berth was of the wombe of Morning dew,[8]
And her conception of the joyous Prime,
And all her whole creation did her shew
Pure and unspotted from all loathly crime,
That is ingenerate° in fleshly slime. innate
So was this virgin borne, so was she bred,
So was she traynèd up from time to time,[9]
In all chast vertue, and true bounti-hed° goodness
Till to her dew perfection she was ripenèd.

4

Her mother was the faire Chrysogonee,
The daughter of Amphisa,[10] who by race

---

[1] Grille Fierce or cruel. In The Odyssey, Grille is one of Odysseus's men whom Circe turns into a pig. In one of Plutarch's dialogues, Grille then refuses to be returned to human form.

[2] Britomartis Her name is a combination of the words Britain and Mars (god of war).

[3] Belphoebe Her name associates her with the goddess Diana (also called Phoebe).

[4] The heavens ... nativitee I.e., the planets were favorably arranged at the time of her birth. Any combination of Jupiter (Jove) and Venus was believed to bring particular luck.

[5] plenteous horne Horn of plenty.

[6] Phoebus I.e., Phoebus Apollo, god of the sun.

[7] the Graces Three sister goddesses who dispense the gifts of pleasure, beauty, and charm.

[8] Her ... dew Cf. Psalm 110.3, describing the reign of the Messiah: "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth."

[9] from time to time Continuously.

[10] Chrysogonee Golden-born (Danaë conceived her when Jove came to her as a golden shower); Amphisa Of double nature.

A Faerie was, yborne of high degree,
She bore Belphoebe, she bore in like cace
Faire Amoretta[1] in the second place:
These two were twinnes, & twixt them two did share
The heritage of all celestiall grace.
That all the rest it seem'd they robbèd bare
Of bountie,° and of beautie, and all vertues rare. goodness

5

It were a goodly storie, to declare,
By what straunge accident faire Chrysogone
Conceiv'd these infants, and how them she bare,
In this wild forrest wandring all alone,
After she had nine moneths fulfild and gone:
For not as other wemens commune brood,
They were enwombèd in the sacred throne
Of her chaste bodie, nor with commune food,
As other wemens babes, they suckèd vitall blood.

6

But wondrously they were begot, and bred
Through influence of th'heavens fruitfull ray,
As it in antique bookes is mentionèd.
It was upon a Sommers shynie day,
When Titan[2] faire his beamès did display,
In a fresh fountaine, farre from all mens vew,
She bath'd her brest, the boyling heat t'allay;
She bath'd with roses red, and violets blew,
And all the sweetest flowres, that in the forrest grew.

7

Till faint through irkesome wearinesse, adowne
Upon the grassie ground her selfe she layd
To sleepe, the whiles a gentle slombring swowne° sleep
Upon her fell all naked bare displayd;
The sunne-beames bright upon her body playd,
Being through former bathing mollifide,° made soft
And pierst into her wombe, where they embayd° permeated
With so sweet sence° and secret power unspide, sensation
That in her pregnant flesh they shortly fructifide.

8

Miraculous may seeme to him, that reades
So straunge ensample of conception;
But reason teacheth that the fruitfull seades
Of all things living, through impression
Of the sunbeames in moyst complexion,
Doe life conceive and quickned are by kynd:° nature
So after Nilus° inundation, the Nile's
Infinite shapes of creatures men do fynd,
Informèd° in the mud, on which the Sunne hath shynd. formed

9

Great father he of generation
Is rightly cald, th'author of life and light;
And his faire sister[3] for creation
Ministreth matter fit, which tempred right
With heate and humour,° breedes the living wight.° moisture creature
So sprong these twinnes in wombe of Chrysogone,
Yet wist° she nought thereof, but sore affright, knew
Wondred to see her belly so upblone,
Which still increast, till she her terme had full outgone.

10

Whereof conceiving shame and foule disgrace, Albe° her guiltlesse conscience her cleard, although
She fled into the wildernesse a space,
Till that unweeldy burden she had reard,° brought forth
And shund dishonor, which as death she feard:
Where wearie of long travell, downe to rest
Her selfe she set, and comfortably cheard;[4]
There a sad cloud of sleepe her overkest,° covered
And seizèd every sense with sorrow sore opprest.

11

It fortunèd, faire Venus having lost
Her little sonne, the wingèd god of love,
Who for some light displeasure, which him crost,
Was from her fled, as flit° as ayerie Dove, quick
And left her blisfull bowre of joy above,
(So from her often he had fled away,
When she for ought him sharpely did reprove,
And wandred in the world in strange aray,
Disguiz'd in thousand shapes, that none might him bewray.°) reveal

---

[1] Amoretta Italian: Little love.

[2] Titan The sun.

[3] his faire sister The moon.

[4] comfortably cheard I.e., was cheered by this comfort.

12

Him for to seeke, she left her heavenly hous,
The house of goodly formes and faire aspects,
Whence all the world derives the glorious
Features of beautie, and all shapes select,° choice
With which high God his workmanship hath deckt;
And searchèd every way, through which his wings
Had borne him, or his tract° she mote° detect: path / might
She promist kisses sweet, and sweeter things
Unto the man, that of him tydings to her brings.

13

First she him sought in Court, where most he used Whylome° to haunt, but there she found him not; previously
But many there she found, which sore accused
His falsehood, and with foule infamous blot
His cruell deedes and wicked wyles did spot:° reproach
Ladies and Lords she every where mote heare
Complayning, how with his empoysned shot
Their wofull harts he wounded had whyleare,° a while earlier
And so had left them languishing twixt hope and feare.

14

She then the Citties sought from gate to gate,
And every one did aske, did he him see;
And every one her answerd, that too late° recently
He had him seene, and felt the crueltie
Of his sharpe darts and whot° artillerie; hot
And every one threw forth reproches rife
Of his mischievous deedes, and said, that hee
Was the disturber of all civill life,
The enimy of peace, and author of all strife.

15

Then in the countrey she abroad him sought,
And in the rurall cottages inquired,
Where also many plaints to her were brought,
How he their heedlesse harts with love had fyred,
And his false venim through their veines inspyred;
And eke the gentle shepheard swaynes,° which sat country laborers
Keeping their fleecie flockes, as they were hyred,
She sweetly heard complaine, both how and what
Her sonne had to them doen; yet she did smile thereat.

16

But when in none of all these she him got,
She gan avize,° where else he mote him hyde: reflect
At last she her bethought, that she had not Yet sought the salvage woods and forrests wyde,
In which full many lovely Nymphes abyde,
Mongst whom might be, that he did closely lye,
Or that the love of some of them him tyde:° bound
For thy,[1] she thither cast° her course t'apply, resolved
To search the secret haunts of Dianes company.

17

Shortly unto the wastefull° woods she came, wild
Whereas she found the Goddesse with her crew,
After late chace of their embrewèd° game, bloodstained
Sitting beside a fountaine in a rew,° row
Some of them washing with the liquid dew
From off their dainty limbes the dustie sweat,
And soyle which did deforme their lively hew;
Others lay shaded from the scorching heat;
The rest upon her person gave attendance great.

18

She having hong upon a bough on high
Her bow and painted quiver, had unlaste° untied
Her silver buskins° from her nimble thigh, boots
And her lancke° loynes ungirt, and brests unbraste, slender
After her heat the breathing cold to taste;
Her golden lockes, that late in tresses bright
Embreaded° were for° hindring of her haste, braided / to prevent
Now loose about her shoulders hong undight,° unbound
And were with sweet Ambrosia° all bespinckled light. perfume

19

Soone as she Venus saw behind her backe,
She was asham'd to be so loose surprized,
And woxe° halfe wroth against her damzels slacke, grew
That had not her thereof before avized,° warned
But suffred her so carelesly disguized

---

[1] For thy Therefore.

Be overtaken. Soone her garments loose
Upgath'ring, in her bosome she comprized,° gathered
Well as she might, and to the Goddesse rose,
Whiles all her Nymphes did like a girlond her enclose.

20

Goodly° she gan faire Cytherea[1] greet, politely
And shortly askèd her, what cause her brought Into that wildernesse for her unmeet,° unsuitable
From her sweet bowres, and beds with pleasures fraught:
That suddein change she strange adventure° thought. chance
To whom halfe weeping, she thus answerèd,
That she her dearest sonne Cupido sought,
Who in his frowardnesse° from her was fled; naughtiness
That she repented sore, to have him angerèd.

21

Thereat Diana gan to smile, in scorne
Of her vaine plaint, and to her scoffing sayd;
Great pittie sure, that ye be so forlorne
Of your gay sonne, that gives ye so good ayd
To your disports:° ill mote ye bene apayd.° amusements repaid
But she was more engrievèd, and replide;
Faire sister, ill beseemes it to upbrayd
A dolefull heart with so disdainfull pride;
The like that mine, may be your paine another tide.° time

22

As you in woods and wanton wildernesse
Your glory set, to chace the salvage beasts,
So my delight is all in joyfulnesse,
In beds, in bowres, in banckets,° and in feasts: banquets
And ill becomes you with your loftie creasts,° helmets
To scorne the joy, that Jove is glad to seeke;
We both are bound to follow heavens beheasts,
And tend our charges with obeisance meeke:
Spare, gentle sister, with reproch my paine to eeke.° increase

23

And tell me, if that ye my sonne have heard,
To lurke emongst your Nymphes in secret wize;
Or keepe their cabins:° much I am affeard, caves
Least he like one of them him selfe disguize,
And turne his arrowes to their exercize:
So may he long himselfe full easie hide:
For he is faire and fresh in face and guize,
As any Nymph (let not it be envyde),° begrudged
So saying every Nymph full narrowly she eyde.

24

But Phoebe therewith sore was angered,
And sharply said; Goe Dame, goe seeke your boy,
Where you him lately left, in Mars[2] his bed;
He comes not here, we scorne his foolish joy,
Ne lend we leisure to his idle toy:° play
But if I catch him in this company,
By Stygian lake[3] I vow, whose sad annoy° affliction
The Gods doe dread, he dearely shall abye:° atone for it
Ile clip his wanton wings, that he no more shall fly.

25

Whom when as Venus saw so sore displeased,
She inly sory was, and gan relent,
What she had said: so her she soone appeased,
With sugred words and gentle blandishment,° flattery
Which as a fountaine from her sweet lips went,
And wellèd goodly forth, that in short space
She was well pleasd, and forth her damzels sent,
Through all the woods, to search from place to place,
If any tract° of him or tydings they mote trace. trace

26

To search the God of love, her Nymphes she sent Throughout the wandring forrest every where:
And after them her selfe eke with her went
To seeke the fugitive, both farre and nere,
So long they sought, till they arrivèd were
In that same shadie covert, whereas lay
Faire Crysogone in slombry traunce whilere:
Who in her sleepe (a wondrous thing to say)
Unwares had borne two babes, as faire as springing° day. dawning

---

[1] Cytherea Venus, who, according to myth, first rose out of the sea near the island of Cythera.

[2] Mars God of war and Venus's lover.

[3] Stygian lake The Styx, a river of the underworld. Oaths made on the Styx were especially sacred; even the gods would not break them.

27

Unwares she them conceiv'd, unwares she bore:
She bore withouten paine, that she conceived
Withouten pleasure: ne her need implore
Lucinaes[1] aide: which when they both perceived,
They were through wonder nigh° of sense bereaved, almost
And gazing each on other, nought bespake:° spoke
At last they both agreed, her seeming grieved° afflicted
Out of her heavy swowne not to awake,
But from her loving side the tender babes to take.

28

Up they them tooke, each one a babe uptooke,
And with them carried, to be fosterèd;
Dame Phoebe to a Nymph her babe betooke,
To be upbrought in perfect Maydenhed,° virginity
And of her selfe her name Belphoebe red:° declared
But Venus hers thence farre away convayd,
To be upbrought in goodly womanhed,
And in her litle loves stead, which was strayd,
Her Amoretta cald, to comfort her dismayd.

29

She brought her to her joyous Paradize,
Where most she wonnes,° when she on earth does dwel. resides
So faire a place, as Nature can devize:
Whether in Paphos, or Cytheron hill,
Or it in Gnidus[2] be, I wote not well;
But well I wote by tryall, that this same
All other pleasant places doth excell,
And callèd is by her lost lovers name,[3]
The Gardin of Adonis, farre renowmd by fame.

30

In that same Gardin all the goodly flowres,
Wherewith dame Nature doth her beautifie,
And decks the girlonds° of her paramoures, garlands
Are fetcht: there is the first seminarie° seed-plot
Of all things, that are borne to live and die,
According to their kindes. Long worke it were,
Here to account° the endlesse progenie enumerate
Of all the weedes, that bud and blossome there;
But so much as doth need, must needs be counted° here. listed

31

It sited° was in fruitfull soyle of old, located
And girt in with two walles on either side;
The one of yron, the other of bright gold,
That none might thorough breake, nor over-stride:
And double gates it had, which opened wide,
By which both in and out men moten pas;
Th'one faire and fresh, the other old and dride:
Old Genius[4] the porter of them was,
Old Genius, the which a double nature has.

32

He letteth in, he letteth out to wend,° come
All that to come into the world desire;
A thousand thousand naked babes attend
About him day and night, which doe require,
That he with fleshly weedes would them attire:
Such as him list,° such as eternall fate likes
Ordainèd hath, he clothes with sinfull mire,[5]
And sendeth forth to live in mortall state,
Till they againe returne backe by the hinder gate.

33

After that they againe returnèd beene,
They in that Gardin planted be againe;
And grow afresh, as they had never seene
Fleshly corruption, nor mortall paine.
Some thousand yeares so doen they there remaine;
And then of him are clad with other hew,° form
Or sent into the chaungefull world againe,
Till thither they returne, where first they grew:
So like a wheele around they runne from old to new.

34

Ne needs there Gardiner to set, or sow,
To plant or prune: for of their owne accord
All things, as they created were, doe grow,
And yet remember well the mightie word,

---

[1] Lucinaes Lucina was the goddess of childbirth.

[2] Paphos ... Gnidus Locations of three major shrines to Venus.

[3] her ... name Venus loved a beautiful boy named Adonis, who was killed by a boar while hunting one day. His blood was transformed into a flower, the anemone.

[4] Genius I.e., Janus, the Roman god of doors and gates.

[5] sinfull mire Flesh.

Which first was spoken by th'Almightie lord,
That bad them to increase and multiply:[1]
Ne doe they need with water of the ford,° stream
Or of the clouds to moysten their roots dry;
For in themselves eternall moisture they imply.° contain

35
Infinite shapes of creatures there are bred,
And uncouth° formes, which none yet ever knew, unfamiliar
And every sort is in a sundry° bed separate
Set by it selfe, and ranckt° in comely rew:° arranged / row
Some fit for reasonable[2] soules t'indew,° assume
Some made for beasts, some made for birds to weare,
And all the fruitfull spawne of fishes hew
In endlesse rancks along enraungèd were,
That seem'd the Ocean could not containe them there.

36
Daily they grow, and daily forth are sent
Into the world, it to replenish more;
Yet is the stocke not lessenèd, nor spent,
But still remaines in everlasting store,
As it at first created was of yore.
For in the wide wombe of the world there lyes,
In hatefull darkenesse and in deepe horrore,
An huge eternall Chaos, which supplyes
The substances of natures fruitfull progenyes.

37
All things from thence doe their first being fetch,
And borrow matter, whereof they are made,
Which when as forme and feature it does ketch,° take Becomes a bodie, and doth then invade° enter
The state of life, out of the griesly shade.
That substance is eterne, and bideth so,
Ne when the life decayes, and forme does fade,
Doth it consume, and into nothing go,
But chaungèd is, and often altred to and fro.

38
The substance is not chaunged, nor alterèd,
But th'only forme and outward fashion;
For every substance is conditionèd° bound
To change her hew, and sundry formes to don,
Meet for her temper and complexion:
For formes are variable and decay,
By course of kind,° and by occasion; nature
And that faire flowre of beautie fades away,
As doth the lilly fresh before the sunny ray.

39
Great enimy to it, and to all the rest,
That in the Gardin of Adonis springs,
Is wicked Time, who with his scyth addrest,° armed
Does mow the flowring herbes and goodly things,
And all their glory to the ground downe flings,
Where they doe wither, and are fowly mard:° marred
He flyes about, and with his flaggy wings
Beates downe both leaves and buds without regard,
Ne ever pittie may relent° his malice hard. soften

40
Yet pittie often did the gods relent,
To see so faire things mard, and spoylèd quight:
And their great mother Venus did lament
The losse of her deare brood, her deare delight:
Her hart was pierst with pittie at the sight,
When walking through the Gardin, them she spyde,
Yet no'te she find redresse for such despight.
For all that lives, is subject to that law:
All things decay in time, and to their end do draw.

41
But were it not, that Time their troubler is,
All that in this delightfull Gardin growes,
Should happie be, and have immortall blis:
For here all plentie, and all pleasure flowes,
And sweet love gentle fits° emongst them throwes, impulses
Without fell rancor, or fond° gealosie; foolish
Franckly each paramour his leman knowes,
Each bird his mate, ne any does envie
Their goodly meriment, and gay felicitie.

42
There is continuall spring, and harvest there
Continuall, both meeting at one time:
For both the boughes doe laughing blossomes beare,
And with fresh colours decke the wanton Prime,

[1] increase and multiply See Genesis 1.28.

[2] reasonable Rational; i.e., human.

And eke attonce the heavy trees they clime,
Which seeme to labour under their fruits lode:
The whiles the joyous birdes make their pastime
Emongst the shadie leaves, their sweet abode,
And their true loves without suspition tell abrode.

43

Right in the middest of that Paradise,
There stood a stately Mount, on whose round top
A gloomy° grove of mirtle trees[1] did rise, shady
Whose shadie boughes sharpe steele did never lop,° cut
Nor wicked beasts their tender buds did crop,
But like a girlond compassèd the hight,
And from their fruitfull sides sweet gum did drop,
That all the ground with precious deaw bedight,° bedecked
Threw forth most dainty odours, & most sweet delight.

44

And in the thickest covert of that shade,
There was a pleasant arbour, not by art,
But of the trees owne inclination made,
Which knitting their rancke° braunches part to part, dense
With wanton yvie twyne entrayld° athwart,° entwined / across
And Eglantine,° and Caprifole° emong, sweet-briar / honeysuckle
Fashiond above within their inmost part,
That nether Phoebus beams could through them throng,
Nor Aeolus sharp blast could worke them any wrong.

45

And all about grew every sort of flowre,
To which sad lovers were transformd of yore;
Fresh Hyacinthus,[2] Phoebus paramoure,
And dearest love:
Foolish Narcisse,[3] that likes the watry shore,
Sad Amaranthus, made a flowre but late,° recently
Sad Amaranthus, in whose purple gore
Me seemes I see Amintas[4] wretched fate,
To whom sweet Poets verse hath given endlesse date.

46

There wont° faire Venus often to enioy was accustomed
Her deare Adonis joyous company,
And reape sweet pleasure of the wanton boy;
There yet, some say, in secret he does ly,
Lappèd in flowres and pretious spycery,° spices
By her hid from the world, and from the skill° knowledge
Of Stygian Gods, which doe her love envy;
But she her selfe, when ever that she will,
Possesseth him, and of his sweetnesse takes her fill.

47

And sooth° it seemes they say: for he may not truly
For ever die, and ever buried bee
In balefull night, where all things are forgot;
All° be he subject to mortalitie, although
Yet is eterne in mutabilitie,
And by succession made perpetuall,
Transformèd oft, and chaungèd diverslie:
For him the Father of all formes they call;
Therefore needs mote he live, that living gives to all.

48

There now he liveth in eternall blis,
Joying° his goddesse, and of her enjoyd: enjoying
Ne feareth he henceforth that foe of his,
Which with his cruell tuske him deadly cloyd:° pierced
For that wilde Bore, the which him once annoyd,° harmed
She firmely hath emprisoned for ay,° ever
That her sweet love his malice mote avoyd,
In a strong rocky Cave, which is they say,
Hewen underneath that Mount, that none him losen may.

49

There now he lives in everlasting joy,
With many of the Gods in company,
Which thither haunt, and with the wingèd boy
Sporting himselfe in safe felicity:

---

[1] mirtle trees Myrtle was sacred to Venus.

[2] Hyacinthus Apollo accidentally killed his young lover Hyacinth, and the hyacinth flower sprang up from the drops of his blood.

[3] Narcisse Narcissus, who fell in love with his own reflection in a pool of water and pined away when he realized it. A narcissus sprang up at the poolside when he died.

[4] Amintas Man who died for the love of a woman named Phillis and was changed into an amaranth flower.

Who when he hath with spoiles and cruelty
Ransackt the world, and in the wofull harts
Of many wretches set his triumphes hye,
Thither resorts, and laying his sad darts
Aside, with faire Adonis playes his wanton parts.

50

And his true love faire Psyche[1] with him playes,
Faire Psyche to him lately reconcyld,
After long troubles and unmeet upbrayes,° reproofs
With which his mother Venus her revyld,° reproached
And eke himselfe her cruelly exyld:
But now in stedfast love and happy state
She with him lives, and hath him borne a chyld,
Pleasure, that doth both gods and men aggrate,° gratify
Pleasure, the daughter of Cupid and Psyche late.

51

Hither great Venus brought this infant faire,
The younger daughter of Chrysogonee,
And unto Psyche with great trust and care
Committed her, yfosterèd to bee,
And traind up in true feminitee:
Who no lesse carefully her tenderèd,° cared for
Then her owne daughter Pleasure, to whom shee
Made her companion, and her lessonèd° taught
In all the lore of love, and goodly womanhead.

52

In which when she to perfect ripenesse grew,
Of grace and beautie noble Paragone,° model
She brought her forth into the worldès vew,
To be th'ensample of true love alone,
And Lodestarre° of all chaste affectione, guiding star
To all faire Ladies, that doe live on ground.
To Faery court she came, where many one Admyrd her goodly haveour,° and found bearing
His feeble hart wide launchèd° with loves cruell wound. cut

53

But she to none of them her love did cast,
Save to the noble knight Sir Scudamore,
To whom her loving hart she linkèd fast
In faithfull love, t'abide for ever more,
And for his dearest sake endurèd sore,
Sore trouble of an hainous enimy;
Who her would forcèd have to have forlore° abandoned
Her former love, and stedfast loyalty,
As ye may elsewhere read that ruefull history.

54

But well I weene, ye first desire to learne,
What end unto that fearefull Damozell,
Which fled so fast from that same foster° stearne,° forester cruel
Whom with his brethren Timias slew, befell:
That was to weet, the goodly Florimell;
Who wandring for to seeke her lover deare,
Her lover deare, her dearest Marinell,
Into misfortune fell, as ye did heare,
And from Prince Arthur fled with wings of idle feare.[2]

CANTO II

Britomart chaceth Ollyphant,
Findes Scudamore distrest:
Assayes the house of Busyrane,
Where Loves spoyles are exprest.

1

O hatefull hellish Snake, what furie furst
Brought thee from balefull house of Proserpine,[3]
Where in her bosome she thee long had nurst,
And fostred° up with bitter milke of tine,° raised / trouble

---

[1] Psyche Wife of Cupid who, when she disobeyed his orders never to look at his face, was punished by Venus, who set her several seemingly impossible tasks. Finally the gods mercifully granted Psyche immortality, allowing her to become a suitable partner for Cupid. See Apuleius's Golden Ass (second century CE).

[2] But well … feare In Canto 1, Britomart, Arthur, and Timias, his squire, encounter the lovely Florimell (whose name combines the words flower and honey and who is associated with beauty) fleeing from a cruel forester. Timias pursues and eventually slays the forester, along with his two brothers, though he is seriously wounded in the process. In Canto 4, we learn that Florimell is seeking her beloved, Marinell (whose name associates him with the sea). Marinell, however, has been told by his mother that a woman will cause him mortal harm so, for a time, he rejects Florimell's love.

[3] balefull … Proserpine The underworld. In classical mythology Proserpine is the wife of Hades for six months a year.

Fowle Gealosie, that turnest love divine
To joylesse dread, and mak'st the loving hart
With hatefull thoughts to languish and to pine,
And feed it selfe with selfe-consuming smart?
Of all the passions in the mind thou vilest art.

2

O let him far be banished away,
And in his stead let Love for ever dwell,
Sweet Love, that doth his golding wings embay° bathe, soak
In blessèd Nectar, and pure Pleasures well,
Untroubled of vile feare, or bitter fell.° gall
And ye faire Ladies, that your kingdomes make
In th'harts of men, them governe wisely well,
And of faire Britomart ensample take,
That was as trew in love, as Turtle° to her make.° turtledove mate

3

Who with Sir Satyrane, as earst ye red,
Forth ryding from Malbeccoes hostlesse hous,[1]
Far off aspyde a young man, the which fled
From an huge Geaunt, that with hideous
And hatefull outrage long him chacèd thus;
It was that Ollyphant, the brother deare
Of that Argante vile and vitious,
From whom the Squire of Dames was reft whylere;[2]
This all as bad as she, and worse, if worse ought were.

4

For as the sister did in feminine
And filthy lust exceede all woman kind,
So he surpassèd his sex masculine,
In beastly use that I did ever find;
Whom when as Britomart beheld behind
The fearefull boy so greedily pursew,
She was emmovèd in her noble mind,
T'employ her puissaunce to his reskew,
And prickèd fiercely forward, where she him did vew.

5

Ne was Sir Satyrane her far behinde,
But with like fiercenesse did ensew the chace:
Whom when the Gyaunt saw, he soone resinde
His former suit, and from them fled apace;
They after both, and boldly bad him bace,[3]
And each did strive the other to out-goe,
But he them both outran a wondrous space,
For he was long, and swift as any Roe,
And now made better speed, t'escape his fearèd foe.

6

It was not Satyrane, whom he did feare,
But Britomart the flowre of chastity;
For he the powre of chast hands might not beare,
But alwayes did their dread encounter fly:
And now so fast his feet he did apply,
That he has gotten to a forrest neare,
Where he is shrowded in security.
The wood they enter, and search every where,
They searchèd diversely, so both divided were.[4]

7

Faire Britomart so long him followèd,
That she at last came to a fountaine sheare,° pure, clear
By which there lay a knight all wallowèd
Upon the grassy ground, and by him neare
His haberjeon,° his helmet, and his speare; coat of mail
A little off, his shield was rudely throwne,
On which the wingèd boy° in colours cleare° Cupid / bright
Depeincted° was, full easie to be knowne, pictured
And he thereby, where ever it in field was showne.

8

His face upon the ground did groveling ly,
As if he had bene slombring in the shade,
That the brave Mayd would not for courtesy,
Out of his quiet slomber him abrade,° waken, disrupt
Nor seeme too suddeinly him to invade:

---

[1] as earst … hostlesse hous In 3.9, Satyrane and Britomart encounter each other outside the home of the miser Malbecco, who has refused them entry; together, they frighten him into offering them hospitality, but leave the following morning; earst Earlier.

[2] that Argante … whylere In 3.7, Satyrane frees the handsome Squire of Dames from a lustful giantess named Argante; whylere A bit before.

[3] bad him bace I.e., challenged the giant. The phrase refers to prisoner's base, a tag-based game.

[4] They searchèd … divided were They searched in different directions and so became separated.

Still as she stood, she heard with grievous throb
Him grone, as if his hart were peeces made,
And with most painefull pangs to sigh and sob,
That pitty did the Virgins hart of patience rob.

9

At last forth breaking into bitter plaintes
He said; O soveraigne Lord that sit'st on hye,
And raignst in blis emongst thy blessèd Saintes,
How suffrest thou such shamefull cruelty,
So long unwreakèd of thine enimy?
Or hast thou, Lord, of good mens cause no heed?
Or doth thy justice sleepe, and silent ly?
What booteth° then the good and righteous deed, benefits
If goodnesse find no grace, nor righteousnesse no meed?° reward

10

If good find grace, and righteousnesse reward,
Why then is Amoret in caytive° band, slavish
Sith° that more bounteous creature never fared since
On foot, upon the face of living land?
Or if that heavenly justice may withstand
The wrongfull outrage of unrighteous men,
Why then is Busirane with wicked hand
Suffred, these seven monethes day in secret den
My Lady and my love so cruelly to pen?° pun

11

My Lady and my love is cruelly pend
In dolefull darkenesse from the vew of day,
Whilest deadly torments do her chast brest rend,
And the sharpe steele doth rive her hart in tway,° two
All for she° Scudamore will not denay.° merely because / deny
Yet thou vile man, vile Scudamore art sound,
Ne canst her ayde, ne canst her foe dismay;
Unworthy wretch to tread upon the ground,
For whom so faire a Lady feeles so sore a wound.

12

There an huge heape of singulfes° did oppresse sighs
His strugling soule, and swelling throbs empeach° impede
His foltring toung with pangs of drerinesse,
Choking the remnant of his plaintife speach,
As if his dayes were come to their last reach.
Which when she heard, and saw the ghastly fit,
Threatning into his life to make a breach,
Both with great ruth° and terrour she was smit, pity
Fearing least from her cage[1] the wearie soule would flit.

13

Tho stooping downe she him amovèd light;
Who therewith somewhat starting, up gan looke,
And seeing him behind a straunger knight,
Whereas no living creature he mistooke,
With great indignaunce he that sight forsooke,
And downe againe himselfe disdainefully
Abjecting,° th'earth with his faire forhead strooke: throwing down
Which the bold Virgin seeing, gan apply
Fit medcine to his griefe, and spake thus courtesly.

14

Ah gentle knight, whose deepe conceivèd griefe
Well seemes t'exceede the powre of patience,
Yet if that heavenly grace some good reliefe
You send, submit you to high providence,
And ever in your noble hart prepense,° intend
That all the sorrow in the world is lesse,
Then vertues might, and values confidence,
For who nill° bide the burden of distresse, will not
Must not here thinke to live: for life is wretchednesse.

15

Therefore, faire Sir, do comfort to you take,
And freely read,° what wicked felon so tell, report
Hath outraged you, and thrald° your gentle make.° enslaved, captured / mate
Perhaps this hand may helpe to ease your woe,
And wreake your sorrow on your cruell foe,
At least it faire endevour will apply.
Those feeling wordes so neare the quicke did goe,
That up his head he rearèd easily,
And leaning on his elbow, these few wordes let fly.

16

What boots it plaine,[2] that° cannot be redrest, what
And sow vaine sorrow in a fruitlesse eare,
Sith powre of hand, nor skill of learnèd brest,

---

[1] her cage I.e., his soul's cage; souls are referred to as female in Spenser's poem and in much tradition.

[2] What boots it plaine How does it help to complain (about).

Ne worldly price cannot redeeme my deare,
Out of her thraldome and continuall feare?
For he the tyraunt, which her hath in ward
By strong enchauntments and blacke Magicke leare,° lore
Hath in a dungeon deepe her close embard,
And many dreadfull feends hath pointed° to appointed her gard.

17

There he tormenteth her most terribly,
And day and night afflicts with mortall paine,
Because to yield him love she doth deny,
Once to me yold,° not to be yold againe. yielded
But yet by torture he would her constraine
Love to conceive in her disdainfull brest;
Till so she do, she must in doole° remaine, sorrow, sadness
Ne may by living meanes be thence relest.
What boots it then to plaine, that cannot be redrest?

18

With this sad hersall° of his heavy stresse, rehearsal
The warlike Damzell was empassiond sore,
And said; Sir knight, your cause is nothing lesse,
Then is your sorrow, certes° if not more; certainly
For nothing so much pitty doth implore,
As gentle Ladies helplesse misery.
But yet, if please ye listen to my lore,° advice, learning
I will with proofe of last extremity,
Deliver her fro thence, or with her for you dy.

19

Ah gentlest knight alive, (said Scudamore),
What huge heroicke magnanimity
Dwels in thy bounteous brest? what couldst thou more,
If she were thine, and thou as now am I?
O spare thy happy dayes, and them apply
To better boot,° but let me dye, that ought; result
More is more losse: one is enough to dy.
Life is not lost, said she, for which is bought
Endlesse renowm, that more then death is to be sought.

20

Thus she at length perswaded him to rise,
And with her wend,° to see what new successe go
Mote him befall upon new enterprise;
His armes, which he had vowed to disprofesse,° renounce
She gathered up and did about him dresse,
And his forwandred[1] steed unto him got:
So forth they both yfere° make their progresse, together
And march not past the mountenaunce° of a shot. reach
Till they arrived, whereas their purpose they did plot.

21

There they dismounting, drew their weapons bold
And stoutly came unto the Castle gate;
Whereas no gate they found, them to withhold,
Nor ward° to wait at morne and evening late, guard
But in the Porch, that did them sore amate,° dismay
A flaming fire, ymixt with smouldry smoke,
And stinking Sulphure, that with griesly hate
And dreadfull horrour did all entraunce choke,
Enforcèd them their forward footing to revoke.

22

Greatly thereat was Britomart dismayd,
Ne in that stownd° wist,° how her selfe peril / knew
to beare;
For daunger vaine it were, to have assayd
That cruell element,° which all things feare, fire
Ne none can suffer° to approchen neare: allow
And turning backe to Scudamore, thus sayd;
What monstrous enmity provoke we heare,
Foolhardy as th'Earthes children, the which made
Battell against the Gods? so we a God invade.[2]

23

Daunger without discretion to attempt,
Inglorious and beastlike is: therefore Sir knight,
Aread° what course of you is safest say, declare dempt,° deemed
And how we with our foe may come to fight.
This is, quoth he, the dolorous despight,[3]
Which earst° to you I playnd: for neither may formerly
This fire be quencht by any wit or might,

---

[1] forwandred Exhausted from wandering.

[2] What monstrous … God invade According to the Greek poet Hesiod, Giants (Gigantes) are the offspring of Earth (Gaia) and Sky (Uranus). In a great battle known as the Gigantomachy, the Giants fought the Olympian gods for control over the cosmos. In Spenser's time these giants were often confused with the rebellious Titans, first generation of the gods who later rebelled against Zeus.

[3] dolorous despight Painful, severe trouble.

Ne yet by any meanes removed away,
So mighty be th'enchauntments, which the same do stay.

24

What is there else, but cease these fruitlesse paines,
And leave me to my former languishing?
Faire Amoret must dwell in wicked chaines,
And Scudamore here dye with sorrowing.
Perdy° not so; said she, for shamefull thing by God
It were t'abandon noble chevisaunce,° chivalrous task
For shew of perill, without venturing:
Rather let try extremities of chaunce,
Then enterprisèd prayse for dread to disavaunce.

25

Therewith resolved to prove her utmost might,
Her ample shield she threw before her face,
And her swords point directing forward right,
Assayld the flame, the which eftsoones° gave place, presently
And did it selfe divide with equall space,
That through she passèd; as a thunder bolt
Perceth the yielding ayre, and doth displace
The soring clouds into sad showres ymolt,° molten
So to her yold the flames, and did their force revolt,

26

Whom whenas Scudamore saw past the fire,
Safe and untoucht, he likewise gan assay,
With greedy will, and envious desire,
And bad the stubborne flames to yield him way:
But cruell Mulciber[1] would not obay
His threatfull pride, but did the more augment
His mighty rage, and with imperious sway
Him forst (maulgre)° his fiercenesse to relent, despite
And backe retire, all scorcht and pitifully brent.

27

With huge impatience he inly swelt,° burned
More for great sorrow, that he could not pas,
Then for the burning torment, which he felt,
That with fell woodnesse° he effiercèd was, madness
And wilfully him throwing on the gras,
Did beat and bounse his head and brest full sore;
The whiles the Championesse now entred has
The utmost rowme, and past the formest° dore, foremost (first)
The utmost rowme, abounding with all precious store.

28

For round about, the wals yclothèd were
With goodly arras° of great majesty, tapestry
Woven with gold and silke so close and nere,
That the rich metall lurkèd privily,
As faining to be hid from envious eye;
Yet here, and there, and every where unwares
It shewd it selfe, and shone unwillingly;
Like a discolourd Snake, whose hidden snares
Through the greene gras his long bright burnisht backe declares.

29

And in those Tapets[2] weren fashionèd
Many faire pourtraicts, and many a faire feate,
And all of love, and all of lusty-hed,° lustful desire
As seemèd by their semblaunt did entreat;
And eke° all Cupids warres they did repeate, also
And cruell battels, which he whilome° fought formerly
Gainst all the Gods, to make his empire great;
Besides the huge massacres, which he wrought
On mighty kings and kesars,° into thraldome brought. caesars

30

Therein was writ, how often thundring Jove[3]
Had felt the point of his hart-percing dart,
And leaving heavens kingdome, here did rove
In straunge disguize, to slake° his scalding smart;° allay burning desire
Now like a Ram, faire Helle to pervart,[4]

---

[1] Mulciber Roman god of fire; also known as Vulcan.

[2] And in those Tapets Stanzas 29 to 46 describe the tapestries ("Tapets"), which depict tales of Roman gods in various romantic entanglements and pursuits. Many of the tales alluded to are drawn from Ovid's Metamorphoses; of these, many appear in a tapestry that the mortal woman Arachne makes as her entry in a weaving contest with Athena (Metamorphoses 6.1–145).

[3] Jove King of the gods in the Roman pantheon; also known as Jupiter or, in Greece, Zeus.

[4] Helle Princess who was about to be killed as a sacrifice when she was rescued by a flying ram. The ram, Chrysomallus, is here conflated with Jove, who in several other stories appears to women in animal form; pervart I.e., carry away.

Now like a Bull, Europa to withdraw:[1]
Ah, how the fearefull Ladies tender hart
Did lively seeme to tremble, when she saw
The huge seas under her t'obay her servaunts law.

31

Soone after that into a golden showre
Him selfe he chaunged faire Danaë[2] to vew,
And through the roofe of her strong brasen towre
Did raine into her lap an hony dew,
The whiles her foolish garde, that little knew
Of such deceipt, kept th'yron dore fast bard,
And watcht, that none should enter nor issew;
Vaine was the watch, and bootlesse all the ward,
Whenas the God to golden hew° him selfe transfard. shape

32

Then was he turnd into a snowy Swan,
To win faire Leda[3] to his lovely trade:° active
O wondrous skill, and sweet wit of the man,
That her in daffadillies sleeping made,
From scorching heat her daintie limbes to shade:
Whiles the proud Bird ruffing his fethers wyde,
And brushing his faire brest, did her invade:
She slept, yet twixt her eyelids closely spyde,
How towards her he rusht, and smilèd at his pryde.

33

Then shewd it, how the Thebane Semelee[4]
Deceived of gealous Juno, did require
To see him in his soveraigne majestee,
Armd with his thunderbolts and lightning fire,
Whence dearely she with death bought her desire.
But faire Alcmena[5] better match did make,
Joying his love in likenesse more entire,
Three nights in one, they say, that for her sake
He then did put, her pleasures lenger° to partake. longer

34

Twise was he seene in soaring Eagles shape,
And with wide wings to beat the buxome° ayre, submissive
Once, when he with Asterie[6] did scape,
Againe, when as the Trojane boy[7] so faire
He snatcht from Ida hill, and with him bare:
Wondrous delight it was, there to behould,
How the rude Shepheards after him did stare,
Trembling through feare, least down he fallen should,
And often to him calling, to take surer hould.

35

In Satyres shape Antiopa[8] he snatcht:
And like a fire, when he Aegin[9] assayd:
A shepheard, when Mnemosyne[10] he catcht:
And like a Serpent to the Thracian mayd.[11]
Whiles thus on earth great Jove these pageaunts playd,
The wingèd boy[12] did thrust into his throne,
And scoffing, thus unto his mother sayd,
Lo now the heavens obey to me alone,
And take me for their Jove, whiles Jove to earth is gone.

---

[1] Now … withdraw In order to seduce the princess Europa, Jove concealed himself in her herd as a white bull and swam away with her across the sea.

[2] Danaë Princess who was imprisoned by her father because it had been foretold that her offspring would kill him. Jove transformed into a shower of gold to enter the room and impregnate her (with Perseus).

[3] Leda Queen of Sparta who was visited by Zeus in the form of a swan. In some versions of the story, he seduced her, and in other versions he raped her. She then bore eggs, from which children hatched, including the twins Castor and Pollux.

[4] Semelee Semele was the Princess of Thebes who conceived the god Bacchus through an affair with Jove. Juno, Jove's wife, disguised herself as Semele's old nurse and convinced Semele to demand that Jove show her his full glory. As a mortal, she was killed by the sight. The unborn Bacchus was put into Jove's thigh to be brought to term.

[5] Alcmena Jove appeared to Alcmena in the form of her husband. When she gave birth to Jove's son Hercules, she abandoned him for fear of Juno's wrath.

[6] Asterie Titan goddess who was pursued by Jove but escaped by turning herself into a quail and diving into the sea.

[7] Trojane boy Ganymede, a Trojan prince who was snatched from Mount Ida by Jove, in the shape of an eagle, and made to be the gods' cup-bearer. The name "Ganymede" was often applied to a boy loved by one or more males.

[8] Antiopa Princess of Thebes who bore Jove two sons.

[9] Aegin Aegina, a nymph abducted by Jove and taken to an island, which he named after her.

[10] Mnemosyne Titan goddess of memory. With Jove, she conceived the Muses.

[11] Thracian mayd Proserpina, daughter of Ceres and goddess of spring who spends six months a year as queen of the underworld. Usually, Jove was considered her father; Spenser refers to a story in which she was seduced by Jove, who appeared to her in the form of a giant serpent.

[12] wingèd boy Cupid, son of Venus.

36

And thou, faire Phoebus, in thy colours bright
Wast there enwoven, and the sad distresse,
In which that boy thee plongèd, for despight,° scorn
That thou bewray'dst° his mothers[1] wantonnesse, revealed
When she with Mars was meynt° in joyfulnesse: mixed
For thy° he thrild thee with a leaden dart, therefore
To love faire Daphne,[2] which thee lovèd lesse:
Lesse she thee loved, then was thy just desart,
Yet was thy love her death, and her death was thy smart.

37

So lovedst thou the lusty° Hyacinct,[3] lovely
So lovedst thou the faire Coronis[4] deare.
Yet both are of thy haplesse hand extinct,
Yet both in flowres do live, and love thee beare,
The one a Paunce,° the other a sweet breare:° pansy sweet briar
For griefe whereof, ye mote° have lively seene might
The God himselfe rending his golden heare,
And breaking quite his gyrlond ever greene,
With other signes of sorrow and impatient teene.

38

Both for those two, and for his owne deare sonne,[5]
The sonne of Climene he did repent,
Who bold to guide the charet of the Sunne,
Himselfe in thousand peeces fondly° rent, foolishly
And all the world with flashing fier brent;
So like, that all the walles did seeme to flame.
Yet cruell Cupid, not herewith content,
Forst him eftsoones to follow other game,
And love a Shepheards daughter for his dearest Dame.

39

He lovèd Isse[6] for his dearest Dame,
And for her sake her cattell fed a while,
And for her sake a cowheard vile became,
The servant of Admetus[7] cowheard vile,° lowly
Whiles that from heaven he sufferèd exile.
Long were to tell each other lovely fit,[8]
Now like a Lyon, hunting after spoile,
Now like a Stag, now like a faulcon flit:
All which in that faire arras was most lively writ.

40

Next unto him was Neptune[9] picturèd,
In his divine resemblance wondrous lyke:
His face was rugged, and his hoarie hed
Droppèd with brackish deaw; his three-forkt Pyke° trident
He stearnly shooke, and therewith fierce did stryke
The raging billowes, that on every syde
They trembling stood, and made a long broad dyke,
That his swift charet might have passage wyde,
Which foure great Hippodames° did draw in temewise tyde.[10] seahorses

41

His sea-horses did seeme to sport amayne,° with full force
And from their nosethrilles blow the brynie streame,
That made the sparckling waves to smoke agayne,
And flame with gold, but the white fomy creame,
Did shine with silver, and shoot forth his beame.
The God himselfe did pensive seeme and sad,
And hong adowne his head, as he did dreame:

---

[1] his mother Venus's adultery with Mars was witnessed by Phoebus (Apollo). Phoebus informed Vulcan, Venus's husband, of the affair.

[2] Daphne Unwilling object of Phoebus's affection. When Phoebus pursued her, she called upon her father Peneus to help her; Peneus, a river god, transformed her into a laurel tree to keep her safe. This tree became sacred to Phoebus who decided to make the laurel his signature plant.

[3] Hyacinct Hyacinthus, Prince of Sparta, loved by both Phoebus and Zephyr (the west wind). When Phoebus threw a discus during a game, Zephyr redirected it to hit the head of Hyacinthus, killing him. His blood produced the hyacinth flower.

[4] Coronis Princess who was seduced by Phoebus, then chose her mortal lover over the god. Phoebus had her killed.

[5] his owne deare sonne Phaethon, son of Phoebus and the sea nymph Climene. Phaethon received permission from his father to drive the chariot of the sun, but was unable to control the chariot's horses. Jove struck him down to stop him from setting fire to the earth.

[6] Isse Beloved of Apollo who disguised himself as a shepherd to seduce her.

[7] servant of Admetus When sentenced to serve a mortal for a year as punishment, Phoebus chose to work as a herder for Admetus, a notably gracious host. Spenser has combined this story with that of Phoebus and Isse, but the two are normally unrelated.

[8] lovely fit Story of love.

[9] Neptune God of the seas, and the brother of Jupiter. Neptune is traditionally pictured with a beard and trident, as Spenser describes.

[10] in temewise tyde Harnessed in pairs.

For priuy° love his brest empiercèd had, private, secret
Ne ought but deare Bisaltis[1] ay° could make him glad. ever

42
He lovèd eke Iphimedia[2] deare,
And Aeolus faire daughter Arne[3] hight,° named
For whom he turnd him selfe into a Steare,
And fed on fodder, to beguile° her sight. delude
Also to win Deucalions daughter bright,
He turned him selfe into a Dolphin fayre;[4]
And like a wingèd horse he tooke his flight,
To snaky-locke Medusa[5] to repayre,
On whom he got faire Pegasus, that flitteth in the ayre.

43
Next Saturne[6] was, (but who would ever weene,° think
That sullein Saturne ever weend to love?
Yet love is sullein, and Saturnlike seene,
As he did for Erigone it prove,)
That to a Centaure did him selfe transmove.
So prooved it eke that gracious God of wine,
When for to compasse Philliras hard love,
He turnd himselfe into a fruitfull vine,
And into her faire bosome made his grapes decline.[7]

44
Long were to tell the amorous assayes,
And gentle pangues, with which he° makèd meeke i.e., Cupid
The mighty Mars, to learne his wanton playes:
How oft for Venus, and how often eek
For many other Nymphes he sore did shreek,
With womanish teares, and with unwarlike smarts,
Privily moystening his horrid cheek.
There was he painted full of burning darts,
And many wide woundes launchèd through his inner parts.

45
Ne did he spare (so cruell was the Elfe)
His owne deare mother, (ah why should he so?)
Ne did he spare sometime to pricke° himselfe, wound
That he might taste the sweet consuming woe,
Which he had wrought to many others moe.
But to declare the mournfull Tragedyes,
And spoiles, wherewith he all the ground did strow,
More eath° to number, with how many eyes easy
High heaven beholds sad lovers nightly theeveryes.[8]

36
Kings Queenes, Lords Ladies, Knights and Damzels gent° well born
Were heaped together with the vulgar sort,
And mingled with the raskall rablement,
Without respect of person or of port,° social standing
To shew Dan° Cupids powre and great effort: Sir
And round about a border was entrayld,
Of broken bowes and arrowes shivered short,
And a long bloudy river through them rayld,° flowed
So lively and so like, that living sence it fayld.° misled, fooled

47
And at the upper end of that faire rowme,
There was an Altar built of pretious stone,
Of passing valew, and of great renowme,
On which there stood an Image all alone,
Of massy° gold, which with his owne light shone; massive
And wings it had with sundry colours dight,° bedecked
More sundry colours, then the proud Pavone° peacock
Beares in his boasted fan, or Iris[9] bright,

---

[1] Bisaltis I.e., Theophane, the daughter of Bisaltis; Theophane was so beautiful that she was pursued by many suitors, so Neptune transformed both her and himself into sheep.

[2] Iphimedia Mother of the giants Otus and Ephialtes.

[3] Arne Neptune fathered two sons with Arne while in the form of a bull. Arne's father, Aeolus, discovered this and blinded her, taking her sons away.

[4] Also to … fayre Melantho, seduced by Neptune in the form of a dolphin.

[5] Medusa Beautiful woman who was seduced by Neptune in Minerva's temple; as a punishment, Minerva transformed her into a snake-haired monster. In some versions of the story, Neptune and Minerva conceived Pegasus, a winged horse.

[6] Saturne King of the Titans who fathered several gods, including Jove, Juno, and Neptune. Saturn (especially the planet with his name) was associated with melancholy, or black bile.

[7] As he did … decline Spenser's verse transposes the names from two stories in Ovid's Metamorphoses. In Ovid's telling, Saturn conceived a centaur with Philyra while in the form of a horse; Liber, the "God of wine," disguised himself as a bunch of grapes in order to trick Erigone, the object of his affections.

[8] theeveryes Thieveries, i.e., of hearts.

[9] Iris Goddess of the rainbow.

When her discolourd° bow she spreds through heaven bright. multi-colored

48
Blindfold he was, and in his cruèll fist
A mortall bow and arrowes keene did hold,
With which he shot at randon, when him list,
Some headed with sad lead, some with pure gold;
(Ah man beware, how thou those darts behold)
A wounded Dragon under him did ly,
Whose hideous tayle his left foot did enfold,
And with a shaft was shot through either eye,
That no man forth might draw, ne no man remedye.

49
And underneath his feet was written thus,
Unto the Victor of the Gods this bee:
And all the people in that ample hous
Did to that image bow their humble knee,
And oft committed fowle Idolatree.
That wondrous sight faire Britomart amazed,
Ne seeing could her wonder satisfie,
But evermore and more upon it gazed,
The whiles the passing brightnes her fraile sences dazed.

50
Tho as she backward° cast her busie eye, behind
To search each secret of that goodly sted,
Over the dore thus written she did spye
Be bold: she oft it over-red,
Yet could not find what sence it figurèd:
But what so were therein or writ or ment,
She was no whit thereby discouragèd
From prosecuting° of her first intent, following, fulfilling
But forward with bold steps into the next roome went.

51
Much fairer, then the former, was that roome,
And richlier by many partes arayd:
For not with arras made in painefull° loome, work-required
But with pure gold it all was overlayd,
Wrought with wilde Antickes,° which their follies playd, grotesque fancies
In the rich metall, as they living were:
A thousand monstrous formes therein were made,
Such as false love doth oft upon him weare:
For love in thousand monstrous formes doth oft appeare.

52
And all about, the glistring walles were hong
With warlike spoiles, and with victorious prayes,° boats
Of mighty Conquerours and Captaines strong,
Which were whilome captivèd in their dayes
To cruell love, and wrought their owne decayes:° undoings
Their swerds and speres were broke, and hauberques rent;
And their proud girlonds of tryumphant bayes[1]
Troden in dust with fury insolent,
To shew the victors might and mercilesse intent.

53
The warlike Mayde beholding earnestly
The goodly ordinance° of this rich place, military equipment
Did greatly wonder, ne could satisfie
Her greedy eyes with gazing a long space:
But more she mervaild that no footings trace,
Nor wight° appeared, but wastefull emptinesse, living being
And solemne silence ouer all that place:
Straunge thing it seemed, that none was to possesse
So rich purveyance,° ne them keepe with carefulnesse. furnishing

54
And as she lookt about, she did behold,
How over that same dore was likewise writ,
Be bold, be bold, and every where Be bold,
That much she muzed, yet could not construe it
By any ridling skill, or commune wit.
At last she spyde at that roomes upper end,
Another yron dore, on which was writ,
Be not too bold; whereto though she did bend
Her earnest mind, yet wist not what it might intend.° signify

55
Thus she there waited untill eventyde,
Yet living creature none she saw appeare:
And now sad shadowes gan the world to hyde,
From mortall vew, and wrap in darkenesse dreare;
Yet nould° she d'off° her weary armes, for feare would not / doff

---

[1] girlonds … bayes In ancient Rome, wreathes of bay laurel leaves were awarded for military victories.

Of secret daunger, ne let sleepe oppresse
Her heavy eyes with natures burdein deare,
But drew her selfe aside in sickernesse,° safety
And her welpointed weapons did about her dresse.

CANTO 12

The maske[1] of Cupid, and th'enchaunted
Chamber are displayd,
Whence Britomart redeemes faire
Amoret, through charmes decayd.

1

Tho when as chearelesse Night ycovered had Faire heaven with an universall cloud,
That every wight dismayd with darknesse sad,
In silence and in sleepe themselves did shroud,
She heard a shrilling Trompet sound aloud,
Signe of nigh battell, or got victory;
Nought therewith daunted was her courage proud,
But rather stird to cruell° enmity, forceful
Expecting ever, when some foe she might descry.° discover

2

With that, an hideous storme of winde arose,
With dreadfull thunder and lightning atwixt,
And an earth-quake, as if it streight would lose° loosen
The worlds foundations from his centre fixt;
A direfull stench of smoke and sulphure mixt Ensewd, whose noyance° fild the fearefull noxious
sted,° place
From the fourth houre of night untill the sixt;
Yet the bold Britonesse was nought ydred,° frightened
Though much emmoved, but stedfast still perseverèd.

3

All suddenly a stormy whirlwind blew
Throughout the house, that clappèd every dore,
With which that yron wicket° open flew, gate
As it with mightie levers had bene tore:
And forth issewd, as on the ready flore
Of some Theatre, a grave personage,
That in his hand a branch of laurell bore,
With comely haveour° and count'nance sage, bearing
Yclad in costly garments, fit for tragicke Stage.

4

Proceeding to the midst, he still did stand,
As if in mind he somewhat had to say,
And to the vulgar[2] beckning with his hand,
In signe of silence, as to heare a play,
By lively actions he gan bewray° reveal
Some argument of matter passionèd;
Which doen, he backe retyrèd soft away,
And passing by, his name discoverèd,
Ease, on his robe in golden letters cypherèd.° written, inscribed

5

The noble Mayd, still standing all this vewd,
And merveild at his strange intendiment;° purpose
With that a joyous fellowship issewd
Of Minstrals, making goodly meriment,
With wanton Bardes, and Rymers impudent,
All which together sung full chearefully
A lay of loves delight, with sweet consent:° harmony
After whom marcht a jolly company,
In manner of a maske, enrangèd orderly.

6

The whiles a most delitious harmony,
In full straunge notes was sweetly heard to sound,
That the rare sweetnesse of the melody
The feeble senses wholly did confound,
And the fraile soule in deepe delight nigh dround:
And when it ceast, shrill trompets loud did bray,
That their report did farre away rebound,
And when they ceast, it gan againe to play,
The whiles the maskers marchèd forth in trim aray.

7

The first was Fancy, like a lovely boy,
Of rare aspect, and beautie without peare;

---

[1] maske Pageant-like court entertainment in which elaborately costumed performers—either paid actors or courtiers—played often allegorical figures. Most masques incorporated speech, singing, and dancing; some, like the "maske of Cupid" described in this canto, incorporated a parade of silent figures.

[2] to the vulgar I.e., to the area where common members of the audience would stand.

Matchable ether to that ympe of Troy,[1]
Whom Jove did love, and chose his cup to beare,
Or that same daintie lad,[2] which was so deare
To great Alcides,° that when as he dyde, Heracles
He wailèd womanlike with many a teare,
And every wood, and every valley wyde
He fild with Hylas name; the Nymphes eke° Hylas cryde. also

8

His garment neither was of silke nor say,° fine cloth
But painted plumes, in goodly order dight,° arrayed
Like as the sunburnt Indians do aray
Their tawney bodies, in their proudest plight:° condition
As those same plumes, so seemd he vaine and light,
That by his gate might easily appeare;
For still he far'd as dauncing in delight,
And in his hand a windy fan did beare,
That in the idle aire he mòved still here and there.

9

And him beside marcht amorous Desyre,
Who seemd of riper yeares, then th'other Swaine,
Yet was that other swayne this elders syre,
And gave him being, commune to them twaine:
His garment was disguisèd° very vaine, made fashionable
And his embrodered Bonet sat awry;
Twixt both his hands few sparkes he close did straine,° hold tight
Which still he blew, and kindled busily,
That soone they life conceived, and forth in flames did fly.

10

Next after him went Doubt, who was yclad
In a discoloured° cote, of straunge disguyse,° many colored fashion
That at his backe a brode Capuccio° had, hood
And sleeves dependant Albanese-wyse:[3]
He lookt askew with his mistrustfull eyes,
And nicely[4] trode, as° thornes lay in his way, as though
Or that the flore to shrinke he did avyse,° observe
And on a broken reed he still did stay
His feeble steps, which shrunke,° when hard theron he lay.° bent pushed

11

With him went Daunger, clothed in ragged weed,° garment
Made of Beares skin, that him more dreadfull made,
Yet his owne face was dreadfull, ne did need Straunge° horrour, to deforme his griesly shade;° alien appearance
A net in th'one hand, and a rustie blade
In th'other was, this Mischiefe, that Mishap;
With th'one his foes he threatned to invade,
With th'other he his friends ment to enwrap:° entangle
For whom he could not kill, he practizd° to entrap. conspired, plotted

12

Next him was Feare, all armed from top to toe,
Yet thought himselfe not safe enough thereby,
But feard each shadow moving to and fro,
And his owne armes when glittering he did spy,
Or clashing heard, he fast away did fly,
As ashes pale of hew, and wingyheeld;
And evermore on Daunger fixt his eye,
Gainst whom he alwaies bent a brasen shield,
Which his right hand unarmèd fearefully did wield.

13

With him went Hope in rancke,° a handsome Mayd, beside him
Of chearefull looke and lovely to behold;
In silken samite° she was light arayd, rich fabric
And her faire lockes were woven up in gold;
She alway smyld, and in her hand did hold
An holy water Sprinckle,[5] dipt in deowe,° dew
With which she sprinckled favours manifold,
On whom she list, and did great liking sheowe,
Great liking unto many, but true love to feowe.

---

[1] ympe of Troy Ganymede, a beautiful Trojan prince stolen by Jove, many said for sexual reasons, and made to be the gods' cup-bearer; ympe Scion.

[2] that same daintie lad Hylas, Heracles's lover and a prince of remarkable beauty; he was abducted by nymphs and never seen again.

[3] dependant Albanese-wyse Hanging in the Scottish ("Albanese") style.

[4] nicely Delicately or reluctantly.

[5] Sprinckle I.e., aspergilium, a liturgical implement used to sprinkle holy water.

14

And after them Dissemblance, and Suspect° Suspicion
Marcht in one rancke, yet an unequall paire:
For she was gentle, and of milde aspect,
Courteous to all, and seeming debonaire,
Goodly adornèd, and exceeding faire:
Yet was that all but painted, and purloynd,° stolen
And her bright browes were deckt with borrowed haire:
Her deedes were forgèd, and her words false coynd,° forged
And alwaies in her hand two clewes° of silke she twynd. balls (of thread)

15

But he was foule, ill favourèd, and grim,
Under his eyebrowes looking still askaunce;° sideways
And ever as Dissemblance laught on him,
He lowrd° on her with daungerous eyeglaunce; frowned
Shewing his nature in his countenance;
His rolling eyes did never rest in place,
But walkt each where, for feare of hid mischaunce,
Holding a lattice still before his face,
Through which he still did peepe, as forward he did pace.

16

Next him went Griefe, and Fury matcht yfere;
Griefe all in sable sorrowfully clad,
Downe hanging his dull head, with heavy chere,° expression
Yet inly being more, then seeming sad:
A paire of Pincers in his hand he had,
With which he pinchèd people to the hart,
That from thenceforth a wretched life they lad,
In wilfull languor and consuming smart,
Dying each day with inward wounds of dolours dart.

17

But Fury was full ill appareilèd
In rags, that naked nigh she did appeare,
With ghastly lookes and dreadfull drerihed;° dreariness
For from her backe her garments she did teare,
And from her head oft rent her snarlèd heare:
In her right hand a firebrand she did tosse
About her head, still roming here and there;
As a dismayèd Deare in chace embost,[1]
Forgetfull of his safety, hath his right way lost.

18

After them went Displeasure and Pleasance,° Pleasure
He looking lompish and full sullein sad,
And hanging downe his heavy countenance;
She chearefull fresh and full of joyance glad,
As if no sorrow she ne felt ne drad;
That evill matchèd paire they seemed to bee:
An angry Waspe th'one in a viall had,
Th'other in hers an hony-lady Bee;
Thus marchèd these sixe couples forth in faire degree.

19

After all these there marcht a most faire Dame,
Led of° two grysie villeins,[2] th'one Despight,° by Contempt, Malice
The other clepèd° Cruelty by name: called
She dolefull Lady, like a dreary Spright,° spirit
Cald by strong charmes out of eternall night,
Had deathes owne image figurd in her face,
Full of sad signes, fearefull to living sight;
Yet in that horror shewd a seemely grace,
And with her feeble feet did move a comely pace.

20

Her brest all naked, as net° ivory, clean, pure
Without adorne of gold or silver bright,
Wherewith the Craftesman wonts it beautify,
Of her dew° honour was despoylèd quight, due, fitting
And a wide wound therein (O ruefull sight)
Entrenchèd deepe with knife accursèd keene,
Yet freshly bleeding forth her fainting spright,
(The worke of cruell hand) was to be seene,
That dyde in sanguine° red her skin all snowy cleene. bloody

21

At that wide orifice her trembling hart
Was drawne forth, and in silver basin layd,
Quite through transfixèd with a deadly dart,
And in her bloud yet steeming fresh embayd:° bathed
And those two villeins, which her steps upstayd,
When her weake feete could scarcely her sustaine,
And fading vitall powers gan to fade,
Her forward still with torture did constraine,
And evermore encreasèd her consuming paine.

---

[1] embost Driven to exhaustion, especially by running away from something.

[2] grysie villeins Grisly, low-class people.

22

Next after her the wingèd God[1] himselfe
Came riding on a Lion ravenous,
Taught to obay the menage° of that Elfe, handling
That man and beast with powre imperious
Subdeweth to his kingdome tyrannous:
His blindfold eyes he bad a while unbind,
That his proud spoyle of that same dolorous
Faire Dame he might behold in perfect kind;° nature, manner
Which seene, he much rejoycèd in his cruell mind.

23

Of which full proud, himselfe up rearing hye,
He lookèd round about with sterne disdaine;
And did survay his goodly company:
And marshalling the evill ordered traine,
With that the darts which his right hand did straine,
Full dreadfully he shooke that all did quake,
And clapt° on hie his coulourd wingès twaine, beat, flapped
That all his many it affraide did make:
Tho blinding him againe, his way he forth did take.

24

Behinde him was Reproch, Repentance, Shame;
Reproch the first, Shame next, Repent behind:
Repentance feeble, sorrowfull, and lame:
Reproch despightfull, carelesse, and unkind;
Shame most ill favourd, bestiall, and blind:
Shame lowrd, Repentance sighed, Reproch did scould;
Reproch sharpe stings, Repentance whips entwind,
Shame burning brond-yrons in her hand did hold:
All three to each unlike, yet all made in one mould.

25

And after them a rude confusèd rout° throng
Of persons flockt, whose names is hard to read:° discern
Emongst them was sterne Strife, and Anger stout,° bold, strong
Unquiet Care, and fond Unthriftihead,° foolish unthriftiness
Lewd° Losse of Time, and Sorrow seeming dead, ignorant, wicked
Inconstant Chaunge, and false Disloyaltie,
Consuming Riotise, and guilty Dread
Of heavenly vengeance, faint Infirmitie,
Vile Povertie, and lastly Death with infamie.

26

There were full many moe like maladies,
Whose names and natures I note° readen well; know not
So many moe, as there be phantasies
In wavering wemens wit, that none can tell,
Or paines in love, or punishments in hell;
All which disguizèd marcht in masking wise,[2]
About the chamber with that Damozell,
And then returnèd, having marchèd thrise,
Into the inner roome, from whence they first did rise.

27

So soone as they were in, the dore streight way
Fast lockèd, driven with that stormy blast,
Which first it opened; and bore all away.
Then the brave Maid, which all this while was plast,
In secret shade, and saw both first and last,
Issewèd forth, and went unto the dore,
To enter in, but found it lockèd fast:
It vaine she thought with rigorous uprore° force, violence
For to efforce, when charmes had closèd it afore.

28

Where force might not availe, their sleights and art
She cast° to use, both fit for hard emprize;° hoped / enterprise
For thy,° from that same roome not to depart therefore Till morrow next, she did her selfe avize,° counsel, advise
When, that same Maske againe should forth arize.
The morrow next appeard with joyous cheare,
Calling men to their daily exercize,
Then she, as morrow fresh, her selfe did reare
Out of her secret stand, that day for to out weare.

29

All that day she outwore in wandering,
And gazing on that Chambers ornament,
Till that againe the second evening
Her covered with her sable vestiment,
Wherewith the worlds faire beautie she hath blent:° hidden
Then when the second watch was almost past,[3]
That brasen dore flew open, and in went

---

[1] the wingèd God Cupid.

[2] in masking wise In the manner of a masque.

[3] the second ... past I.e., it was almost midnight.

Bold Britomart, as she had late forecast,
Neither of idle shewes, nor of false charmes aghast.

30

So soone as she was entred, round about
She cast her eies, to see what was become
Of all those persons, which she saw without:
But lo, they streight were vanisht all and some,
Ne living wight she saw in all that roome,
Save that same woefull Ladie, both whose hands
Were bounden fast, that did her ill become,
And her small wast girt round with yron bands,
Unto a brasen pillour, by the which she stands.

31

And her before the vile Enchaunter sate,
Figuring straunge characters of his art,
With living bloud he those characters wrate,
Dreadfully dropping from her dying hart,
Seeming transfixèd with a cruell dart,
And all perforce to make her him to love.
Ah who can love the worker of her smart?
A thousand charmes he formerly did prove;° try
Yet thousand charmes could not her stedfast heart remove.

32

Soone as that virgin knight he saw in place,
His wicked bookes in hast he overthrew,
Not caring his long labours to deface,[1]
And fiercely ronning to that Lady trew,
A murdrous knife out of his pocket drew,
The which he thought, for villeinous despight,
In her tormented bodie to embrew:° penetrate
But the stout Damzell to him leaping light,° quickly
His cursèd hand withheld, and maisterèd his might.

33

From her, to whom his fury first he ment,
The wicked weapon rashly° he did wrest, quickly
And turning to her selfe his fell intent,
Unwares it strooke into her snowie chest,
That little drops empurpled her faire brest.
Exceeding wroth therewith the virgin grew,
Albe° the wound were nothing deepe imprest, albeit
And fiercely forth her mortall blade she drew,
To give him the reward for such vile outrage dew.

34

So mightily she smote him, that to ground
He fell halfe dead; next stroke him should have slaine,
Had not the Lady, which by him stood bound,
Dernely° unto her callèd to abstaine, bleakly
From doing him to dy. For else her paine
Should be remedilesse, sith° none but hee, since
Which wrought it, could the same recure° againe. remedy
Therewith she stayd her hand, loth stayd to bee;
For life she him envyde,° and longed revenge to see. begrudged

35

And to him said, Thou wicked man, whose meed° reward
For so huge mischiefe, and vile villany
Is death, or if that ought° do death exceed, anything
Be sure, that nought may save thee from to dy,
But if that thou this Dame doe presently
Restore unto her health, and former state;
This doe and live, else die undoubtedly.
He glad of life, that lookt for death but late,
Did yield himselfe right willing to prolong his date.° life span

36

And rising up, gan streight to overlooke,
Those cursèd leaves, his charmes backe to reverse;
Full dreadfull things out of that balefull booke
He red, and measured many a sad verse,
That horror gan the virgins hart to perse,° pierce
And her faire locks up starèd stiffe on end,
Hearing him those same bloudy lines reherse;° repeat
And all the while he red, she did extend
Her sword high over him, if ought he did offend.

37

Anon° she gan perceive the house to quake, soon
And all the dores to rattle round about;
Yet all that did not her dismaièd make,
Nor slacke° her threatfull hand for daungers dout,° relax fear
But still with stedfast eye and courage stout
Abode, to weet° what end would come of all. know
At last that mightie chaine, which round about

---

[1] Not caring … deface Not caring whether or not he ruined the results of his long labors.

Her tender waste was wound, adowne gan fall,
And that great brasen pillour broke in peeces small.

38

The cruell steele, which thrild° her dying hart, penetrated
Fell softly forth, as of his owne accord,
And the wyde wound, which lately did dispart
Her bleeding brest, and riven bowels gored,
Was closèd up, as it had not bene bored,° damaged
And every part to safety full sound,
As she were never hurt, was soone restored:
Tho when she felt her selfe to be unbound,
And perfect hole,° prostrate she fell unto the ground. whole (a pun)

39

Before faire Britomart, she fell prostrate,
Saying, Ah noble knight, what worthy meed° reward
Can wretched Lady, quit from wofull state,
Yield you in liew° of this your gratious deed? thanks, reward
Your vertue selfe her owne reward shall breed,
Even immortall praise, and glory wyde,
Which I your vassall,° by your prowesse freed, servant
Shall through the world make to be notifyde,
And goodly well advance,° that goodly well was tryde. praise

40

But Britomart uprearing her from ground,
Said, Gentle Dame, reward enough I weene
For many labours more, then I have found,
This, that in safety now I have you seene,
And meane of your deliverance have beene:
Henceforth faire Lady comfort to you take,
And put away remembrance of late teene;° suffering
In stead thereof know, that your loving Make,° mate (Scudamore)
Hath no lesse griefe endurèd for your gentle sake.

41

She much was cheard to heare him mentiònd,
Whom of all living wights she lovèd best.
Then laid the noble Championesse strong hond
Upon th'enchaunter, which had her distrest
So sore, and with foule outrages opprest:
With that great chaine, wherewith not long ygo
He bound that pitteous Lady prisoner, now relest,° released
Himselfe she bound, more worthy to be so,
And captive with her led to wretchednesse and wo.

42

Returning backe, those goodly roomes, which erst° earlier
She saw so rich and royally arayd,
Now vanish utterly, and cleane subverst
She found, and all their glory quite decayd,
That sight of such a chaunge her much dismayd.
Thence forth descending to that perlous° Porch, perilous
Those dreadfull flames she also found delayd,° quenched
And quenchèd quite, like a consumèd torch,
That erst all entrers wont so cruelly to scorch.

43

More easie issew now, then entrance late
She found: for now that fainèd° dreadfull flame, feigned, illusory
Which chokt the porch of that enchaunted gate,
And passage bard to all, that thither came,
Was vanisht quite, as it were not the same,
And gave her leave at pleasure forth to passe.
Th'Enchaunter selfe, which all that fraud did frame,
To have efforst the love of that faire lasse,
Seeing his worke now wasted deepe engrievèd was.

44

But when the victoresse arrivèd there,
Where late she left the pensife Scudamore,
With her owne trusty Squire, both full of feare,
Neither of them she found where she them lore.° left
Thereat her noble hart was stonisht sore;
But most faire Amoret, whose gentle spright
Now gan to feede on hope, which she before
Conceivèd had, to see her owne dear knight,
Being thereof beguyld was fild with new affright.

45

But he sad man, when he had long in drede
Awayted there for Britomarts returne,
Yet saw her not nor signe of her good speed,
His expectation to despaire did turne,
Misdeeming° sure that her those flames did burne; mistakenly thinking
And therefore gan advize with her old Squire,
Who her deare nourslings losse no lesse did mourne,

Thence to depart for further aide t'enquire:
Where let them wend at will, whilest here I doe respire.

[Stanzas 43 to 45 above did not appear in the 1590 edition of the first three books of The Faerie Queene; instead, the canto concluded with the following five stanzas.]

At last she came unto the place, where late
She left Sir Scudamore in great distresse,
Twixt dolour and despight halfe desperate,
Of his loves succour, of his owne redresse,
And of the hardie Britomarts successe:
There on the cold earth him now thrown she found,
In wilfull anguish, and dead heavinesse,
And to him cald; whose voices knowen sound
Soone as he heard, himself he rearèd light from ground.

There did he see, that most on earth him joyd,
His dearest love, the comfort of his dayes,
Whose too long absence him had sore annoyd,
And wearièd his life with dull delayes:
Straight he upstarted from the loathèd layes,° flat ground
And to her ran with hasty egernesse,
Like as a Deare, that greedily embayes° plunges, bathes
In the coole soile, after long thirstinesse,
Which he in chace endurèd hath, now nigh breathlesse.

Lightly he clipt° her twixt his armés twaine, hugged
And straightly did embrace her body bright,
Her body, late the prison of sad paine,
Now the sweet lodge of love and deare delight:
But she faire Lady overcommen quight
Of huge affection, did in pleasure melt,
And in sweete ravishment pourd out her spright:
No word they spake, nor earthly thing they felt,
But like two senceles stocks[1] in long embracement dwelt.

Had ye them seene, ye would have surely thought,
That they had beene that faire Hermaphrodite,[2]
Which that rich Romane of white marble wrought,
And in his costly Bath causd to bee site:
So seemd those two, as growne together quite,
That Britomart halfe envying their blesse,
Was much empassiond in her gentle sprite,
And to her selfe oft wisht like happinesse,
In vaine she wisht, that fate n'ould let her yet possesse.

Thus doe those lovers with sweet countervayle,[3]
Each other of loves bitter fruit despoile.
But now my teme begins to faint and fayle,
All woxen° weary of their journall° toyle: become / daily
Therefore I will their sweatie yokes assoyle,° release
At this same furrowes end, till a new day:
And ye faire Swayns,° after your long turmoyle, rural laborers
Now cease your worke, and at your pleasure play;
Now cease your worke; to morrow is an holy day.

from BOOK 5 [1596]

CANTO 2

Artegall heares of Florimell,[4]
Does with the Pagan fight:
Him slaies, drownes Lady Munera,
Does race° her castle quight. raze

1

Nought is more honorable to a knight,
Ne better doth beseeme° brave chevalry, be fitting for
Then to defend the feeble in their right,
And wrong redresse in such as wend° awry. go
Whilome° those great Heroes got thereby formerly
Their greatest glory, for their rightfull deedes,
And place deservèd with the Gods on hy.
Herein the noblesse of this knight exceedes,
Who now to perils great for justice sake proceedes.

---

[1] stocks Literally, stumps; figuratively, things without movement or sensation.

[2] Hermaphrodite Son of Mercury and Aphrodite who spurned the advances of the nymph Salmakis; she prayed that they be joined together. They were united into a single being that was both male and female and sometimes represented true marriage.

[3] countervayle Compensation, counterbalancing.

[4] Artegall The hero of Book 5, Artegall is "The Champion of true Iustice" (5.1.3), raised and educated by Astrea, the goddess of justice (5.1). His name means "equal to Arthur"; Florimell A beautiful woman who, throughout Books 3 and 4, preserves her chastity despite being pursued, often violently, by many who desire her. She is united with the only object of her affections, Marinell, at the conclusion of Book 4.

2

To which as he now was uppon the way,
He chaunst to meet a Dwarfe in hasty course;
Whom he required° his forward hast to stay, asked
Till he of tidings mote with him discourse.
Loth was the Dwarfe, yet did he stay perforse,° by force
And gan of sundry newes his store to tell,
As to his memory they had recourse:
But chiefely of the fairest Florimell,
How she was found againe, and spousde to Marinell.

3

For this was Dony, Florimels owne Dwarfe,
Whom having lost (as ye have heard whyleare)° just before
And finding in the way the scattred scarfe,[1]
The fortune of her life long time did feare.
But of her health when Artegall did heare,
And safe returne, he was full inly glad,
And askt him where, and when her bridale cheare° feast
Should be solemnized:° for if time he had, celebrated
He would be there, and honor to her spousall° ad. wedding

4

Within three daies, quoth hee as I do here,
It will be at the Castle of the strond;° strand, beach
What time if naught me let,° I will be there prevent
To doe her service, so as I am bond.
But in my way a little here beyond
A cursed cruell Sarazin[2] doth wonne,° dwell
That keepes a Bridges passage by strong hond,
And many errant Knights hath there fordonne;° ruined
That makes all men for feare that passage for to shonne.

5

What mister wight,[3] quoth he, and how far hence
Is he, that doth to travellers such harmes?
He is, said he, a man of great defence;
Expert in battell and in deedes of armes;
And more emboldned by the wicked charmes,
With which his daughter doth him still support;
Having great Lordships got and goodly farmes,
Through strong oppression of his powre extort;° extorted
By which he stil them holds, and keepes with strong effort.

6

And dayly he his wrongs encreaseth more,
For never wight° he lets to passe that way, person
Over his Bridge, albee he rich or poore,
But he him makes his passage-penny pay:
Else he doth hold him backe or beat away.
Thereto he hath a groome of evill guize,° behavior
Whose scalp is bare, that bondage doth bewray,[4]
Which pols and pils[5] the poore in piteous wize;° manner
But he him selfe uppon the rich doth tyrannize.

7

His name is hight° Pollente, rightly so called
For that he is so puissant° and strong, powerful
That with his powre he all doth overgo,
And makes them subject to his mighty wrong;
And some by sleight he eke° doth underfong.° also / entrap
For on a Bridge he custometh to fight,
Which is but narrow, but exceeding long;
And in the same are many trap fals[6] pight,° set
Through which the rider downe doth fall through oversight.

8

And underneath the same a river flowes,
That is both swift and dangerous deepe withall;
Into the which whom so he overthrowes,
All destitute of helpe doth headlong fall,
But he him selfe, through practise usuall,
Leapes forth into the floud, and there assaies° attacks, challenges
His foe confused through his sodaine fall,
That horse and man he equally dismaies,
And either both them drownes, or trayterously slaies.

9

Then doth he take the spoile° of them at will, plunder
And to his daughter brings, that dwels thereby:
Who all that comes doth take, and therewith fill

---

[1] the scattred scarfe Probably Florimel's lost girdle (a waistband, not underwear); see 3.7.

[2] Sarazin Saracen, a term used by medieval Christians to refer to Arabs, Turks, and/or Muslim, as well as to pagans.

[3] mister wight Type of person.

[4] Whose scalp … bewray Whose shaved head reveals his enslavement.

[5] pols and pils Extorts and pillages, with a pun referring to the previous line: "poll" also means "head" and "pill" also means "make bald." "Pollente" recalls the Latin for "strong" (pollens).

[6] trap fals False traps, i.e., trapdoors.

The coffers of her wicked threasury;
Which she with wrongs hath heaped up so hy,
That many Princes she in wealth exceedes,
And purchast all the countrey lying ny
With the revenue of her plenteous meedes:° rewards
Her name is Munera,[1] agreeing with her deedes.

10

Thereto she is full faire, and rich attired,
With golden hands and silver feete beside,
That many Lords have her to wife desired:
But she them all despiseth for great pride.
Now by my life, sayd he, and God to guide,
None other way will I this day betake,
But by that Bridge, whereas he doth abide:
Therefore me thither lead. No more he spake,
But thitherward forthright his ready way did make.

11

Unto the place he came within a while,
Where on the Bridge he ready armed saw
The Sarazin, awayting for some spoile.
Who as they to the passage gan to draw,
A villaine to them came with scull all raw,
That passage money did of them require,
According to the custome of their law.
To whom he aunswerd wroth, Loe there thy hire;° payment
And with that word him strooke, that streight he did expire.

12

Which when the Pagan saw, he wexed° wroth, became
And streight him selfe unto the fight addrest,
Ne was Sir Artegall behinde: so both
Together ran with ready speares in rest.
Right in the midst, whereas they brest to brest
Should meete, a trap was letten downe to fall
Into the floud: streight leapt the Carle° churl, base person
unblest,
Well weening° that his foe was falne withall: knowing
But he was well aware, and leapt before his fall.

13

There being both together in the floud,
They each at other tyrannously flew;
Ne ought the water coolèd their whot bloud,
But rather in them kindled choler[2] new.
But there the Paynim,° who that use well knew pagan
To fight in water, great advantage had,
That oftentimes him nigh he overthrew:
And eke the courser,° whereuppon he rad,° war horse / rode
Could swim like to a fish, whiles he his backe bestrad.

14

Which oddes when as Sir Artegall espide,
He saw no way, but close with him in hast;
And to him driving strongly downe the tide,
Uppon his iron coller griped fast,
That with the straint his wesand° nigh he brast. throat
There they together strove and struggled long,
Either the other from his steede to cast;
Ne ever Artegall his griple° strong grip
For any thing wold slacke, but still uppon him hong.

15

As when a Dolphin and a Sele are met,
In the wide champian° of the Ocean plaine: level expanse
With cruell chaufe° their courages they whet, anger
The maysterdome of each by force to gaine,
And dreadfull battaile twixt them do darraine:° engage in
They snuf, they snort, they bounce, they rage, they rore,
That all the sea disturbèd with their traine,[3]
Doth frie° with fome above the surges hore.° boil / grey-white
Such was betwixt these two the troublesome uprore.

16

So Artegall at length him forst forsake
His horses backe, for dread of being drownd,
And to his handy swimming[4] him betake.
Eftsoones° him selfe he from his hold unbownd, soon
And then no ods at all in him he fownd:
For Artegall in swimming skilfull was,
And durst° the depth of any water sownd. dared
So ought each Knight, that use of perill has,[5]
In swimming be expert through waters force to pas.

---

[1] Munera Latin: Gifts, rewards (as in "remuneration").

[2] choler One of the four humors that, according to early modern medicine, affected mental and physical health. Choler and blood were the "hot" humors, and an overabundance of choler was thought to cause anger.

[3] their traine I.e., the trail of water displaced by their activity.

[4] handy swimming Dogpaddling.

[5] use of perill has Is used to peril.

17

Then very doubtfull was the warres event,° outcome
Uncertaine whether had the better side:
For both were skild in that experiment,[1]
And both in armes well traind and throughly tride.
But Artegall was better breathed beside,
And towards th'end, grew greater in his might,
That his faint foe no longer could abide
His puissance, ne beare him selfe upright,
But from the water to the land betooke his flight.

18

But Artegall pursewd him still so neare,
With bright Chrysaor[2] in his cruell hand,
That as his head he gan a litle reare
Above the brincke, to tread upon the land,
He smote it off, that tumbling on the strand
It bit the earth for very fell° despight,° bitter / contempt
And gnashed with his teeth, as if he band° cursed
High God, whose goodnesse he despairèd quight,
Or curst the hand, which did that vengeance on him dight.° do

19

His corps was carried downe along the Lee,
Whose waters with his filthy bloud it stayned:
But his blasphemous head, that all might see,
He pitcht upon a pole on high ordayned;
Where many years it afterwards remayned,
To be a mirrour to all mighty men,
In whose right hands great power is contayned,
That none of them the feeble overren,
But alwaies doe their powre within just compasse pen.

20

That done, unto the Castle he did wend,
In which the Paynims daughter did abide,
Guarded of many which did her defend:
Of whom he entrance sought, but was denide,
And with reprochfull blasphemy defide,
Beaten with stones downe from the battilment,
That he was forcèd to withdraw aside;
And bad his servant Talus[3] to invent° find, discover
Which way he enter might, without endangerment.

21

Eftsoones his Page drew to the Castle gate,
And with his iron flale at it let flie,
That all the warders it did sore amate,° dismay, stun
The which erewhile spake so reprochfully,
And made them stoupe, that looked earst° so hie. formerly
Yet still he bet, and bounst° uppon the dore, struck
And thundred strokes thereon so hideouslie,
That all the peece° he shaked from the flore, castle
And fillèd all the house with feare and great uprore.

22

With noise whereof the Lady forth appeared
Uppon the Castle wall, and when she saw
The daungerous state, in which she stood, she feared
The sad effect of her neare overthrow;
And gan entreat that iron man below,
To cease his outrage, and him faire besought,
Sith° neither force of stones which they did throw, since
Nor powr of charms, which she against him wrought, Might otherwise prevaile, or make him cease for ought.

23

But when as yet she saw him to proceede,
Unmoved with praiers, or with piteous thought,
She ment him to corrupt with goodly meede;° bribery
And causde great sackes with endlesse riches fraught,
Unto the battilment to be upbrought,
And powrèd forth over the Castle wall,
That she might win some time, though dearly bought
Whilest he to gathering of the gold did fall.
But he was nothing moved, nor tempted therewithall.

24

But still continued his assault the more,
And layd on load with his huge yron flaile,
That at the length he has yrent° the dore, rent: split open
And made way for his maister to assaile.
Who being entred, nought did then availe
For wight,° against his powre them selves to reare: anyone
Each one did flie; their hearts began to faile,

---

[1] that experiment That skill being tested, i.e., swimming.

[2] Chrysaor Greek: Golden sword. Artegall receives the sword from Astrea in 5.1.9.

[3] Talus A man made of iron, whom Astrea gives to Artegall to serve him as an attendant and enforcer.

And hid them selves in corners here and there;
And eke their dame halfe dead did hide her self for feare.

25

Long they her sought, yet no where could they finde her,
That sure they weened she was escapt away:
But Talus, that could like a limehound° winde her, bloodhound
And all things secrete wisely could bewray,° uncover
At length found out, whereas she hidden lay
Under an heape of gold. Thence he her drew
By the faire lockes, and fowly did array,
Withouten pitty of her goodly hew,° looks
That Artegall him selfe her seemelesse° plight did rew. unseemly

26

Yet for no pitty would he change the course
Of Justice, which in Talus hand did lye;
Who rudely hayld her forth without remorse,
Still holding up her suppliant hands on hye,
And kneeling at his feete submissively.
But he her suppliant hands, those hands of gold,
And eke her feete, those feete of silver trye,° refined
Which sought unrighteousnesse, and justice sold,
Chopt off, and nayld on high, that all might them behold.

27

Her selfe then tooke he by the sclender wast,
In vaine loud crying, and into the flood
Over the Castle wall adowne her cast,
And there her drownèd in the durty mud:
But the streame washt away her guilty blood.
Thereafter all that mucky pelfe° he tooke, stolen goods
The spoile of peoples evill gotten good,
The which her sire had scrap't by hooke and crooke;
And burning all to ashes, powr'd it downe the brooke.

28

And lastly all that Castle quite he raced,° razed
Even from the sole of his foundation,
And all the hewen° stones thereof defaced, shaped, cut
That there mote be no hope of reparation,
Nor memory thereof to any nation.
All which when Talus throughly had perfourmed,
Sir Artegall undid the evill fashion,
And wicked customes of that Bridge refourmed.
Which done, unto his former journey he retourned.

29

In which they measured mickle° weary way, many a
Till that at length nigh to the sea they drew;
By which as they did travell on a day,
They saw before them, far as they could vew,
Full many people gathered in a crew:
Whose great assembly they did much admire,° wonder at
For never there the like resort° they knew. crowd
So towardes them they coasted,° to enquire approached
What thing so many nations met, did there desire.

30

There they beheld a mighty Gyant stand
Upon a rocke, and holding forth on hie
An huge great paire of balance° in his hand, scales
With which he boasted in his surquedrie,° arrogance
That all the world he would weigh equallie,
If ought he had the same to counterpoys.°[1] balance
For want whereof he weighèd vanity,
And fild his ballaunce full of idle toys:
Yet was admirèd much of fooles, women, and boys.

31

He sayd that he would all the earth uptake,
And all the sea, devided each from either:
So would he of the fire one ballaunce make,
And one of th'ayre, without or wind, or wether:
Then would he ballaunce heaven and hell together,
And all that did within them all containe;
Of all whose weight, he would not misse a fether.
And looke what surplus did of each remaine,
He would to his owne part restore the same againe.

32

For why,° he sayd they all unequall were, because
And had encroched uppon others share,
Like as the sea (which plaine he shewèd there)
Had worne the earth, so did the fire the aire,
So all the rest did others parts empaire.
And so were realmes and nations run awry.

---

[1] That all the world ... to counterpoys I.e., he would weigh the world so as to serve equality if he could only find something to counterbalance that world on the other side of his scales.

All which he undertooke for to repaire,
In sort as they were formèd auncienly;
And all things would reduce unto equality.

33

Therefore the vulgar° did about him flocke, common people
And cluster thicke unto his leasings° vaine, lies
Like foolish flies about an hony crocke,
In hope by him great benefite to gaine,
And uncontrollèd freedome to obtaine.
All which when Artegall did see, and heare,
How he mis-led the simple peoples traine,
In sdeignfull° wize he drew unto him neare, disdainful
And thus unto him spake, without regard or feare.

34

Thou that presum'st to weigh the world anew,
And all things to an equall to restore,
In stead of right me seemes great wrong dost shew,
And far above thy forces pitch to sore° soar
For ere thou limit what is lesse or more
In every thing, thou oughtest first to know,
What was the poyse° of every part of yore:° weight / the past
And looke then how much it doth overflow,
Or faile thereof, so much is more then just to trow.° be sure of 35

For at the first they all created were
In goodly measure, by their Makers might,
And weighèd out in ballaunces so nere,
That not a dram was missing of their right,
The earth was in the middle centre pight,[1]
In which it doth immoveable abide,
Hemd in with waters like a wall in sight;
And they with aire, that not a drop can slide:
Al which the heavens containe, and in their courses guide.[2]

36

Such heavenly justice doth among them raine,° reign
That every one doe know their certaine bound,
In which they doe these many yeares remaine,
And mongst them al no change hath yet beene found.
But if thou now shouldst weigh them new in pound,
We are not sure they would so long remaine:
All change is perillous, and all chaunce unsound.
Therefore leave off to weigh them all againe,
Till we may be assured they shall their course retaine.

37

Thou foolishe Elfe said then the Gyant wroth
Seest not, how badly all things present bee,
And each estate quite out of order go'th?
The sea it selfe doest thou not plainely see
Encroch uppon the land there under thee;
And th'earth it selfe how daily its increast,
By all that dying to it turned be?
Were it not good that wrong were then surceast,° ended
And from the most, that some were given to the least?

38

Therefore I will throw downe these mountaines hie,
And make them levell with the lowly plaine:
These towring rocks, which reach unto the skie,
I will thrust downe into the deepest maine,° sea
And as they were, them equalize againe.
Tyrants that make men subject to their law,
I will suppresse, that they no more may raine;
And Lordings curbe, that commons° over-aw; common people
And all the wealth of rich men to the poore will draw.

39

Of things unseene how canst thou deeme° aright, judge
Then answered the righteous Artegall,
Sith thou misdeem'st so much of things in sight?
What though the sea with waves continuall
Doe eate the earth, it is no more at all:
Ne is the earth the lesse, or loseth ought,
For whatsoever from one place doth fall,
Is with the tide unto an other brought:
For there is nothing lost, that may be found, if sought.

40

Likewise the earth is not augmented more,
By all that dying into it doe fade.
For of the earth they formed were of yore;
How ever gay their blossome or their blade
Doe flourish now, they into dust shall vade.° disappear

---

[1] The earth … pight The Ptolemaic astronomical model, in which the earth is fixed at the center of the universe, was predominantly accepted in sixteenth-century England; pight Fixed.

[2] For at … courses guide See Job 38.4–11 and Isaiah 40.12.

What wrong then is it, if that when they die,
They turne to that, whereof they first were made?
All in the powre of their great Maker lie:
All creatures must obey the voice of the most hie.

41

They live, they die, like as he doth ordaine,
Ne ever any asketh reason why.
The hils doe not the lowly dales disdaine;
The dales doe not the lofty hils envy.
He maketh Kings to sit in soverainty;
He maketh subjects to their powre obay;
He pulleth downe, he setteth up on hy;
He gives to this, from that he takes away.
For all we have is his: what he list doe, he may.

42

What ever thing is done, by him is donne,
Ne any may his mighty will withstand;
Ne any may his soveraine power shonne,
Ne loose that he hath bound with stedfast band.
In vaine therefore doest thou now take in hand,
To call to count, or weigh his workes anew,
Whose counsels depth thou canst not understand,
Sith of things subiect to thy daily vew
Thou doest not know the causes, nor their courses dew.° due

43

For take thy ballaunce, if thou be so wise,
And weigh the winde, that under heaven doth blow;
Or weigh the light, that in the East doth rise;
Or weigh the thought, that from mans mind doth flow.
But if the weight of these thou canst not show,
Weigh but one word which from thy lips doth fall.
For how canst thou those greater secrets know,
That doest not know the least thing of them all?
Ill can he rule the great, that cannot reach the small.

44

Therewith the Gyant much abashèd° sayd; ashamed
That he of little things made reckoning light,
Yet the least word that ever could be layd
Within his ballaunce, he could way aright.
Which is, sayd he,° more heavy then in weight, Artegall
The right or wrong, the false or else the trew?
He answered, that he would try it streight,
So he the words into his ballaunce threw,
But streight the wingèd words out of his ballaunce flew.

45

Wroth wext° he then, and sayd, that words were light, became
Ne would within his ballaunce well abide.
But he could justly weigh the wrong or right.
Well then, sayd Artegall, let it be tride.
First in one ballance set the true aside.
He did so first; and then the false he layd
In th'other scale; but still it downe did slide,
And by no meane could in the weight be stayd.
For by no meanes the false will with the truth be wayd.

46

Now take the right likewise, sayd Artegall,
And counterpeise° the same with so much wrong. balance
So first the right he put into one scale;
And then the Gyant strove with puissance strong
To fill the other scale with so much wrong.
But all the wrongs that he therein could lay,
Might not it peise;° yet did he labour long, balance
And swat, and chaufed, and provèd° every way: tried
Yet all the wrongs could not a litle right downe lay.

47

Which when he saw, he greatly grew in rage,
And almost would his balances have broken:
But Artegall him fairely gan asswage,° calm
And said; Be not upon thy balance wroken:° revenged
For they doe nought but right or wrong betoken;
But in the mind the doome° of right must bee; judgment
And so likewise of words, the which be spoken,
The eare must be the ballance, to decree
And judge, whether with truth or falshood they agree.

48

But set the truth and set the right aside,
For they with wrong or falshood will not fare;
And put two wrongs together to be tride,
Or else two falses, of each equall share;
And then together doe them both compare.
For truth is one, and right is ever one.
So did he, and then plaine it did appeare,

Whether of them the greater were attone.[1]
But right sate in the middest of the beame alone.

49
But he the right from thence did thrust away,
For it was not the right, which he did seeke;
But rather strove extremities to way,
Th'one to diminish, th'other for to eeke:° increase
For of the meane he greatly did misleeke.
Whom when so lewdly° minded Talus found, immorally
Approching nigh unto him cheeke by cheeke,
He shouldered him from off the higher ground,
And down the rock him throwing, in the sea him dround.

50
Like as a ship, whom cruell tempest drives
Upon a rocke with horrible dismay,
Her shattered ribs in thousand peeces rives,° cracks
And spoyling all her geares and goodly ray,° array
Does make her selfe misfortunes piteous pray.
So downe the cliffe the wretched Gyant tumbled;
His battred ballances in peeces lay,
His timbered bones all broken rudely rumbled,
So was the high aspyring with huge ruine humbled.

51
That when the people, which had there about
Long wayted, saw his sudden desolation,
They gan to gather in tumultuous rout,° throng
And mutining, to stirre up civill faction,
For certaine losse of so great expectation.
For well they hopèd to have got great good,
And wondrous riches by his innovation.
Therefore resolving to revenge his blood,
They rose in armes, and all in battell order stood.

52
Which lawlesse multitude him comming too
In warlike wise, when Artegall did vew,
He much was troubled, ne wist° what to doo. knew
For loth he was his noble hands t'embrew° stain
In the base blood of such a rascall crew;
And otherwise, if that he should retire,
He feared least they with shame would him pursew.
Therefore he Talus to them sent, t'inquire
The cause of their array, and truce for to desire.

53
But soone as they him nigh approching spide,
They gan with all their weapons him assay,
And rudely stroke at him on every side:
Yet nought they could him hurt, ne ought dismay.
But when at them he with his flaile gan lay,
He like a swarme of flyes them overthrew;
Ne any of them durst come in his way,
But here and there before his presence flew,
And hid themselves in holes and bushes from his vew.

54
As when a Faulcon hath with nimble flight
Flowne at a flush[2] of Ducks, foreby the brooke,
The trembling foule dismayd with dreadfull sight
Of death, the which them almost overtooke,
Doe hide themselves from her astonying° looke, astonishing
Amongst the flags° and covert round about. rushes
When Talus saw they all the field forsooke
And none appeared of all that raskall rout,
To Artegall he turned, and went with him throughout.
—1590, 1596

Letter to Sir Walter Ralegh on The Faerie Queene

Spenser's letter to Sir Walter Ralegh, an important colleague in England's efforts to govern the often rebellious Irish, was first published, together with a large number of dedicatory sonnets, as an explanatory "annex" to the 1590 Faerie Queene. The 1596 edition dropped it, possibly because Ralegh had recently earned the queen's displeasure or perhaps because, or so think many scholars, what the letter says about the plot sits problematically alongside the poem itself. Nor is it clear how the "virtues" on which Spenser tells Ralegh he would base his projected twelve books in fact relate to those of Aristotle, particularly since Aristotelian tradition had been modified by a still lively Medieval Scholastic and Christian understanding of that Greek philosopher. The Letter reappeared near the end of the 1609 Faerie Queene, and since then it has been routinely printed with the poem, often as a preface even though Spenser wrote it as an appendix. Authorities on Spenser, who read the Letter with interest, caution, and sometimes puzzlement, disagree as to where it should be placed. In this edition we retain it as an "annex," but readers should remember that it is an anomaly—a prefatory afterword.

---

[1] attone At one, i.e., when everything was considered together.

[2] flush Group of birds startled into flight.

Letter to Sir Walter Ralegh on The Faerie Queene

A Letter of the author's expounding his whole intention in the course of this work: which, for that it giveth great light to the reader, for the better understanding is hereunto annexed.[1]

To the right noble, and valorous, Sir Walter Ralegh, knight, Lord Warden of the Stanneries,[2] and Her Majesty's lieutenant of the County of Cornwall.

Sir: Knowing how doubtfully all Allegories may be construed, and this book of mine, which I have entitled the Faery Queene, being a continued allegory, or dark conceit,[3] I have thought good, as well for avoiding of jealous opinions and misconstructions, as also for your better light in reading thereof (being so by you commanded), to discover unto you the general intention and meaning which in the whole course thereof I have fashioned, without expressing of any particular purposes or by-accidents[4] therein occasioned. The general end therefore of all the book is to fashion a gentleman or noble person in virtuous and gentle[5] discipline: which for that I conceived should be most plausible and pleasing being coloured with an historical fiction,[6] the which the most part of men delight to read rather for variety of matter than for profit of the ensample,[7] I chose the history of King Arthur, as most fit for the excellency of his person, being made famous by many men's former works, and also furthest from the danger of envy, and suspicion of present time.[8] In which I have followed all the antique poets historical: first Homer, who in the persons of Agamemnon and Ulysses hath ensampled[9] a good governor and a virtuous man, the one in his Ilias, the other in his Odysseus; then Virgil, whose like intention was to do[10] in the person of Æneas; after him Ariosto comprised them both in his Orlando; and lately Tasso[11] dissevered them again and formed both parts in two persons, namely that part which they in philosophy call Ethice, or virtues of a private man, coloured[12] in his Rinaldo; the other named Politice in his Godfredo. By ensample of which excellent poets, I labour to portrait[13] in Arthur, before he was king, the image of a brave knight perfected in the twelve private moral virtues as Aristotle hath devised, the which is the purpose of these first twelve books:[14] which if I find to be well accepted, I may be perhaps encouraged to frame the other part of politic virtues in his person after that he came to be king. To some, I know, this method will seem unpleasant, who had rather have good discipline delivered plainly in way of precepts,[15] or sermoned at large, as they use, than thus cloudily enwrapped in allegorical devises. But such, meseems, should be satisfied with the use[16] of these days, seeing all things accounted by their shows and nothing esteemed of that is not delightful and pleasing to common sense.[1] For this cause is Xenophon preferred before Plato,[2] for that the one, in the exquisite depth of his judgement, formed a commonwealth such as it should be, but the other in the person of Cyrus and the Persians fashioned a government such as might best be: so much more profitable and gracious is doctrine by ensample than by rule. So have I laboured to do in the person of Arthur: whom I conceive, after his long education by Timon, to whom he was by Merlin delivered to be brought up so soon as he was born of the Lady Igrayne, to have seen in a dream or vision the Faery Queene, with whose excellent beauty ravished, he awaking resolved to seek her out, and so being by Merlin armed, and by Timon thoroughly instructed, he went to seek her forth in Faery Land. In that Faery Queene I mean glory in my general intention, but in my particular I conceive the most excellent and glorious person of our sovereign the Queene,[3] and her kingdom in Faery Land. And yet, in some places else[4] I do otherwise shadow[5] her. For considering she beareth two persons, the one of a most royal queene or empress, the other of a most virtuous and beautiful lady, this latter part in some places I do express in Belphœbe, fashioning her name according to your own excellent conceit of Cynthia[6] (Phoebe and Cynthia being both names of Diana). So in the person of Prince Arthur I set forth magnificence[7] in particular, which virtue for that (according to Aristotle and the rest) it is the perfection of all the rest and containeth in it them all, therefore in the whole course I mention the deeds of Arthur applicable to that virtue which I write of in that book. But of the 12 other virtues I make 12 other knights the patrons, for the more variety of the history: of which these three books contain three. The first of the Knight of the Redcrosse, in whom I express holiness. The second of Sir Guyon, in whom I set forth temperance.[8] The third of Britomart, a lady knight, in whom I picture chastity.[9] But because the beginning of the whole work seemeth abrupt and as depending upon other antecedents, it needs that ye know the occasion of these three knights' several adventures. For the method of a poet historical is not such as of an historiographer.[10] For an historiographer discourseth[11] of affairs orderly as they were done, accounting as well the times as the actions; but a poet thrusteth into the midst, even where it most concerneth him, and there recoursing to the things forepast,[12] and divining of things to come, maketh a pleasing analysis of all.

---

[1] annexed Added.

[2] Stanneries Mines in Cornwall and Devon.

[3] dark conceit Semi-concealed or difficult poetic notion, plan, or conception.

[4] by-accidents Secondary narratives or descriptions.

[5] fashion Represent; also form, educate; gentle As befits the gentry class, the well-born.

[6] historical fiction Imaginary narrative, fiction.

[7] ensample Example, model.

[8] suspicion of present time Potential accusations related to current political controversies or government censorship.

[9] ensampled Exemplified.

[10] like intention was to do I.e., "intention was to do something similar."

[11] Ariosto Lodovico Ariosto (1474–1533) wrote the epic romance Orlando Furioso (1532); Tasso Torquato Tasso (1544–95) published Rinaldo, a chivalric romance, in 1562, and Gerusalemme Liberata (which follows the epic adventures of Count Godfredo) in 1581.

[12] coloured Illustrated, demonstrated.

[13] portrait Portray.

[14] first twelve books Evidently, Spenser planned for The Faerie Queene to comprise 12 books and then perhaps a sequel of another 12; so far as we know, he completed only six books and a fragment.

[15] precepts Principles, advice.

[16] use Custom.

The beginning therefore of my history, if it were to be told by an historiographer, should be the twelfth book, which is the last, where I devise that the Faery Queene kept her annual feast 12 days, upon which 12 several[13] days, the occasions of the 12 several adventures happened, which being undertaken by 12 several knights, are in these 12 books severally handled and discoursed. The first was this: In the beginning of the feast, there presented himself a tall clownish[14] young man, who falling before the Queen of Faries desired a boon[15] (as the manner then was), which during that feast she might not refuse: which was that he might have the achievement of any adventure which during that feast should happen; that being granted, he rested him on the floor, unfit through his rusticity for a better place. Soon after entered a fair lady in mourning weeds,[1] riding on a white ass, with a dwarf behind her leading a warlike steed that bore the arms of a knight, and his spear in the dwarf's hand. She, falling before the Queene of Faeries, complained that her father and mother, an ancient king and queene, had been by an huge dragon many years shut up in a brasen[2] castle, who thence suffered them not to issue;[3] and therefore besought the Faery Queene to assign her some one of her knights to take on him that exploit. Presently that clownish person, upstarting, desired that adventure, whereat the Queene much wondering and the lady much gainsaying,[4] yet he earnestly importuned[5] his desire. In the end the lady told him that unless that armour which she brought would serve him (that is, the armour of a Christian man specified by Saint Paul, vi Ephes.),[6] that he could not succeed in that enterprise: which being forthwith put upon him with due furnitures[7] thereunto, he seemed the goodliest man in all that company, and was well liked of the lady. And soon after taking on him knighthood, and mounting on that strange courser,[8] he went forth with her on that adventure, where beginneth the first book, vz.[9] "A gentle knight was pricking on the plain," &c.

---

[1] shows Outward appearances; common sense Popular opinion, or less pejoratively, the consensus.

[2] Xenophon preferred before Plato Spenser contrasts Xenophon's Cyropaedia (early 4th century BCE), with its narrative excitement, compelling characters, and greater political realism, to Plato's more abstract ideal Republic (c. 380 BCE).

[3] our sovereign the Queene Elizabeth I (reigned 1558–1603); Spenser exploits the older conception of the monarch's two bodies, one public and continuing, the other private, individual, and mortal.

[4] places else Other places.

[5] shadow Indirectly represent.

[6] Cynthia Probably as an effort to soften her anger, Ralegh's poem The Ocean to Cynthia (1592?) praises the still-offended Queen Elizabeth. Cynthia, Phoebe, and Diana were all names for the Greco-Roman virgin goddess of the hunt and the moon.

[7] magnificence "Greatness in action," specifically a princely and protective liberality suiting a great ruler. How Magnificence relates to the Aristotelian "Magnanimity" (greatness of soul) has been debated, as has the relation of either virtue to Christian thinking, especially granted Medieval interpretations of Aristotle.

[8] temperance Moderation and self restraint, but also the dynamic fusion of opposites (one "tempers" a sword with fire and cold water).

[9] chastity Not to be confused with virginity; chastity includes faithful married sexuality.

[10] historiographer Writer of factual chronicles.

[11] discourseth Tells.

[12] recoursing to the things forepast Returning to past events; like Homer and Virgil, Spenser begins his poem in medias res (in the middle) and then indicates what has come before.

[13] several Separate.

[14] clownish Rustic-looking.

[15] boon Favor.

The second day there came in a palmer[10] bearing an infant with bloody hands, whose parents he complained to have been slain by an enchantress called Acrasia, and therefore craved of the Faery Queene to appoint him some knight to perform that adventure, which being assigned to Sir Guyon, he presently went forth with that same palmer, which is the beginning of the second book and the whole subject thereof. The third day there came in a groom,[11] who complained before the Faery Queene, that a vile enchanter called Busirane had in hand a most fair lady, called Amoret, whom he kept in most grievous torment because she would not yield him the pleasure of her body. Whereupon Sir Scudamour, the lover of that lady, presently took on him that adventure. But being unable to perform it by reason of the hard[12] enchantments, after long sorrow, in the end met with Britomart, who succoured[13] him, and rescued his love.

But by occasion hereof, many other adventures are intermedled, but rather as accidents than intendments,[14] as the love of Britomart, the overthrow of Marinell, the misery of Florimell, the virtuousness of Belphœbe, the lasciviousness[15] of Hellenora, and many the like.

Thus much, Sir, I have briefly overrun[16] to direct your understanding to the well-head of the history, that from thence gathering the whole intention of the conceit ye may, as in a handful, grip all the discourse, which otherwise may happily[17] seem tedious and confused. So humbly craving the continuance of your honourable favour towards me, and th'eternal establishment of your happiness, I humbly take leave.

23 January, 1589[18]
Yours most humbly affectionate,
Ed. Spenser

---

[1] weeds Clothes.

[2] brasen Strong.

[3] issue Emerge.

[4] gainsaying Opposing.

[5] importuned Begged for.

[6] Saint Paul, vi Ephes. Ephesians 6, in which Paul commands, "Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil." The parts specified are the loins girt about with truth; the breastplate of righteousness; feet shod with the gospel of peace; the shield of faith "wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked"; the helmet of salvation; and "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God."

[7] due furnitures Suitable equipment, supplies.

[8] courser Swift horse.

[9] vz. Latin: namely, to wit (Videlicet. Abbreviation: viz).

[10] palmer Pilgrim, especially one who has returned from the Holy Land carrying a palm as a symbol of his journey.

[11] groom Manservant.

[12] hard Persistent, powerful.

[13] succoured Assisted.

[14] accidents than intendments Episodes not part of the main storylines.

[15] lasciviousness Unrestrained sensuality, especially lustful behavior.

[16] overrun Described rapidly.

[17] happily By chance.

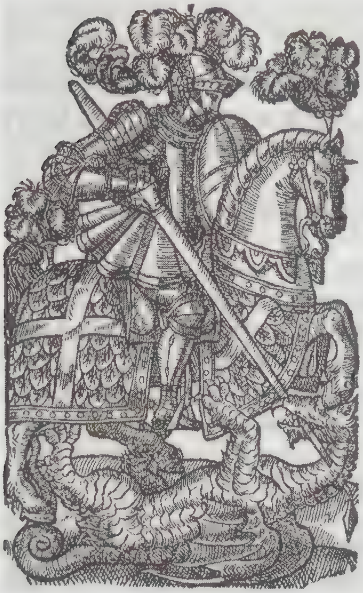
[18] 23 January, 1589 By the modern (i.e., Gregorian) calendar, 3 February 1589; England did not abandon the old Julian Calendar until 1752, and in Spenser's day March 25 was still the official start of the new year.

IN CONTEXT

The Redcrosse Knight



This illustration of the Redcrosse Knight is from the 1590 edition of The Faerie Queene.

IN CONTEXT

Christian Armor

The opening stanza of Book 1 presents a riddle: how can Redcrosse Knight's armor be dented and battle scarred when the Knight has yet to see battle? Spenser expected his readers to realize that the Knight's armor is allegorical, the Christian armor specified by Saint Paul in Ephesians 6.11–17. The concept of spiritual armor for the spiritual warfare of everyday life was a popular trope in Renaissance theology and literature, and one of the best known treatments appeared in the Handbook of the Christian Soldier by the great Dutch humanist Desiderius Erasmus (c. 1469–1546).

from Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, 6.11–17 (Geneva Bible, modernized spelling)

Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the assaults of the devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, and against the worldly governors, the princess of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickednesses, which are in the high places.

For this cause take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to resist in the evil day, & having finished all things, stand fast.

Stand therefore, and your loins gird about with verity, & having on the breast plate of righteousness,

And your feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace.

Above all, take the shield of faith, wherewith ye may quench all the fiery darts of the wicked,

And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.

from Desiderius Erasmus, Enchiridion militis Christiani [Handbook of the Christian Soldier] (1504), first translated into English in 1533, probably by William Tyndale. The following excerpt is a modern spelling version of the 1533 translation.

ON THE ARMOR OF THE CHRISTIAN KNIGHT

Wilt thou hear the instruments or artillery of Christian men's war? And the zeal of him (saith scripture) shall take harness, and shall harness his creature to avenge his enemies; he will put on justice for his breast plate, and take for his helmet sure and true judgement; he will take a shield of equity impenetrable or that cannot be pierced, yea and he will sharpen or fashion cruel wrath into a spear. Thou readest also in Isaiah he is armed with justice as with an habergeon,[1] and a sallet[2] of health upon his head; he is clothed with the vestures[3] of vengeance, and covered as it were with a cloak of zeal.

Now if thou list, go thee to the storehouse of Paul that valiant captain, certainly thou shalt also find there the armour of war, not carnal things but valiant in God to destroy fortresses and counsels, and every high thing that exalteth himself against the doctrine of God. Thou shalt find there the armour of God, by the which thou mayest resist in a woeful day. Thou shalt find the harness of justice on the right hand, and on the left thou shalt find the defense of thy sides' verity, and the habergeon of justice, the buckler[4] of faith wherewith thou mayest quench all the hot and fiery weapons of thy cruel adversary. Thou shalt find also the helmet of health and the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, with the which all, if a man shall be diligently covered and fenced, he may boldly without fear bring forth the bold saying of Paul: who shall separate us from the love of God? shall tribulation? shall straitness or difficulty? shall hunger? shall nakedness? shall peril? shall persecution? shall a sword? Behold how mighty enemies and how much feared of all men he setteth at nought.

But hear also a certain greater thing, for it followeth. But in all things we have overcome by his help which loved us. And I am assured (saith he) that neither death nor life, nor angels, neither principates, neither virtues, neither present things, neither things to come, neither strength, neither highness, neither lowness, nor none other creature shall or may separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesu. O happy trust and confidence which the weapons or armour of light giveth to Paul, that is by interpretation a little man, which calleth himself the refuse or outcast of the world. Of such armour therefore abundantly shall holy scripture minister to thee, if thou wilt occupy thy time in it with all thy might: so that thou shalt not need our counsel or admonitions. Nevertheless, seeing it is thy mind, lest I should seem not to have obeyed thy request, I have forged for thee this little treatise called Enchiridion, that is to say, a certain little dagger, whom never lay out of thy hand, no not when thou art at meat, or in thy chamber. Insomuch that if at any time thou shalt be compelled to make a pilgrimage in these worldly occupations, and shalt be accumbered to bear about with the whole and complete armour and harness of holy scripture, yet commit not that the sutler[1] in wait at any season should come upon thee and find thee utterly unarmed, but at the least let it not grieve thee to have with them this little hanger,[2] which shall not be heavy to bear, nor unprofitable for thy defense, for it is very little, yet if thou use it wisely, and couple with it the buckler of faith, thou shalt be able to withstand the fierce and raging assault of thine enemy: so that thou shalt have no deadly wound.

---

[1] habergeon Sleeveless coat or jacket of mail or scale armor.

[2] sallet Light headpiece, with the lower part curving out behind.

[3] vestures Clothing, apparel.

[4] buckler Small round shield.

IN CONTEXT

Spirituality and The Faerie Queene

The Bible's Song of Solomon, a quasi-dialogue of lovers filled with sensuous metaphors, had long been read in both Jewish and Christian tradition as allegorizing the marriage between God and humanity, or God and the soul, or Christ and the Church (the body of all believers). For writers such as Spenser and Donne, the tradition further legitimized the crossover between the spiritual and the erotic found in much Renaissance art and literature.

Heading to the Song of Solomon (Geneva Bible, modernized spelling)

In this song, Salomon by most sweet and comfortable allegories and parables describeth the perfect love of Jesus Christ, the true Salomon and King of peace, and the faithful soul of his church which he hath sacrificed and appointed to be his spouse, holy, chaste, and without reprehension. So that here is declared the singular love of the bridegroom toward the bride, and his great and excellent benefits wherewith he doth enrich her of his pure bounty and grace without any of her deservings. Also the earnest affection of the church which is inflamed with the love of Christ desiring to be more and more joined to him in love, and not to be forsaken for any spot or blemish that is in her.

---

[1] sutler One who sells provisions to soldiers.

[2] hanger Short sword.

from Amoretti[1]

pages

1

Happy ye leaves° when as those lilly hands, a pages which hold my life in their dead doing[2] might, b shall handle you and hold in loves soft bands,° a bonds
lyke captives trembling at the victors sight. b
And happy lines, on which with starry light, b those lamping° eyes will deigne b blazing sometimes to look E
and reade the sorrowes of my dying spright,° b spirit written with teares in harts close bleeding book. C
And happy rymes bath'd in the sacred brooke, c of Helicon[3] whence she derivèd is, d
when ye behold that Angels blessèd looke, c
my soules long lackèd foode, my heavens blis. d
Leaves, lines, and rymes, seeke her to please alone, e whom if ye please, I care for other none. e

3

The soverayne beauty which I doo admyre, witnesse the world how worthy to be prayzed:
the light wherof hath kindled heavenly fyre,
in my fraile spirit by her from basenesse raysed.
That being now with her huge brightnesse dazed, base thing I can no more endure to view:
but looking still on her I stand amazed,
at wondrous sight of so celestiall hew.° form
So when my toung would speak her praises dew,° due
it stoppèd is with thoughts astonishment:
and when my pen would write her titles true,
it ravisht is with fancies wonderment:
Yet in my hart I then both speake and write,
The wonder that my wit cannot endite.

6

Be nought dismayd that her unmovèd mind
doth still persist in her rebellious pride:
such love not lyke to lusts of baser kynd,
the harder wonne, the firmer will abide.
The duresull° Oake, whose sap is not yet dride, durable is long ere it conceive the kindling fyre:
but when it once doth burne, it doth divide,
great heat, and makes his flames to heaven aspire.
So hard it is to kindle new desire,
in gentle brest that shall endure for ever:
deepe is the wound, that dints° the parts entire strikes with chast affects, that naught but death can sever.
Then thinke not long in taking litle paine,
to knit the knot, that ever shall remaine.

15

Ye tradefull° Merchants, that with engaged in trading weary toyle,° toil
do seeke most pretious things to make your gain;
and both the Indias[4] of their treasures spoile,
what needeth you to seeke so farre in vaine?
For loe° my love doth in her selfe containe behold
all this worlds riches that may farre be found, if Saphyres, loe her eies be Saphyres plaine,
if Rubies, loe hir lips be Rubies sound:° pure
If Pearles, hir teeth be pearles both pure and round;
if Yvorie, her forhead yvory weene;° seems
if Gold, her locks are finest gold on ground;
if silver, her faire hands are silver sheene.° beautiful
But that which fairest is, but few behold, her mind adornd with vertues manifold.

22

This holy season[5] fit to fast and pray,
Men to devotion ought to be inclynd:
therefore, I lykewise on so holy day,[6]
for my sweet Saynt some service fit will find.
Her temple fayre is built within my mind,
in which her glorious ymage placèd is,
on which my thoughts doo day and night attend
lyke sacred priests that never thinke amisse.
There I to her as th'author of my blisse, will builde an altar to appease her yre:
and on the same my hart will sacrifise, burning in flames of pure and chast desyre:

---

[1] Amoretti Italian: Little loves. This sonnet sequence is generally read as a description of Spenser's courtship of and marriage to Elizabeth Boyle (whom he had married in the previous year, 1594).

[2] dead doing Death-dealing.

[3] Helicon One of the mountains sacred to the Nine Muses, the goddesses of the arts and sciences. The sacred spring which flows from Helicon is the Hippocrene.

[4] both the Indias I.e., the East and West Indies.

[5] This holy season Lent.

[6] holy day Ash Wednesday.

The which vouchsafe O goddesse to accept, amongst thy deerest relicks to be kept.

26

Sweet is the Rose, but growes upon a brere;° thorny bush
Sweet is the Junipere, but sharpe his bough; B sweet is the Eglantine,° but pricketh nere; A sweet-briar sweet is the firbloome,[1] but his braunches rough. B Sweet is the Cypresse, but his rynd° is tough, B bark sweet is the nut, but bitter is his pill;° C shell sweet is the broome-flowre,[2] but yet sowre enough; B and sweet is Moly,[3] but his root is ill. C
So every sweet with soure is tempred still, C that maketh it be coveted the more: D for easie things that may be got at will, C most sorts of men doe set but little store.
Why then should I accoumpt° of little paine, think much E that endlesse pleasure shall unto me gaine. E

34[4]

Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde,
by conduct of some star doth make her way,
whenas a storme hath dimd her trusty guyde,
out of her course doth wander far astray.
So I whose star, that wont with her bright ray,
me to direct, with cloudes is overcast,
doe wander now in darknesse and dismay, through hidden perils round about me plast.° placed
Yet hope I well, that when this storme is past my Helice the lodestar[5] of my lyfe will shine again, and looke on me at last,
with lovely light to cleare my cloudy grief,
Till then I wander carefull° comfortlesse, full of cares
in secret sorow and sad pensivenesse.

37

What guyle is this, that those her golden tresses,
She doth attyre under a net of gold:
and with sly° skill so cunningly them dresses, dexterous
that which is gold or heare,° may scarse be told? hair
Is it that mens frayle eyes, which gaze too bold, she may entangle in that golden snare:
and being caught may craftily enfold,
theyr weaker harts, which are not wel aware?
Take heed therefore, myne eyes, how ye doe stare henceforth too rashly on that guilefull net, in which if ever ye entrappèd are, out of her bands° ye by no meanes shall get. bonds
Fondnesse° it were for any being free, foolishness to covet fetters, though they golden bee.

54

Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay,
My love lyke the Spectator ydly sits beholding me that all the pageants° play, parts disguysing diversly my troubled wits.
Sometimes I joy when glad occasion fits,
and mask in myrth lyke to a Comedy:
soone after when my joy to sorrow flits,
I waile and make my woes a Tragedy.
Yet she beholding me with constant eye, delights not in my merth nor rues° my smart:° pities / pain
but when I laugh she mocks, and when I cry
she laughes, and hardens evermore her hart.
What then can move her? if nor merth nor mone,° moan
she is no woman, but a sencelesse stone.

64

Comming to kisse her lyps, (such grace I found)
Me seemd I smelt a gardin of sweet flowres:
that dainty odours from them threw around for damzels fit to decke their lovers bowres.
Her lips did smell lyke unto Gillyflowers,° carnations her ruddy cheekes lyke unto Roses red:
her snowy browes lyke budded Bellamoures,[6]
her lovely eyes lyke Pincks[7] but newly spred,
Her goodly bosome lyke a Strawberry bed,
her neck lyke to a bounch of Cullambynes:° columbines her brest lyke lillyes, ere theyr leaves be shed, her nipples lyke yong blossomd Jessemynes,° jasmines

---

[1] firbloome Fruit of the fir tree.

[2] broome-flowre Large yellow flower of the broom shrub, a common English plant.

[3] Moly Mythical herb with a white flower and black root, taken by Odysseus to ward off the spells of the witch Circe.

[4] 34 Modifies Petrarch's Rima 189, or one of the many adaptations.

[5] Helice The constellation Ursa Major; lodestar North Star, Polaris, in the constellation of Ursa Minor.

[6] Bellamoures Unidentified.

[7] Pincks Dianthus plants, the flowers of which can be red, white, pink, or variegated.

Such fragrant flowres doe give most odorous smell, but her sweet odour did them all excell.

67[1]

Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace,
Seeing the game from him escapt away,
sits downe to rest him in some shady place,
with panting hounds beguilèd of their pray:
So after long pursuit and vaine° assay,° fruitless / attempt when I all weary had the chace forsooke, the gentle deare returnd the selfe-same way,
thinking to quench her thirst at the next brooke.
There she beholding me with mylder looke, sought not to fly, but fearelesse still did bide:
till I in hand her yet halfe trembling tooke,
and with her owne goodwill hir fyrmely tyde.
Strange thing me seemd to see a beast so wyld,
so goodly wonne with her owne will beguyld.° deceived

68

Most glorious Lord of lyfe that on this day,[2]
Didst make thy triumph, over death and sin:
and having harrowd hell didst bring away[3] captivity thence captive us to win:
This joyous day, deare Lord, with joy begin,
and grant that we for whom thou diddest dye being with thy deare blood clene washt from sin, may live for ever in felicity.
And that thy love we weighing worthily,
may likewise love thee for the same againe:
and for thy sake that all lyke deare[4] didst buy,
with love may one another entertayne.
So let us love, deare love, lyke as we ought,
love is the lesson which the Lord us taught.

69

The famous warriors of the anticke world,[5]
Used Trophees to erect in stately wize:° ways in which they would the records have enrold, of theyr great deeds and valarous emprize.
What trophee then shall I most fit devize, in which I may record the memory of my loves conquest, peerelesse beauties prise, adorn'd with honour, love, and chastity.
Even this verse vowd to eternity,
shall be thereof immortall moniment:
and tell her prayse to all posterity,
that may admire such worlds rare wonderment.
The happy purchase of my glorious spoile, gotten at last with labour and long toyle.

70

Fresh spring the herald of loves mighty king,
In whose cote armour richly are displayd
all sorts of flowers the which on earth do spring in goodly colours gloriously arrayd.
Goe to my love, where she is carelesse layd,
yet in her winters bowre not well awake:
tell her the joyous time wil not be staid° halted
unlesse she doe him by the forelock take.[6]
Bid her therefore her selfe soone ready make,
to wayt on love amongst his lovely crew:
where every one that misseth then her make,° mate shall be by him amearst° with penance dew.° immersed / due
Make hast therefore sweet love, whilest it is prime,° spring for none can call againe the passèd time.

74

Most happy letters fram'd by skilfull trade,° application with which that happy name[7] was first desynd:
the which three times thrise happy hath me made,
with guifts of body, fortune and of mind.
The first my being to me gave by kind,° nature from mothers womb deriv'd by dew° descent, due the second is my sovereigne Queene most kind, that honour and large richesse to me lent.

---

[1] 67 An adaptation of the Italian poet Petrarch's Rima 190 (also adapted by Thomas Wyatt, Torquato Tasso, and Marguerite de Navarre). Spenser significantly changes Petrarch's original ending, turning Petrarch's lament into a happy celebration of the realization of his desires.

[2] this day Easter.

[3] having ... away Before his Resurrection, Christ descended into Hell to rescue the good Israelites who had died before his birth—an event referred to as the Harrowing of Hell.

[4] lyke deare At the same cost. I.e., Christ redeemed all people at the same cost.

[5] anticke world I.e., antique world, classical Greece and Rome.

[6] by ... take Seize the time or take the opportunity.

[7] that happy name Elizabeth, the name shared by Spenser's mother, Queen, and wife.

The third my love, my lives last ornament, by whom my spirit out of dust was raysed:° raised to speake her prayse and glory excellent,
of all alive most worthy to be praysed.
Ye three Elizabeths for ever live, that three such graces[1] did unto me give.

75

One day I wrote her name upon the strand,° shore
but came the waves and washèd it away:
agayne I wrote it with a second hand,
but came the tyde, and made my paynes his pray.° prey Vayne man, sayd she, that doest in vaine assay,° attempt a mortall thing so to immortalize.
for I my selve shall lyke to this decay, and eek° my name bee wypèd out lykewize. also Not so, (quod° I) let baser things devize° said / plan to dy in dust, but you shall live by fame:
my verse your vertues rare shall eternize,
and in the hevens wryte your glorious name.
Where whenas death shall all the world subdew,
our love shall live, and later life renew.

80

After so long a race as I have run
Through Faery land, which those six books[2] compile, give leave to rest me being halfe fordonne,° overcome and gather to my selfe new breath awhile.
Then as a steed refreshèd after toyle,
out of my prison I will breake anew:
and stoutly will that second worke assoyle,° discharge with strong endevour and attention dew.° due Till then give leave to me in pleasant mew,° seclusion to sport my muse and sing my loves sweet praise:
the contemplation of whose heavenly hew,° form
my spirit to an higher pitch will rayse.
But let her prayses yet be low and meane,° common fit for the handmayd of the Faery Queene.

82

Joy of my life, full oft for loving you
I blesse my lot, that was so lucky placed:
but then the more your owne mishap I rew,° pity that are so much by so meane° love embased.° common lowered
For had the equall hevens so much you graced in this as in the rest, ye mote invent som hevenly wit, whose verse could have enchased° engraved your glorious name in golden moniment.
But since ye deignd so goodly to relent to me your thrall,° in whom is little worth, bondage that little that I am, shall all be spent, in setting your immortall prayses forth.
Whose lofty argument° uplifting me, theme shall lift you up unto an high degree.

89

Lyke as the Culver° on the barèd bough, dove
Sits mourning for the absence of her mate:
and in her songs sends many a wishfull vow,
for his returne that seemes to linger late.
So I alone now left disconsolate, mourne to my selfe the absence of my love:
and wandring here and there all desolate, seek with my playnts° to match that mournful dove laments
Ne joy of ought° that under heaven doth hove,° anything dwell can comfort me, but her owne joyous sight:
whose sweet aspect both God and man can move,
in her unspotted° pleasauns° to delight. pure / pleasure
Dark is my day, whyles her fayre light I mis, and dead my life that wants such lively° blis. vital
—1594

---

[1] three such graces I.e., Three Graces, sister goddesses of beauty, mirth, and bounty.

[2] those six books The six completed books of The Faerie Queene.

Epithalamion[1]

Ye learnèd sisters[2] which have oftentimes
Beene to me ayding, others to adorne:° praise
Whom ye thought worthy of your gracefull rymes,
That even the greatest did not greatly scorne
To heare theyr names sung in your simple layes,° songs
But joyèd in theyr prayse.
And when ye list° your owne mishaps to mourne, desire
Which death, or love, or fortunes wreck did rayse,
Your string could soone to sadder tenor turne,
And teach the woods and waters to lament
Your dolefull dreriment.° misery
Now lay those sorrowfull complaints aside,
And having all your heads with girland crownd,
Helpe me mine owne loves prayses to resound,
Ne let the same of any be envide:
So Orpheus did for his owne bride,[3]
So I unto my selfe alone will sing,
The woods shall to me answer and my Eccho ring.

Early before the worlds light giving lampe,
His golden beame upon the hils doth spred,
Having disperst the nights unchearefull dampe,
Doe ye awake, and with fresh lusty hed[4]
Go to the bowre° of my belovèd love, bedroom
My truest turtle dove
Bid her awake; for Hymen[5] is awake,
And long since ready forth his maske° to move, wedding procession
With his bright Tead° that flames with many a flake,° torch / spark
And many a bachelor to waite on him,
In theyr fresh garments trim.
Bid her awake therefore and soone her dight,° prepare
For lo the wishèd day is come at last,
That shall for al the paynes and sorrowes past,
Pay to her usury° of long delight, interest
And whylest she doth her dight,
Doe ye to her of joy and solace sing,
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Bring with you all the Nymphes that you can heare[6]
Both of the rivers and the forrests greene:
And of the sea that neighbours to her neare,
Al with gay girlands goodly wel beseene.° befit
And let them also with them bring in hand,
Another gay girland
For my fayre love of lillyes and of roses,
Bound true love wize[7] with a blew silke riband.° ribbon
And let them make great store of bridale poses,° posies
And let them eeke° bring store of other flowers also
To deck the bridale bowers.
And let the ground whereas her foot shall tread,
For feare the stones her tender foot should wrong
Be strewed with fragrant flowers all along,
And diapred° lyke the discolored° mead.° adorned / multicolored / meadow
Which done, doe at her chamber dore awayt,
For she will waken strayt,° at once
The whiles doe ye this song unto her sing,
The woods shall to you answer and your Eccho ring.

Ye Nymphes of Mulla[8] which with carefull heed,
The silver scaly trouts doe tend full well,
And greedy pikes which use therein to feed,
(Those trouts and pikes all others doo excell)
And ye likewise which keepe the rushy lake,
Where none doo fishes take
Bynd up the locks the which hang scatterd light,
And in his waters which your mirror make,

---

[1] Epithalamion Meaning "at the bedroom" (Greek), an epithalamion is a wedding song, normally written by an outsider to celebrate a marriage. Classical poets including Sappho and Catullus wrote poems in this genre, which always begin with an invocation of the Muses, proceed through a full description of the wedding ceremony and celebration, and end with a reference to the consummation of the marriage. In Spenser's poem, each of the twenty-four sections corresponds to an hour of the wedding day and the poem's 365 lines corresponds to the year.

[2] learnèd sisters The Nine Muses, goddesses of the arts and sciences.

[3] So … bride One of the earliest and most celebrated poets of Greek mythology, Orpheus was famous for the magical power of his music and his passion for his wife, Eurydice, whom he attempted to rescue from the underworld after her death.

[4] lusty hed Vigor.

[5] Hymen God of marriage.

[6] that you can heare I.e., that can hear you.

[7] true love wize I.e., in a truelove's knot, an ornamental, double-looped knot.

[8] Mulla Poetic name of the River Awbeg in Ireland, near Spenser's home.

Behold your faces as the christall bright,
That when you come whereas° my love doth lie, to where
No blemish she may spie.
And eke ye lightfoot mayds which keepe the deere,
That on the hoary° mountayne use to towre, ancient
And the wylde wolves which seeke them to devoure,
With your steele darts doo chace fro comming neer
Be also present heere,
To helpe to decke her and to help to sing,
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Wake now my love, awake; for it is time,
The Rosy Morne long since left Tithones[1] bed,
All ready to her silver coche° to clyme, coach
And Phoebus[2] gins to shew his glorious hed.
Hark how the cheerefull birds do chaunt theyr laies
And carroll of loves praise.
The merry Larke hir mattins° sings aloft, morning prayers
The thrush replyes, the Mavis descant[3] playes,
The Ouzell° shrills, the Ruddock° warbles soft, blackbird / robin
So goodly all agree with sweet consent,
To this dayes merriment.
Ah my deere love why doe ye sleepe thus long,
When meeter° were that ye should now awake, more suitable
T'awayt the comming of your joyous make,° mate
And hearken to the birds lovelearnèd song,
The deawy leaves among.
For they of joy and pleasance to you sing,
That all the woods them answer & theyr eccho ring.

My love is now awake out of her dreame,
And her fayre eyes like stars that dimmèd were
With darksome cloud, now shew theyr goodly beams
More bright then Hesperus[4] his head doth rere.
Come now ye damzels, daughters of delight,
Helpe quickly her to dight,
But first come ye fayre houres which were begot
In Joves[5] sweet paradice, of Day and Night,
Which doe the seasons of the yeare allot,
And al that ever in this world is fayre
Doe make and still° repayre.° always / recreate
And ye three handmayds of the Cyprian Queene,[6]
The which doe still adorne her beauties pride,
Helpe to addorne my beautifullest bride:
And as ye her array, still throw betweene° occasionally
Some graces to be seene,
And as ye use° to Venus, to her sing, are accustomed
The whiles the woods shal answer & your eccho ring.

Now is my love all ready forth to come,
Let all the virgins therefore well awayt,
And ye fresh boyes that tend upon her groome
Prepare your selves; for he is comming strayt.° immediately
Set all your things in seemely° good aray° suitable / order
Fit for so joyfull day,
The joyfulst day that ever sunne did see.
Faire Sun, shew forth thy favourable ray,
And let thy lifull° heat not fervent be life-giving
For feare of burning her sunshyny face,
Her beauty to disgrace.
O fayrest Phoebus, father of the Muse,[7]
If ever I did honour thee aright,
Or sing the thing, that mote° thy mind delight, might
Doe not thy servants simple boone° refuse, request
But let this day let this one day be myne,
Let all the rest be thine.
Then I thy soverayne prayses loud wil sing,
That all the woods shal answer and theyr eccho ring.

Harke how the Minstrels gin to shrill aloud
Their merry Musick that resounds from far,
The pipe, the tabor,° and the trembling Croud,° drum / fiddle
That well agree withouten breach° or jar. break
But most of all the Damzels doe delite,
When they their tymbrels° smyte, tambourines
And thereunto doe daunce and carrol sweet,
That all the sences they doe ravish quite,
The whyles the boyes run up and downe the street,

---

[1] Tithones I.e., Tithonus, husband of Aurora, goddess of the dawn.

[2] Phoebus Phoebus Apollo, god of the sun.

[3] Mavis Song thrush; descant Accompaniment.

[4] Hesperus Morning star.

[5] Jove King of the gods.

[6] ye three … Queene The Cyprian Queen is Venus, goddess of love, and her handmaids are the Three Graces, who embody beauty, love, and pleasure.

[7] father … Muse Apollo was god of music and poetry.

Crying aloud with strong confusèd noyce,° noise
As if it were one voyce.
Hymen io° Hymen, Hymen they do shout, dear
That even to the heavens theyr shouting shrill
Doth reach, and all the firmament doth fill,
To which the people standing all about,
As in approvance doe thereto applaud
And loud advaunce her laud,° praise
And evermore they Hymen Hymen sing,
That al the woods them answer and theyr eccho ring.

Loe where she comes along with portly° pace majestic
Lyke Phoebe[1] from her chamber of the East,
Arysing forth to run her mighty race,
Clad all in white, that seemes° a virgin best. suits
So well it her beseemes that ye would weene° believe
Some angell she had beene.
Her long loose yellow locks lyke golden wyre, Sprinckled with perle, and perling flowres a tweene,° between
Doe lyke a golden mantle her attyre,
And being crownèd with a girland greene,
Seeme lyke some mayden Queene.
Her modest eyes abashèd to behold
So many gazers, as on her do stare,
Upon the lowly ground affixèd are.
Ne dare lift up her countenance too bold,
But blush to heare her prayses sung so loud,
So farre from being proud.
Nathlesse doe ye still loud her prayses sing.
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Tell me ye merchants daughters did ye see
So fayre a creature in your towne before,
So sweet, so lovely, and so mild as she,
Adornd with beautyes grace and vertues store,
Her goodly eyes lyke Saphyres shining bright,
Her forehead yvory white,
Her cheekes lyke apples which the sun hath rudded,° reddened
Her lips lyke cherryes charming men to byte,
Her brest like to a bowle of creame uncrudded,° unclotted
Her paps° lyke lyllies budded, breasts
Her snowie necke lyke to a marble towre,
And all her body like a pallace fayre,
Ascending uppe with many a stately stayre,
To honors seat and chastities sweet bowre.
Why stand ye still ye virgins in amaze,
Upon her so to gaze,
Whiles ye forget your former lay to sing,
To which the woods did answer and your eccho ring.

But if ye saw that which no eyes can see,
The inward beauty of her lively° spright,° living / spirit
Garnisht with heavenly guifts of high degree,
Much more then would ye wonder at that sight,
And stand astonisht lyke to those which red° beheld
Medusaes mazeful hed.[2]
There dwels sweet love and constant chastity,
Unspotted fayth and comely womanhood,
Regard of honour and mild modesty,
There vertue raynes as Queene in royal throne,
And giveth lawes alone.
The which the base affections doe obay,
And yeeld theyr services unto her will,
Ne thought of thing uncomely° ever may unseemly
Thereto approch to tempt her mind to ill.
Had ye once seene these her celestial threasures,
And unrevealèd pleasures,
Then would ye wonder and her prayses sing,
That al the woods should answer and your echo ring.

Open the temple gates unto my love,
Open them wide that she may enter in,
And all the postes adorne as doth behove,
And all the pillours deck with girlands trim,
For to recyve this Saynt with honour dew,
That commeth in to you.
With trembling steps and humble reverence,
She commeth in, before th'almighties vew,
Of her ye virgins learne obedience,
When so ye come into those holy places,
To humble your proud faces:
Bring her up to th'high altar that she may
The sacred ceremonies there partake,
The which do endlesse matrimony make,

---

[1] Phoebe Another name for Diana, virgin goddess of the moon.

[2] Medusaes mazeful hed Medusa was one of the Gorgons, three sister monsters, terrible to behold. Medusa's hair was made up of intertwined serpents, and when she was looked upon, her beholder would turn to stone. Renaissance commentators often read her as symbolizing amazing chastity.

And let the roring Organs loudly play
The praises of the Lord in lively notes,
The whiles with hollow throates
The Choristers the joyous Antheme sing,
That al the woods may answere and their eccho ring.

Behold whiles she before the altar stands
Hearing the holy priest that to her speakes
And blesseth her with his two happy hands,
How the red roses flush up in her cheekes,
And the pure snow with goodly° vermill° stayne, fair scarlet
Like crimsin dyde in grayne,[1]
That even th'Angels which continually,
About the sacred Altare doe remaine,
Forget their service and about her fly,
Ofte peeping in her face that seemes more fayre,
The more they on it stare.
But her sad° eyes still fastened on the ground, dignified
Are governèd with goodly modesty,
That suffers not one looke to glaunce awry,
Which may let in a little thought unsownd.
Why blush ye love to give to me your hand,
The pledge of all our band?° bond
Sing ye sweet Angels, Alleluya sing,
That all the woods may answere and your eccho ring.

Now al is done; bring home the bride againe,
Bring home the triumph of our victory,
Bring home with you the glory of her gaine,° having gained
With joyance bring her and with jollity.
Never had man more joyfull day then this,
Whom heaven would heape with blis.
Make feast therefore now all this live long day,
This day for ever to me holy is,
Poure out the wine without restraint or stay,° pause
Poure not by cups, but by the belly full,
Poure out to all that wull,° will
And sprinkle all the postes and wals with wine,
That they may sweat, and drunken be withall.
Crowne ye God Bacchus[2] with a coronall,° garland
And Hymen also crowne with wreathes of vine,
And let the Graces daunce unto the rest;
For they can doo it best:
The whiles the maydens doe theyr carroll sing,
To which the woods shal answer & theyr eccho ring.

Ring ye the bels, ye yong men of the towne,
And leave your wonted° labors for this day: habitual
This day is holy; doe ye write it downe,
That ye for ever it remember may.
This day the sunne is in his chiefest hight,
With Barnaby the bright,[3]
From whence declining daily by degrees,
He somewhat loseth of his heat and light,
When once the Crab[4] behind his back he sees.
But for this time it ill ordainèd was,
To chose the longest day in all the yeare,
And shortest night, when longest fitter weare:° were
Yet never day so long, but late° would passe. finally
Ring ye the bels, to make it weare° away, wear
And bonefiers° make all day, bonfires
And daunce about them, and about them sing:
That all the woods may answer, and your eccho ring.

Ah when will this long weary day have end,
And lende° me leave to come unto my love? grant
How slowly do the houres theyr numbers spend?
How slowly does sad Time his feathers move?
Hast thee O fayrest Planet[5] to thy home
Within the Westerne fome:° ocean
Thy tyred steedes long since have need of rest.
Long though it be, at last I see it gloome,° become dusk
And the bright evening star with golden creast° crest
Appeare out of the East.
Fayre childe of beauty, glorious lampe of love
That all the host of heaven in rankes doost lead,
And guydest lovers through the nightès dread,
How chearefully thou lookest from above,
And seemst to laugh atweene thy twinkling light
As joying in the sight
Of these glad many which for joy doe sing,
That all the woods them answer and their echo ring.

---

[1] in grayne Fast dyed.

[2] Bacchus God of wine.

[3] Barnaby the bright In the Julian Calendar St. Barnabas's Day, June 11, was the longest day of the year.

[4] the Crab Cancer, the constellation through which the sun passes toward the end of July.

[5] fayrest Planet The sun, which the god Apollo pulls in his horse-drawn chariot.

Now ceasse ye damsels your delights forepast;° past
Enough is it, that all the day was youres:
Now day is doen, and night is nighing° fast: coming
Now bring the Bryde into the brydall boures.
Now night is come, now soone her disaray,
And in her bed her lay;
Lay her in lillies and in violets,
And silken courteins over her display,
And odourd sheetes, and Arras° coverlets, tapestry
Behold how goodly my faire love does ly
In proud humility;
Like unto Maia,[1] when as Jove her tooke,
In Tempe,[2] lying on the flowry gras,
Twixt sleepe and wake, after she weary was,
With bathing in the Acidalian brooke.
Now it is night, ye damsels may be gon,
And leave my love alone,
And leave likewise your former lay to sing:
The woods no more shal answere, nor your echo ring.

Now welcome night, thou night so long expected,
That long daies labour doest at last defray,° repay
And all my cares, which cruell love collected,
Hast sumd in one, and cancellèd for aye:° ever
Spread thy broad wing over my love and me,
That no man may us see,
And in thy sable mantle us enwrap,
From feare of perrill and foule horror free.
Let no false treason seeke us to entrap,
Nor any dread disquiet once annoy
The safety of our joy:
But let the night be calme and quietsome,
Without tempestuous storms or sad afray:° fear
Lyke as when Jove with fayre Alcmena[3] lay,
When he begot the great Tirynthian groome:
Or lyke as when he with thy selfe° did lie, i.e., night
And begot Majesty.
And let the mayds and yongmen cease to sing:
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr eccho ring.

Let no lamenting cryes, nor dolefull teares,
Be heard all night within nor yet without:
Ne let false whispers, breeding hidden feares,
Breake gentle sleepe with misconceivèd dout.
Let no deluding dreames, nor dreadful sights
Make sudden sad affrights;
Ne let house fyres, nor lightnings helpelesse harmes,
Ne let the Pouke,[4] nor other evill sprights,
Ne let mischivous witches with theyr charmes,
Ne let hob Goblins, names whose sence we see not,
Fray us with things that be not.
Let not the shriech° Oule, nor the Storke be heard: screech
Nor the night Raven that still° deadly yels,[5] always Nor damnèd ghosts cald up with mighty spels,
Nor griesly° vultures make us once affeard: ghastly
Ne let th'unpleasant Quyre° of Frogs still croking choir
Make us to wish theyr choking.
Let none of these theyr drery accents sing;
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr eccho ring.

But let stil Silence trew night watches keepe,
That sacred peace may in assurance rayne,
And tymely sleep, when it is tyme to sleepe,
May poure his limbs forth on your pleasant playne,
The whiles an hundred little wingèd loves,[6]
Like divers° fethered doves, diverse
Shall fly and flutter round about your bed,
And in the secret darke, that none reproves,
Their prety stealthes shal worke, & snares shal spread
To filch away sweet snatches of delight,
Conceald through covert night.
Ye sonnes of Venus, play your sports at will,
For greedy pleasure, carelesse of your toyes,° games
Thinks more upon her paradise of joyes,
Then what ye do, albe it good or ill.
All night therefore attend your merry play,
For it will soone be day:
Now none doth hinder you, that say or sing,
Ne will the woods now answer, nor your Eccho ring.

---

[1] Maia Eldest daughter of Atlas, who gave birth to Mercury after being seduced by Jove.

[2] Tempe Vale of Tempe, in Thessaly.

[3] Alcmena Mother of Hercules, with whom Jove lay for three nights.

[4] Pouke Puck, or Robin Goodfellow, a mischievous fairy.

[5] Let not … yels The owl was said to be a harbinger of death and the raven to be a bad omen; the stork, according to Chaucer, was an avenger of adultery.

[6] wingèd loves Cupids.

Who is the same, which at my window peepes?
Or whose is that faire face, that shines so bright,
Is it not Cinthia,[1] she that never sleepes,
But walkes about high heaven al the night?
O fayrest goddesse, do thou not envy
My love with me to spy:
For thou likewise didst love, though now unthought,
And for a fleece of woll,° which privily, wool
The Latmian shephard[2] once unto thee brought,
His pleasures with thee wrought.
Therefore to us be favorable now;
And sith° of wemens labours thou hast charge, since
And generation goodly dost enlarge,
Encline they will t'effect our wishfull vow,
And the chast wombe informe° with timely seed, impregnate
That may our comfort breed:
Till which we cease our hopefull hap° to sing, hoped for good fortune
Ne let the woods us answere, nor our Eccho ring.

And thou great Juno,[3] which with awful might
The lawes of wedlock still dost patronize,
And the religion° of the faith first plight worship
With sacred rites hast taught to solemnize:
And eeke for comfort often callèd art
Of women in their smart,° pain
Eternally bind thou this lovely band,
And all thy blessings unto us impart.
And thou glad Genius, in whose gentle hand,
The bridale bowre and geniall° bed remaine, nuptial
Without blemish or staine,
And the sweet pleasures of theyr loves delight.
With secret ayde doest succour° and supply, assist
Till they bring forth the fruitfull progeny,
Send us the timely fruit of this same night.
And thou fayre Hebe,[4] and thou Hymen free,
Grant that it may so be.
Til which we cease your further prayse to sing,
Ne any woods shal answer, nor your Eccho ring.

And ye high heavens, the temple of the gods,
In which a thousand torches flaming bright
Doe burne, that to us wretched earthly clods:
In dreadful darknesse lend desirèd light;
And all ye powers which in the same remayne,
More then we men can fayne,° desire
Poure out your blessing on us plentiously,
And happy influence upon us raine,
That we may raise a large posterity,
Which from the earth, which they may long possesse,
With lasting happinesse,
Up to your haughty° pallaces may mount, lofty
And for the guerdon° of theyr glorious merit reward
May heavenly tabernacles there inherit,
Of blessed Saints for to increase the count.
So let us rest, sweet love, in hope of this,
And cease till then our tymely joyes to sing,
The woods no more us answer, nor our eccho ring.

Song made in lieu of many ornaments,
With which my love should duly have bene dect,° decked
Which cutting off through hasty accidents,
Ye would not stay your dew time to expect,° await
But promist both to recompens,
Be unto her a goodly ornament,
And for short time an endlesse moniment.
—1594

---

[1] Cinthia Diana, goddess of the moon and childbirth.

[2] Latmian shephard Endymion, whom Diana loved.

[3] Juno Goddess of marriage and wife of Jove.

[4] Hebe Goddess of youth and spring.

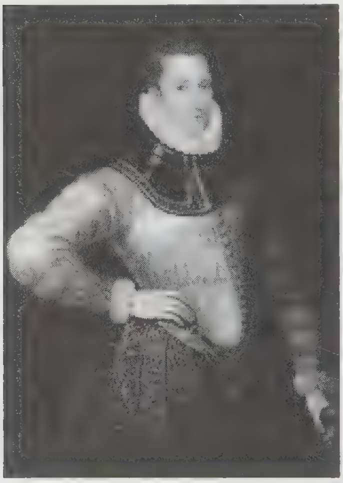
SIR PHILIP SIDNEY

1554 – 1586

Sir Philip Sidney remains not only a famous writer but an example of the complete Renaissance courtier. He was the author of the sonnet sequence Astrophil and Stella, of the prose romance Arcadia and of An Apology for Poetry (also known as A Defence of Poesy), the first extended work of literary criticism in English. Sidney's writings are witty, eloquent, and imaginative in their marriage of English style and the Renaissance genres and ideals embraced by artists in Italy, France, and Spain. Sidney was also a courtier, diplomat, and gentleman-soldier renowned for his courtesy; according to a probably apocryphal story, when wounded on the battlefield and offered water, he saw a thirsty foot-soldier eying the bottle longingly and told him to take it, saying "Thy necessity is yet greater than mine."



Sidney was born on 30 November 1554, the eldest son of Sir Henry Sidney and Lady Mary Dudley. Although his family was not rich by the standards of the nobility, his birth placed him in an élite circle: his father, at one point Viceroy of Ireland, had been a friend of Edward VI; his godfather was Philip II of Spain, for whom he was named; and his uncle, Robert Dudley, was the powerful Earl of Leicester, the royal favorite who had courted Elizabeth and whom the Queen certainly loved. Sidney's education befitted one of his class. He entered Shrewsbury School in 1564, was taught there by the learned Thomas Ashton, and in 1568 entered Christ Church, Oxford, where he remained until he was 17. He left without a degree, as was often done, and was sent on a tour of Europe to learn about the languages and circumstances of other countries. This trip was to be highly beneficial for the young Sidney: it sparked a fascination with Continental ideas, and the important figures he befriended in the political, philosophical, and scholarly worlds helped shape his mind and career.

Sidney's cosmopolitanism also earned him some favor at court. In 1572 he was a junior member of a special embassy to France's Charles IX. While in Paris, Sidney witnessed the horrifying St. Bartholomew's Day massacre in which many Huguenots (French Protestants) were slaughtered. The event left its mark on him, confirming his passionate, if hardly narrow-minded, Protestantism. He continued his travels around Europe, studying for a while at the University of Padua and visiting Vienna, Frankfurt, and Prague. He returned to England in May 1575, finding service with the Queen and gaining a reputation as an excellent diplomat.

Although Sidney's writing took second place to his political service, he influenced the literary world by encouraging other writers such as Edward Dyer, Fulke Greville (who later wrote his biography), and the young Edmund Spenser, who dedicated his Shepheardes Calender (1579) to him. Sidney's own first known work is The Lady of May (1578), a masque he composed for a royal visit; it featured the Queen herself.

Knowing his talent as a persuasive writer, the political faction headed by the Earl of Leicester and Sir Francis Walsingham, an important royal advisor and director of the secret service whose daughter was to marry Sidney, asked Philip to write a letter to Elizabeth opposing her marriage plans. Throughout the 1570s Spain had been gathering political and military power, so as a counterbalance some in England and France suggested an alliance between the two nations to be cemented by a match between Elizabeth and the Duke of Alençon, brother of the French king (who had himself once courted the English queen). In his letter Sidney reminds the queen of the duke's role in the murder of Huguenots and urges her not to marry a foreign and Catholic prince. It used to be thought that Elizabeth was highly displeased at this gesture: John Stubbs, Puritan gentleman, printed a pamphlet that contained similar advice and was severely punished. Sidney, however, was doing his duty as a courtier, and there is no evidence that the Queen resented his letter. He did fall out with the Earl of Oxford in a tennis-court quarrel and, given the Earl's murderous proclivities, seems to have thought it safer to stay with his sister Mary and her husband, the Earl of Pembroke, at their Wiltshire manor for a year. There he composed verses, translated a few Huguenot texts and some psalms, and wrote A Defence of Poesy (published in 1595). In this last, Sidney sets out a more wide-ranging and substantial theory of literature and criticism than any that had yet appeared in English, lightened by urbane humor and touches of self-mockery and with elements of paradox (Sidney smilingly claims to prove the distorting power of self-love by showing how he, a poet, can praise poetry). By "poetry" Sidney means fictions, products of the imagination, which he insists are more psychologically compelling than the historian's facts or the philosopher's moral abstractions. He also comments on particular authors and works, and compares modern English literature to that of ancient Greece and Rome. His assessment of the English play Gorboduc is the first sustained critical discussion of a literary work in English.

In writing his poetic work Astrophil and Stella, and despite his claim not to be a "pickpurse of another's wit," Sidney had before him a major Continental model—the Petrarchan sonnet sequence. Although Sidney's own contribution to, and revision of, the genre was not printed until five years after his death, the sonnets had been circulating in manuscript. Their publication in 1591 launched a brief but intense fashion for sonnet sequences. Sidney's longest work, The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, a pastoral romance with elements of epic and drama, recounts the romantic and martial adventures of two Greek princes, Musidorus and Pyrocles. Mixed in with the five books of prose narrative are a number of pastoral poems that sometimes experiment with classical meters. Ostensibly begun as entertainment for the author's sister, Sidney revised what is now called "The Old Arcadia" (lost until 1908), increasing the work's epic possibilities and political significance; he was part way through this version, now called "The New Arcadia," when he died. In 1590 his sister Mary published The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, a hybrid volume with the revised first part and the unrevised later part; it was this version that became popular and influential in England and even on the Continent.

In the early 1580s Sidney was knighted, named Joint Master of the Ordnance, and later charged with helping the English prepare an expedition to aid the Dutch in their revolt against Spain. In 1585 he was appointed Governor of Flushing, a town in the Netherlands that the English used as a base of operations, where he participated in several successful armed forays against the Spanish. On 22 September 1586, during a skirmish with Spanish forces outside the Dutch town of Zutphen, Sidney was shot in the thigh. The wound became gangrenous, and Sidney died of the infection on 17 October 1586. A flurry of grieving poetry was to follow and in February 1587 the body was brought home and given a magnificent funeral—an occasion designed in part to stir public patriotism and encourage support for the struggle against Spain. A fine poet had died but a legend had been born.

⌘⌘⌘

from Astrophil and Stella

A B A B A B C D C C C E

1

Loving in truth, and fain° in verse my love desiring to show, a
That she, dear she,[1] might take some pleasure of my pain, b
unrequited love
Pleasure might cause her read, reading might make her know, a
Knowledge might pity win, and pity grace obtain, b
I sought fit words to paint the blackest face of woe, a
Studying inventions fine, her wits to entertain, b
Oft turning others' leaves, to see if thence would flow a
Some fresh and fruitful showers upon my sun-burned brain. b
But words came halting forth, wanting Invention's stay;° c support
Invention, Nature's child, fled step-dame Study's blows, d
And others' feet still seemed but strangers in my way. c
Thus, great with child to speak, and helpless in my throes, d
Biting my truant pen, beating myself for spite, e
"Fool," said my Muse to me, "look in thy heart and write." e

2

Not at first sight, nor with a dribbèd° shot, A faulty Love[2] gave the wound which while I breathe will bleed.
But known worth did in mine[3] of time proceed,
'Till by degrees it had full conquest got.
I saw and liked, I liked but lovèd not,
I loved, but straight did not what Love decreed. B
At length to Love's decrees I—forced—agreed,
Yet with repining at so partial° lot. A unequal
Now even that footstep of lost liberty C
Is gone, and now like slave-born Muscovite. D
I call it praise to suffer tyranny; C
And now employ the remnant of my wit. D
To make myself believe that all is well, E
While with a feeling skill I paint my hell. E

Quatrain
Couplet

7

When Nature made her chief work, Stella's eyes,
In colour black, why wrapped she beams so bright?
Would she in beamy black, like painter wise,
Frame daintiest lustre mixed of shades and light?
Or did she else that sober hue devise,
In object[4] best to knit and strength our sight,
Lest if no veil these brave gleams did disguise,
They, sun-like, should more dazzle than delight?
Or would she her miraculous power show,
That whereas black seems beauty's contrary,
She e'en in black doth make all beauties flow?
Both so, and thus, she, minding° Love, remembering should be Placed ever there, gave him this mourning weed° garment
To honour all their deaths who for her bleed.

18 disgraced

With what sharp checks I in myself am shent[5]
When into Reason's audit I do go;
And by just counts myself a bankrout° know bankrupt
Of all those goods which Heaven to me hath lent.
Unable quite to pay even Nature's rent,
Which unto it by birthright I do owe.
And which is worse, no good excuse can show,
But that my wealth I have most idly spent.
My youth doth waste, my knowledge brings forth toys,[6]
My wit doth strive those passions to defend,
Which for reward spoil it with vain annoys.[7]
I see my course to lose myself doth bend.
I see, and yet no greater sorrow take
Than that I lose no more for Stella's sake.

20

Fly, fly, my friends, I have my death wound; fly!
See there that boy, that murdering boy° I say, Cupid
Who like a thief, hid in dark bush doth lie,
Till bloody bullet get him wrongful prey.
So tyrant he no fitter place could spy,

---

[1] That she, dear she In the 1591 edition, this phrase is "That the dear she."

[2] Love Cupid.

[3] mine Subterranean passage dug under an enemy fortress.

[4] In object With the goal.

[5] sharp checks Reproaches; shent Disgraced.

[6] toys Frivolous pieces of writing.

[7] annoys Irritations.

Nor so fair level[1] in so secret stay,
As that sweet black which veils the heav'nly eye:
There himself with his shot he close doth lay.
Poor passenger,° pass now thereby I did, passer-by
And stayed pleased with the prospect of the place,
While that black hue from me the bad guest hid:
But straight I saw motions of lightning grace,
And then descried the glist'ring of his dart:
But ere I could fly hence, it pierced my heart.

21

Your words, my friend, (right healthful caustics[2]) blame
My young mind marred, whom Love doth windlass° so, ensnare
That mine own writings like bad servants show
My wits, quick in vain thoughts, in virtue lame;
That Plato[3] I read for nought, but if° he tame unless Such doltish gyres;° that to my birth I owe circles
Nobler desires, lest else that friendly foe,
Great expectation, were a train of shame.
For since mad March great promise made of me,
If now the May of my years much decline,
What can be hoped my harvest time will be?
Sure you say well, "Your wisdom's golden mine,
Dig deep with learning's spade." Now tell me this,
Hath this world aught so fair as Stella is?

22

In highest way of heav'n the Sun did ride,
Progressing then from fair twins' golden place:[4]
Having no scarf of clouds before his face,
But shining forth of heat in his chief pride;
When some fair ladies by hard promise tied,
On horseback met him in his furious race,
Yet each prepared with fan's well-shading grace
From that foe's wounds° their tender skins sunburn to hide.
Stella alone with face unarmed marched.
Either to do like him which open shone,
Or careless of the wealth because her own:
Yet were the hid and meaner beauties parch'd,
Her daintiest bare went free; the cause was this,
The Sun, which others burned, did her but kiss.

23

The curious wits seeing dull pensiveness
Bewray° itself in my long settled eyes, reveal
Whence those same fumes of melancholy rise,
With idle pains, and missing aim, do guess.
Some that know how my spring I did address,
Deem that my Muse some fruit of knowledge plies:
Others, because the Prince° my service tries, the Queen
Think that I think state errors to redress.
But harder judges judge ambition's rage,
Scourge of itself, still climbing slipp'ry place,
Holds my young brain cativ'd° in golden cage. captive
Oh fools, or over-wise, alas the race
Of all my thoughts hath neither stop nor start,
But only Stella's eyes and Stella's heart.

24

Rich fools there be, whose base and filthy heart
Lies hatching still the goods wherein they flow:
And damning their own selves to Tantal's smart,[5]
Wealth breeding want, more blist° more blessed wretched grow.
Yet to those fools heav'n such wit doth impart
As what their hands do hold, their heads do know,
And knowing love, and loving, lay apart,
As sacred things, far from all danger's show.
But that rich fool[6] who by blind Fortune's lot
The richest gem of love and life enjoys,
And can with foul abuse such beauties blot;
Let him, deprived of sweet but unfelt joys, (Exiled for aye° from those high treasures, which ever
He knows not) grow in only folly rich.

---

[1] so fair level So well take aim.

[2] right healthful caustics Truly life-giving corrosives.

[3] Plato Plato likened reason to a charioteer of the passions.

[4] fair twins' golden place Gemini, the sign from which the sun emerges in June.

[5] Tantal's smart The torment of Tantalus, the miser, who was condemned to perpetual thirst even amid water.

[6] that rich fool Lord Rich, the husband of Penelope Devereaux (Sidney's Stella).

25

The wisest scholar[1] of the wight° most wise man
By Phoebus' doom,[2] with sugared sentence says,
That Virtue, if it once met with our eyes,
Strange flames of love it in our souls would raise;
But for that man with pain his truth descries,
While he each thing in sense's balance weighs,
And so nor will, nor can behold those skies
Which inward sun to heroic mind displays,
Virtue of late with virtuous care to stir° encourage Love of herself, took Stella's shape, that she
To mortal eyes might sweetly shine in her.
It is most true, for since I her did see,
Virtue's great beauty in that face I prove,
And find th'effect, for I do burn in love.

26

Though dusty° wits dare scorn astrology, earthbound
And fools can think those lamps° of purest light stars
Whose numbers, ways, greatness, eternity,
Promising wonders, wonder do invite,
To have for no cause birthright in the sky,
But for to spangle the black weeds of night:
Or for some brawl,° which in that chamber high, country dance
They should still dance to please a gazer's sight;
For me, I do Nature unidle know,
And know great causes, great effects procure:
And know those bodies high reign on the low.
And if these rules did fail, proof° makes me sure, experience
Who oft fore-judge my after-following race,
By only those two stars in Stella's face.

27

Because I oft in dark abstracted guise
Seem most alone in greatest company,
With dearth of words, or answers quite awry,
To them that would make speech of speech arise,
They deem, and of their doom the rumour flies,
That poison foul of bubbling pride doth lie
So in my swelling breast that only I
Fawn on myself, and others do despise:
Yet pride I think doth not my soul possess,
Which looks too oft in his unflatt'ring glass:° mirror
But one worse fault, ambition, I confess,
That makes me oft my best friends overpass,
Unseen, unheard, while though to highest place
Bends all his powers, even° unto Stella's grace. only

31

With how sad steps, oh Moon, thou climb'st the skies,
How silently, and with how wan° a face. pale
What, may it be, that even in heav'nly place
That busy archer° his sharp arrows tries? Cupid
Sure, if that long-with-love-acquainted eyes
Can judge of love, thou feel'st a lover's case;
I read it in thy looks; thy languished grace
To me that feel the like, thy state descries.° reveals
Then ev'n of fellowship, oh Moon, tell me
Is constant love deemed there but want of wit?
Are beauties there as proud as here they be?
Do they above love to be loved, and yet
Those lovers scorn whom that love doth possess?
Do they call virtue there ungratefulness?

34

Come, let me write. "And to what end?" To ease
A burdened heart. "How can words ease, which are
The glasses of thy daily vexing care?"
Oft cruel fights well-pictured forth do please.
"Art not ashamed to publish[3] thy disease?"
Nay, that may breed my fame, it is so rare.
"But will not wise men think thy words fond ware?"[4]
Then be they close,° and so none shall displease. concealed
"What idler thing than speak and not be heard?"
What harder thing than smart and not to speak?
Peace, foolish wit, with wit my wit is marred.
Thus write I while I doubt[5] to write, and wreak
My harms on ink's poor loss. Perhaps some find Stella's great pow'rs that so confuse my mind.

39

Come, Sleep! O Sleep, the certain knot of peace,
The baiting place of wit, the balm of woe,
The poor man's wealth, the prisoner's release,
Th' indifferent° judge 'tween the high and low. impartial

---

[1] wisest scholar Plato was the pupil of Socrates.

[2] By Phoebus' doom Judged most wise by the oracle of Apollo at Delphi.

[3] publish Make public.

[4] fond ware Frivolities.

[5] doubt Hesitate.

With shield of proof shield me from out the press
Of those fierce darts Despair at me doth throw.
O make in me those civil wars to cease;
I will good tribute pay, if thou do so.
Take thou of me smooth pillows, sweetest bed,
A chamber deaf to noise and blind to light,
A rosy garland, and a weary head.
And if these things, as being thine by right,
Move not thy heavy grace, thou shalt in me,
Livelier than elsewhere, Stella's image see.

41

Having this day my horse, my hand, my lance
Guided so well, that I obtained the prize,
Both by the judgment of the English eyes,
And of some sent from that sweet enemy France;[1]
Horsemen my skill in horsemanship advance,
Town-folks my strength; a daintier° judge applies more discerning
His praise to sleight,° which from good use doth rise; dexterity
Some lucky wits impute it but to chance;
Others, because of both sides I do take
My blood from them who did excel in this,[2]
Think Nature me a man of arms did make.
How far they shot awry! The true cause is,
Stella looked on, and from her heav'nly face
Sent forth the beams, which made so fair my race.

45

Stella oft sees the very face of woe
Painted in my beclouded stormy face,
But cannot skill[3] to pity my disgrace,
Not though thereof the cause herself she know.
Yet hearing late a fable which did show
Of lovers never known a grievous case,
Pity thereof gate° in her breast such place got
That, from that sea derived, tears' spring did flow.
Alas, if fancy, drawn by imagined things,
Though false, yet with free scope more grace doth breed
Than servant's[4] wrack, where new doubts honor brings,
Then think, my dear, that you in me do read
Of lover's ruin some sad tragedy:
I am not I; pity the tale of me.

47

What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?
Can those black beams such burning marks[5] engrave
In my free side? or am I born a slave,
Whose neck becomes[6] such yoke of tyranny?
Or want° I sense to feel my misery? lack
Or sprite,° disdain of such disdain to have, spirit
Who for long faith, though daily help I crave,
May get no alms but scorn of beggery?
Virtue awake, beauty but beauty is;
I may, I must, I can, I will, I do
Leave following that, which it is gain to miss.
Let her go. Soft, but here she comes. "Go to, Unkind, I love you not." Oh me, that eye
Doth make my heart give to my tongue the lie.

48

Soul's joy, bend not those morning stars from me,
Where Virtue is made strong by Beauty's might,
Where Love is chasteness, Pain doth learn delight,
And Humbleness grows one with Majesty.
Whatever may ensue, oh let me be
Copartner of the riches of that sight:
Let not mine eyes be hell-driv'n from that light:
Oh look, oh shine, oh let me die and see.
For though I oft my self of them bemoan,
That through my heart their beamy darts be gone,
Whose cureless wounds ev'n now most freshly bleed:
Yet since my death-wound is already got,
Dear killer, spare not thy sweet cruel shot:
A kind of grace it is to slay with speed.

49

I on my horse, and Love on me doth try
Our horsemanships, while by strange work I prove
A horseman to my horse, a horse to Love;

---

[1] that sweet enemy France French emissaries sent by the Duke of Anjou to negotiate a match with Queen Elizabeth. Sidney participated in a tournament at court to honor the delegation in April, 1581.

[2] both sides ... this Both sides of Sidney's family were distinguished in war and chivalry.

[3] cannot skill Is unable.

[4] servant's I.e., the lover's.

[5] burning marks Permanent scars seared into him by Stella's eyes.

[6] becomes Is suited to.

And now man's wrongs in me, poor beast, descry.° discover
The reins wherewith my rider doth me tie,
Are humbled thoughts, which bit of reverence move,
Curbed in with fear, but with gilt boss[1] above
Of hope, which makes it seem fair to the eye.
The wand° is will; thou, fancy, saddle art,[2] crop
Girt° fast by memory; and while I spur fastened
My horse, he spurs with sharp desire my heart:
He sits me fast, however I do stir:
And now hath made me to his hand so right,[3]
That in the manage[4] myself takes delight.

50

Stella, the fullness of my thoughts of thee
Cannot be stayed within my panting breast,
But they do swell and struggle forth of me,
Till that in words thy figure be expressed.
And yet as soon as they so formed be,
According to my Lord Love's own behest:
With sad eyes I their weak proportion see,
To portrait° that which in this world is best. portray
So that I cannot choose but write my mind,
And cannot choose but put out what I write,
While these poor babes[5] their death in birth do find:
And now my pen these lines had dashed quite,
But that they stopped his fury from the same,
Because their forefront bare sweet Stella's name.[6]

51

Pardon mine ears, both I and they do pray,° ask earnestly
So may your tongue still fluently proceed,
To them that do such entertainment need,
So may you still have somewhat new to say.
On silly me do not the burden lay
Of all the grave conceits[7] your brain doth breed;
But find some Hercules to bear, instead
Of Atlas tired, your wisdom's heav'nly sway.
For me, while you discourse of courtly tides,
Of cunning fishers in most troubled streams,[8]
Of straying ways, when valiant error guides:
Meanwhile my heart confers with Stella's beams,
And is even irked that so sweet comedy,[9]
By such unsuited speech should hindered be.

52

A strife is grown between Virtue and Love,
While each pretends° that Stella must be his. declares
Her eyes, her lips, her all, saith Love, do this Since they do wear his badge, most firmly prove.
But Virtue thus that title doth disprove:
That Stella (oh dear name) that Stella is
That virtuous soul, sure heir of heav'nly bliss,
Not this fair outside, which our hearts doth move.
And therefore, though her beauty and her grace
Be Love's indeed, in Stella's self he may
By no pretense claim any manner° place. kind of
Well, Love, since this demur our suit doth stay,[10]
Let Virtue have that Stella's self; yet thus,
That Virtue but that body grant to us.

53

In martial sports I had my cunning tried,
And yet to break more staves° did me address: lances
While, with the people's shouts, I must confess,
Youth, luck, and praise, ev'n filled my veins with pride;
When Cupid having me his slave descried,° discerned
In Mars's livery, prancing in the press:[11]
"What now, Sir Fool," said he; I would no less.[12]
"Look here, I say." I look'd and Stella spied,
Who hard by made a window send forth light.
My heart then quaked, then dazzled were mine eyes;
One hand forgot to rule,[13] th'other to fight.
Nor trumpet's sound I heard, nor friendly cries;

---

[1] gilt boss Metal knob on the bit.

[2] thou, fancy, saddle art You, imagination, are the saddle.

[3] to his hand so right Respond so sensitively to his hand.

[4] the manage The process of training, management.

[5] these poor babes The poems.

[6] Because their … name Because Stella is the first word of the sonnet, it preserves the poem from destruction.

[7] grave conceits Serious ideas.

[8] cunning fishers … streams Courtiers currying favor amid political turmoil.

[9] sweet comedy Pleasant reflections.

[10] demur Objection; stay Halt.

[11] livery Uniform; press Throng.

[12] I would no less I would like the same attention that you give Mars.

[13] to rule To control the horse.

My foe came on, and beat the air for me,[1]
Till that her blush taught me my shame to see.

54

Because I breathe not love to every one,
Nor do not use set colours[2] for to wear,
Nor nourish special locks of vowed hair,[3]
Nor give each speech the full point of a groan,
The courtly nymphs,[4] acquainted with the moan
Of them, who in their lips Love's standard° bear; distinctive flag
"What he?" say they of me. "Now I dare swear,
He cannot love. No, no, let him alone."
And think so still, so Stella know my mind.
Profess indeed I do not Cupid's art;
But you, fair maids, at length this true shall find:
That his right° badge is worn but in the heart; true
Dumb swans, not chatt'ring pies,[5] do lovers prove;
They love indeed, who quake to say they love.

55

Muses, I oft invoked your holy aid,
With choicest flow'rs my speech t'engarland so
That it, despised in true but naked show,[6]
Might win some grace in your sweet skill arrayed.
And oft whole troops of saddest words I stayed,° held back
Striving abroad a-foraging to go,
Until by your inspiring I might know
How their black banner° might be best displayed. sad aspect
But now I mean no more your help to try,
Nor other sug'ring of my speech to prove,
But on her name incessantly to cry:
For let me but name her whom I do love,
So sweet sounds straight mine ear and heart do hit,
That I well find no eloquence like it.

61

Oft with true sighs, oft with uncallèd tears,
Now with slow words, now with dumb eloquence,
I Stella's eyes assail, invade her ears,
But this at last is her sweet-breathed defense:
That who indeed in-felt affection bears,
So captives to his saint both soul and sense,
That wholly hers, all selfness° he forbears; self-centeredness
Thence his desires he learns, his life's course thence.
Now, since her chaste mind hates this love in me,
With chastened mind I straight must show that she Shall quickly me from what she hates remove.
O Doctor[7] Cupid, thou for me reply,
Driven else to grant, by angel's sophistry,[8]
That I love not without I leave to love.

69

O joy too high for my low style to show!
O bliss fit for a nobler state than me!
Envy, put out thine eyes, lest thou do see
What oceans of delight in me do flow.
My friend, that oft saw, through all masks, my woe,
Come, come, and let me pour myself on thee.
Gone is the winter of my misery,
My spring appears, O see what here doth grow.
For Stella hath with words where faith doth shine,
Of her high heart given me the monarchy.
I, I, O I may say that she is mine!
And though she give but thus condition'ly
This realm of bliss, while virtuous course I take,
No kings be crowned but they some covenants make.

71

Who will in fairest book of Nature know
How Virtue may best lodged in beauty be,
Let him but learn of love to read in thee,
Stella, those fair lines which true goodness show.
There shall he find all vices' overthrow,
Not by rude force, but sweetest sovereignty
Of reason, from whose light those night-birds fly,
That inward sun in thine eyes shineth so.
And not content to be Perfection's heir,
Thyself, dost strive all minds that way to move,
Who mark in thee what is in thee most fair.

---

[1] beat the air for me Struck at the empty air instead of me.

[2] set colours The usual colors of a lover.

[3] nourish special … hair Keep special locks of hair given as a pledge.

[4] courtly nymphs Women at court.

[5] Dumb Silent; pies Magpies.

[6] despised in … show Despised for being plain, though sincere.

[7] Doctor One who is well educated and highly knowledgeable.

[8] sophistry Clever but fallacious reasoning.

So while thy beauty draws thy heart to love,
As fast thy virtue bends that love to good.
"But ah," Desire still cries, "Give me some food."

94

Grief find the words, for thou hast made my brain
So dark with misty vapours, which arise
From out thy heavy mould, that inbent[1] eyes
Can scarce discern the shape of mine own pain.
Do thou then (for thou canst), do thou complain,° lament
For my poor soul, which now that sickness tries,[2]
Which ev'n to sense, sense of itself denies,
Though harbingers of death lodge there his train.
Or if thy love of plaint° yet mine forbears, lamentation
As of a caitiff[3] worthy so to die,
Yet wail thyself, and wail with causeful tears,
That though in wretchedness thy life doth lie,
Yet growest more wretched than thy nature bears,
By being placed in such a wretch as I.

95

Yet Sighs, dear Sighs, indeed true friends you are,
That do not leave your least friend at the worst,
But as you with my breast I oft have nursed,
So grateful now you wait upon my care.
Faint coward Joy no longer tarry dare,
Seeing Hope yield when this woe strake° him first: struck
Delight protests he is not for th'accursed,
Though oft himself my mate-in-arms he sware.[4]
Nay Sorrow comes with such main rage, that he Kills his own children, Tears, finding that they
By love were made apt to consort with me.
Only, true Sighs, you do not go away;
Thank may you have for such a thankful part,
Thank-worthiest yet when you shall break my heart.

96

Thought, with good cause thou lik'st so well the Night,
Since kind or chance gives both one livery,[5]
Both sadly black, both blackly darkened be,
Night barred from sun, thou from thy own sunlight;
Silence in both displays his sullen might,
Slow Heaviness in both holds one degree—[6]
That full of doubts, thou of perplexity;
Thy tears express Night's native moisture right.[7]
In both a mazeful° solitariness: bewildering
In Night of sprites° the ghastly powers to stir, spirits
In thee, or sprites or sprited ghastliness.
But, but (alas) Night's side the odds hath, fur,°[8] far
For that° at length yet doth invite some rest, night
Thou, though still tired, yet still dost it° detest. rest

97

Dian,[9] that fain would cheer her friend the Night,
Shows her oft at the full her fairest face,
Bringing with her those starry nymphs, whose chase° arrows
From heav'nly standing hits each mortal wight.[10]
But ah, poor Night, in love with Phoebus'[11] light,
And endlessly despairing of his grace,
Herself (to show no other joy hath place)
Silent and sad in mourning weeds doth dight:[12]
Ev'n so (alas) a lady, Dian's peer,
With choice delights and rarest company
Would fain° drive clouds from out my heavy cheer. gladly
But woe is me, though Joy itself were she,
She could not show my blind brain ways of joy,
While I despair my[13] Sun's sight to enjoy.

98

Ah bed, the field where joy's peace some do see,
The field where all my thoughts to war be trained,° drawn
How is thy grace by my strange fortune stained!
How thy lee° shores by my sighs stormed be! sheltered
With sweet soft shades° thou oft invitest me shadows

---

[1] inbent Inward-looking.

[2] sickness tries Lovesickness triumphs.

[3] caitiff Despicable person.

[4] sware Swore he was.

[5] kind Nature; livery Aspect.

[6] one degree Similar sway.

[7] Thy tears … right Thought's tears reveal night's natural dampness.

[8] fur Far. (Spelled by Sidney this way to rhyme with "stir.")

[9] Dian Diana, goddess of the moon.

[10] standing Position; wight Man.

[11] Phoebus' The sun god's.

[12] weeds Clothes; dight Dress.

[13] despair my Despair of my.

To steal some rest, but wretch I am constrained (Spurred with Love's spur, though galled and shortly reined[1]
With Care's hard hand) to turn and toss in thee.
While the black horrors of the silent night
Paint woe's black face so lively to my sight,
That tedious leisure marks each wrinkled line.
But when Aurora leads out Phoebus' dance,[2]
Mine eyes then only wink,° for spite perchance, close
That worms should have their Sun, and I want mine.

99

When far-spent night persuades each mortal eye,
To whom nor° art nor nature granteth light, neither
To lay his then mark-wanting° shafts of sight, aimless
Closed with their quivers, in sleep's armory;
With windows° ope then most my mind doth lie, eyes
Viewing the shape of darkness and delight,
Takes in that sad hue, which the inward night
Of his mazed powers[3] keeps perfect harmony.
But when birds charm,[4] and that sweet air which is Morn's messenger, with rose enamel'd skies,
Calls each wight° to salute the flower of bliss: person
In tomb of lids then buried are mine eyes,
Forced by their lord, who is ashamed to find
Such light in sense,[5] with such a darkened mind.

100

Oh tears, no° tears, but rain from Beauty's skies, not Making those lilies and those roses[6] grow,
Which aye° most fair, now more than most fair show, always
While graceful Pity Beauty beautifies.
Oh honeyed sighs, which from that breast do rise,
Whose pants do make unspilling cream to flow,
Winged with whose breath, so pleasing zephyrs blow,
As can refresh the hell where my soul fries.
Oh plaints° conserved in such a sugared phrase complaints
That Eloquence itself envies your praise
While sobbed-out words a perfect music give.
Such tears, sighs, plaints, no sorrow is, but joy:
Or if such heav'nly signs must prove annoy,
All mirth farewell, let me in sorrow live.

101

Stella is sick, and in that sickbed lies
Sweetness, that breathes and pants as oft as she;
And Grace, sick too, such fine conclusions[7] tries
That Sickness brags itself best graced to be.[8]
Beauty is sick, but sick in so fair guise
That is that paleness Beauty's white we see;
And Joy, which is inseparate° from those eyes, inseparable
Stella now learns (strange case) to weep in thee.
Love moves[9] thy pain, and like a faithful page,
As thy looks stir, runs up and down to make
All folks pressed° at thy will thy pain t'assuage. eager
Nature with care sweats for her darling's sake,
Knowing worlds pass, ere she enough can find
Of such heav'n stuff,° to clothe so heav'nly mind. matter

102

Where be those roses gone, which sweetened so our eyes?
Where those red cheeks, which oft with fair increase did frame
The height of honour in the kindly° badge of shame? pleasant
Who hath the crimson weeds° stol'n from my morning skies? clouds
How doth the colour fade of those vermilion° dyes scarlet
Which Nature's self did make, and self engrained° the same? dyed fast
I would know by what right this paleness overcame
That hue, whose force my heart still unto thraldom ties.
Galen's adoptive sons,[10] who by a beaten way
Their judgments hackney on, the fault of sickness lay;
But feeling proof makes me say they mistake it fur:° far
It is but Love, which makes his paper perfect white

---

[1] galled Sore, chafed; shortly reined Reined in tight.

[2] Aurora Goddess of the dawn; Phoebus' dance The sun's dance, daylight.

[3] mazed powers Bewildered thoughts.

[4] charm Sing in chorus.

[5] light in sense Light available to the senses.

[6] those lilies and those roses The colors of Stella's cheeks.

[7] fine conclusions Delicate trials.

[8] best graced to be In the most graced of states.

[9] moves Is animated by.

[10] Galen's adoptive sons Doctors; followers of Aelius Galenus (131?–201? CE), probably the most accomplished medical researcher of the Roman period.

To write therein more fresh the story of delight,
While Beauty's reddest ink Venus for him doth stir.

103

Oh happy Thames, that didst my Stella bear,
I saw thyself with many a smiling line
Upon thy cheerful face,[1] Joy's livery° wear, uniform
While those fair planets[2] on thy streams did shine.
The boat for joy could not to dance forbear,
While wanton winds with beauties so divine
Ravished, stayed not, till in her golden hair
They did themselves (oh sweetest prison) twine.
And fain° those Aeol's youths[3] there would their stay gladly
Have made, but, forced by Nature still to fly,
First did with puffing kiss those locks display:° blow about
She so disheveled, blushed; from window I
With sight thereof cried out, "oh fair disgrace;
Let Honour's self to thee grant highest place."

104

Envious wits,° what hath been mine offence, minds
That with such poisonous care my looks you mark,
That to each word, nay, sigh of mine you hark,
As grudging me my sorrow's eloquence?
Ah, is it not enough that I am thence?[4]
Thence, so far thence, that scarcely any spark
Of comfort dare come to this dungeon dark,
Where rigorous exile locks up all my sense?
But if I by a happy window pass,
If I but stars[5] upon mine armour bear
—Sick, thirsty, glad (though but of empty glass):
Your moral notes straight my hid meaning tear
From out my ribs, and puffing prove that I Do Stella love. Fools, who doth it deny?

105

Unhappy sight, and hath she vanished by
So near, in so good time, so free° a place? open
Dead glass,[6] dost thou thy object so embrace,
As what my heart still sees thou canst not spy?
I swear by her I love and lack, that I
Was not in fault, who bend thy dazzling race[7]
Only unto the heav'n of Stella's face,
Counting but dust what in the way did lie.
But cease, mine eyes; your tears do witness well
That you, guiltless thereof, your nectar missed:
Cursed be the page from whom the bad torch fell,
Cursed be the night which did your strife° resist, objective
Cursed be the coachman which did drive so fast,
With no worse curse than absence makes me taste.

106

Oh absent presence, Stella is not here;
False flattering Hope, that with so fair a face
Bare me in hand,[8] that in this orphan place,
Stella, I say my Stella, should appear:
What say'st thou now? Where is that dainty cheer
Thou told'st mine eyes should help their famished case?
But thou art gone, now that self-felt disgrace
Doth make me most to wish thy comfort near.
But here I do store of[9] fair ladies meet,
Who may with charm° of conversation sweet harmony
Make in my heavy mould new thought to grow:
Sure they prevail as much with me, as he
That bade his friend, but then new maimed, to be Merry with him, and not think of his woe.

107

Stella, since thou so right a princess art
Of all the powers which life bestows on me,
That ere by them aught undertaken be[10]
They first resort unto that sovereign part;[11]
Sweet, for a while give respite to my heart,
Which pants as though it still should leap to thee,

---

[1] many a ... face Water is conceived as having a human face elsewhere by Sidney; in the Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, for example, he describes blood as filling "the wrinkles of the sea's visage."

[2] fair planets Stella's eyes.

[3] Aeol's youths Breezes; sons of Aeolus, ruler of the winds in Greek mythology.

[4] thence Away from where I want to be.

[5] stars Stella's emblems.

[6] Dead glass Astrophil's eyes.

[7] dazzling race Lantern, torch.

[8] Bare me in hand Deceived me.

[9] store of Many.

[10] ere by ... be Before they undertake anything.

[11] resort unto ... part Refer to your sovereign direction.

And on my thoughts give thy lieutenancy° authority
To this great cause,[1] which needs both use° experience and art.
And as a queen, who from her presence sends
Whom she employs, dismiss from thee my wit,
Till it have wrought what thy own will attends.[2]
On servants' shame oft master's blame doth sit;
Oh let not fools in me thy works° reprove, actions
And scorning say, "See what it is to love."

108

When Sorrow (using mine own fire's might)
Melts down his lead into my boiling breast,
Through that dark furnace to my heart oppressed
There shines a joy from thee, my only light;
But soon as thought of thee breeds my delight,
And my young soul flutters to thee, his nest,
Most rude Despair, my daily unbidden guest,
Clips straight my wings, straight wraps me in his night,
And makes me then bow down my head and say,
"Ah, what doth Phoebus' gold° that wretch avail sunlight Whom iron doors do keep from use of[3] day?"
So strangely (alas) thy works in me prevail,[4]
That in my woes for thee thou art my joy,
And in my joys for thee my only annoy.
—1591

The Defence of Poesy

When the right virtuous Edward Wotton[5] and I were at the Emperor's Court together, we gave ourselves to learn horsemanship of John Pietro Pugliano, one that with great commendation had the place of an esquire[6] in his stable; and he, according to the fertileness of the Italian wit, did not only afford us the demonstration of his practise, but sought to enrich our minds with the contemplations therein, which he thought most precious. But with none I remember mine ears were at any time more laden, than when (either angered with slow payment, or moved with our learner-like admiration) he exercised his speech in the praise of his faculty.[7] He said soldiers were the noblest estate of mankind, and horsemen the noblest of soldiers. He said they were the masters of war and ornaments of peace, speedy goers and strong abiders, triumphers both in camps and courts. Nay, to so unbelieved a point he proceeded as that no earthly thing bred such wonder to a prince as to be a good horseman. Skill of government was but a pedanteria[8] in comparison. Then would he add certain praises by telling us what a peerless beast the horse was, the one serviceable courtier without flattery, the beast of most beauty, faithfulness, courage, and such more, that if I had not been a piece of a logician[9] before I came to him, I think he would have persuaded me to have wished myself a horse. But thus much at least with his no few words he drove into me that self-love is better than any gilding to make that seem gorgeous wherein ourselves be parties. Wherein, if Pugliano's strong affection and weak arguments will not satisfy you, I will give you a nearer example of myself, who (I know not by what mischance) in these my not old years and idlest times having slipped into the title of a poet, am provoked to say something unto you in the defence of that my un-elected vocation, which if I handle with more good will than good reasons, bear with me, since the scholar is to be pardoned that followeth the steps of his master. And yet I must say that, as I have more just cause to make a pitiful defence of poor poetry, which from almost the highest estimation of learning is fallen to be the laughingstock of children, so have I need to bring some more available proofs: since the former is by no man barred of his deserved credit, the silly latter hath had even the names of philosophers used to the defacing of it, with great danger of civil war among the Muses.

And first, truly, to all them that, professing learning, inveigh against poetry, may justly be objected that they go very near to ungratefulness, to seek to deface that which, in the noblest nations and languages that are known, hath been the first light-giver to ignorance, and first nurse, whose milk little & little enabled them to feed afterwards of tougher knowledges. And will you play the hedgehog, that, being received into the den, drive out his host? Or rather the vipers, that with their birth kill their parents?

---

[1] this great cause Perhaps the composition of the Arcadia.

[2] wrought Created; attends Waits for.

[3] use of Enjoying.

[4] thy works … prevail Your actions rule me.

[5] Edward Wotton Statesman and courtier with whom Sidney developed a friendship while they were both serving as diplomats at the court of Holy Roman Emperor Maxmillian II in Vienna.

[6] esquire Equerry, manager of a nobleman's stable and horses.

[7] faculty Area of expertise or learning; ability.

[8] pedanteria Pedantry.

[9] if… logician I.e., if I had not been somewhat proficient in logic.

Let learned Greece in any of his manifold sciences be able to show me one book before Musaeus, Homer, & Hesiod,[1] all three nothing else but poets. Nay, let any history be brought that can say any writers were there before them, if they were not men of the same skill, as Orpheus, Linus,[2] and some other are named, who, having been the first of that country that made pens deliverers of their knowledge to the posterity, may justly challenge to be called their fathers in learning. For not only in time they had this priority (although in itself antiquity be venerable), but went before them as causes to draw with their charming sweetness the wild untamed wits to an admiration of knowledge. So, as Amphion[3] was said to move stones with his poetry to build Thebes, and Orpheus to be listened to by beasts—indeed stony and beastly people—so among the Romans were Livius Andronicus, and Ennius.[4] So in the Italian language the first that made it aspire to be a treasure-house of science, were the poets Dante, Bocaccio, and Petrarch.[5] So in our English were Gower[6] and Chaucer, after whom, encouraged & delighted with their excellent fore-going, others have followed to beautify our mother tongue as well in the same kind as other arts.

This did so notably show itself that the Philosophers of Greece durst not a long time appear to the world but under the mask of poets. So Thales, Empedocles, and Parmenides[7] sang their natural philosophy in verses; so did Pythagoras and Phocylides[8] their moral counsels; so did Tyrtaeus in war matters, and Solon[9] in matters of policy: or rather they, being poets, did exercise their delightful vein in those points of highest knowledge, which before them lay hidden to the world. For that wise Solon was directly a poet, it is manifest, having written in verse the notable fable of the Atlantic Island, which was continued by Plato.[10] And truly even Plato whosoever well considereth shall find that in the body of his work, though the inside & strength were philosophy, the skin, as it were, and beauty depended most of[11] poetry; for all standeth upon dialogues, wherein he feigneth many honest burgesses of Athens speak of such matters, that, if they had been set on the rack, they would never have confessed them, besides his poetical describing the circumstances of their meetings, as the well ordering of a banquet, the delicacy of a walk, with interlacing mere tales, as Gyges' ring[1] and others, which who knoweth not to be flowers of poetry did never walk into Apollo's Garden.[2]

---

[1] Musaeus Fifth-century BCE Greek priest and poet who was said to have been either the son or student of Orpheus; Homer Eighth-century BCE Greek poet credited with authoring the epic poems The Iliad and The Odyssey; Hesiod Greek poet known for Works and Days and The Theogony (eighth century BCE).

[2] Orpheus In Greek mythology, poet whose songs possessed the uncanny ability to charm; Linus Mythical poet and musician, said to be Orpheus's teacher.

[3] Amphion Son of Zeus whose magical lyre could move stones. The walls of Thebes were said to have built themselves by the music of his lyre.

[4] Livius Andronicus Roman playwright (third century BCE) who composed the first tragedy and the first comedy in Latin; Ennius Highly influential Latin poet (239–169 BCE) known as the father of Latin poetry.

[5] Dante Dante Alighieri, an Italian poet (1265–1321) best known for the poem The Divine Comedy; Bocaccio Giovanni Bocaccio (1313–75), an Italian author and poet known for his collection of tales The Decameron; Petrarch Francesco Petrarch, Italian author (1304–74) best known for his sonnets, which were a source of influence for many poets of the early modern period, including Sidney, Henry Howard, Thomas Wyatt, and Edmund Spenser.

[6] Gower John Gower, English author and poet (1330–1408).

[7] Thales Greek geometrician, scientist, and philosopher of the sixth century BCE; Empedocles Greek philosopher of the fifth century BCE; Parmenides Greek philosopher (c. fifth century BCE) who appears as a character in one of Plato's dialogues.

[8] Pythagoras Greek mathematician (c. fifth century BCE) influential in the development of mathematics; Phocylides Greek moralist of the sixth century BCE.

[9] Tyrtaeus Poet whose surviving elegiac verses extol the military virtues of the Spartans (c. seventh century BCE.); Solon Athenian statesman of the sixth century BCE who was believed to have written an epic (now lost) about Atlantis.

[10] fable … Plato Plato wrote two dialogues which refer to the lost civilization of Atlantis.

[11] of On.

And even historiographers (although their lips sound of things done, and verity be written in their foreheads) have been glad to borrow both fashion and, perchance, weight of the poets. So Herodotus entitled his History by the name of the nine Muses;[3] and both he and all the rest that followed him either stole or usurped of poetry their passionate describing of passions, the many particularities of battles which no man could affirm, or, if that be denied me, long orations put in the mouths of great kings and captains, which it is certain they never pronounced.

So that truly neither philosopher nor historiographer could at the first have entered into the gates of popular judgments if they had not taken a great passport of poetry, which in all nations at this day where learning flourisheth not, is plain to be seen; in all which they have some feeling of poetry.

In Turkey, besides their lawgiving divines, they have no other writers but poets. In our neighbour country Ireland, where truly learning goes very bare, yet are their poets held in a devout reverence. Even among the most barbarous and simple Indians where no writing is, yet they have their poets who make & sing songs, which they call areytos,[4] both of their ancestor's deeds and praises of their gods—a sufficient probability that, if ever learning come among them, it must be by having their hard dull wits softened and sharpened with the sweet delights of poetry, for until they find a pleasure in the exercise of the mind, great promises of much knowledge will little persuade them that know not the fruits of knowledge. In Wales, the true remnant of the ancient Britons, as there are good authorities to show the long time they had poets, which they called bards, so through all the conquests of Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, some of whom did seek to ruin all memory of learning from among them, yet do their poets even to this day last; so as it is not more notable in the soon beginning, than in long continuing.

But since the authors of most of our sciences[5] were the Romans, and before them the Greeks, let us a little stand upon their authorities, but even so far as to see what names they have given unto this now scorned skill.

Among the Romans a poet was called vates, which is as much as a diviner, foreseer, or prophet, as by his conjoined words vaticinium and vaticinari[6] is manifest: so heavenly a title did that excellent people bestow upon this heart-ravishing knowledge. And so far were they carried into the admiration thereof that they thought in the chanceable hitting upon any of such verses great foretokens of their following fortunes were placed. Whereupon grew the word of Sortes Vergilianae,[7] when by sudden opening Virgil's book they lighted upon some verse of his, as it is reported by many, whereof the histories of the emperors' lives are full: as of Albinus, the governor of our island, who in his childhood met with this verse and in his age performed it. Although it were a very vain and godless superstition, as also it was to think spirits were commanded by such verses—whereupon this word "charms," derived of carmina,[9] cometh—so yet serves it to show the great reverence those wits were held in; and altogether not without ground, since both by the oracles of Delphos and Sybilla's[10] prophesies were wholly delivered in verses. For that same exquisite observing of number and measure in the words, and that high flying liberty of conceit[1] proper to the poet, did seem to have some divine force in it.

> Arma amens capio, nec sat rationis in armis[8]

---

[1] well … banquet The Symposium is set during a banquet; delicacy … walk In The Phaedrus the two speakers discuss their ideas while taking a walk; Gyges' ring In Plato's Republic, a shepherd uses a magic ring to make himself invisible for self-gain.

[2] which who … Garden I.e., whoever does not recognize these works as the flowers of poetry must know nothing of poetry (Apollo was the classical god of poetry).

[3] Muses Greek goddesses who presided over learning and the arts.

[4] areytos Song-dance performances of the Taino people that recounted past histories and legends.

[5] sciences Branches of knowledge; fields of study.

[6] vaticinium Latin: prophecy; vaticinari Latin: to predict.

[7] Sortes Virgilianae Practice of opening at random one of the works of the Latin poet Virgil and using the text as a means of divination.

[8] Arma … armis Latin: "Frantically I seized my arms, though there is little reason in arms." (Aeneid 2.314).

[9] carmina Latin: songs.

[10] oracles of Delphos Greek oracle of the god Apollo; Sybilla Female prophet of the oracle.

And may not I presume a little farther, to show the reasonableness of this word vates, and say that the holy David's Psalms[2] are a divine poem? If I do, I shall not do it without the testimony of great learned men, both ancient and modern. But even the name of Psalms will speak for me, which being interpreted, is nothing but songs; then that it is fully written in meter, as all learned Hebraists agree, although the rules be not yet fully found.[3] Lastly and principally, his handling his prophecy, which is merely[4] poetical: for what else is the awaking his musical instruments, the often and free changing of persons, his notable prosopopeias,[5] when he makes you as it were see God coming in His majesty, his telling of the beasts' joyfulness and hills leaping, but a heavenly poesy, wherein almost he shows himself a passionate lover of that unspeakable and everlasting beauty to be seen by the eyes of the mind, only cleared by faith? But truly now having named him, I fear I seem to profane that holy name, applying it to poetry, which is among us thrown down to so ridiculous an estimation. But they that with quiet judgments will look a little deeper into it, shall find the end & working of it such as, being rightly applied, deserves not to be scourged out of the Church of God.

But now let us see how the Greeks have named it, and how they have deemed of it. The Greeks named him ποιητήν,[6] which name hath, as the most excellent, gone through other languages. It cometh of this word ποιεῖν, which is "to make": wherein, I know not whether by luck or wisdom, we Englishmen have met with the Greeks in calling him a maker, which name, how high and incomparable a title it is, I had rather were known by marking the scope of other sciences than by any partial allegation.

There is no art delivered unto mankind that hath not the works of nature for his principal object, without which they could not consist, and on which they so depend, as they become actors & players, as it were of what nature will have set forth. So doth the astronomer look upon the stars, and, by that he sees, set down what order nature hath taken therein. So doth the geometrician & arithmetician in their diverse sorts of quantities. So doth the musicians in time tell you which by nature agree, which not. The natural philosopher thereon hath his name, and the moral philosopher standeth upon the natural virtues, vices, or passions of man; and follow nature (saith he) therein, and thou shalt not err. The lawyer saith what men have determined; the historian, what men have done. The grammarian speaketh only of the rules of speech; and the rhetorician and logician, considering what in nature will soonest prove and persuade, thereon give artificial rules, which still are compassed within the circle of a question according to the proposed matter. The physician weigheth the nature of man's body, & the nature of things helpful or hurtful unto it. And the metaphysic, though it be in the second & abstract notions, and therefore be counted supernatural, yet doth he indeed build upon the depth of nature. Only the poet, disdaining to be tied to any such subjection, lifted up with the vigour of his own invention, doth grow in effect into another nature, in making things either better than nature bringeth forth, or, quite anew, forms such as never were in nature, as the Heroes, Demigods, Cyclops, Chimeras, Furies,[7] and such like: so as he goes hand in hand with nature, not enclosed within the narrow warrant of her gifts, but freely ranging within the zodiac of his own wit. Nature never set forth the earth in so rich tapestry as diverse poets have done: neither with so pleasant rivers, fruitful trees, sweet-smelling flowers, nor whatsoever else may make the too much loved earth more lovely. Her world is brazen, the poets only deliver a golden.

---

[1] conceit Conception; signification.

[2] David's Psalms Book of Psalms, thought to be written by the biblical King David of Israel.

[3] then that … found Many Renaissance scholars believed that the psalms were written in verse forms that closely resembled classical Greek and Latin meters.

[4] merely Solely.

[5] prosopopoeias Greek: personifications.

[6] ποιητήν Greek: poet.

[7] Cyclops Mythical race of giants, each of whom has only one eye; Chimeras Mythological fire-breathing monsters, part goat, part lion, and part serpent; Furies Three avenging winged goddesses.

But let those things alone and go to man—for whom as the other things are, so it seemeth in him her uttermost cunning is employed—& know whether she have brought forth so true a lover as Theagenes, so constant a friend as Pylades, so valiant a man as Orlando, so right a prince as Xenophon's Cyrus, so excellent a man every way as Virgil's Aeneas.[1] Neither let this be jestingly conceived, because the works of the one be essential, the other in imitation or fiction: for every understanding knoweth the skill of each artificer standeth in that idea or fore-conceit[2] of the work, and not in the work itself. And that the poet hath that idea is manifest by delivering them forth in such excellency as he had imagined them. Which delivering forth also is not wholly imaginative, as we are wont to say by them that build castles in the air, but so far substantially it worketh, not only to make a Cyrus, which had been but a particular excellency as nature might have done, but to bestow a Cyrus upon the world to make many Cyruses, if they will learn aright why and how that maker made him.

Neither let it be deemed too saucy a comparison to balance the highest point of man's wit with the efficacy of nature; but rather give right honor to the heavenly maker of that maker, who, having made man to his own likeness, set him beyond and over all the works of that second nature: which in nothing he showeth so much as in poetry, when with the force of a divine breath he bringeth things forth surpassing her doings—with no small arguments to the incredulous of that first accursed fall of Adam, since our erected wit maketh us know what perfection is, and yet our infected will keepeth us from reaching unto it. But these arguments will by few be understood, and by fewer granted. This much I hope will be given me, that the Greeks with some probability of reason gave him the name above all names of learning.

Now let us go to a more ordinary opening[3] of him, that the truth may be the more palpable: and so I hope, though we get not so unmatched a praise as the etymology of his names will grant, yet his very description, which no man will deny, shall not justly be barred from a principal commendation.

Poesy therefore is an art of imitation: for so Aristotle termeth it in the word μιμησις,[4] that is to say, a representing, counterfeiting, or figuring forth—to speak metaphorically, a speaking picture—with this end, to teach and delight.

Of this there have been three general kinds. The chief, both in antiquity and excellency, were they that did imitate the unconceivable excellencies of God. Such were David in his Psalms; Solomon in his Song of Songs, in his Ecclesiastes and Proverbs; Moses and Deborah in their Hymns; and the writer of Job: which, beside other, the learned Immanuel Tremellius and Franciscus Junius[5] do entitle the poetical part of the Scripture. Against these none will speak that hath the Holy Ghost in due holy reverence. (In this kind, though in a full wrong divinity, were Orpheus, Amphion, Homer in his hymns, and many other, both Greeks and Romans.) And this poesy must be used by whosoever will follow St. James's counsel in singing psalms when they are merry,[6] and I know is used with the fruit of comfort by some, when, in sorrowful pangs of their death-bringing sins, they find the consolation of the never-leaving goodness.

The second kind is of them that deal with matters philosophical; either moral, as Tyrteus, Phocylides, Cato; or natural, as Lucretius and Virgil's Georgics; or astronomical, as Manilius and Pontanus; or historical, as

---

[1] Theagenes Hero in Heliodorus's prose romance Theagenes and Chariclea; Pylades Character in Aeschylus's play Oresteia who helped his friend Orestes avenge his father Agamemnon's death; Orlando Character of exemplary valor and heroism in Orlando Furioso, Ariosto's epic romance; Xenophon's Cyrus In his Cyropaedia, the Greek historian Xenophon recounts the education of Cyrus the Great, first Achaemenian Emperor of Persia; Aeneas Hero who led his fellow Trojans to Italy; protagonist of Virgil's epic The Aeneid.

[2] fore-conceit Plan.

[3] opening Examination.

[4] μιμησις Greek: mimesis, the concept of poetry as primarily imitative. (See Aristotle's Poetics 1.2.)

[5] Immanuel … Junius Two theologians who produced a Latin translation of the Hebrew and Greek Bible first published in 1575.

[6] whosoever … merry "Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray. Is any merry? Let him sing psalms" (James 5.13).

Lucan:[1] which who mislike, the fault is in their judgment quite out of taste, & not in the sweet food of sweetly uttered knowledge.

But because this second sort is wrapped within the fold of the proposed subject, and takes not the free course of his own invention, whether they properly be poets or no let grammarians dispute, and go to the third, indeed right poets, of whom chiefly this question ariseth: betwixt whom and these second is such a kind of difference as betwixt the meaner sort of painters, who counterfeit only such faces as are set before them, and the more excellent, who, having no law but wit, bestow that in colours upon you which is fittest for the eye to see: as the constant, though lamenting look of Lucretia[2] when she punished in herself another's fault, wherein he painteth not Lucretia whom he never saw, but painteth the outward beauty of such a virtue. For these third be they which most properly do imitate to teach & delight, and to imitate borrow nothing of what is, hath been, or shall be; but range, only reined with learned discretion, into the divine consideration of what may be and should be. These be they that, as the first and most noble sort may justly be termed vates, so these are waited on in the excellentest languages and best understandings with the fore-described name of poets. For these indeed do merely make to imitate; and imitate both to delight & teach; and delight, to move men to take that goodness in hand, which without delight they would fly as from a stranger; and teach, to make them know that goodness whereunto they are moved—which being the noblest scope to which ever any learning was directed, yet want there not idle tongues to bark at them.

These be subdivided into sundry more special denominations. The most notable be the heroic, lyric, tragic, comic, satiric, iambic, elegiac, pastoral, and certain others, some of these being termed according to the matter they deal with, some by the sort of verse they liked best to write in; for indeed the greatest part of poets have apparelled their poetical inventions in that numbrous kind of writing which is called verse—indeed but apparelled, verse being but an ornament and no cause to poetry, since there have been many most excellent poets that never versified, and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of poets. For Xenophon, who did imitate so excellently as to give us effigiem iusti imperii, the portraiture of a just empire, under the name of Cyrus (as Cicero saith of him), made therein an absolute heroical poem. So did Heliodorus in his sugared invention of that picture of love in Theagenes & Chariclea;[3] and yet both these wrote in prose, which I speak to show that it is not rhyming and versing that makes a poet (no more than a long gown makes an advocate,[4] who, though he pleaded in armour, should be an advocate and no soldier). But it is that feigning notable images of virtues, vices, or what else, with that delightful teaching, which must be the right describing note to know a poet by. Although indeed the senate of poets hath chosen verse as their fittest raiment, meaning, as in matter they passed all in all, so in manner to go beyond them: not speaking (table-talk fashion or like men in a dream) words as they chanceably fall from the mouth, but peising[5] each syllable of each word by just proportion, according to the dignity of the subject.

Now, therefore, it shall not be amiss first to weigh this latter sort of poetry by his works, and then by his parts; and if in neither of these anatomies he be condemnable, I hope we shall obtain a more favorable sentence.

This purifying of wit—this enriching of memory, enabling of judgment, and enlarging of conceit—which commonly we call learning, under what name soever it come forth, or to what immediate end soever it be directed, the final end is to lead and draw us to as high

[1] Cato Dionysus Cato (234–149 BCE), author of The Distichs, a collection of proverbial wisdom used in moral education; Lucretius First-century BCE Epicurean poet, author of De Rerum Natura (On the Nature of Things); Georgics Virgil's instructive poems on farming; Manilius First-century CE Stoic, author of the Astronomica, an astrological poem; Pontanus Fifteenth-century Italian humanist Giovanni Pontano, author of an astrological poem entitled Urania; Lucan Roman poet of the first century CE who never finished his epic Pharsalia, on Rome's civil wars.

[2] Lucretia Beautiful wife of Tarquinius Collatinus, a Roman noble, whose suicide after she was raped by Sextus Tarquinius, a Roman prince, led to political revolt and the creation of the Roman Republic.

[3] Theagenes & Chariclea Lovers in The Aethiopica by Heliodorus.

[4] advocate Lawyer.

[5] peising Weighing.

a perfection as our degenerate souls, made worse by their clayey lodgings, can be capable of.

This, according to the inclination of man, bred many-formed impressions. For some, that thought this felicity principally to be gotten by knowledge, and no knowledge to be so high or heavenly as acquaintance with the stars, gave themselves to astronomy. Others, persuading themselves to be demigods if they knew the causes of things, became natural and supernatural philosophers. Some an admirable delight drew to music, and some the certainty of demonstration to the mathematics. But all, one and other, having scope to know, & by knowledge to lift up the mind from the dungeon of the body to the enjoying his own divine essence.

But when by the balance of experience it was found that the astronomer, looking to the stars, might fall in a ditch, that the inquiring philosopher might be blind in himself, & the mathematician might draw forth a straight line with a crooked heart, then lo, did proof, the overruler of opinions, make manifest that all these are but serving sciences, which, as they have each a private end in themselves, so yet are they all directed to the highest end of the mistress-knowledge, by the Greeks called ἀρχίτεκτονικη, which stands, as I think, in the knowledge of a man's self, in the ethic and politic consideration, with the end of well-doing and not of well-knowing only—even as the saddler's next end is to make a good saddle, but his further end to serve a nobler faculty, which is horsemanship, so the horseman's to soldiery, and the soldier not only to have the skill, but to perform the practise of a soldier. So that, the ending end of all earthly learning being virtuous action, those skills that most serve to bring forth that have a most just title to be princes over all the rest.

Wherein, if we can, show we the poet is worthy to have it before any other competitors, among whom principally to challenge it step forth the moral philosophers, whom me thinketh I see coming towards me with a sullen gravity, as though they could not abide vice by daylight, rudely clothed for to witness outwardly their contempt of outward things, with books in their hands against glory, whereto they set their names, sophistically speaking against subtlety, and angry with any man in whom they see the foul fault of anger. These men casting largess as they go, of definitions, divisions, and distinctions, with a scornful interrogative do soberly ask whether it be possible to find any path so ready to lead a man to virtue as that which teacheth what virtue is, & teacheth it not only by delivering forth his very being, his causes and effects, but also by making known his enemy, vice, which must be destroyed, and his cumbersome servant, passion, which must be mastered; by showing the generalities that containeth it and the specialties that are derived from it; lastly, by plain setting down how it extendeth itself out of the limits of a man's own little world to the government of families and maintaining of public societies.

The historian scarcely gives leisure to the moralist to say so much, but that he, laden with old mouse-eaten records, authorizing himself for the most part upon other histories, whose greatest authorities are built upon the notable foundation hearsay, having much ado to accord differing writers & to pick truth out of partiality; better acquainted with a thousand years ago than with the present age, and yet better knowing how this world goeth than how his own wit runneth; curious for antiquities and inquisitive of novelties; a wonder to young folks and a tyrant in table talk, denieth, in a great chafe,[1] that any man for teaching of virtue, and virtuous actions, is comparable to him. "I am testis temporum, lux veritatis, vita memoriae, magistra vitae, nuncia vetustatis.[2] The philosopher," saith he, "teacheth a disputative virtue, but I do an active. His virtue is excellent in the dangerless Academy of Plato, but mine showeth forth her honorable face in the battles of Marathon, Pharsalia, Poitiers, and Agincourt.[3] He teacheth virtue by certain abstract considerations, but I only follow the footing of them that have gone before you. Old-aged experience goeth beyond the fine-witted philosopher, but I give the experience of many ages. Lastly, if he make the songbook, I put the learner's hand to the lute; and if he be the guide, I am the light." Then he would allege you innumerable examples, confirming story by stories, how much the wisest senators and princes have been directed by the credit of history, as Brutus, Alphonsus of Aragon,[1] and who not, if need be. At length the long line of their disputation maketh a point in this, that the one giveth the precept, & the other the example.

---

[1] chafe Temper, passion.

[2] testis … vetustatis Latin: the witness of time, the light of truth, the life of memory, the instructor of life, the herald of old age (Cicero, De Oratore, 2.9.36).

[3] Marathon Site of the Greeks' victory over the Persians in 490 BCE; Pharsalia Site of Pompey's loss to Caesar in 48 BCE; Poitiers Site of the French defeat by Edward, England's Black Prince, in 1356; Agincourt Battlefield on which the French were again defeated by the English in 1415.

Now whom shall we find (since the question stands for the highest form in the school of learning) to be moderator? Truly as me seemeth, the poet; and if not a moderator, even the man that ought to carry the title from them both, & much more from all the other serving sciences. Therefore compare we the poet with the historian & with the moral philosopher; and if he go beyond them both, no other human skill can match him. For as for the divine, with all reverence it is ever to be excepted, not only for having his scope as far beyond any of these as eternity exceeds a moment, but even for passing each of these in themselves. And for the lawyer, though Ius[2] be the daughter of Justice, the chief of virtues, yet because he seeketh to make men good rather formidine poenae than virtutis amore;[3] or, to say righter, doth not endeavour to make men good, but that their evil hurt not others; having no care so he be a good citizen, how bad a man he might be. Therefore, as our wickedness maketh him necessary, and necessity maketh him honorable, so he is not in the deepest truth to stand in rank with these who all endeavour to take naughtiness away and plant goodness even in the secretest cabinet of our souls. And these four are all that any way deal in the consideration of men's manners, which being the supreme knowledge, they that best breed it deserve the best commendation.

The philosopher, therefore, and the historian are they which would win the goal, the one by precept, the other by example. But both, not having both, do both halt.[4] For the philosopher, setting down with thorny arguments the bare rule, is so hard of utterance and so misty to be conceived, that one that hath no other guide but him shall wade in him till he be old before he shall find sufficient cause to be honest. For his knowledge standeth so upon the abstract and general that happy is that man who may understand him, and more happy that can apply what he doth understand. On the other side, the historian, wanting the precept, is so tied, not to what should be but to what is, to the particular truth of things and not to the general reason of things, that his example draweth no necessary consequence, and therefore a less fruitful doctrine.

Now doth the peerless poet perform both: for whatsoever the philosopher says should be done, he gives a perfect picture of it by someone by whom he presupposes it was done, so as he coupleth the general notion with the particular example. A perfect picture I say, for he yieldeth to the powers of the mind an image of that whereof the philosopher bestoweth but a wordish description, which doth neither strike, pierce, nor possess the sight of the soul so much as that other doth. For as in outward things, to a man that had never seen an elephant or a rhinoceros, who should tell him most exquisitely all their shape, colour, bigness, and particular marks, or of a gorgeous palace an architect, who, declaring the full beauties, might well make the hearer able to repeat, as it were by rote, all he had heard, yet should never satisfy his inward conceit with being witness to itself of a true lively knowledge; but the same man, as soon as he might see those beasts well painted, or that house well in model, should straightaways grow without need of any description, to a judicial comprehending of them: so no doubt the philosopher with his learned definitions—be it of virtues or vices, matters of public policy or private government—replenisheth the memory with many infallible grounds of wisdom, which, notwithstanding, lie dark before the imaginative and judging power, if they be not illuminated or figured forth by the speaking picture of poesy.

---

[1] Brutus Roman politician who conspired to assassinate Caesar, and was inspired to do so by the history of his ancestor, Junius Brutus, who defeated the Tarquin kings; Alphonsus of Aragon King of Aragon who carried the histories of Livy and Caesar with him into battle and who, according to Jacques Amyot, recovered from a severe illness upon being read aloud the deeds of Alexander the Great.

[2] Ius Latin: Right.

[3] formidine … amore Latin: by fear of punishment than by love of virtue (Horace, Epistles, 1.6.52–53).

[4] halt Limp; proceed unsteadily or imperfectly.

Tully[1] taketh much pains, and many times not without poetical helps, to make us know the force love of our country hath in us. Let us but hear old Anchises speaking in the midst of Troy's flames, or see Ulysses in the fullness of all Calypso's delights bewail his absence from barren and beggarly Ithaca.[2] Anger, the Stoics said, was a short madness: let but Sophocles bring you Ajax on a stage, killing or whipping sheep and oxen, thinking them the army of Greeks with their chieftains Agamemnon and Menelaus,[3] and tell me if you have not a more familiar insight into anger than finding in the schoolmen his genus and difference.[4] See whether wisdom and temperance in Ulysses and Diomedes, valour in Achilles, friendship in Nisus and Euryalus,[5] even to an ignorant man carry not an apparent shining; and, contrarily, the remorse of conscience in Oedipus; the soon repenting pride in Agamemnon; the self-devouring cruelty in his father Atreus; the violence of ambition in the two Theban brothers; the sour sweetness of revenge in Medea; and, to fall lower, the Terentian Gnatho and our Chaucer's Pandar[6] so expressed that we now use their names to signify their trades: and finally, all virtues, vices, and passions so in their own natural states laid to the view that we seem not to hear of them, but clearly to see through them.

But even in the most excellent determination of goodness, what philosopher's counsel can so readily direct a prince, as the feigned Cyrus in Xenophon; or a virtuous man in all fortunes, as Aeneas in Virgil; or a whole commonwealth, as the way of Sir Thomas More's Utopia? I say the way, because where Sir Thomas More erred, it was the fault of the man and not of the poet, for that way of patterning a commonwealth was most absolute, though he perchance hath not so absolutely performed it. For the question is, whether the fashioned image of poetry or the regular instruction of philosophy hath the more force in teaching: wherein if the philosophers have more rightly showed themselves philosophers than the poets have attained to the high top of their profession, as in truth

> Mediocribus esse poetis non Dii, non homines, > non concessere columnae,[7]

it is, I say again, not the fault of the art, but that by few men that art can be accomplished.

Certainly, even our Saviour Christ could as well have given the moral commonplaces of uncharitableness and humbleness as the divine narration of Dives and Lazarus; or of disobedience and mercy, as the heavenly discourse of the lost child and the gracious father;[8] but that his thorough-searching wisdom knew the estate of Dives burning in hell, and of Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, would more constantly, as it were, inhabit both the memory and judgment. Truly, for myself, meseems I see before mine eyes the lost child's disdainful prodigality, turned to envy a swine's dinner: which by the learned divines are thought not to be historical acts, but instructing parables.

For conclusion, I say the philosopher teacheth, but he teacheth obscurely, so as the learned only can understand him; that is to say, he teacheth them that are already taught. But the poet is the food for the tenderest stomachs; the poet is indeed the right popular philosopher, whereof Aesop's tales give good proof, whose pretty allegories, stealing under the formal tales of beasts, makes many, more beastly than beasts, begin to hear the sound of virtue from those dumb speakers.

---

[1] Tully First-century BCE Roman rhetorician Marcus Tullius Cicero.

[2] Anchises … flames See The Aeneid 2.634–49; Ulysses … Ithaca See Odyssey 5.149–59.

[3] Sophocles … Menelaus In Ajax by Sophocles.

[4] difference Attribute that distinguishes one species from others in the same genus.

[5] Diomedes Achaean warrior, see Iliad 5.114; Achilles Primary Greek hero of Homer's Iliad; Nisus and Euryalus Two Trojan warriors and fast friends who die together in battle (Aeneid 9.443–45).

[6] Agamemnon Greek king whose pride causes the dispute with Achilles that results in Achilles's temporary withdrawal from battle; Atreus King of Mycenae who, after being challenged for the throne by his brother, Thyestes, got revenge by banishing Thyestes and gruesomely murdering his sons; Theban brothers Polynices and Eteocles, the children of Oedipus and his mother Jocasta. The brothers agreed to rule their father's kingdom jointly, but neither respected their agreement; Terentian Gnatho Fawning, obsequious character in The Eunuch, a comedy by the Roman playwright Terence; Pandar Machinating character who serves as go-between for the lovers in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde.

[7] Mediocribus … columnae Latin: "Neither gods nor men nor booksellers allow poets to be ordinary" (Horace, Ars Poetica 372–73).

[8] Dives and Lazarus See Luke 16.20–31. Dives is a rich man condemned to hell after refusing to help the beggar Lazarus; lost … father See Luke 15.11–32, in which the Prodigal Son is welcomed home by his father.

But now it may be alleged that if this imagining of matters be so fit for the imagination, then must the historian needs surpass, who bringeth you images of true matters, such as indeed were done, and not such as fantastically or falsely may be suggested to have been done. Truly Aristotle himself, in his discourse of poesy, plainly determines this question, saying that poetry is φιλοσοφωτερων and σπουδαιοτερον that is to say, it is more philosophical and more studiously serious than history. His reason is, because poesy dealeth with καθόλου; that is to say, with the universal consideration, and the history with καθ' ἑκαστον, the particular. Now, saith he, the universal ways what is fit to be said or done, either in likelihood or necessity (which the poesy considers in his imposed names), and the particular only marketh whether Alcibiades[1] did, or suffered, this or that. Thus far Aristotle: which reason of his (as all his) is most full of reason. For indeed, if the question were whether it were better to have a particular act truly or falsely set down, there is no doubt which is to be chosen, no more than whether you had rather have Vespasian's[2] picture right as he was, or, at the painter's pleasure, nothing resembling. But if the question be for your own use and learning, whether it be better to have it set down as it should be, or as it was, then certainly is more doctrinable the feigned Cyrus in Xenophon than the true Cyrus in Justin, and the feigned Aeneas in Virgil than the right Aeneas in Dares Phrygius:[3] as to a lady that desired to fashion her countenance to the best grace, a painter should more benefit her to portrait a most sweet face, writing Canidia upon it, than to paint Canidia as she was, who, Horace sweareth, was full ill-favored.[4]

If the poet do his part aright, he will show you in Tantalus,[5] Atreus, and such like, nothing that is not to be shunned; in Cyrus, Aeneas, Ulysses, each thing to be followed; where the historian, bound to tell things as things were, cannot be liberal (without he will be poetical) of a perfect pattern, but, as in Alexander or Scipio himself, show doings, some to be liked, some to be misliked. And then how will you discern what to follow but by your own discretion, which you had without reading Quintus Curtius.[6] And whereas a man may say, though in universal consideration of doctrine the poet prevaileth, yet that the history, in his saying such a thing was done, doth warrant a man more in that he shall follow—the answer is manifest: that, if he stand upon that was (as if he should argue, because it rained yesterday, therefore it should rain today), then indeed hath it some advantage to a gross conceit. But if he know an example only informs a conjectured likelihood, and so go by reason, the poet doth so far exceed him as he is to frame his example to that which is most reasonable (be it in warlike, politic, or private matters), where the historian in his bare was hath many times that which we call fortune to overrule the best wisdom. Many times he must tell events whereof he can yield no cause; or, if he do, it must be poetically.

For that a feigned example hath as much force to teach as a true example (for as for to move, it is clear, since the feigned may be tuned to the highest key of passion) let us take one example wherein an historian and a poet did concur. Herodotus and Justin doth both testify that Zopirus, King Darius's faithful servant, seeing his master long resisted by the rebellious Babylonians, feigned himself in extreme disgrace of his king; for verifying of which he caused his own nose and ears to be cut off, and so flying to the Babylonians was received, and for his known valour so far credited that he did find means to deliver them over to Darius. Much like matter doth Livy record of Tarquinius and his son.[1] Xenophon excellently feigneth such another stratagem performed by Abradates in Cyrus' behalf.[2] Now would I fain know, if occasion be presented unto you to serve your prince by such an honest dissimulation, why you do not as well learn it of Xenophon's fiction as of the others verity; and truly so much the better, as you shall save your nose by the bargain: for Abradates did not counterfeit so far. So then the best of the historian is subject to the poet; for whatsoever action, or faction, whatsoever counsel, policy, or war stratagem the historian is bound to recite, that may the poet (if he list[3]) with his imitation make his own, beautifying it both for further teaching, and more delighting, as it please him: having all, from Dante's heaven to his hell, under the authority of his pen.[4] Which if I be asked what poets have done so, as I might well name some, so yet say I, and say again, I speak of the art, and not of the artificer.

---

[1] Alcibiades Greek statesman and friend of Achilles. (See Poetics 9.145.)

[2] Vespasian First-century CE Roman emperor, reported to have been very ugly.

[3] Justin Marcus Justinus, whose c. second-century BCE Histories provide an account of Cyrus' actions; Dares Phrygius Supposed author of an account of the Trojan War, probably in fact written after the second century CE.

[4] Horace … ill-favored Cf. Epodes 5, in which Horace attacks the Roman prostitute Canidia; she had apparently rejected him.

[5] Tantalus When invited to dine with the gods, Tantalus served them pieces of his own murdered son, Pelops.

[6] Quintus Curtius Roman historian who wrote a multi-volume biography of Alexander the Great.

Now to that which commonly is attributed to the praise of history, in respect of the notable learning, is got by marking the success, as though therein a man should see virtue exalted & vice punished—truly that commendation is peculiar to poetry, and far off from history. For indeed poetry ever sets Virtue so out in her best colours, making Fortune her well-waiting handmaid, that one must needs be enamoured of her. Well may you see Ulysses in a storm and in other hard plights, but they are but exercises of patience and magnanimity, to make them shine the more in the near following prosperity. And of the contrary part, if evil men come to the stage, they ever go out (as the tragedy writer answered to one that misliked the show of such persons) so manacled as they little animate folks to follow them. But the history, being captived to the truth of a foolish world, is many times a terror from well-doing, and an encouragement to unbridled wickedness. For see we not valiant Miltiades[5] rot in his fetters? The just Phocion[6] and the accomplished Socrates put to death like traitors? The cruel Severus[7] live prosperously? The excellent Severus[8] miserably murdered? Sulla and Marius[9] dying in their beds? Pompey and Cicero[10] slain then, when they would have thought exile a happiness? See we not virtuous Cato[11] driven to kill himself, and rebel Caesar so advanced that his name yet, after 1600 years, lasteth in the highest honor? And mark but even Caesar's own words of the forenamed Sulla (who in that only did honestly, to put down his dishonest tyranny), literas nescivet,[12] as if want of learning caused him to do well. He meant it not by poetry, which, not content with earthly plagues, deviseth new punishments in hell for tyrants, nor yet by philosophy, which teacheth occidendos esse; but no doubt by skill in history, for that indeed can afford you Cypselus, Periander, Phalaris, Dionysius,[13] and I know not how many more of the same kennel, that speed well enough in their abominable injustice of usurpation.

---

[1] Livy … son Tarquinius Superbus, last king of Rome (534–510 BCE), and his son, who pretended to be an ally of the Gabians in order to deliver them over to his father. See Titus Livius's Early History of Rome.

[2] Xenophon … behalf Abradates, the fifth-century BCE viceroy of Shushan who gave his allegiance to Cyrus, King of Persia. See Xenophon's Cyropaedia.

[3] list Desires.

[4] from Dante's … pen Reference to Dante's Divine Comedy, which describes its narrator's journey through hell, purgatory, and heaven.

[5] Miltiades Fifth-century BCE Athenian general who was imprisoned by his own people after leading a failed naval attack.

[6] Phocion Athenian statesman (402–318 BCE).

[7] cruel Severus Lucius Septimius Severus, second-century CE Roman emperor known for his cruelty.

[8] excellent Severus Alexander Severus (208–235 CE), noble and virtuous Roman emperor who was nevertheless killed by his troops.

[9] Sulla and Marius Lucius Sulla (138–78 BCE) and Gaius Marius (157–83 BCE), two rival Roman generals and politicians whose disputes brought civil war to Rome.

[10] Pompey Gnaeus Pompeius, first-century BCE Roman general who was murdered after opposing Caesar in battle; Cicero Marcus Tullius Cicero was murdered by order of Marcus Antonius.

[11] Cato Marcus Porcius Cato (95–46 BCE), Roman aristocrat who opposed both Pompey and Caesar and who committed suicide rather than submit to Caesar's authority.

[12] literas nescivet Latin: "He knew nothing of letters" (Suetonius, Life of Caesar, ch. 77).

[13] occidendos esse Latin: "they are to be killed"; Cypselus, Periander, Phalaris, Dionysius Tyrannical rulers remembered for the brutality of their crimes and the impunity with which those crimes were committed.

I conclude, therefore, that he excelleth history, not only in furnishing the mind with knowledge, but in setting it forward to that which deserves to be called and accounted good: which setting forward, and moving to well-doing, indeed setteth the laurel crown upon the poets as victorious, not only of the historian, but over the philosopher, howsoever in teaching it may be questionable.

For suppose it be granted (that which I suppose with great reason may be denied) that the philosopher, in respect of his methodical proceeding, doth teach more perfectly than the poet, yet do I think that no man is so much φιλοφιλοσοφος[1] as to compare the philosopher in moving with the poet. And that moving is of a higher degree than teaching, it may by this appear, that it is well nigh both the cause and effect of teaching. For who will be taught, if he be not moved with desire to be taught? And what so much good doth that teaching bring forth (I speak still of moral doctrine) as that it moveth one to do that which it doth teach. For, as Aristotle saith, it is not γνωσις but πραχις[2] must be the fruit. And how πραχις can be, without being moved to practice, it is no hard matter to consider.

The philosopher showeth you the way; he informeth you of the particularities, as well of the tediousness of the way, as of the pleasant lodging you shall have when your journey is ended, as of the many by-turnings that may divert you from your way. But this is to no man but to him that will read him, and read him with attentive studious painfulness; which constant desire whosoever hath in him, hath already passed half the hardness of the way, and therefore is beholding to the philosopher but for the other half. Nay truly, learned men have learnedly thought that where once reason hath so much over-mastered passion as that the mind hath a free desire to do well, the inward light each mind hath in itself is as good as a philosopher's book; since in nature we know it is well to do well, and what is well, and what is evil, although not in the words of art which philosophers bestow upon us; for out of natural conceit the philosophers drew it. But to be moved to do that which we know, or to be moved with desire to know, hoc opus, hic labor est.[3]

Now therein of all sciences (I speak still of human, and according to the human conceit) is our poet the monarch. For he doth not only show the way, but giveth so sweet a prospect into the way, as will entice any man to enter into it. Nay, he doth, as if your journey should lie through a fair vineyard, at the very first give you a cluster of grapes, that full of the taste, you may long to pass further. He beginneth not with obscure definitions, which must blur the margin with interpretations and load the memory with doubtfulness, but he cometh to you with words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for, the well enchanting skill of music; and with a tale forsooth he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play and old men from the chimney corner. And, pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue—even as the child is often brought to take most wholesome things by hiding them in such other as have a pleasant taste, which, if one should begin to tell them the nature of the aloes or rhabarbarum[4] they should receive, would sooner take their physic at their ears than at their mouth. So it is in men (most of which are childish in the best things, till they be cradled in their graves): glad they will be to hear the tales of Hercules, Achilles, Cyrus, Aeneas; and, hearing them, must needs hear the right description of wisdom, value, and justice; which, if they had been barely (that is to say philosophically) set out, they would swear they be brought to school again.

That imitation whereof poetry is, hath the most conveniency to nature of all other, insomuch that, as Aristotle saith, those things which in themselves are horrible, as cruel battles, unnatural monsters, are made in poetical imitation delightful.[1] Truly, I have known men that even with reading Amadis de Gaule[2] (which God knoweth wanteth much of a perfect poesy) have found their hearts moved to the exercise of courtesy, liberality, and especially courage. Who readeth Aeneas carrying old Anchises on his back, that wisheth not it were his fortune to perform so excellent an act? Whom doth not those words of Turnus move, the tale of Turnus having planted his image in the imagination,

---

[1] φιλοφιλοσοφος Greek: one who loves philosophy.

[2] γνωσις Greek: theory, knowing; πραχις Greek: practice. (See Nicomachean Ethics, 1.1.)

[3] hoc … est Latin: "this is the task, this is the work" (Virgil, Aeneid 6.129).

[4] aloes or rhabarbarum Aloe and rhubarb, two bitter-tasting plants often taken as medicines.

> Fugientam haec terra videbit?
> Usque adeone mori miserum est?[3]

Where the philosophers, as they scorn to delight, so must they be content little to move—saving wrangling whether virtus[4] be the chief or the only good, whether the contemplative or the active life do excel—which Plato and Boethius well knew, and therefore made mistress Philosophy very often borrow the masking raiment of poesy.[5] For even those hard-hearted evil men who think virtue a school name, and know no other good but indulgere genio,[6] and therefore despise the austere admonitions of the philosopher, and feel not the inward reason they stand upon, yet will be content to be delighted—which is all the good-fellow poet seemeth to promise—and so steal to see the form of goodness, (which seen, they cannot but love) ere themselves be aware, as if they took a medicine of cherries.

Infinite proofs of the strange effects of this poetical invention might be alleged; only two shall serve, which are so often remembered as I think all men know them. The one of Menenius Agrippa,[7] who, when the whole people of Rome had resolutely divided themselves from the Senate, with apparent show of utter ruin, though he were (for that time) an excellent orator, came not among them upon trust either of figurative speeches or cunning insinuations, and much less with far-fet[8] maxims of philosophy, which (especially if they were Platonic) they must have learned geometry before they could well have conceived; but forsooth he behaves himself like a homely and familiar poet. He telleth them a tale, that there was a time when all the parts of the body made a mutinous conspiracy against the belly, which they thought devoured the fruits of each other's labour; they concluded that they would let so unprofitable a spender starve. In the end, to be short (for the tale is notorious, and as notorious that it was a tale), with punishing the belly they plagued themselves. This, applied by him, wrought such effect in the people, as I never read that only words brought forth but then so sudden and so good an alteration; for upon reasonable conditions a perfect reconcilement ensued. The other is of Nathan the prophet, who, when the holy David had so far forsaken God as to confirm adultery with murder, when he was to do the tenderest office of a friend in laying his own shame before his eyes, sent by God to call again so chosen a servant, how doth he it but by telling of a man whose beloved lamb was ungratefully taken from his bosom: the application most divinely true, but the discourse itself feigned; which made David (I speak of the second and instrumental cause) as in a glass see his own filthiness, as that heavenly psalm of mercy[9] well testifieth.

By these, therefore, examples and reasons, I think it may be manifest that the poet, with that same hand of delight, doth draw the mind more effectually than any other art doth. And so a conclusion not unfitly ensue: that, as virtue is the most excellent resting place for all worldly learning to make his end of, so poetry, being the most familiar to teach it, and most princely to move towards it, in the most excellent work is the most excellent workman.

---

[1] as Aristotle … delightful Cf. Poetics Part 4.

[2] Amadis de Gaule Spanish chivalric romance written by Vasco de Lobeyra.

[3] Fugientam … est Latin. In Virgil's Aeneid, Turnus, when attempting to defend his home from the invading Trojans, cries, "Shall this land see him [Turnus] run away? / Is it so hard to die?" (Aeneid 12.645–46).

[4] virtus Latin word that carries with it the sense of courage and strength of purpose as well as the quality we now use the word "virtue" to denote.

[5] which … poesy Both Plato and Boethius were philosophers who believed in the superiority of a contemplative life.

[6] indulgere genio Latin: to indulge your appetite; i.e., self-indulgence (Persius, Satires 5.151).

[7] Menenius Agrippa Roman consul of the fifth century BCE. See Livy, Histories 2.32.

[8] far-fet Far-fetched.

[9] heavenly psalm of mercy Cf. Psalm 51.

But I am content not only to decipher him[1] by his works (although works, in commendation and dispraise, must ever hold a high authority), but more narrowly will examine his parts; so that (as in a man) though all together may carry a presence full of majesty and beauty, perchance in some one defectuous[2] piece we may find blemish.

Now in his parts, kinds, or species (as you list to term them), it is to be noted that some poesies have coupled together two or three kinds, as the tragical and comical, whereupon is risen the tragicomical. Some, in the manner, have mingled prose and verse, as Sannazaro[3] and Boethius; some have mingled matters heroical and pastoral. But that cometh all to one in this question; for, if severed they be good, the conjunction cannot be hurtful. Therefore, perchance forgetting some and leaving some as needless to be remembered, it shall not be amiss in a word to cite the special kinds, to see what faults may be found in the right use of them.

Is it then the Pastoral poem which is misliked? (For perchance where the hedge is lowest[4] they will soonest leap over.) Is the poor pipe[5] disdained, which sometimes out of Meliboeus' mouth can show the misery of people under hard lords and ravening soldiers, and again, by Tityrus,[6] what blessedness is derived to them that lie lowest from the goodness of them that sit highest; sometimes, under the pretty tales of wolves and sheep, can include the whole considerations of wrongdoing and patience; sometimes show that contentions for trifles can get but a trifling victory: where perchance a man may see that even Alexander & Darius, when they strove who should be cock of this world's dunghill, the benefit they got was that the after-livers may say

Haec memini & victum frustra contendere Thyrsin:
Ex illo Corydon, Corydon est tempore nobis.[7]

Or is it the lamenting Elegiac, which in a kind heart would move rather pity than blame; who bewails with the great philosopher Heraclitus[8] the weakness of mankind and the wretchedness of the world; who surely is to be praised either for compassionate accompanying just causes of lamentations, or for rightly painting out how weak be the passions of woefulness? Is it the bitter but wholesome Iambic,[9] who rubs the galled mind, in making shame the trumpet of villainy, with bold and open crying out against naughtiness? Or the Satiric, who

Omne vafer vitium ridenti tangit amico;[10]

who sportingly never leaveth till he make a man laugh at folly, and at length ashamed, to laugh at himself, which he cannot avoid without avoiding the folly; who, while circum praecordia ludit,[11]

giveth us to feel how many headaches a passionate life bringeth us to; how, when all is done,

---

[1] him I.e., poet.

[2] defectuous Defective.

[3] Sannazaro Italian poet Jacopo Sannazaro, author of the pastoral romance Arcadia, which mixes poetry and prose.

[4] lowest Pastoral poetry was considered the lowest and least technically advanced of the poetic genres.

[5] pipe Shepherd's pipe, the symbol of pastoral poetry.

[6] Meliboeus ... Tityrus Meliboeus and Tityrus are two shepherds in Virgil's Eclogues.

[7] Haec ... nobis Latin: "These things I remember, how Thyrsis, vanquished, strove in vain. From that time it is Corydon, Corydon with us." From Virgil, Eclogues 7.69–70, in which the pastoral poets Thyrsis and Corydon challenge one another to a singing contest—an event which, Sidney says, is comparable to the victory of Alexander the Great over Darius of Persia.

[8] Heraclitus Fifth-century BCE Greek philosopher who believed that everything in the universe is subject to constant change and strife.

[9] Iambic Verse form typically used in satire and direct attacks.

[10] Omne ... amico Latin: "The crafty man probes every fault while making his friends laugh" (Persius, Satires 1.116–17).

[11] circum praecordia ludit Latin: "he plays about the heart" (Persius, Satires, 1.117).

Est Ulubris, animus si nos non deficit aequus.[1]

No, perchance it is the Comic, whom naughty playmakers and stage-keepers have justly made odious. To the arguments of abuse I will after answer. Only thus much now is to be said, that the comedy is an imitation of the common errors of our life, which he representeth in the most ridiculous and scornful sort that may be, so as it is impossible that any beholder can be content to be such a one. Now, as in geometry the oblique must be known as well as the right, and in arithmetic the odd as well as the even, so in the actions of our life who seeth not the filthiness of evil wanteth a great folly to perceive the beauty of virtue. This doth the comedy handle so in our private and domestical matters as with hearing it we get, as it were, an experience what is to be looked for of a niggardly Demea, of a crafty Davus, of a flattering Gnatho, of a vain-glorious Thraso;[2] and not only to know what effects are to be expected, but to know who be such, by the signifying badge given them by the comedian. And little reason hath any man to say that men learn the evil by seeing it so set out, since, as I said before, there is no man living but, by the force truth hath in nature, no sooner seeth these men play their parts, but wisheth them in pistrinum;[3] although perchance the sack of his own faults lie so behind his back that he seeth not himself to dance the same measure;[4] whereto yet nothing can more open his eyes than to see his own actions contemptibly set forth.

So that the right use of comedy will, I think, by nobody be blamed; and much less of the high and excellent Tragedy, that openeth the greatest wounds, and showeth forth the ulcers that are covered with tissue; that maketh kings fear to be tyrants, and tyrants manifest their tyrannical humours; that, with stirring the affects of admiration and commiseration, teacheth the uncertainty of this world, and upon how weak foundations gilded roofs are builded; that maketh us know

Qui sceptra saevus duro imperio regit
Timet timentes; metus in auctorem redit.[5]

But how much it can move, Plutarch yieldeth a notable testimony of the abominable tyrant Alexander Pheraeus,[6] from whose eyes a tragedy, well made and represented, drew abundance of tears, who without all pity had murdered infinite numbers, and some of his own blood: so as he, that was not ashamed to make matters for tragedies, yet could not resist the sweet violence of a tragedy. And if it wrought no further good in him, it was that he, in despite of himself, withdrew himself from hearkening to that which might mollify his hard heart.

But it is not the tragedy they do mislike; for it were too absurd to cast out so excellent a representation of whatsoever is most worthy to be learned.

Is it the Lyric that most displeaseth, who with his tuned lyre and well-accorded voice giveth praise, the reward of virtue, to virtuous acts; who gives moral precepts, and natural problems; who sometimes raiseth up his voice to the height of the heavens in singing the lauds of the immortal God? Certainly I must confess mine own barbarousness, I never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas[7] that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet; and yet is it sung but by some blind crowder,[8] with no rougher voice than rude style; which, being so evil apparelled in the dust and cobwebs of that uncivil age, what would it work trimmed in the gorgeous eloquence of Pindar?[1] In Hungary I have seen it the manner at all feasts, and other such like meetings, to have songs of their ancestors' valour, which that right soldier-like nation think one of the chiefest kindlers of brave courage. The incomparable Lacedemonians[2] did not only carry that kind of music ever with them to the field, but even at home, as such songs were made, so were they all content to be singers of them—when the lusty men were to tell what they did, the old men what they had done, and the young what they would do. And where a man may say that Pindar many times praiseth highly victories of small moment, rather matters of sport than virtue; as it may be answered, it was the fault of the poet, and not of the poetry, so indeed the chief fault was in the time and custom of the Greeks, who set those toys at so high a price that Philip of Macedon[3] reckoned a horserace won at Olympus among his three fearful felicities. But as the unimitable Pindar often did, so is that kind most capable and most fit to awake the thoughts from the sleep of idleness to embrace honorable enterprises.

---

[1] Est ... aequus Latin: "[What you are seeking] is at Ulubrae, if a well-balanced mind does not fail us" (Adaptation of Horace, Epistles, 1.11.30). Ulubrae was a small, notoriously dull town bordered by marshlands.

[2] Demea ... Thraso Four stock characters from the plays of Terence.

[3] in pistrinum Latin: in the mill (where Roman slaves and criminals were forced to work as punishment).

[4] the sack ... measure Reference to one of Aesop's fables, in which every person is given two sacks to carry. One, which is slung behind the back, out of sight, contains one's own faults. The other, hung in front of one's neck, contains all the faults of others.

[5] Qui ... redit Latin: "The cruel man who rules his kingdom with harsh sway / Fears those who fear him; terror returns upon the author" (Seneca, Oedipus 3.705–06).

[6] Alexander Pheraeus Tyrant who, according to Plutarch, wept to see the suffering of Hecuba and Andromache in Euripides's tragedy Troades.

[7] old song ... Douglas The Ballad of Chevy Chase.

[8] crowder One who would play the Celtic instrument called the "crowd," an early form of the fiddle.

There rests the Heroical[4]—whose very name, I think, should daunt all backbiters. For by what conceit can a tongue be directed to speak evil of that which draweth with him no less champions than Achilles, Cyrus, Aeneas, Turnus, Tydeus, Rinaldo[5]—who doth not only teach and move to a truth, but teacheth and moveth to the most high and excellent truth; who maketh magnanimity and justice shine through all misty fearfulness and foggy desires; who, if the saying of Plato and Tully be true, that who could see virtue would be wonderfully ravished with the love of her beauty—this man sets her out to make her more lovely in her holiday apparel, to the eye of any that will deign not to disdain until they understand. But if anything be already said in the defence of sweet poetry, all concurreth to the maintaining the heroical, which is not only a kind, but the best and most accomplished kinds of poetry. For, as the image of each action stirreth and instructeth the mind, so the lofty image of such worthies most inflameth the mind with desire to be worthy, and informs with counsel how to be worthy. Only let Aeneas be worn in the tablet of your memory, how he governeth himself in the ruin of his country; in the preserving his old father, and carrying away his religious ceremonies; in obeying God's commandment to leave Dido,[6] though not only all passionate kindness, but even the human consideration of virtuous gratefulness, would have craved other of him; how in storms, how in sports, how in war, how in peace, how a fugitive, how victorious, how besieged, how besieging, how to strangers, how to allies, how to enemies, how to his own; lastly, how in his inward self, and how in his outward government—and, I think, in a mind most prejudiced with a prejudicating humour, he will be found in excellency fruitful. Yea as Horace saith, > melius Chrisippo & Crantore.[7]

But truly I imagine it falleth out with these poet-whippers, as with some good women, who often are sick, but in faith they cannot tell where; so the name of poetry is odious to them, but neither his cause nor effects, neither the sum that contains him, nor the particularities descending from him, give any fast handle to their carping dispraise.

---

[1] Pindar Famous Greek lyric poet (d. c. 443 BCE) whose odes celebrated victorious athletes.

[2] Lacedemonians Spartans.

[3] Philip of Macedon Father of Alexander the Great. According to Plutarch's Life of Alexander, Philip received three wonderful tidings in one day—that his wife had given birth to a son, that his general had been victorious in battle, and that his horse had won a race at Olympia.

[4] Heroical Epic.

[5] Turnus Great adversary of Aeneas in Virgil's Aeneid; Tydeus Hero of Statius's Thebaid; Rinaldo Hero of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso.

[6] Aeneas ... Dido See Aeneid 2.705–20; 4.23–34. When Aeneas leads his people from Troy to Carthage, Dido, Queen of Carthage, becomes his lover until the gods order Aeneas to leave her and continue on his mission to build a new city for his people.

[7] melius ... Crantore Latin: "better than Chrysippus and Crantor" (Epistles, 1.2.4); Chrysippus Third-century BCE Stoic philosopher; Crantor Greek philosopher of the fourth century BCE and the first commentator on Plato.

Since then poetry is of all human learnings the most ancient and of most fatherly antiquity, as from whence other learnings have taken their beginnings; since it is so universal that no learned nation doth despise it, nor barbarous nation is without it; since both Roman & Greek gave such divine names unto it, the one of prophesying, the other of making; and that indeed the name of making is fit for him, considering that where all other arts retain themselves within their subject, and receive, as it were, their being from it, the poet only bringeth his own stuff, and doth not learn a conceit out of a matter, but maketh matter for a conceit; since neither his description nor end containing any evil, the thing described cannot be evil; since his effects be so good as to teach goodness and delight the learners of it; since therein (namely in moral doctrine, the chief of all knowledges) he doth not only far pass the historian, but, for instructing, is well nigh comparable to the philosopher, for moving, leaves him behind him; since the Holy Scripture (wherein there is no uncleanness) hath whole parts in it poetical, and that even our Saviour Christ vouchsafed to use the flowers of it; since all his kinds are not only in their united forms, but in their severed dissections, fully commendable; I think (and think I think rightly) the laurel crown appointed for triumphant captains doth worthily (of all other learnings) honor the poet's triumph.

But because we have ears as well as tongues, and that the lightest reasons that may be will seem to weigh greatly, if nothing be put in the counterbalance, let us hear, and, as well as we can, ponder what objections be made against this art, which may be worthy either of yielding or answering.

First, truly I note not only in these μισομουσι, poet-haters, but in all that kind of people who seek a praise by dispraising others, that they do prodigally spend a great many wandering words in quips and scoffs, carping and taunting at each thing which, by stirring the spleen, may stay the brain from a thorough-beholding the worthiness of the subject. Those kind of objections, as they are full of a very idle easiness, since there is nothing of so sacred a majesty but that an itching tongue may rub itself upon it, so deserve they no other answer, but, instead of laughing at the jest, to laugh at the jester. We know a playing wit can praise the discretion of an ass, the comfortableness of being in debt, and the jolly commodities of being sick of the plague. So of the contrary side, if we will turn Ovid's verse, that good lie hid in nearness of the evil, Agrippa will be as merry in showing the vanity of science as Erasmus[2] was in the commending of folly. Neither shall any man or matter escape some touch of these smiling railers. But for Erasmus and Agrippa, they had another foundation than the superficial part would promise. Marry, these other pleasant fault-finders, who will correct the verb before they understand the noun, and confute others knowledge before they confirm their own, I would have them only remember that scoffing cometh not of wisdom; so as the best title in true English they get with their merriments is to be called good fools, for so have our grave forefathers ever termed that humorous kind of jesters.

> Ut lateat virtus, proximitate mali,[1]

But that which giveth greatest scope to their scorning humour is rhyming and versing. It is already said (and, as I think, truly said) it is not rhyming and versing that makes poesy. One may be a poet without versing, and a versifier without poetry. But yet, presuppose it were inseparable (as indeed it seemeth Scaliger[3] judgeth), truly it were an inseparable commendation. For if oratio next to ratio, speech next to reason, be the greatest gift bestowed upon mortality, that cannot be praiseless which doth most polish that blessing of speech; which considers each word, not only (as a man may say) by his forcible quality, but by his best measured quantity, carrying even in themselves a harmony—without, perchance, number, measure, order, proportion be in our time grown odious. But lay aside the just praise it hath by being the only fit speech for music (music, I say, the most divine striker of the senses), thus much is undoubtedly true, that if reading be foolish without remembering, memory being the only treasure of knowledge, those words which are fittest for memory are likewise most convenient for knowledge. Now, that verse far exceedeth prose in the knitting up of the memory, the reason is manifest: the words (besides their delight, which hath a great affinity to memory) being so set as one cannot be lost but the whole work fails; which accusing itself, calleth the remembrance back to itself, and so most strongly confirmeth it. Besides, one word so, as it were, begetting another, as, be it in rhyme or measured verse, by the former a man shall have a near guess to the follower. Lastly, even they that have taught the art of memory have showed nothing so apt for it as a certain room divided into many places well & thoroughly known. Now, that hath the verse in effect perfectly, every word having his natural seat, which seat must needs make the word remembered. But what needeth more in a thing so known to all men? Who is it that ever was scholar that doth not carry away some verse of Virgil, Horace, or Cato, which in his youth he learned, and even to his old age serve him for hourly lessons; as

---

[1] Ut ... mali Latin: "That virtue may lurk next to evil" (Ovid, The Art of Love 2.662).

[2] Agrippa German philosopher and author of On the Uncertainty and Vanity of the Sciences and the Arts (1526); Erasmus Dutch humanist who wrote The Praise of Folly (1509).

[3] Scaliger Julius Caesar Scaliger, Italian scholar of the sixteenth century who wrote Seven Books on Poetry.

> Percontatorem fugito nam garrulus idem est;
> Dum tibi quisque placet credula turba sumas.[1]

But the fitness it hath for memory is notably proved by all delivery of arts, wherein, for the most part, from grammar to logic, mathematics, physic, and the rest, the rules chiefly necessary to be borne away are compiled in verses. So that, verse being in itself sweet and orderly, and being best for memory, the only handle of knowledge, it must be in jest that any man can speak against it.

Now then go we to the most important imputations laid to the poor poets. For aught I can yet learn, they are these. First, that there being many other more fruitful knowledges, a man might better spend his time in them than in this. Secondly, that it is the mother of lies. Thirdly, that it is the nurse of abuse, infecting us with many pestilent desires; with a siren's sweetness drawing the mind to the serpent's tail of sinful fancies (and herein, especially, comedies give the largest field to ear,[2] as Chaucer saith); how, both in other nations and in ours, before poets did soften us, we were full of courage, given to martial exercises, the pillars of man-like liberty, and not lulled asleep in shady idleness with poets' pastimes. And lastly and chiefly, they cry out with open mouth, as if they had shot Robin Hood, that Plato banished them out of his commonwealth. Truly this is much, if there be much truth in it.

First, to the first. That a man might better spend his time, is a reason indeed; but it doth, as they say, but petere principium.[3] For if it be as I affirm, that no learning is so good as that which teacheth and moveth to virtue; and that none can both teach and move thereto so much as poesy, then is the conclusion manifest that ink and paper cannot be to a more profitable purpose employed. And certainly, though a man should grant their first assumption, it should follow (methinks) very unwillingly, that good is not good, because better is better. But I still and utterly deny that there is sprung out of the earth a more fruitful knowledge.

To the second, therefore, that they should be the principal liars, I answer paradoxically, but truly, I think truly, that of all writers under the sun, the poet is the least liar; and, though he would, as a poet can scarcely be a liar. The astronomer, with his cousin the geometrician, can hardly escape, when they take upon them to measure the height of the stars. How often, think you, do the physicians lie, when they aver things good for sicknesses, which afterwards send Charon[4] a great number of souls drowned in a potion before they come to his ferry? And no less of the rest, which take upon them to affirm. Now, for the poet, he nothing affirms, and therefore never lieth. For, as I take it, to lie is to affirm that to be true which is false. So as the other artists, and especially the historian, affirming many things, can, in the cloudy knowledge of mankind, hardly escape from many lies. But the poet, as I said before, never affirmeth. The poet never maketh any circles about your imagination, to conjure you to believe for true what he writes. He citeth not authorities of other histories, but even for his entry calleth the sweet Muses to inspire unto him a good invention; in truth, not labouring to tell you what is or is not, but what should or should not, be. And therefore, though he recount things not true, yet because he telleth them not for true, he lieth not—without we will say that Nathan lied in his speech before alleged to David; which as a wicked man durst scarce say, so think I none so simple would say that Aesop lied in the tales of his beasts; for who thinks Aesop wrote it for actually true were well worthy to have his name chronicled among the beasts he writeth of. What child is there that, coming to a play and seeing "Thebes" written in great letters upon an old door, doth believe that it is Thebes? If then a man can arrive to the child's age to know that the poets' persons and doings are but pictures what should be, and not stories what have been, they will never give the lie to things not affirmatively but allegorically and figuratively written. And therefore, as in history, looking for truth, they may go away full fraught with falsehood, so in poesy, looking but for fiction, they shall use the narration but as an imaginative ground-plot of a profitable invention. But hereto is replied that the poets give names to men they write of, which argueth a conceit of an actual truth, and so, not being true, proves a falsehood. And doth the lawyer lie then, when under the names of John-a-stiles and John-a-nokes[1] he putteth his case? But that is easily answered. Their naming of men is but to make their picture the more lively, and not to build any history: painting men, they cannot leave men nameless. We see we cannot play at chess but that we must give names to our chessmen; and yet, methinks, he were a very partial champion of truth that would say we lied for giving a piece of wood the reverend title of a bishop. The poet nameth Cyrus and Aeneas no other way than to show what men of their fames, fortunes, and estates should do.

---

[1] Percontatorem ... est Latin: "Flee the inquisitive man, for he is sure to be garrulous" (Horace, Epistles 1.18.69); Dum ... sumas Latin: "While each pleases himself we are a credulous mob" (Ovid, Remedia Amoris 686).

[2] comedies ... ear See "The Knight's Tale" l.28, in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales: "a large feeld to ere" ("ere" meaning "to plow").

[3] petere principium Latin: to beg the question.

[4] Charon Greek mythological ferryman of the underworld who transports the souls of the dead across the River Styx.

Their third is, how much it abuseth men's wit, training it to wanton sinfulness and lustful love. For indeed that is the principal, if not only, abuse I can hear alleged. They say the comedies rather teach than reprehend amorous conceits. They say the lyric is larded with passionate sonnets, the elegiac weeps the want of his mistress, and that even to the heroical, Cupid hath ambitiously climbed. Alas, Love, I would thou couldst as well defend thyself as thou canst offend others. I would those on whom thou doest attend could either put thee away, or yield good reason why they keep thee. But grant love of beauty to be a beastly fault (although it be very hard, since only man, and no beast, hath that gift to discern beauty); grant that lovely name of Love to deserve all hateful reproaches (although even some of my masters the philosophers spent a good deal of their lamp-oil in setting forth the excellency of it); grant, I say, whatsoever they will have granted, that not only love, but lust, but vanity, but (if they list) scurrility, possesseth many leaves of the poets' books; yet, think I, when this is granted, they will find their sentence may with good manners put the last words foremost, and not say that poetry abuseth man's wit, but that man's wit abuseth poetry.

For I will not deny but that man's wit may make poesy, which should be εἰκαστικὴ[2] (which some learned have defined, "figuring forth good things"), to be φανταστικὴ[3] (which doth, contrariwise, infect the fancy with unworthy objects), as the painter should give to the eye either some excellent perspective, or some fine picture fit for building or fortification, or containing in it some notable example (as Abraham sacrificing his son Isaac, Judith killing Holofernes, David fighting with Goliath),[4] may leave those, and please an ill-pleased eye with wanton shows of better hidden matters. But what, shall the abuse of a thing, make the right use odious? Nay, truly, though I yield that poesy may not only be abused, but that, being abused, by the reason of his sweet charming force, it can do more hurt than any other army of words: yet shall it be so far from concluding that the abuse should give reproach to the abused, that, contrariwise, it is a good reason that whatsoever, being abused, doth most harm, being rightly used (and upon the right use, each thing receives his title), doth most good. Do we not see skill of physic, the best rampire[1] to our often-assaulted bodies, being abused, teach poison, the most violent destroyer? Doth not knowledge of law, whose end is to even & right all things, being abused, grow the crooked fosterer of horrible injuries? Doth not (to go to the highest) God's word, abused, breed heresy, and his name, abused, become blasphemy? Truly, a needle cannot do much hurt, and as truly (with leave of ladies be it spoken) it cannot do much good: with a sword thou mayst kill thy father, and with a sword thou mayst defend thy prince and country. So that, as in their calling poets fathers of lies they said nothing, so in this their argument of abuse they prove the commendation.

---

[1] John ... nokes Fictitious names, like John Doe.

[2] εἰκαστικὴ Greek: representing real things.

[3] φανταστικὴ Greek: representing imaginary things.

[4] as Abraham ... Goliath See Genesis 22, Judith 2–14, and 1 Samuel 17, respectively.

They allege herewith, that before poets began to be in price, our nation had set their hearts' delight upon action, and not imagination: rather doing things worthy to be written, than writing things fit to be done. What that before-time was, I think scarcely Sphinx[2] can tell, since no memory is so ancient that hath not the precedent of poetry. And certain it is that, in our plainest homeliness, yet never was the Albion nation[3] without poetry. Marry, this argument, though it be levelled against poetry, yet is it indeed a chainshot[4] against all learning, or "bookishness," as they commonly term it. Of such mind were certain Goths, of whom it is written that, having in the spoil of a famous city taken a fair library, one hangman (belike fit to execute the fruits of their wits), who had murdered a great number of bodies, would have set fire in it. "No," said another very gravely, "take heed what you do; for while they are busy about those toys, we shall with more leisure conquer their countries." This indeed is the ordinary doctrine of ignorance, and many words sometimes I have heard spent in it. But because this reason is generally against all learning, as well as poetry, or rather, all learning but poetry; because it were too great a digression to handle it, or at least too superfluous (since it is manifest that all government of action is to be gotten by knowledge, and knowledge best by gathering many knowledges, which is reading), I only, with Horace, to him that is of that opinion > jubeo stultum esse libenter;[5]

for as for poetry itself, it is the freest from this objection.

For poetry is the companion of camps. I dare undertake Orlando Furioso, or honest King Arthur, will never displease a soldier; but the quiddity of ens and prima materia will hardly agree with a corselet;[6] and therefore, as I said in the beginning, even Turks and Tartars are delighted with poets. Homer, a Greek, flourished before Greece flourished. And if to a slight conjecture a conjecture may be opposed, truly it may seem that, as by him their learned men took almost their first light of knowledge, so their active men received their first motions of courage. Only Alexander's example may serve, who by Plutarch is accounted of such virtue, that Fortune was not his guide but his footstool; whose acts speak for him, though Plutarch did not: indeed the phoenix[7] of warlike princes. This Alexander left his schoolmaster, living Aristotle, behind him, but took dead Homer with him. He put the philosopher Callisthenes to death for his seeming philosophical, indeed mutinous, stubbornness, but the chief thing he was ever heard to wish for was that Homer had been alive. He well found he received more bravery of mind by the pattern of Achilles than by hearing the definition of fortitude. And therefore, if Cato misliked Fulvius for carrying Ennius with him to the field,[1] it may be answered that, if Cato misliked it, the noble Fulvius liked it, or else he had not done it; for it was not the excellent Cato Uticensis[2] (whose authority I would much more have reverenced), but it was the former, in truth a bitter punisher of faults (but else a man that had never sacrificed to the Graces:[3] he misliked and cried out against all Greek learning, and yet, being four score years old, began to learn it, belike fearing that Pluto[4] understood not Latin). Indeed, the Roman laws allowed no person to be carried to the wars but he that was in the soldiers' role; and therefore, though Cato misliked his unmustered[5] person, he misliked not his work. And if he had, Scipio Nasica, judged by common consent the best Roman, loved him. Both the other Scipio brothers, who had by their virtues no less surnames than of Asia and Afric,[6] so loved him that they caused his body to be buried in their sepulture.[7] So as Cato's authority, being but against his person, and that answered with so far greater than himself, is herein of no validity.

---

[1] rampire Rampart; bulwark.

[2] Sphinx Mythical creature with the head of a woman and the body of a lion who posed riddles to humans.

[3] Albion nation England.

[4] chainshot Weapon used in naval warfare to destroy ships; it consists of two cannon balls joined by a chain.

[5] jubeo … libenter Latin: "I order him to be gladly foolish" (Horace, Satires 1.1.63).

[6] quiddity Subtlety; ens Latin: essential nature; prima materia Latin: primary, original matter of the universe; corselet Soldier (literally, a corselet is a piece of body armor worn by soldiers).

[7] phoenix Mythical unique bird said to be eternally reborn from its own ashes.

But now indeed my burden is great, that Plato's name is laid upon me, whom, I must confess, of all philosophers, I have ever esteemed most worthy of reverence; and with good reason, since of all philosophers he is the most poetical. Yet if he will defile the fountain out of which his flowing streams have proceeded, let us boldly examine with what reasons he did it. First, truly, a man might maliciously object that Plato, being a philosopher, was a natural enemy of poets. For indeed, after the philosophers had picked out of the sweet mysteries of poetry the right discerning true points of knowledge, they forthwith, putting it in method, and making a school-art of that which the poets did only teach by a divine delightfulness, beginning to spurn at their guides like ungrateful apprentices, were not content to set up shop for themselves, but sought by all means to discredit their masters; which by the force of delight being barred them, the less they could overthrow them, the more they hated them. For indeed, they found for Homer seven cities strove who should have him for their citizen; where so many cities banished philosophers as not fit members to live among them. For only repeating certain of Euripides's verses, many Athenians had their lives saved of the Syracusans, where the Athenians themselves thought many philosophers unworthy to live.[8] Certain poets, as Simonides and Pindarus, had so prevailed with Hiero the First that of a tyrant they made him a just king; where Plato could do so little with Dionysus,[9] that he himself of a philosopher was made a slave. But who should do thus, I confess, should requite the objections made against poets with like cavillations[10] against philosophers; as likewise one should do that should bid one read Phaedrus or Symposium in Plato, or the discourse of love in Plutarch, and see whether any poet do authorize abominable filthiness, as they do. Again, a man might ask out of what commonwealth Plato did banish them:[11] in sooth, thence where himself alloweth community of women[12]—so as belike this banishment grew not for effeminate wantonness, since little should poetical sonnets be hurtful when a man might have what woman he listed. But I honor philosophical instructions, and bless the wits which bred them: so as they be not abused, which is likewise stretched to poetry.

---

[1] Cato … field Marcus Portius Cato the Censor objected to his general, Marcus Flavius Nobilior, bringing the poet Quintus Ennius (not merely his poetry) with him into battle.

[2] Cato Uticensis Great-grandson of Cato the Censor and famous political opponent of Julius Caesar.

[3] the Graces Three mythological goddesses, daughters of Zeus and Eurynome who bestow joy, beauty, and charm.

[4] Pluto God of the underworld.

[5] unmustered I.e., not officially enrolled in the army.

[6] Scipio Nasica Second-century BCE consul of Rome; other Scipio brothers … Asia and Afric Scipio Asiaticus and Scipio Africanus, two skilled and noble generals.

[7] sepulture Sepulcher.

[8] Athenians … live Plutarch, in his Life of Nicias, ch. 29, claims that a group of Greek slaves won their freedom as a reward for having taught their masters the poetry of Euripides.

[9] Simonides Greek lyric poet (c. 556–468 BCE); Hiero the First Despotic ruler of Syracuse who was also a patron of Greek poets; Dionysus Fourth-century BCE tyrant of Syracuse who is said to have indirectly caused Plato to be sold into slavery.

[10] cavillations Meritless objections.

[11] them I.e., poets.

[12] community of women Cf. Plato's Republic, 5.449–62, in which he proposes that in an ideal republic, women would not marry, but would be shared equally by all men.

St. Paul himself setteth a watch-word upon philosophy, indeed upon the abuse.[1] So doth Plato upon the abuse, not upon poetry. Plato found fault that the poets of his time filled the world with wrong opinions of the gods, making light tales of that unspotted essence, and therefore would not have the youth depraved with such opinions. Herein may much be said. Let this suffice: the poets did not induce such opinions, but did imitate those opinions already induced; for all the Greek stories can well testify that the very religion of that time stood upon many, and many-fashioned, gods, not taught so by poets, but followed according to their nature of imitation. Who list may read in Plutarch the discourses of Isis and Osiris, of the cause why Oracles ceased, of the divine providence, & see whether the theology of that nation stood not upon such dreams which the poets indeed superstitiously observed—and truly (since they had not the light of Christ) did much better in it than the philosophers, who, shaking off superstition, brought in atheism. Plato therefore (whose authority I had much rather justly construe than unjustly resist) meant not in general of poets, in those words of which Julius Scaliger saith, Qua authoritate barbari quidam atque hispidi abuti velint ad poetas e republica exigendos;[2] but only meant to drive out those wrong opinions of the Deity (whereof now, without further law, Christianity hath taken away all the hurtful belief), perchance (as he thought) nourished by then-esteemed poets. And a man need go no further than to Plato himself to know his meaning: who, in his dialogue called Ion, giveth high and rightly divine commendation unto poetry. So as Plato, banishing the abuse, not the thing, not banishing it, but giving due honor unto it, shall be our patron, and not our adversary. For indeed I had much rather, since truly I may do it, show their mistaking of Plato (under whose lion's skin they would make an ass-like braying against poesy) than go about to overthrow his authority; whom the wiser a man is, the more just cause he shall find to have in admiration; especially since he attributeth unto poesy more than myself do, namely, to be a very inspiring of a divine force, far above man's wit, as in the forenamed dialogue is apparent.

Of the other side, who would show the honors have been by the best sort of judgments granted them, a whole sea of examples would present themselves: Alexanders, Caesars, Scipios, all favorers of poets; Laelius,[3] called the Roman Socrates, himself a poet, so as part of Heautontimorumenos in Terence was supposed to be made by him; and even the Greek Socrates, whom Apollo confirmed to be the only wise man, is said to have spent part of his old time in putting Aesop's fables into verses. And therefore, full evil should it become his scholar Plato to put such words in his master's mouth against poets. But what need more? Aristotle writes the Art of Poesy; and why, if it should not be written? Plutarch teacheth the use to be gathered of them;[4] and how, if they should not be read? And who reads Plutarch's either history or philosophy shall find he trimmeth both their garments with guards of poesy. But I list not to defend poesy with the help of his underling historiography. Let it suffice to have showed it is a fit soil for praise to dwell upon; and what dispraise may set upon it, is either easily overcome, or transformed into just commendation.

So that, since the excellencies of it may be so easily and so justly confirmed, and the low-creeping objections so soon trodden down—it not being an art of lies, but of true doctrine; not of effeminateness, but of notable stirring of courage; not of abusing man's wit, but of strengthening man's wit; not banished, but honored, by Plato—let us rather plant more laurels for to engarland the poets' heads (which honor of being laureate, as besides them only triumphant captains were, is a sufficient authority to show the price they ought to be held in) than suffer the ill-favored breath of such wrong-speakers once to blow upon the clear springs of poesy.

But since I have run so long a career in this matter, methinks, before I give my pen a full stop, it shall be but a little more lost time to enquire why England, the

---

St. Paul … abuse See Colossus 2.8: "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ."

Qua … exigendos Latin: "By the abuse of which authority [i.e., Plato's] some barbarous and crude men seek to expel poets from the Republic" (Scaliger, Poetics 5.a.1).

[3] Laelius Roman soldier and politician Gaius Laelius (d. 160 BCE).

[4] Plutarch …them See Plutarch's Moralia 17, "How the Young Man Should Study Poetry."

mother of excellent minds, should be grown so hard a stepmother to poets, who certainly in wit ought to pass all other, since all only proceedeth from their wit, being indeed makers of themselves, not takers of others. How can I but exclaim

> Musa, mihi causas memoria, quo numine laeso?[1]

Sweet poesy, that hath anciently had kings, emperors, senators, great captains, such as—besides a thousands others—David, Adrian, Sophocles, Germanicus, not only to favor poets, but to be poets; and of our nearer times can present for her patrons a Robert, King of Sicily, the great King Francis of France, King James of Scotland; such cardinals as Bembus and Bibbiena; such famous preachers and teachers as Beza and Melanchthon; so learned philosophers as Fracastorius and Scaliger; so great orators as Pontanus and Muretus; so piercing wits as George Buchanan; so grave counsellors as, besides many, but before all, that Hospital of France,[2] than whom (I think) that realm never brought forth a more accomplished judgment, more firmly built upon virtue: I say these, with numbers of others, not only to read others' poesies, but to poetize for others' reading—that poesy, thus embraced in all other places, should only find in our time a hard welcome in England. I think the very earth lamenteth it, and therefore decks our soil with fewer laurels than it was accustomed. For heretofore poets have in England also flourished, and which is to be noted, even in those times when the trumpet of Mars[3] did sound loudest. And now that an over-faint quietness should seem to strew the house for poets, they are almost in as good reputation as the mountebanks[4] at Venice. Truly even that, as of the one side it giveth great praise to poesy, which like Venus (but to better purpose) had rather be troubled in the net with Mars than enjoy the homely quiet of Vulcan:[5] so serves it for a piece of a reason why they are less grateful to idle England, which now can scarce endure the pain of a pen.

Upon this necessarily followeth, that base men with evil wits undertake it, who think it enough if they can be rewarded of the printer. And so as Epaminondas[6] is said with the honor of his virtue to have made an office, by his exercising it, which before was contemptible, to become highly respected; so these men, no more but setting their names to it, by their own disgracefulness disgrace the most graceful poesy. For now, as if all the Muses were got with child to bring forth bastard poets, without any commission they do post over the banks of the Helicon,[7] till they make the readers more weary than post-horses; while, in the meantime, they are better content to suppress the outflowings of their wit, than, by publishing them, to be accounted knights of the same order. But I that, before ever I durst aspire unto the dignity, am admitted into the company of the paper-blurrers, do find the very true cause of our wanting estimation is want of desert—taking upon us to be poets in despite of Pallas.

> Queis meliore luto finxit praecordia Titan[8]

---

[1] Musa … laeso Latin: "O Muse, tell me the cause by which the divine has been offended?" (Aeneid 1.8).

[2] David King David of Israel; Adrian Roman emperor Hadrian (76–138 CE), a patron of the arts and also a writer; Germanicus Roman general (d. 19 CE), known for conquering Germany and said to have written verse; Robert King Robert II of Anjou (1275–1343), patron to Petrarch; Francis King Francis I of France (1494–1547), under whose patronage many French poets flourished; James King James VI of Scotland (later James I of England), author, and patron of other poets; Bembus The Roman Catholic cardinal, philosopher, and poet Pietro Bembo (1470–1547); Bibbiena Cardinal and author of the comedy Calandria (1513); Beza Theodore Beza (1519–1605), Calvinist reformer, theologian, and author; Melanchthon Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560), theologian, author, and friend and supporter of Martin Luther; Fracastorius The Italian physician Girolamo Fracastoro, known for writing the Naugerius (1555); Scaliger See description of Scaliger on page 357; Pontanus The poet Giovanni Pontano (1426–1503); Muretus The French humanist Marc-Antoine de Muret (1526–85); George Buchanan Scottish humanist, poet, and playwright (1506–82); Hospital of France Michel de L'Hôpital (1505–73), reformist French Chancellor and Latin poet.

[3] Mars Roman god of war.

[4] mountebanks Charlatans.

[5] Venus … Vulcan Vulcan, the Roman god of fire, forged a net to catch his wife, Venus, goddess of love and beauty, in adultery with Mars.

[6] Epaminondas Theban general of the fourth century BCE.

[7] Helicon Mountain sacred to the Muses.

[8] Queis … Titan Latin: "Whose breasts the Titan [Prometheus] has fashioned from finer clays" (Juvenal, Satires 14.36).

Now, wherein we want desert were a thankworthy labour to express; but if I knew, I should have mended myself. But as I never desired the title, so have I neglected the means to come by it. Only, overmastered by some thoughts, I yielded an inky tribute unto them. Marry, they that delight in poesy itself should seek to know what they do, and how they do; and especially look themselves in an unflattering glass of reason, if they be inclinable unto it. For poesy must not be drawn by the ears; it must be gently led, or rather it must lead—which was partly the cause that made the ancient-learned affirm it was a divine gift, & no human skill: since all other knowledges lie ready for any that have strength of wit. A poet no industry can make, if his own genius be not carried into it; and therefore it is an old proverb, orator fit, poeta nascitur.[1]

Yet confess I always, that as the fertilest ground must be manured, so must the highest flying wit have a Daedalus[2] to guide him. That Daedalus, they say, both in this and in other, hath three wings to bear itself up into the air of due commendation: that is, art, imitation, and exercise. But these, neither artificial rules nor imitative patterns, we much cumber[3] ourselves with all. Exercise indeed we do, but that very fore-backwardly: for where we should exercise to know, we exercise as having known; and so is our brain delivered of much matter which never was begotten by knowledge. For there being two principal parts, matter to be expressed by words, and words to express the matter: in neither, we use art or imitation rightly. Our matter is quodlibet[4] indeed, though wrongly performing Ovid's verse, never marshalling it into any assured rank, that almost the readers cannot tell where to find themselves.

> Quicquid conabar dicere, Versus erit:[5]

Chaucer, undoubtedly, did excellently in his Troilus and Criseyde; of whom, truly, I know not whether to marvel more, either that he in that misty time could see so clearly, or that we in this clear age go so stumblingly after him. Yet had he great wants, fit to be forgiven in so reverent an antiquity. I account the Mirror of Magistrates[6] meetly furnished of beautiful parts, and in the Earl of Surrey's lyrics many things tasting of a noble birth, and worthy of a noble mind. The Shepherd's Calendar[7] hath much poetry in his eclogues, indeed worthy the reading, if I be not deceived. (That same framing of his style to an old rustic language I dare not allow, since neither Theocritus in Greek, Virgil in Latin, nor Sannazaro[8] in Italian did affect it.) Besides these, I do not remember to have seen but few (to speak boldly) printed that have poetical sinews in them; for proof whereof, let but most of the verses be put in prose, and then ask the meaning, and it will be found that one verse did but beget another, without ordering at the first what should be at the last; which becomes a confused mass of words with a tingling sound of rhyme, barely accompanied with reason.

Our tragedies and comedies (not without cause cried out against), observing rules neither of honest civility, nor skilful poetry—excepting Gorboduc[9] (again, I say, of those that I have seen), which notwithstanding as it is full of stately speeches and well-sounding phrases, climbing to the height of Seneca's style, and as full of notable morality, which it doth most delightfully teach, and so obtain the very end of poesy, yet in truth it is very defectuous in the circumstances, which grieveth me, because it might not remain as an exact model of all tragedies. For it is faulty both in place and time, the two necessary companions of all corporal actions. For where the stage should always represent but one place, and the uttermost time presupposed in it should be, both by Aristotle's precept and common reason, but one day, there is both many days and places inartificially imagined.

---

[1] orator ... nascitur Latin: "the orator is made, the poet is born."

[2] Daedalus Mythical inventor who escaped prison on wings made of wax and feathers.

[3] cumber Encumber.

[4] quodlibet Latin: anything you wish.

[5] Quicquid ... erit Latin: "Whatever I shall try to say, it will be verse" (Ovid, Tristia 4.10.26).

[6] Mirror of Magistrates Collection of poems imagined said by various fallen political figures (1559).

[7] Shepherd's Calendar Twelve pastoral poems by Edmund Spenser (1552–99), dedicated to Sidney.

[8] Theocrites ... Virgil ... Sannazaro Pastoral poets.

[9] Gorboduc 1561 tragedy by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville.

But if it be so in Gorboduc, how much more in all the rest, where you shall have Asia of the one side, and Africa of the other, and so many other under-kingdoms that the player, when he cometh in, must ever begin with telling where he is, or else the tale will not be conceived? Now you shall have three ladies walk to gather flowers: and then we must believe the stage to be a garden. By and by we hear news of shipwreck in the same place: and then we are to blame if we accept it not for a rock. Upon the back of that comes out a hideous monster with fire and smoke: and then the miserable beholders are bound to take it for a cave. While in the meantime two armies fly in, represented with four swords & bucklers: and then what hard heart will not receive it for a pitched field?

Now, of time they are much more liberal: for ordinary it is that two young princes[1] fall in love; after many traverses[2] she is got with child, delivered of a fair boy; he is lost, groweth a man, falls in love, and is ready to get another child; and all this is in two hours' space: which, how absurd it is in sense, even sense may imagine, and art hath taught, and all ancient examples justified—and at this day, the ordinary players in Italy will not err in. Yet will some bring in an example of Eunuchus in Terence, that containeth matter of two days, yet far short of twenty years. True it is, and so was it to be played in two days, and so fitted to the time it set forth. And though Plautus[3] have in one place done amiss, let us hit with him, & not miss with him.

But they will say, how then shall we set forth a story which containeth both many places and many times? And do they not know that a tragedy is tied to the laws of poesy, and not of history; not bound to follow the story, but having liberty either to feign a quite new matter or to frame the history to the most tragical conveniency? Again, many things may be told which cannot be showed, if they know the difference betwixt reporting and representing. As, for example, I may speak (though I am here) of Peru, and in speech digress from that to the description of Calcutta; but in action I cannot represent it without Pacolet's horse.[4] And so was the manner the ancients took, by some nuntius[5] to recount things done in former time or other place. Lastly, if they will represent a history, they must not (as Horace saith) begin ab ovo,[6] but they must come to the principal point of that one action which they will represent.

By example this will be best expressed. I have a story of young Polydorus,[7] delivered for safety's sake, with great riches, by his father Priam to Polymnester, King of Thrace, in the Trojan war time. He, after some years, hearing the overthrow of Priam, for to make the treasure his own, murdereth the child; the body of the child is taken up by Hecuba; she, the same day, findeth a sleight to be revenged most cruelly of the tyrant. Where now would one of our tragedy writers begin, but with the delivery of the child? Then should he sail over into Thrace, and so spend I know not how many years, and travel numbers of places. But where doth Euripides? Even with the finding of the body, the rest leaving to be told by the spirit of Polydorus. This needs no further to be enlarged; the dullest wit may conceive it.

But besides these gross absurdities, how all their plays be neither right tragedies, nor right comedies, mingling kings and clowns, not because the matter so carrieth it, but thrust in the clown by head and shoulders to play a part in majestical matters with neither decency nor discretion, so as neither the admiration and commiseration, nor the right sportfulness, is by their mongrel tragicomedy obtained. I know Apuleius[8] did somewhat so, but that is a thing recounted with space of time, not represented in one moment; and I know the ancients have one or two examples of tragicomedies, as Plautus hath Amphitryo;[9] but, if we mark them well, we shall find that they never, or very daintily, match hornpipes and funerals. So falleth it out that, having indeed no right comedy, in that comical part of our tragedy we have nothing but scurrility, unworthy of any chaste ears, or some extreme show of doltishness, indeed fit to lift up a loud laughter, and nothing else: where the whole tract of a comedy should be full of delight, as the tragedy should be still maintained in a well-raised admiration.

---

[1] princes I.e., children of kings, both male and female.

[2] traverses Trials; tribulations.

[3] Plautus Roman writer whose play The Menaechmi or the Twin Brothers provided the basis for Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors.

[4] Pacolet's horse Enchanted flying horse in the French romance Valentine and Orson.

[5] nuntius Latin: messenger.

[6] ab ovo Latin: from the egg; i.e., from the beginning.

[7] story … Polydorus Euripedes tells this story in his play Hecuba.

[8] Apuleius Author of the Latin work The Golden Ass (translated into English in 1566 by William Adlington).

[9] Amphitryo Tragicomedy by the Roman playwright Plautus, in which the gods trick Alcmena, the heroine, into sleeping with Jupiter.

But our comedians think there is no delight without laughter, which is very wrong; for though laughter may come with delight, yet cometh it not of delight, as though delight should be the cause of laughter; but well may one thing breed both together. Nay, rather in themselves they have, as it were, a kind of contrariety: for delight we scarcely do but in things that have a conveniency to ourselves, or to the general nature; laughter almost ever cometh of things most disproportioned to ourselves and nature. Delight hath a joy in it, either permanent or present. Laughter hath only a scornful tickling.

For example, we are ravished with delight to see a fair woman, and yet are far from being moved to laughter. We laugh at deformed creatures, wherein certainly we cannot delight. We delight in good chances, we laugh at mischances. We delight to hear the happiness of our friends and country, at which he were worthy to be laughed at that would laugh; we shall, contrarily, laugh sometimes to find a matter quite mistaken and go down the hill against the bias[1] in the mouth of some such men—as for the respect of them one shall be heartily sorry, he cannot choose but laugh, and so is rather pained than delighted with laughter.

Yet deny I not but that they may go well together. For as in Alexander's picture well set out we delight without laughter, and in twenty mad antics we laugh without delight; so in Hercules, painted with his great beard and furious countenance, in a woman's attire, spinning at Omphale's commandment,[2] it breedeth both delight and laughter: for the representing of so strange a power in love procureth delight, and the scornfulness of the action stirreth laughter. But I speak to this purpose, that all the end of the comical part be not upon such scornful matters as stir laughter only, but, mixed with it, that delightful teaching which is the end of poesy. And the great fault even in that point of laughter, and forbidden plainly by Aristotle,[3] is that they stir laughter in sinful things, which are rather execrable than ridiculous, or in miserable, which are rather to be pitied than scorned. For what is it to make folks gape at a wretched beggar and a beggarly clown; or, against law of hospitality, to jest at strangers because they speak not English so well as we do? What do we learn, since it is certain

> Nil habet infoelix paupertas durius in se,
> Quam quod ridiculos homines facit?[4]

But rather, a busy loving courtier and a heartless threatening Thraso; a self-wise-seeming schoolmaster; an awry transformed traveller. These, if we saw walk in stage names, which we play naturally, therein were delightful laughter, and teaching delightfulness—as in the other, the tragedies of Buchanan do justly bring forth a divine admiration.

But I have lavished out too many words of this play matter. I do it because, as they are excelling parts of poesy, so is there none so much used in England, and none can be more pitifully abused; which, like an unmannerly daughter showing a bad education, causeth her mother Poesy's honesty to be called in question.

Other sort of poetry almost have we none, but that lyrical kind of songs and sonnets: which, Lord, if He gave us so good minds, how well it might be employed, and with how heavenly fruits, both private and public, in singing the praises of the immortal beauty: the immortal goodness of that God who giveth us hands to write and wits to conceive; of which we might well want words, but never matter; of which we could turn our eyes to nothing, but we should ever have new-budding occasions. But truly many of such writings as come under the banner of unresistible love, if I were a mistress, would never persuade me they were in love: so coldly they apply fiery speeches, as men that had rather read lovers' writings—and so caught up certain swelling phrases which hang together like a man that once told me the wind was at northwest and by south, because he would be sure to name winds enough—than that in truth they feel those passions, which easily (as I think) may be bewrayed[1] by that same forcibleness, or energia (as the Greeks call it), of the writer. But let this be a sufficient though short note, that we miss the right use of the material point of poesy.

---

[1] go down … bias End disastrously.

[2] Omphale's commandment Hercules, in love with Queen Omphale, agreed to dress as a woman and complete various tasks for her.

[3] laughter … Aristotle See Nicomachean Ethics 4.8 (1128a).

[4] Nil … facit Latin: "Luckless poverty has in itself nothing harder than that it makes men ridiculous" (Juvenal, Satires 3.152–53).

Now, for the outside of it, which is words, or (as I may term it) diction, it is even well worse. So is it that honey-flowing matron, Eloquence, apparelled, or rather disguised, in a courtesan-like painted affectation. One time, with so far-fet words that many seem monsters, but must seem strangers to any poor Englishman; another time, with coursing of a letter,[2] as if they were bound to follow the method of a dictionary: another time, with figures and flowers, extremely winter-starved. But I would this fault were only peculiar to versifiers, and had not as large possession among prose-printers: and (which is to be marvelled) among many scholars; & (which is to be pitied) among some preachers. Truly I could wish, if at least I might be so bold to wish in a thing beyond the reach of my capacity, the diligent imitators of Tully & Demosthenes[3] (most worthy to be imitated) did not so much keep Nizolian paper-books[4] of their figures and phrase, as by attentive translation, as it were, devour them whole, and make them wholly theirs: for now they cast sugar and spice upon every dish that is served to the table—like those Indians, not content to wear earrings at the fit and natural place of the ears, but they will thrust jewels through their nose and lips, because they will be sure to be fine. Tully, when he was to drive out Catiline, as it were with a thunderbolt of eloquence, often used the figure of repitition, as Vivit & vincit, imo in senatum. Venit imo, in senatum venit,[5] &c. Indeed, inflamed with a well grounded rage, he would have his words (as it were) double out of his mouth, and so do that artificially[6] which we see men in choler do naturally. And we, having noted the grace of those words, hale them in sometimes to a familiar epistle, when it were too much choler to be choleric. How well store of similiter[7] cadences doth sound with the gravity of the pulpit, I would but invoke Demosthenes' soul to tell, who with a rare daintiness useth them. Truly they have made me think of the sophister[8] that with too much subtlety would prove two eggs three, and though he might be counted a sophister, had none for his labour. So these men bringing in such a kind of eloquence, well may they obtain an opinion of a seeming finesse, but persuade few—which should be the end of their finesse. Now for similitudes, in certain printed discourses, I think all herbarists, all stories of beasts, fowls, and fishes, are rifled up,[9] that they may come in multitudes to wait upon any of our conceits; which certainly is as absurd a surfeit to the ears as is possible. For the force of a similitude not being to prove anything to a contrary disputer, but only to explain to a willing hearer, when that is done, the rest is a most tedious prattling, rather over-swaying the memory from the purpose whereto they were applied, than any whit informing the judgment, already either satisfied, or by similitudes not to be satisfied. For my part, I do not doubt, when Antonius and Crassus,[10] the great forefathers of Cicero in eloquence, the one (as Cicero testifieth of them) pretended not to know art, the other not to set by it, because with a plain sensibleness they might win credit of popular ears (which credit is the nearest step to persuasion, which persuasion is the chief mark of oratory), I do not doubt (I say) but that they used these knacks very sparingly; which who doth generally use, any man may see doth dance to his own music, and so to be noted by the audience more careful to speak curiously than truly. Undoubtedly (at least to my opinion undoubtedly), I have found in divers small learned courtiers a more sound style than in some professors of learning; of which I can guess no other cause, but that the courtier, following that which by practice he findeth fittest to nature, therein (though he know it not) doth according to art, though not by art: where the other, using art to show art, and not hide art (as in these cases he should do), flieth from nature, & indeed abuseth art.

---

[1] bewrayed Betrayed.

[2] coursing of a letter Repetition of a letter; i.e., alliteration.

[3] Demosthenes Famous Athenian orator of the fifth century BCE.

[4] Nizolian paper-books Selection of Cicero's phrases and sayings compiled by sixteenth-century Italian humanist Mario Nizolio.

[5] Vivit … venit Latin: "He lives and he comes, indeed he comes into the Senate. He indeed comes, into the Senate he comes." Adaptation of Cicero, Catiline 1.1.2.

[6] artificially Artfully; skillfully.

[7] similiter I.e., in like manner.

[8] sophister One who values rhetoric over veracity.

[9] rifled up Searched through.

[10] Antonius and Crassus Two Roman consuls (of 99 and 175 BCE, respectively).

But what? Methinks I deserve to be pounded for straying from poetry to oratory. But both have such an affinity in the wordish consideration, that I think this digression will make my meaning receive the fuller understanding: which is not to take upon me to teach poets how they should do, but only, finding myself sick among the rest, to show some one or two spots of the common infection grown among the most part of writers, that, acknowledging ourselves somewhat awry, we may bend to the right use both of matter and manner: whereto our language giveth us great occasion, being indeed capable of any excellent exercising of it. I know some will say it is a mingled language: and why not, so much the better, taking the best of both the other? Another will say it wanteth grammar. Nay truly, it hath that praise, that it wants not grammar: for grammar it might have, but it needs it not, being so easy in itself, and so void of those cumbersome differences of cases, genders, moods, & tenses, which I think was a piece of the Tower of Babylon's[1] curse, that a man should be put to school to learn his mother tongue. But for the uttering sweetly and properly the conceit of the mind, which is the end of speech, that hath it equally with any other tongue in the world; and is particularly happy in compositions of two or three words together, near the Greek, far beyond the Latin, which is one of the greatest beauties can be in a language.

Now, of versifying there are two sorts, the one ancient, the other modern. The ancient marked the quantity of each syllable, and according to that, framed his verse; the modern, observing only number (with some regard of the accent) the chief life of it standeth in that like sounding of the words, which we call rhyme. Whether of these be the more excellent, would bear many speeches: the ancient no doubt more fit for music, both words and time observing quantity, and more fit lively to express divers passions by the low or lofty sound of the well-weighed syllable; the latter likewise with his rhyme striketh a certain music to the ear, and, in fine, since it doth delight, though by an other way, it obtains the same purpose, there being in either sweetness, and wanting in neither majesty. Truly the English, before any vulgar language[2] I know, is fit for both sorts: for, for the ancient, the Italian is so full of vowels that it must ever be cumbered with elisions; the Dutch so of the other side, with consonants, that they cannot yield the sweet sliding fit for a verse; the French in his whole language hath not one word that hath his accent in the last syllable, saving two, called antepenultima; and little more hath the Spanish, and therefore very gracelessly may they use dactyls. The English is subject to none of these defects. Now for rhyme, though we do not observe quantity, yet we observe the accent very precisely, which other languages either cannot do, or will not do so absolutely. That caesura, or breathing place in the midst of the verse, neither Italian nor Spanish have, the French and we never almost fail of. Lastly, even the very rhyme itself, the Italian cannot put it in the last syllable, by the French named the masculine rhyme, but still in the next to the last, which the French call the female, or the next before that, which the Italian term sdrucciola. The example of the former, is buono, suono, of the sdrucciola, is femina, semina. The French, of the other side, hath both the male, as bon, son; and the female, as plaise, taise; but the sdrucciola he hath not: where the English hath all three, as due, true; father, rather; motion, potion[3]—with much more which might be said, but that already I find the triflingness of this discourse is much too much enlarged.

So that since the ever-praiseworthy Poesy is full of virtue-breeding delightfulness, and void of no gift that ought to be in the noble name of learning; since the blames laid against it are either false or feeble; since the cause why it is not esteemed in England is the fault of poet-apes, not poets; since, lastly, our tongue is most fit to honor poesy, and to be honored by poesy; I conjure you all that have had the evil luck to read this ink-wasting toy of mine, even in the name of the nine Muses, no more to scorn the sacred mysteries of poesy; no more to laugh at the name of poets, as though they were next inheritors to fools; no more to jest at the reverent title of a rhymer; but to believe, with Aristotle, that they were the ancient treasurers of the Grecians' divinity; to believe, with Bembus, that they were the first bringers-in of all civility; to believe, with Scaliger, that no philosopher's precepts can sooner make you an honest man than the reading of Virgil; to believe, with Clauserus, the translator of Cornatus,[1] that it pleased the heavenly Deity, by Hesiod and Homer, under the veil of fables to give us all knowledge, logic, rhetoric, philosophy natural and moral, and quid non?[2] To believe, with me, that there are many mysteries contained in poetry, which of purpose were written darkly, lest by profane wits it should be abused; to believe, with Landino,[3] that they are so beloved of the gods that whatsoever they write proceeds of a divine fury; lastly, to believe themselves when they tell you they will make you immortal by their verses. Thus doing, your name shall flourish in the printers' shops; thus doing, you shall be of kin to many a poetical preface; thus doing, you shall be most fair, most rich, most wise, most all: you shall dwell upon superlatives; thus doing, though you be libertino patre natus, you shall suddenly grow Herculea proles,

---

[1] Tower of Babylon I.e., the Tower of Babel.

[2] vulgar language Vernacular.

[3] motion, potion Pronounced with three syllables.

> Si quid mea carmina possunt;[4]

thus doing, your soul shall be placed with Dante's Beatrice, or Virgil's Anchises. But if (fie of such a but) you be born so near the dull-making cataract of Nilus that you cannot hear the planet-like music[5] of poetry;[6] if you have so earth-creeping a mind that it cannot lift itself up to look to the sky of poetry, or rather, by a certain rustical disdain, will become such a mome as to be a Momus[7] of poetry; then, though I will not wish unto you the ass's ears of Midas,[8] nor to be driven by a poet's verses, as Bubonax[9] was, to hang himself, nor to be rhymed to death, as is said to be done in Ireland;[10] yet thus much curse I must send you in the behalf of all poets: that while you live, you live in love, and never get favor, for lacking skill of a sonnet; and when you die, your memory die from the earth for want of an epitaph.
—1595

---

[1] Clauserus … Cornatus Conrad Clauser (1826–91), German scholar who translated the work of Cornatus, a Stoic philosopher of the first century.

[2] quid non? Latin: what not?

[3] Landino Cristoforo Landino (1424–1504), Italian humanist and literary critic best known for his highly acclaimed annotated edition of Dante's Divine Comedy.

[4] libertino … natus Latin: born of a freed slave; Herculea proles Latin: Descendant of Hercules; Si … possunt Latin: "If my songs are able to do anything" (Virgil, Aeneid 9.446).

[5] planet-like music Many had long believed that the movement of the various planets' spheres produced a beautiful and perfectly harmonious music.

[6] so near … poetry Cicero believed that the sound of the Nile's cataracts caused deafness to those nearby.

[7] mome Fool; Momus God of mockery and unfair criticism; he was exiled from Mt. Olympus as a result of his constant criticism.

[8] ass's ears of Midas Apollo, god of music, punished King Midas by giving him the ears of an ass after Midas judged the rustic pipe playing of Pan to be superior to that of Apollo.

[9] Bubonax Combination of the name of the sculptor Bupalus and that of the Greek poet Hipponax. Hipponax mocked Bupalus in verse after seeing an unflattering portrait the sculptor had made of him. His satiric attack was so biting that Bupalus was driven to hang himself.

[10] rhymed … Ireland Irish poets bragged that their magical rhymes could cause death.

IN CONTEXT

The Abuse of Poesy

The attacks against which Sidney and others were defending poetry have important roots in ancient philosophy. They stem in particular from the Platonic arguments that storytelling is in some ways morally akin to lying, and that in so far as fictions are to be allowed (whether spoken, written in prose, or acted upon the stage) they should embody human notions of moral justice, with the wicked shown to be punished, and so on. In the sixteenth century some Protestants expanded upon these arguments from Plato, contending that the representation of wickedness in artistic form was itself immoral—regardless of whether wickedness was represented as leading in the end to reward or punishment. The most famous of these attacks was The School of Abuse by Stephen Gosson (1554–1624). Gosson, who had himself been a playwright as well as a writer of pamphlets, and who would later become a clergyman, was commissioned by the authorities in London to write an attack on what were perceived to be the excesses and immoralities of the commercial drama. Gosson's style of attack itself ran to excess—as is evident in the excerpt below.

from Plato, The Republic (c. 375 BCE)[1]

In this excerpt the philosopher Socrates (who is assumed to be speaking for Plato) is discussing with Adeimantus the education of a leader. In the course of the discussion he puts forward the argument that the sorts of stories that poets and dramatists are allowed to recount should be restricted, and that certain subjects should be censored.

from BOOK 2:

…

SOCRATES. You know also that the beginning is the most important part of any work, especially in the case of a young and tender thing; for that is the time at which the character is being formed and the desired impression is more readily taken.

ADEIMANTUS. Quite true.

SOCRATES. And shall we just carelessly allow children to hear any casual tales which may be devised by casual persons, and to receive into their minds ideas for the most part the very opposite of those which we should wish them to have when they are grown up?

ADEIMANTUS. We cannot.

SOCRATES. Then the first thing will be to establish a censorship of the writers of fiction, and let the censors receive any tale of fiction which is good, and reject the bad; and we will desire mothers and nurses to tell their children the authorized ones only. Let them fashion the mind with such tales, even more fondly than they mold the body with their hands; but most of those which are now in use must be discarded.

ADEIMANTUS. Of what tales are you speaking?

---

[1] The Republic Translated by Benjamin Jowett (1894).

SOCRATES. You may find a model of the lesser in the greater, for they are necessarily of the same type, and there is the same spirit in both of them.

ADEIMANTUS. Very likely, but I do not as yet know what you would term the greater.

SOCRATES. Those which are narrated by Homer and Hesiod,[1] and the rest of the poets, who have ever been the great story-tellers.

ADEIMANTUS. But which stories do you mean; and what fault do you find with them?

SOCRATES. A fault which is most serious—the fault of telling a lie, and, what is more, a bad lie.

ADEIMANTUS. But when is this fault committed?

SOCRATES. Whenever an erroneous representation is made of the nature of gods and heroes—as when a painter paints a portrait not having the shadow of a likeness to the original. [...] God, if He be good, is not the author of all things, as the many assert, but He is the cause of a few things only, and not of most things that occur to men. For few are the goods of human life, and many are the evils, and the good is to be attributed to God alone; of the evils the causes are to be sought elsewhere, and not in Him.

ADEIMANTUS. That appears to me to be most true.

SOCRATES. Then we must not listen to Homer or to any other poet who is guilty of the folly of saying that two casks lie at the threshold of Zeus,[2] full of lots, one of good, the other of evil lots, and that he to whom Zeus gives a mixture of the two sometimes meets with evil fortune, at other times with good; but that he to whom is given the cup of unmingled ill, him wild hunger drives o'er the beauteous earth. And if anyone assert that the violation of oaths and treaties, which was really the work of Pandarus,[3] was brought about by Athene[4] and Zeus, or that the strife and contention of the gods was instigated by Themis[5] and Zeus, he shall not have our approval; neither will we allow our young men to hear the words of Aeschylus,[6] that God plants guilt among men when he desires utterly to destroy a house. And if a poet writes of the sufferings of Niobe—the subject of the tragedy in which these iambic verses occur—or of the house of Pelops,[7] or of the Trojan war or on any similar theme, either we must not permit him to say that these are the works of God, or if they are of God, he must devise some explanation of them such as we are seeking; he must say that God did what was just and right, and they were the better for being punished; but that those who are punished are miserable, and that God is the author of their misery, the poet is not to be permitted to say; though he may say that the wicked are miserable because they require to be punished, and are benefitted by receiving punishment from God; but that God being good is the author of evil to anyone is to be strenuously denied, and not to be said or sung or heard in verse or prose by anyone whether old or young in any well-ordered commonwealth. Such a fiction is suicidal, ruinous, impious.

[1] Homer Eighth-century BCE Greek poet credited with authoring the epic poems The Iliad and The Odyssey; Hesiod Eighth-century BCE Greek poet known for Works and Days and The Theogeny.

[2] Zeus King of the Greek gods.

[3] Pandarus Trojan warrior in Homer's Iliad who broke the truce between Greece and Troy by wounding Menelaus, the king of Sparta.

[4] Athene Athena, the Greek goddess of wisdom and warfare and the protectress of Athens.

[5] Themis In Greek mythology, a Titan and the goddess of order and justice.

[6] Aeschylus Athenian tragic dramatist of the fifth century BCE.

[7] Niobe Queen of Thebes who boasted of her fruitfulness, angering the gods Apollo and Artemis and causing them to murder her children; Pelops Son of Tantalus who won his wife, Hippodamia, by defeating her father, the king of Pisa, in a chariot race. To ensure his victory, Pelops bribed the king's charioteer to betray his master. After the race, Pelops was unable to pay the reward, and threw the charioteer in the lake instead. Before drowning, the charioteer cursed the house of Pelops.

from Stephen Gosson, The School of Abuse (1579)

I must confess that poets are the whetstones of wit, notwithstanding that wit is dearly bought. Where honey and gall are mixed, it will be hard to sever the one from the other. The deceitful physician giveth sweet syrups to make his poison go down the smoother; the juggler casteth a mist to work the close; the Siren's song[1] is the sailor's wreck; the fowler's whistle, the bird's death; the wholesome bait, the fish's bane; the Harpies[2] have virgins' faces and vultures' talons; Hyena speaks like a friend, and devours like a foe; the calmest seas hide dangerous rocks: the wolf jets in weathers fells. Many good sentences are spoken by Davus[3] to shadow his knavery, and written by poets as ornaments to beautify their works and set their trumpery to sale without suspect.

But if you look well to Epeus's horse, you find in his bowels the destruction of Troy;[4] open the sepulchre of Semiramis,[5] whose title promiseth such wealth to the kings of Persia, you shall see nothing but dead bones; rip up the golden ball that Nero[6] consecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus, you shall have it stuffed with the shavings of his beard; pull off the vizard that poets mask in, you shall disclose their reproach, bewray their vanity, loath their wantonness, lament their folly, and perceive their sharp sayings to be placed as pearls in dunghills, fresh pictures on rotten walls, chaste matrons' apparel on common courtesans. These are the cups of Circe that turn reasonable creatures into brute beasts, the balls of Hippomenes[7] that hinder the course of Atalanta, and the blocks of the Devil that are cast in our ways to cut off the race of toward wits. No marvel though Plato shut them out of his school and banished them quite from his commonwealth as effeminate writers, unprofitable members, and utter enemies to virtue.

The Romans were very desirous to imitate the Greeks, and yet very loath to receive their poets. Insomuch that Cato[8] layeth it in the dish of Marcus the noble as a foul reproach that in the time of his consulship he brought Ennius the poet into his province. Tully,[9] accustomed to read them with great diligence in his youth, but when he waxed graver in study, elder in years, riper in judgment, he accompted them the fathers of lies, the pipes of vanity, and schools of abuse. Maximus Tyrius[1] taketh upon him to defend the discipline of these doctors under the name of Homer, wresting the rashness of Ajax to valor, the cowardice of Ulysses to policy,[2] the dotage of Nestor to grave counsel, and the battle of Troy to the wonderful conflict of the four elements, where Juno, which is counted the air, sets in her foot to take up the strike and steps boldly betwixt them to part the fray. It is a pageant worth the sight, to behold how he labors with mountains to bring forth mice, much like to some of those players that come to the scaffold[3] with drum and trumpet to proffer skirmish, and when they have sounded alarm, off go the pieces to encounter a shadow, or conquer a paper monster. You will smile, I am sure, if you read it, to see how this moral philosopher toils to draw the lion's skin upon Aesop's ass, Hercules' shoes on a child's feet, amplifying that which the more it is stirred, the more it stinks, the less it is talked of, the better it is liked, and as wayward children, the more they be flattered, the worse they are, or as cursed sores with often touching wax angry, and run the longer without healing. He attributeth the beginning of virtue to Minerva, if friendship to Venus, and the root of all handicrafts to Vulcan, but if he had broke his arm as well as his leg when he fell out of heaven into Lemnos,[4] either Apollo must have played the bonesetter, or every occupation been laid a-water.[5] [1] Siren's song In Greek mythology the Sirens—creatures that were half woman, half bird—would sing in a captivating fashion that would lead sailors to destroy themselves, whether by jumping overboard or by running their ships aground.

---

[2] Harpies Greek mythological creatures with women's faces and bodies, wings, and sharp claws.

[3] Davus Servant in Andria, a comedy by the Roman second-century BCE dramatist Terence.

[4] Epeus's horse … Troy According to Greek legend, the Greeks pretended to retreat after having attacked the city of Troy for many years, but they left behind a huge wooden horse, supposedly as a gift. When the Trojans moved the horse inside the city walls, Greek warriors who had hidden themselves inside the structure attacked the Trojans and conquered the city. Epeus had taken the lead in constructing the horse.

[5] Semiramis Mythical Assyrian queen who was said to have conquered many lands and founded the city of Babylon.

[6] Nero Tyrannical Roman emperor of the first century CE.

[7] cups of Circe In Homer's Odyssey, the enchantress Circe gives Odysseus's men a potion that turns them into swine; balls of Hippomenes According to Greek mythology, Atalanta was a huntress who was famous for her speed, and who would only marry the suitor who could beat her in a race. Hippomenes did so by dropping three golden apples, which Atalanta stopped to retrieve.

[8] Cato The Roman statesman Cato the Younger (95–46 BCE), whose great-grandfather, the statesman Cato the Elder (Marcus Porcius Cato), brought the poet Ennius from Sardinia to Rome.

Tully Marcus Tullius Cicero, a great Roman orator and politician (106–43 BCE).

from The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia

Interpreted variously as an escapist delight and as a work of profound ethical instruction, Sidney's pastoral romance Arcadia was enormously popular and influential in the century following its publication. Written in prose (interspersed with verse), it combines elements of the epic tradition with those of classical and Renaissance romance and pastoral writing; its setting, Arcadia, has been used as an idealized location in pastoral literature since the time of Virgil. Spenser's work is particularly indebted to Jorge de Montemayor's Diana (1559), a popular Spanish-language pastoral romance, and to an earlier pastoral romance also called Arcadia (1504), by the Italian humanist poet Jacopo Sannazaro.

Sidney wrote his Arcadia for the entertainment of his sister, Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke, who shared her brother's literary talents. The Arcadia depicts the military and amorous exploits of Musidorus and Pyrocles, two Grecian princes who fall in love with the Arcadian princesses Philoclea and Pamela. Intended both to instruct the reader in moral and courtly behavior and to amuse, the Arcadia deals above all with matters of love, but often touches as well on the political and military realms. Against a background that frequently includes civil unrest, political rebellion, and war, it depicts a variety of humorous romantic entanglements; its many instances of cross-dressing, disguise, and confused desire anticipate those of Shakespeare's comedies.

---

[1] Maximus Tyrius See Oration 26 of the Philosophical Orations of Maximus of Tyre, a second-century CE Greek philosopher.

[2] policy Political cunning.

[3] scaffold Stage.

[4] Lemnos Island in the northern part of the Aegean Sea.

[5] laid a-water Made of no effect.

The Arcadia has a complex publishing history and survives in three very different forms. The first version, now known as the Old Arcadia, was written between 1577 and 1580 and circulated in manuscript form during Sidney's lifetime. In the 1580s, Sidney began an extensive revision and expansion of his work. Much longer than the original, this revised version, often called the New Arcadia, employs a more elevated style and is more serious in theme; it also adds a number of events to the narrative and adopts a more complex plot structure. The New Arcadia was left incomplete at Sidney's death, but Fulke Greville, Sidney's biographer and lifelong friend, oversaw its publication in 1590. Three years later, Sidney's sister edited and published a composite version that includes the New Arcadia along with the final three books of the Old Arcadia to complete the narrative. The following selections are based upon this 1593 version.

THE COVNTESSE
OF PEMBROKES
ARCADIA.

WRITTEN BY SIR
Philip Sidney Knight.

NOW SINCE THE FIRST EDItion augmented and ended.

LONDON.
Printed for William Ponſonbie.
Anno Domini. 1 5 9 3.

SPIRO
NON TIBI

Title page, The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, 1593.

from The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia

from Book 1
from Chapter I

It was in the time that the earth begins to put on her new apparel against the approach of her lover, and that the sun, running a most even course, becomes an indifferent arbiter between the night and the day, when the hopeless shepherd Strephon was come to the sands which lie against the island of Cithera;[1] where viewing the place with a heavy kind of delight, and sometimes casting his eyes to the isleward, he called his friendly rival, the pastor[2] Claius, unto him; and setting first down in his darkened countenance a doleful copy of what he would speak,

"O my Claius," said he, "hither we are now come to pay the rent for which we are so called unto by over-busy remembrance—remembrance, restless remembrance, which claims not only this duty of us but for it will have us forget ourselves. I pray you, when we were amid our flock, and that of other shepherds some were running after their sheep strayed beyond their bounds, some delighting their eyes with seeing them nibble upon the short and sweet grass, some medicating their sick ewes, some setting a bell for an ensign of a sheepish squadron,[3] some with more leisure inventing new games of exercising their bodies and sporting their wits; did remembrance grant us any holiday either for pastime or devotion—nay either for necessary food or natural rest—but that still it forced our thoughts to work upon this place where we last (alas, that the word last should so long last) did graze our eyes upon her ever-flourishing beauty? Did it not still cry within us 'Ah, you base-minded wretches, are your thoughts so deeply bemired in the trade or ordinary worldeings, as for respect of gain some paltry wool may yield you, to let so much time pass without knowing perfectly her estate, especially in so troublesome a season; to leave that shore unsaluted from whence you may see to the island where she dwelleth; to leave those steps unkissed wherein Urania printed the farewell of all beauty?'

"Well, then, remembrance commanded; we obeyed, and here we find that as our remembrance came ever clothed unto us in the form of this place, so this place gives new heat to the fever of our languishing remembrance. Yonder, my Claius, Urania lighted. The very horse, methought, bewailed to be so disburdened. And as for thee, poor Claius, when thou wentest to help her down, I saw reverence and desire so divide thee that thou didst at one instant both blush and quake, and instead of bearing her wert ready to fall down thyself. There she sat, vouchsafing[4] my cloak (then most gorgeous) under her. At yonder rising of the ground she turned herself, looking back towards her wonted abode, and because of her parting, bearing much sorrow in her eyes, the lightsomeness whereof had yet so natural a cheerfulness as it made even sorrow seem to smile. At that turning she spake to us all, opening the cherry of her lips, and Lord, how greedily mine ears did feed upon the sweet words she uttered! And here she laid her hand over thine eyes, when she saw the tears springing in them, as if she would conceal them from other and yet herself feel some of thy sorrow. But woe is me, yonder, yonder, did she put her foot into the boat, at that instant, as it were, dividing her heavenly beauty between the earth and the sea. But when she was embarked, did you not mark how the winds whistled and the seas danced for joy, how the sails did swell with pride, and all because they had Urania? O Urania, blessed be thou, Urania, the sweetest fairness, and fairest sweetness!"

With that word his voice brake so with sobbing that he could say no farther, and Claius thus answered:

"Alas, my Strephon," said he, "what needs this score to reckon up only our losses? What doubt is there but that the sight of this place doth call our thoughts to appear at the court of affection, held by that racking[5] steward remembrance? As well may sheep forget to fear when they spy wolves as we can miss such fancies when we see any place made happy by her treading. Who can choose that saw her but think where she stayed, where she walked, where she turned, where she spoke? But what is all this? Truly no more but as this place served us to think of those things, so those things serve as places to call to memory more excellent matters. No, no, let us think with consideration, and consider with acknowledging, and acknowledge with admiration, and admire with love, and love with joy in the midst of all woes. Let us in such sort think, I say, that our poor eyes were so enriched as to behold, and our low hearts so exalted as to love, a maid who is such that as the greatest thing the world can show is her beauty, so the least thing that may be praised in her is her beauty. Certainly as her eyelids are more pleasant to behold than two white kids climbing up a fair tree and browsing on its tenderest branches, and yet are nothing compared to the day-shining stars contained in them; and as her breath is more sweet than a gentle south-west wind which comes creeping over flowery fields and shadowed waters in the extreme heat of summer, and yet is nothing compared to the honey-flowing speech that breath doth carry; no more all that our eyes can see of her (though when they have seen her, what else they shall ever see is but dry stubble after clover-grass) is to be matched with the flock of unspeakable virtues laid up delightfully in that best-builded fold. But indeed, as we can better consider the sun's beauty by marking how he gilds these waters and mountains than by looking upon his own face, too glorious for our weak eyes, so it may be our conceits[1] (not able to bear her sun-staining excellency) will better weigh it by her works upon some meaner subject employed. And alas, who can better witness that than we, whose experience is grounded upon feeling? Hath not the only love of her made us, being silly ignorant shepherds, raise up our thoughts above the ordinary level of the world, so that great clerks[2] do not disdain our conference? Hath not the desire to seem worthy in her eyes made us, when others were sleeping, to sit viewing the course of the heavens; when others were running at Base,[3] to run over learned writings; when others mark their sheep, we to mark ourselves? Hath not she thrown reason upon our desires and, as it were, given eyes unto Cupid?[4] Hath in any but in her, love-fellowship maintained friendship between rivals, and beauty taught the beholders chastity?" ...

---

[1] Cithera Greek island associated with Aphrodite, the goddess of love.

[2] pastor Shepherd.

[3] setting … squadron Reference to the shepherding practice of attaching a bell to the sheep that leads the flock.

[4] vouchsafing Courteously receiving.

[5] affection Emotion (as opposed to reason); racking Torturing.

from CHAPTER 2[5]

... The third day after, in the time that the morning did strew roses and violets in the heavenly floor against the coming of the sun, the nightingales (striving one with the other which could in most dainty variety recount their wrong-caused sorrow[6]) made them put off their sleep, and rising from under a tree (which that night had been their pavilion) they went on their journey, which by and by welcomed Musidorus's eyes, wearied with the wasted soil of Laconia,[7] with delightful prospects.

There were hills which garnished their proud heights with stately trees; humble valleys whose base estate seemed comforted with refreshing of silver rivers; meadows enamelled with all sorts of eye-pleasing flowers; thickets, which, being lined with most pleasant shade, were witnessed so too by the cheerful deposition of many well-tuned birds; each pasture stored with sheep feeding with sober security, while the pretty lambs with bleating oratory craved the dams' comfort; here a shepherd's boy piping as though he should never be old; there a young shepherdess knitting and withal singing, and it seemed that her voice comforted her hands to work and her hands kept time to her voice's music. As for the houses of the country—for many houses came under their eye—they were all scattered, no two being one by the other, and yet not so far off as that it barred mutual succour: a show, as it were, of an accompanable solitariness and of a civil[1] wildness.

---

[1] conceits Conceptions, thoughts.

[2] the only love Only the love; clerks Learned people.

[3] running at Base Playing Prisoner's Base, a game involving tag.

[4] eyes unto Cupid To evoke the irrationality of love, Cupid is sometimes described as blind or blindfolded.

[5] CHAPTER 2 Earlier in Book 1, the shepherds Claius and Strephon discover Musidorus on the shore after a shipwreck. They offer to take him with them to Arcadia, the country they are from.

[6] their wrong-caused sorrow In classical mythology, the princess Philomel was raped, then transformed into a nightingale; her "sorrow" is that expressed by the nightingales.

[7] Laconia Greek region also called Lacedaemonia, immediately south of Arcadia. In antiquity, Sparta was located there.

"I pray you," said Musidorus, then first unsealing his long silent lips: "what countries be these we pass through which are so divers in show, the one wanting no store, the other having no store but of want?"

"The country," answered Claius, "where you were cast ashore and now are passed through is Laconia, not so poor by the barrenness of the soil (though in itself not passing fertile) as by a civil war, which being these two years within the bowels of that estate between the gentlemen and the peasants (by them named Helots) hath in this sort as it were disfigured the face of nature, and made it so unhospital as now you have found it: the towns neither of the one side nor the other willingly opening their gates to strangers, nor strangers willingly entering for fear of being mistaken.[2]

"But this country where now you set your foot is Arcadia; and even hard by is the house of Kalander whither we lead you: this country being thus decked with peace and (the child of peace) good husbandry. These houses you see so scattered are of men as we two are that live upon the commodity of their sheep, and therefore in the division of the Arcadian estate are termed shepherds: a happy people, wanting little because they desire not much." …

from CHAPTER 5[3]

… "My Lord," said he, "when our good king Basilius, with better success than expectation, took to wife even in his more than decaying years the fair young princess Gynecia, there came with her a young lord, cousin german[4] to herself, named Argalus, led hither partly with the love and honour of his noble kinswoman, partly with the humour of youth which ever thinks that good whose goodness he sees not. And in this court he received so good increase of knowledge, that after some years spent he so manifested a most virtuous mind in all his actions that Arcadia gloried such a plant was transported unto them, being a gentleman in deed most rarely accomplished, excellently learned, but without all vain glory; friendly without factiousness; valiant, so as for my part I think the earth hath no man that hath done more heroical acts than he, howsoever now of late the fame flies of the two princes of Thessalia and Macedon,[5] and hath long done of our noble prince Amphialus, who indeed in our parts is only[6] accounted likely to match him. But I say for my part, I think no man for valour of mind and ability of body to be preferred, if equalled to Argalus; and yet so valiant, as he never durst do anybody injury: in behaviour, some will say, ever sad, surely sober, and somewhat given to musing, but never uncourteous; his word ever led by his thought and followed by his deed; rather liberal than magnificent,[7] though the one wanted not and the other had ever good choice of the receiver. In sum (for I perceive I shall easily take a great draught of his praises, whom both I and all this country love so well) such a man was—and I hope is—Argalus, as hardly the nicest eye can find a spot in, if the over-vehement constancy of yet spotless affection may not in hard-wrested constructions be counted a spot: which in this manner began that work in him which hath made both him, and itself in him, over all this country famous.

"My master's son Clitophon … being a young gentleman as of great birth, being our king's sister's son, so truly of good nature and one that can see good and love it, haunted more the company of this worthy Argalus than of any other; so as if there were not a friendship (which is so rare as it is to be doubted whether it be a thing in deed or but a word) at least there was such a liking and friendliness as hath brought forth the effects which you shall hear. About two years since, it so fell out that he brought him to a great lady's house, sister to my master, who had with her her only daughter, the fair Parthenia, fair indeed (fame, I think, itself not daring to call any fairer, if it be not Helena, queen of Corinth, and the two incomparable sisters of Arcadia[1]) and that which made her fairness much the fairer was, that it was but a fair ambassador of a most fair mind; full of wit, and a wit which delighted more to judge itself than to show itself: her speech being as rare, as precious; her silence without sullenness; her modesty without affectation; her shamefastness[2] without ignorance: in sum, one that to praise well, one must first set down with himself what it is to be excellent, for so she is.

---

[1] accompanable Companionable; civil Civilized.

[2] passing Surpassingly; Helots Members of a large population enslaved by the citizens of Sparta; unhospital Inhospitable; mistaken I.e., mistaken for the enemy.

[3] CHAPTER 5 The following story is told by a steward to Musidorus.

[4] german Closely related.

[5] two princes … Macedon Musidorus and Pyrocles. (At this point in the narrative, Musidorus is going by a false name, so the steward does not know who he is addressing.)

[6] only I.e., the only one.

[7] rather liberal than magnificent Generous in his expenditure rather than lavish.

"I think you think that these perfections, meeting, could not choose but find one another and delight in that they found; for likeness of manners is likely in reason to draw liking with affection; men's actions do not always cross with reason. To be short, it did so indeed. They loved, although for a while the fire thereof (hope's wings being cut off) were blown by the bellows of despair, upon this occasion:

"There had been a good while before, and so continued, a suitor to this same lady, a great noble man, though of Laconia yet near neighbour to Parthenia's mother, named Demagoras; a man mighty in riches and power and proud thereof, stubbornly stout, loving nobody but himself, and, for his own delight's sake, Parthenia: and pursuing vehemently his desire, his riches had so gilded over all his other imperfections that the old lady, though contrary to my lord her brother's mind, had given her consent; and using a mother's authority upon her fair daughter had made her yield thereunto, not because she liked her choice but because her obedient mind had not yet taken upon it to make choice. And the day of their assurance drew near, when my young lord Clitophon brought this noble Argalus, perchance principally to see so rare a sight, as Parthenia by all well-judging eyes was judged.

"But though few days were before the time of assurance appointed, yet love, that saw he had a great journey to make in short time, hasted so himself that before her word could tie her to Demagoras, her heart hath vowed her to Argalus with so grateful a receipt in mutual affection that if she desired above all things to have Argalus, Argalus feared nothing but to miss Parthenia. And now Parthenia had learned both liking and misliking, loving and loathing, and out of passion began to take the authority of judgement; insomuch that when the time came that Demagoras, full of proud joy, thought to receive the gift of herself, she, with words of resolute refusal though with tears showing she was sorry she must refuse, assured her mother she would first be bedded in her grave than wedded to Demagoras. The change was no more strange than unpleasant to the mother who, being determinately (lest I should say of a great lady, wilfully) bent to marry her to Demagoras, tried all ways which a witty[3] and hard-hearted mother could use upon so humble a daughter in whom the only resisting power was love. But the more she assaulted, the more she taught Parthenia to defend; and the more Parthenia defended, the more she made her mother obstinate in the assault: who at length finding that Argalus standing between them was it that most eclipsed her affection from shining upon Demagoras, she sought all means how to remove him, so much the more as he manifested himself an unremovable suitor to her daughter: first by employing him in as many dangerous enterprises as ever the evil step-mother Juno recommended to the famous Hercules.[4] But the more his virtue was tried, the more pure it grew, while all the things she did to overthrow him did set him up upon the height of honour enough to have moved her heart, especially to a man every way so worthy as Argalus; but she struggling against all reason, because she would have her will and show her authority in matching her[5] with

---

[1] two incomparable … Arcadia Pamela and Philoclea, princesses of Arcadia.

[2] shamefastness Virtuous restraint.

[3] witty Clever, cunning.

[4] as ever … Hercules Juno's husband fathered Hercules in the course of an affair, and in revenge she tormented him throughout his life; her actions led to his performance of the "labors," a series of extremely difficult heroic tasks.

[5] her I.e, Parthenia.

Demagoras, the more virtuous Argalus was the more she hated him, thinking herself conquered in his conquests, and therefore still employing him in more and more dangerous attempts. In the meanwhile she used all extremities possible upon her fair daughter to make her give over herself to her direction. But it was hard to judge whether he in doing or she in suffering showed greater constancy of affection; for, as to Argalus the world sooner wanted occasions than he valour to go through them, so to Parthenia malice sooner ceased than her unchanged patience. Lastly, by treasons Demagoras and she would have made away with Argalus, but he with providence and courage so passed over all that the mother took such a spiteful grief at it that her heart brake withal, and she died.

"But then Demagoras, assuring himself that now Parthenia was her own she would never be his, and receiving as much by her own determinate answer; not more desiring his own happiness, than envying Argalus, whom he saw with narrow eyes even ready to enjoy the perfection of his desires; strengthening his conceit with all the mischievous counsels which disdained love and envious pride could give unto him, the wicked wretch (taking a time that Argalus was gone to his country to fetch some of his principal friends to honour the marriage which Parthenia had most joyfully consented unto) the wicked Demagoras, I say, desiring to speak with her, with unmerciful force (her weak arms in vain resisting) rubbed all over her face a most horrible poison, the effect whereof was such that never leper looked more ugly than she did: which done, having his men and horses ready, departed away in spite of her servants, as ready to revenge as they could be in such an unexpected mischief. But the abominableness of this fact being come to my L. Kalander, he made such means, both by our king's intercession and his own, that by the king and senate of Lacedaemon, Demagoras was upon pain of death banished the country: who, hating the punishment where he should have hated the fault, joined himself, with all the powers he could make, unto the Helots, lately in rebellion against that state: and they, glad to have a man of such authority among them, made him their general, and under him have committed divers the most outrageous villainies that a base multitude full of desperate revenge can imagine.

"But within a while after this pitiful fact committed upon Parthenia, Argalus returned, poor Gentleman, having her fair image in his heart, and already promising his eyes the uttermost of his felicity when they (nobody else daring to tell it him) were the first messengers to themselves of their own misfortune. I mean not to move passion with telling you the grief of both when he knew her, for at first he did not; nor at first knowledge could possibly have virtue's aid so ready as not even weakly to lament the loss of such a jewel, so much the more as that skilful men in that art assured it was unrecoverable. But within a while, truth of love (which still held the first face in his memory) a virtuous constancy, and even a delight to be constant, faith given, and inward worthiness shining through the foulest mists, took so full hold of the noble Argalus, that not only in such comfort which witty arguments may bestow upon adversity, but even with the most abundant kindness that an eye-ravished lover can express, he laboured both to drive the extremity of sorrow from he, and to hasten the celebration of their marriage: whereunto he unfeignedly showed himself no less cheerfully earnest than if she had never been disinherited of that goodly portion which nature had so liberally bequeathed unto her; and for that cause deferred his intended revenge upon Demagoras, because he might continually be in her presence, showing more humble serviceableness and joy to content her than ever before.

"But as he gave this rare example (not to be hoped for of any other but of another Argalus) so of the other side, she took as strange a course in affection; for where she desired to enjoy him more than to live, yet did she overthrow both her own desire and his and in no sort would yield to marry him: with a strange encounter of love's affects[1] and effects; that he by an affection sprung from excessive beauty should delight in horrible foulness, and she of a vehement desire to have him should kindly[2] build a resolution never to have him; for truth it is, that so in heart she loved him as she could not find in her heart he should be tied to what was unworthy of his presence.

---

[1] affects Emotions.

[2] kindly Naturally.

"Truly, Sir, a very good orator might have a fair field to use eloquence in, if he did but only repeat the lamentable and truly affectionated[1] speeches, while he conjured her by remembrance of her affection and true oaths of his own affection not to make him so unhappy as to think he had not only lost her face but her heart; that her face, when it was fairest, had been but as a marshal to lodge the love of her in his mind, which now was so well placed that it needed no further help of any outward harbinger;[2] beseeching her, even with tears, to know that his love was not so superficial as to go no further than the skin, which yet now to him was most fair since it was hers: how could he be so ungrateful as to love her the less for that which she had only received for his sake; that he never beheld it, but therein he saw the loveliness of her love towards him; protesting unto her that he would never take joy of his life if he might not enjoy her for whom principally he was glad he had life. But (as I heard by one that overheard them) she, wringing him by the hand, made no other answer but this:

"'My Lord,' said she, 'God knows I love you. If I were princess of the whole world and had, withal, all the blessings that ever the world brought forth, I should not make delay to lay myself and them under your feet; or if I had continued but as I was, though, I must confess, far unworthy of you, yet would I (with too great a joy for my heart to think of) have accepted your vouchsafing me to be yours, and with faith and obedience would have supplied[3] all other defects. But first let me be much more miserable than I am ere I match Argalus to such a Parthenia. Live happy, dear Argalus, I give you full liberty, and I beseech you to take it; and I assure you I shall rejoice (whatsoever become of me) to see you so coupled as may be fit both for your honour and satisfaction.' With that she burst out crying and weeping, not able longer to control herself from blaming her fortune and wishing her own death.

"But Argalus, with a most heavy heart still pursuing his desire, she fixed of mind to avoid further intreaty, and to fly all company which, even of him, grew unpleasant unto her; one night she stole away: but whither as yet is unknown or indeed, what is become of her.

"Argalus sought her long, and in many places; at length (despairing to find her, and the more he despaired, the more enraged) weary of his life, but first determining to be revenged of Demagoras, he went alone disguised into the chief town held by the Helots, where coming into his presence, guarded about by many of his soldiers, he could delay his fury no longer for a fitter time, but setting upon him, in despite of a great many that helped him, gave him divers mortal wounds, and himself (no question) had been there presently murdered, but that Demagoras himself desired he might be kept alive, perchance with intention to feed his own eyes with some cruel execution to be laid upon him. But death came sooner than he[4] looked for, yet having had leisure to appoint his successor, a young man not long before delivered out of the prison of the king of Lacedaemon, where he should have suffered death for having slain the king's nephew: but him he named, who at that time was absent making inroads upon the Lacedaemonians. But being returned, the rest of the Helots, for the great liking they conceived of that young man, (especially because they had none among themselves to whom the others would yield) were content to follow Demagoras's appointment. And well hath it succeeded with them, he having since done things beyond the hope of the youngest heads; of whom I speak the rather because he hath hitherto preserved Argalus alive, under pretence to have him publicly and with exquisite torments executed after the end of these wars, of which they hope for a soon and prosperous issue...."

---

[1] affectionated Emotional.

[2] harbinger Person sent ahead of an army or important person to prepare lodgings.

[3] supplied Made up for.

[4] he I.e, Demagoras.

from CHAPTER 12[1]

… [H]aving already passed over the greatest part of Arcadia, one day coming under the side of the pleasant mountain Maenalus, his horse, nothing guilty of his inquisitiveness, with flat tiring taught him that discreet stays[2] make speedy journeys: and therefore lighting down and unbridling his horse, he himself went to repose himself in a little wood he saw thereby. Where lying under the protection of a shady tree, with intention to make forgetting sleep comfort a sorrowful memory, he saw a sight which persuaded and obtained of his eyes that they would abide yet a while open. It was the appearing of a lady who, because she walked with her side toward him, he could not perfectly see her face, but so much he might see of her that was a surety for the rest that all was excellent.

Well might he perceive the hanging of her hair in fairest quantity in locks, some curled and some as it were forgotten, with such a careless care and an art so hiding art that she seemed she would lay them for a pattern whether nature simply or nature helped by cunning be the more excellent: the rest whereof was drawn into a coronet of gold richly set with pearl, and so joined all over with gold wires and covered with feathers of divers colours that it was not unlike to an helmet, such a glittering show it bare, and so bravely it was held up from the head. Upon her body she wore a doublet of sky-colour satin, covered with plates of gold and, as it were, nailed with precious stones that in it she might seem armed. The nether part of her garment was full of stuff and cut after such a fashion, that though the length of it reached to the ankles, yet in her going one might sometimes discern the small of her leg, which with the foot was dressed in a short pair of crimson velvet buskins,[3] in some places open, as the ancient manner was, to show the fairness of the skin. Over all this she wore a certain mantle made in such manner, that coming under her right arm and covering most of that side, it had no fastening on the left side but only upon the top of her shoulder, where the two ends met and were closed together with a very rich jewel: the device whereof, as he after saw, was this: a Hercules made in little form, but set with a distaff in his hand, as he once was by Omphale's commandment,[4] with a word in Greek but thus to be interpreted, "Never more valiant." On the same side on her thigh she wore a sword which, as it witnessed her to be an Amazon or one following that profession, so it seemed but a needless weapon, since her other forces were without withstanding.

But this lady walked outright[5] till he might see her enter into a fine close arbour. It was of trees, whose branches so lovingly interlaced one the other that it could resist the strongest violence of eyesight; but she went into it by a door she opened, which moved him, as warily as he could, to follow her; and by and by he might hear her sing this song with a voice no less beautiful to his ears than her goodliness was full of harmony to his eyes:

Transformed in show, but more transformed in mind,
    I cease to strive, with double conquest foiled:
For, woe is me, my powers all I find
    With outward force, and inward treason, spoiled.

For from without came to mine eyes the blow,
    Whereto my inward thoughts did faintly yield:
Both these conspired poor reason's overthrow;
    False in myself, thus have I lost the field.

---

[1] CHAPTER 12 Earlier in Book 1, Musidorus and Pyrocles, having been separated by a shipwreck, reunite and receive hospitality from Kalander, an Arcadian lord. The reunion, however, is short-lived; Musidorus soon finds a note from Pyrocles explaining that he has left Kalander's home because the "violence of love leads me into such a course, whereof your knowledge may much more vex you than help me" (1.10). Though the note encourages Musidorus to return to his homeland, he remains in Arcadia and searches the countryside for Pyrocles.

[2] discreet stays Prudent rests.

[3] buskins Laced boots with open fronts, commonly worn in classical Greece.

[4] device Emblem, an allegorical picture with a motto; distaff Spindle; Omphale's commandment As punishment for a murder, Hercules was enslaved to the Lydian queen Omphale, who required him to do women's work and wear women's clothing. She eventually freed him, and they were married.

[5] outright Straight ahead.

Thus are my eyes still captive to one sight;
Thus all my thoughts are slaves to one thought still:
Thus reason to his servants yields his right;
Thus is my power transformed to your will.
What marvel then, I take a woman's hue,[1]
Since what I see, think, know, is all but you?

This ditty gave him some suspicion, but the voice gave him almost assurance who the singer was; and therefore boldly thrusting open the door and entering into the arbour, he perceived indeed that it was Pyrocles thus disguised: wherewith not receiving so much joy to have found him as grief so to have found him, amazedly looking upon him (as Apollo is painted when he saw Daphne suddenly turned into a laurel) he was not able to bring forth a word; so that Pyrocles (who had as much shame as Musidorus had sorrow) rising to him, would have formed a substantial excuse, but his insinuation being of blushing and his division of sighs, his whole oration stood upon a short narration[2] what was the cause of this metamorphosis. But by that time Musidorus had gathered his spirits together, and yet casting a ghastful[3] countenance upon him as if he would conjure some strange spirit, he thus spake unto him:

"And is it possible that this is Pyrocles, the only young prince in the world formed by nature and framed by education to the true exercise of virtue? Or is it indeed some Amazon that hath counterfeited the face of my friend in this sort to vex me? For likelier sure I would have thought it that any outward face might have been disguised than that the face of so excellent a mind could have been thus blemished. O sweet Pyrocles, separate yourself a little, if it be possible, from yourself, and let your own mind look upon your own proceedings; so shall my words be needless and you best instructed. See with yourself how fit it will be for you in this your tender youth, born so great a prince, and of so rare not only expectation but proof, desired of your old father, and wanted of your native country, now so near your home to divert your thoughts from the way of goodness to lose, nay, to abuse your time. Lastly to overthrow all the excellent things you have done, which have filled the world with your fame; as if you should drown your ship in the long desired haven, or, like an ill player, should mar the last act of his tragedy. Remember (for I know you know it) that if we will be men, the reasonable part of our soul is to have absolute commandment, against which, if any sensual weakness arise, we are to yield all our sound forces to the overthrowing of so unnatural a rebellion; wherein how can we want courage, since we are to deal against so weak an adversary that in itself is nothing but weakness? Nay, we are to resolve that if reason direct it, we must do it; and if we must do it, we will do it; for, to say 'I cannot,' is childish, and 'I will not,' womanish.

"And see how extremely every way you can endanger your mind; for to take this womanish habit, without you frame your behavior accordingly, is wholly vain; your behaviour can never come kindly[4] from you but as the mind is proportioned unto it: so that you must resolve, if you will play your part to any purpose, whatsoever peevish imperfections are in that sex, to soften your heart to receive them—the very first down-step to all wickedness. For do not deceive yourself, my dear cousin, there is no man suddenly either excellently good or extremely evil, but grows either as he holds himself up in virtue or lets himself slide to viciousness.

"And let us see what power is the author of all these troubles: forsooth love, love, a passion, and the basest and fruitlessest of all passions. Fear breedeth wit; anger is the cradle of courage; joy openeth and enableth the heart; sorrow, as it closeth, so it draweth it inward to look to the correcting of itself; and so all of them generally have power towards some good by the direction of reason. But this bastard Love (for indeed the name of love is most unworthily applied to so hateful a humour) as it is engendered betwixt lust and idleness; as the matter it works upon is nothing but a certain base weakness which some gentle fools call a gentle heart; as his adjoined companions be unquietness, longings, fond comforts, faint discomforts, hopes, jealousies, ungrounded rages, causeless yieldings; so is the highest end it aspires unto a little pleasure with much pain before and great repentance after. But that end, how endless it runs into infinite evils, were fit enough for the matter we speak of; but not for your ears, in whom, indeed, there is so much true disposition to virtue.

---

[1] hue Appearance.

[2] Apollo ... laurel When Apollo fell in love with the nymph Daphne, she prayed to be saved from his unwanted pursuit, and her father transformed her into a laurel tree; insinuation Opening to a persuasive speech; division Portion of a speech in which the orator delineates the points of agreement and disagreement between two sides of an argument; narration Portion of a speech in which the orator presents facts.

[3] ghastful Horrified.

[4] kindly Naturally.

"Yet thus much of his[1] worthy effects in yourself is to be seen, that (besides your breaking laws of hospitality with Kalander and of friendship with me) it utterly subverts the course of nature in making reason give place to sense, and man to woman. And truly I think hereupon it first got the name of love: for indeed the true love hath that excellent nature in it, that it doth transform the very essence of the lover into the thing loved, uniting and, as it were, incorporating it with a secret and inward working. And herein do these kinds of loves imitate the excellent; for as the love of heaven makes one heavenly, the love of virtue, virtuous, so doth the love of the world make one become worldly: and this effeminate love of a woman doth so womanize a man that, if he yield to it, it will not only make him an Amazon, but a launder, a distaff-spinner[2] or whatsoever other vile occupation their idle heads can imagine and their weak hands perform.

"Therefore, to trouble you no longer with my tedious but loving words, if either you remember what you are, what you have been, or what you must be; if you consider what it is that moved you, or by what kind of creature you are moved, you shall find the cause so small, the effect so dangerous, yourself so unworthy to run into the one or to be driven by the other, that I doubt not I shall quickly have occasion rather to praise you for having conquered it than to give you further counsel how to do it."

But in Pyrocles this speech wrought no more but that he who (before he was espied) was afraid, after (being perceived) was ashamed, now (being hardly rubbed upon[3]) left both fear and shame and was moved to anger. But the exceeding goodwill he bore to Musidorus striving with it, he thus (partly to satisfy him, but principally to loose the reins to his own motions[4]) made him answer:

"Cousin! whatsoever good disposition nature hath bestowed upon me, or howsoever that disposition hath been by bringing up confirmed, this I must confess, that I am not yet come to that degree of wisdom to think light of the sex of whom I have my life, since if I be anything (which your friendship rather finds than I acknowledge) I was, to come to it, born of a woman and nursed of a woman. And certainly (for this point of your speech doth nearest touch me) it is strange to see the unmanlike cruelty of mankind, who, not content with their tyrannous ambition to have brought the other's virtuous patience under them, like childish masters think their masterhood nothing without doing injury to them who (if we will argue by reason) are framed of nature with the same parts of the mind for the exercise of virtue as we are. And for example, even this estate of Amazons (which I now for my greatest honour do seek to counterfeit) doth well witness that if generally the sweetness of their disposition did not make them see the vainness of these things which we account glorious, they neither want valour of mind, nor yet doth their fairness take away their force. And truly we men and praisers of men should remember that if we have such excellencies, it is reason to think them excellent creatures of whom we are, since a kite[5] never brought forth a good flying hawk. But to tell you true, as I think it superfluous to use any words of such a subject which is so praised in itself as it needs no praises, so withal, I fear, lest my conceit[6] (not able to reach unto them) bring forth words which for their unworthiness may be a disgrace to them I so inwardly honour. Let this suffice, that they are capable of virtue: and virtue, you yourselves say, is to be loved, and I too, truly. But this I willingly confess, that it likes me much better when I find virtue in a fair lodging than when I am bound to seek it in an ill-favoured creature, like a pearl in a dung-hill. As for my fault of being an uncivil guest to Kalander, if you could feel what an inward guest myself am host unto, you would think it were excusable, in that I rather perform the duties of an host than the ceremonies of a guest. And for my breaking the laws of friendship with you, which I would rather die than effectually do, truly I could find it in my heart to ask you pardon for it but that your now handling of me gives me reason to confirm my former dealing."

---

[1] his I.e., love's.

[2] launder Launderer; distaff-spinner Spinner of yarn.

[3] hardly rubbed upon Harshly and too closely described.

[4] motions Emotions.

[5] kite Type of bird of prey that, unlike a hawk, was not typically used in early modern falconry.

[6] conceit Clever, rhetorically pleasing expression.

And here Pyrocles stayed, as to breathe himself, having been transported with a little vehemency, because it seemed him Musidorus had over-bitterly glanced against the reputation of womankind: but then quieting his countenance as well as out of an unquiet mind it might be, he thus proceeded on:

"And poor love," said he, "dear cousin, is little beholding[1] unto you, since you are not contented to spoil it of the honour of the highest power of the mind which notable men have attributed unto it; but you deject it below all other passions, in truth somewhat strangely, since, if love receive any disgrace, it is by the company of these passions you prefer before it. For those kinds of bitter objections (as that lust, idleness, and a weak heart should be, as it were, the matter and form of love) rather touch me, dear Musidorus, than love; but I am good witness of my own imperfections, and therefore will not defend myself. But herein I must say you deal contrary to yourself: for if I be so weak, then can you not with reason stir me up as you did by remembrance of my own virtue; or if indeed I be virtuous, then must you confess that love hath his working in a virtuous heart; and so no doubt hath it, whatsoever I be: for, if we love virtue, in whom shall we love it but in a virtuous creature—without[2] your meaning be, I should love this word "Virtue" where I see it written in a book! Those troublesome effects you say it breeds be not the faults of love, but of him that loves, as an unable vessel to bear such a liquor; like evil eyes not able to look on the sun, or like a weak brain, soonest overthrown with the best wine. Even that heavenly love you speak of is accompanied in some hearts with hopes, griefs, longings and despairs. And in that heavenly love, since there are two parts—the one the love itself, the other the excellency of the thing loved—I, not able at the first leap to frame both in me, do now, like a diligent workman, make ready the chief instrument and first part of that great work, which is love itself; which when I have a while practised in this sort, then you shall see me turn it to greater matters. And thus gently you may, if it please you, think of me. Neither doubt[3] you because I wear a woman's apparel I will be the more womanish, since I assure you, for all my apparel, there is nothing I desire more than fully to prove myself a man in this enterprise. Much might be said in my defence, much more for love, and most of all for that divine creature which hath joined me and love together. But these disputations are fitter for quiet schools than my troubled brains, which are bent rather in deeds to perform than in words to defend the noble desire that possesseth me."

"O lord," said Musidorus, "how sharp-witted you are to hurt yourself!"

"No," answered he, "but it is the hurt you speak of which makes me so sharp-witted."

"Even so," said Musidorus, "as every base occupation makes one sharp in that practice and foolish in all the rest."

"Nay rather," answered Pyrocles, "as each excellent thing, once well-learned, serves for a measure of all other knowledges."

"And is that become," said Musidorus, "a measure for other things which never received measure in itself?"

"It is counted without measure," answered Pyrocles, "because the workings of it are without measure, but otherwise, in nature it hath measure, since it hath an end alloted unto it."

"The beginning, being so excellent," said Musidorus, "I would gladly know the end."

"Enjoying," answered Pyrocles with a deep sigh.

---

[1] beholding Beholden.

[2] without Unless.

[3] doubt Fear.

"O," said Musidorus, "now set you forth the baseness of it, since if it end in enjoying, it shows all the rest was nothing."

"You mistake me," answered Pyrocles, "I spake of the end to which it is directed; which end ends not, no sooner than the life."

"Alas, let your own brain disenchant you," said Musidorus.

"My heart is too far possessed," said Pyrocles.

"But the head gives you direction," said Musidorus.

"And the heart gives me life," answered Pyrocles.

But Musidorus was so grieved to see his well-beloved friend obstinate, as he thought, to his own destruction, that it forced him with more than accustomed vehemency to speak these words.

"Well, well," said he, "you list[1] to abuse yourself. It was a very white and red virtue, which you could pick out of a painterly gloss of a visage.[2] Confess the truth, and you shall find the utmost was but beauty, a thing, which though it be in as great excellency in yourself as may be in any, yet I am sure you make no further reckoning of it than of an outward fading benefit Nature bestowed upon you. And yet such is your want of a true grounded virtue, which must be like itself in all points, that what you wisely account a trifle in yourself, you fondly[3] become a slave unto in another. For my part I now protest I have left nothing unsaid which my wit could make me know, or my most entire friendship to you requires of me. I do not beseech you even for the love betwixt us (if this other love hath left any in you towards me) and for the remembrance of your old careful father (if you can remember him that forget yourself) lastly, for Pyrocles' own sake (who is now upon the point of falling or rising) to purge yourself of this vile infection. Otherwise give me leave to leave off this name of friendship as an idle title of a thing which cannot be where virtue is abolished."

The length of these speeches before had not so much cloyed[4] Pyrocles, though he were very impatient of long deliberations, as this last farewell of him he loved as his own life did wound his soul. For thinking himself afflicted, he was the apter to conceive unkindness deeply, insomuch that shaking his head, and delivering some show of tears, he thus uttered his griefs:

"Alas," said he, "Prince Musidorus, how cruelly you deal with me. If you seek the victory, take it, and, if you list, the triumph. Have you all the reason of the world, and with me remain all the imperfections yet such as I can no more lay from me than the crow can be persuaded by the swan to cast off all his black feathers. But truly you deal with me like a physician that, seeing his patient in a pestilent fever, should chide him instead of ministering help, and bid him be sick no more; or rather like such a friend that, visiting his friend condemned to perpetual prison and laden with grievous fetters, should will him to shake off his fetters or he would leave him. I am sick, and sick to the death. I am prisoner, neither is there any redress but by her to whom I am a slave. Now, if you list, leave him that loves you in the highest degree: but remember ever to carry this with you, that you abandon your friend in his greatest extremity."

And herewith the deep wound of his love, being rubbed afresh with this new unkindness, began, as it were, to bleed again in such sort that he was unable to bear it any longer; but gushing out abundance of tears, and crossing his arms over his woeful heart, as if his tears had been out-flowing blood, his arms an over-pressing burden, he sunk down to the ground. Which sudden trance went so to the heart of Musidorus that, falling down by him and kissing the weeping eyes of his friend, he besought him not to make account of his speech which, if it had been over-vehement, yet was it to be borne withal, because it came out of a love much more vehement: that he had not thought fancy could have received so deep a wound; but now finding in him the force of it, he would no further contrary it but employ all his service to medicine it in such sort as the nature of it required. But even this kindness made Pyrocles the more melt in the former unkindness, which his manlike tears well showed, with a silent look upon Musidorus, as who should say: "And is it possible that Musidorus should threaten to leave me?"; and this struck Musidorus's mind and senses so dumb, too, that for grief being not able to say anything, they rested with their eyes placed one upon the other, in such sort as might well paint out the true passion of unkindness to be never aright but betwixt them that most dearly love.

---

[1] list Desire.

[2] It was … visage Musidorus is suggesting that Pyrocles is attracted by his beloved's complexion, rather than her virtue; gloss Semblance; visage Face.

[3] fondly Foolishly.

[4] cloyed Excessively satiated.

And thus remained they a time, till at length Musidorus, embracing him, said "And will you thus shake off your friend?"

"It is you that shake me off," said Pyrocles, "being for my unperfectness unworthy of your friendship."

"But this," said Musidorus, "shows you more unperfect, to be cruel to him that submits himself unto you. But since you are unperfect," said he, smiling, "it is reason you be governed by us wise and perfect men. And that authority will I begin to take upon me, with three absolute commandments: the first, that you increase not your evil with further griefs: the second, that you love her with all the powers of your mind: and the last commandment shall be, you command me to do what service I can towards the attaining of your desires."

Pyrocles's heart was not so oppressed with the two mighty passions of love and unkindness but that it yielded to some mirth at this commandment of Musidorus that he should love; so that something clearing his face from his former shows of grief: "Well," said he, "dear cousin, I see by the well choosing of your commandments that you are far fitter to be a prince than a counsellor, and therefore I am resolved to employ all my endeavour to obey you, with this condition, that the commandments ye command me to lay upon you shall only be, that you continue to love me, and look upon my imperfections with more affection than judgment." …

—1593 (EARLIER VERSIONS 1580 AND 1590)

Unlike Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender, Sidney's Arcadia did not appear in early editions with illustrations of pastoral scenes. Two examples of such scenes from sixteenth and early seventeenth-century painting are shown here. Titian's Shepherd and Nymph (c. 1570–75), above, is an Italian example; the miniature portrait (c. 1610–14) below, of Edward Herbert, Baron of Cherbury, is by the French-born English painter Isaac Oliver. (Another portrait by Oliver appears on the cover of this volume.)

IN CONTEXT

An Emblem Honoring Sir Philip Sidney

from Geffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblems (1586)

> For centuries the relation of Reason to the passions and appetites had been allegorized first as a charioteer driving one obedient and one rebellious horse (cf. Plato's Ion) and then as a man on horseback. Especially in Astrophil and Stella, Sidney played with his name "Phil[h]ip" ("phil-hippos," Greek for "horse-lover") and self-mockingly rued his own inability to let reason govern desire. In this image Sidney nimbly governs his rearing horse, representing his ability to judge and rule well. The Dutch hoped that he and his uncle, the earl of Leicester, would play a political role in encouraging Elizabeth I to help the Dutch revolt against Spain—hence the title's reference to Sidney's governorship of the Dutch town Flushing and its garrison. The Latin in the margin reads "Claud 4. Honor. Tu civem, patremque geras, tu consule cunctu, / Nec tibi, nec tua te moveant, sed publica vota," transcribed (with a few inaccuracies) from the Roman poet Claudian's "Panegyric on the Fourth Consulship of the Emperor Honorius" (398 CE), ll. 294–95. The quotation offers advice on rulership: "Bear thyself as both a father and a citizen, moved not only by thy own wishes but by those of the public." Peacham could not know that Sidney would not live to take such counsel, dying that year from wounds received at the battle of Zutphen in the Netherlands. The text of the emblem is reproduced below.

Non locus virum, sed vir locum ornat.[1]

To the honourable Sir PHILLIP SIDNEY Knight, Governor of the Garrison and Town of Vliſsing.

The tramping steed, that champs the burnished bit,
Is managed brave, with riders for the nones:[2]
But, when the fool upon his back doth set,
He throws him down, and oft doth bruise his bones:
　His courage fierce, doth crave a better guide
　And eke such horse, the fool should not bestride.

By which is meant, that men of judgment grave,
Of learning, wit, and eke of conscience clear,
In high estate, are fit their seats to have,
And to be stalled, in sacred justice cheer:
　Wherein they rule, unto their endless fame,
　But fools are foiled, and thrown out of the same.

　　——magnum hoc ego duco,
　　Quod placuit tibi, qui turpi secernis honestum.[3]

---

[1] Non locus … ornat Latin: Not the office the man, but the man adorns the office.

[2] Is managed … nones Is bravely (or splendidly) managed by riders suited to the occasion.

[3] magnum … honestum Latin: for me it is an honor to have pleased thee, / Who canst tell virtue from vice.

38 Non locus virum, ſed vir locum ornat.

To the Honorable Sir PHILLIP SIDNEY Knight, Gouernour of the Garriſon and towne of Vliſsing.

THE trampinge ſteede, that champes the burniſh'd bitte,
Is mannag'd braue, with ryders for the nones:
But, when the foole vppon his backe doth ſette,
He throwes him downe, and ofte doth bruſe his bones:
  His corage feirce, dothe craue a better guide,
  And eke ſuch horſe, the foole ſhoulde not beſtride.

Claud. 4 Honor. Tu ciuem, patrémque geras, tu conſule cunctis, Non tibi, nec tua te moueant, ſed publica vota.

By which is ment, that men of iudgement graue,
Of learning, witte, and eeke of conſcience cleare,
In highe eſtate, are fitte theire ſeates to haue,
And to be ſtall'd, in ſacred iuſtice cheare:
  Wherein they rule, vnto theire endleſſe fame,
  But fooles are foil'd, and throwne out of the ſame.

Horat. 1. Ser. 6.

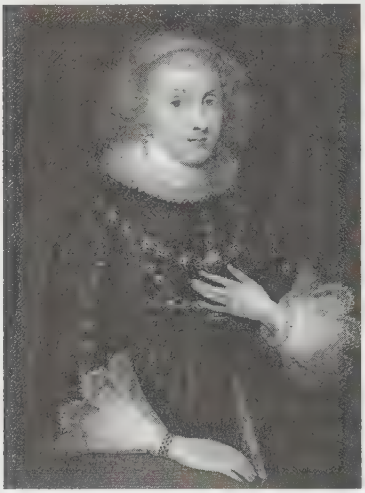
——magnum hoc ego duco,
Quòd placuit tibi, qui turpi ſecernis honeſtum.

Medio

MARY SIDNEY HERBERT, COUNTESS OF PEMBROKE

1561 – 1621

Although she was a respected and much-praised author in her lifetime, in the centuries after her death Mary Sidney's fame was eclipsed by that of her brother Philip, the celebrated Renaissance writer and courtier. It is only in recent years that literary historians and critics have again begun to recognize fully her contribution to English literature. Her published poems and translations are valuable in themselves, and her metrical paraphrases of the Psalms influenced the seventeenth-century lyric, including poems by John Donne and George Herbert. In addition to creating her own literary works, she employed her position as a countess and her personal wealth to serve as a patron of other writers. Among those who dedicated works to her were Edmund Spenser, Nicholas Breton, Samuel Daniel, and Aemelia Lanyer. She was also a literary mentor for her niece and goddaughter, Lady Mary Sidney Wroth.



Mary Sidney was born at Tickenhall, near Bewdley, Worcestershire, on 27 October 1561. Her father was Sir Henry Sidney, a statesman who served for some years as Viceroy of Ireland, and her mother was Mary Dudley, whose father was the Duke of Northumberland and whose brother was Robert Leicester, a favorite of Queen Elizabeth. Because she was a girl, Mary Sidney was excluded from schools above the primary level, but like many girls from the upper classes she received an excellent education at home, studying theology, classical literature, Latin, French, and Italian. She was also brought up to practice personal piety with a Protestant emphasis, a piety that was to manifest itself in her writings. After her sister Ambrosia died in February 1575, Mary was invited to the court of Elizabeth, where, at age 14, she served as maid of honor.

Within two years of her arrival at court, Mary Sidney had married Henry Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, a family ally. She was fifteen, he was forty-three, and she was his third wife, but the match proved to be reasonably happy, and produced four children. As Countess of Pembroke, Mary Sidney Herbert was mistress of Wilton House, Wiltshire, and Baynards Castle, London. It was at Wilton House that her brother Philip stayed for a while, probably in 1580, and began his most famous work, The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, which he dedicated to his sister. He also began a series of verse adaptations of the Psalms, and when he died in 1586 after being wounded during a skirmish with Spanish forces in the Netherlands, his sister continued his work. Philip had adapted Psalms 1 through 43; Mary revised these and wrote her own adaptations of Psalms 44 though 150, completing the Psalter. To understand the Psalms and to help shape her own versions, she drew on commentaries by such Protestant authorities as John Calvin and Théodore de Bèze, on the Psalter in the Book of Common Prayer, on translations in various Bibles (particularly the 1560 Geneva Bible), and on earlier metrical versions such as those by Clément Marot and Bèze that made up the French Huguenot Psalter. She may even have known, conceivably at first hand but more probably at second, some rabbinical commentary on the Psalms. The result is a body of often powerful verse that is relatively faithful to the original but with a variety of interesting shadings. In some cases the shadings draw attention to the translator's female perspective; in others they stress the psalms' political significance—as, for instance, the advice to rulers to follow the Word of God and to do justice. The Countess also wrote poems in praise of her brother and of the Queen, and translated some French and Italian works into English—most notably Petrarch's Triumph of Death. She also continued to supervise the publication of her brother Philip's work.

After the death of her husband in 1601, Mary Sidney shifted her energies to administering the family estates and to arranging marriages and political appointments for her children. She traveled on the Continent where, her correspondence shows, she continued her literary activity. She built Houghton House in Bedfordshire while also maintaining a home in London and keeping up her connections at court. She died of smallpox on 25 September 1621, and is buried with her husband in Salisbury Cathedral.

⁂

To the Angel Spirit of the Most Excellent Sir Philip Sidney

To thee, pure sprite,° to thee alone's addressed spirit
This coupled work,[1] by double int'rest thine:
First raised by thy blest hand, and what is mine
Inspired by thee, thy secret power imprest.° influenced by
So dared my muse with thine itself combine,
As mortal stuff with that which is divine.
Thy lightning beams give luster to the rest,

That heaven's king may deign his own transformed
In substance no, but superficial tire° attire
By thee put on; to praise, not to aspire
To those high tones, so in themselves adorned,
Which angels sing in their celestial choir,
And all of tongues with soul and voice admire
These sacred hymns thy kingly prophet[2] formed.

Oh, had that soul which honor brought to rest
Too soon not left, and reft° the world of all robbed
What man could show which we perfection call,
This half-maimed piece had sorted with[3] the best.
Deep wounds enlarged, long festered in their gall,
Fresh bleeding smart; not eye- but heart-tears fall.
Ah memory, what needs this new arrest?

Yet here behold (oh, wert thou to behold!)
This finish't now, thy matchless muse begun,
The rest but piec't, as left by thee undone.
Pardon (oh, blest soul) presumption too too bold:
If love and zeal such error ill-become,
'Tis zealous love, love which hath never done,
Nor can enough in world of words unfold.

And since it hath no further scope to go,
Nor other purpose but to honor thee,
Thee in thy works, where all the Graces[4] be
As little streams with all their all do flow
To their great sea, due tribute's grateful fee;
So press my thoughts, my burdened thoughts, in me,
To pay the debt of infinites I owe

To thy great worth. Exceeding nature's store,
Wonder of men, sole born perfection's kind,
Phoenix thou wert. So rare thy fairest mind,
Heav'nly adorned, Earth justly might adore,
Where truthful praise in highest glory shined,
For there alone was praise to truth confined;
And where but there, to live forevermore?

---

[1] This coupled work Translations of the psalms, which Sidney had begun before his death.

[2] kingly prophet King David, author of the Psalms.

[3] sorted with Matched.

[4] the Graces Greek goddesses of joy, charm, and beauty.

Oh! When to this accompt,° this cast-up sum, account
This reckoning made, this audit of my woe,
I call my thoughts, whence so strange passions flow,
How works my heart, my senses stricken dumb?
That would thee more than ever heart could show,
And all too short: who knew thee best doth know
There lives no wit that may thy praise become.° express

Truth I invoke (who scorn elsewhere to move
Or here in aught my blood should partialize),[1]
Truth, sacred Truth, thee sole to solemnize.
Those precious rights well known best minds approve;
And who but doth, hath wisdom's open eyes,
Not owly blind the fairest light still° flies, always Confirm no less? At least 'tis sealed above.

Where thou art fixed among thy fellow lights:
My day put out, my life in darkness cast,
Thy angel's soul with highest angels placed,
There blessed sings enjoying heaven-delights,
Thy maker's praise; as far from earthly taste
As here thy works so worthily embraced
By all of worth, where never envy bites.

As goodly buildings to some glorious end
Cut off by fate, before the Graces had
Each wond'rous part in all their beauties clad,
Yet so much done, as art could not amend;
So thy rare works to which no wit can add,
In all men's eyes which are not blindly mad,
Beyond compare, above all praise extend.

Immortal monuments of thy fair fame,
Though not complete, nor in the reach of thought,
How on that passing peacetime would have wrought,
Had Heav'n so spared the life of life to frame
The rest?[2] But ah, such loss! Hath this world aught
Can equal it? Or which like grievance brought?
Yet there will live thy ever-praised name.

To which these dearest off'rings of my heart,
Dissolved to ink, while pen's impressions move
The bleeding veins of never-dying love,
I render here; these wounding lines of smart,
Sad characters indeed of simple love,
Not art nor skill which abler wits do prove,
Of my full soul receive the meanest part.

Receive these hymns, these obsequies receive:
If any mark of thy sweet sprite appear,
Well are they born; no title else shall bear.
I can no more: dear soul, I take my leave;
Sorrow still strives, would mount thy highest sphere,
Presuming so just cause might meet thee there.
Oh happy change, could so I take my leave!
—1623 (WRITTEN C. 1595)

from The Psalms of David

Psalm 52: Quid Gloriaris?[3]

Tyrant, why swell'st thou thus,
Of mischief vaunting?
Since help from God to us
Is never wanting?

Lewd lies the tongue contrives,
Loud lies it soundeth:
Sharper than sharpest knives
With lies it woundeth.

Falsehood thy wit approves,
All truth rejected:
Thy will all vices loves,
Virtue neglected.

Not words from cursèd thee,
But gulfs° are pourèd. chasms
Gulfs wherein daily be Good men devourèd.

---

[1] who … partialize I.e., I scorn to be seen to be partial to a member of my own family.

[2] Had Heav'n … rest I.e., had Heaven spared the life of Sidney so that he could frame the life of the rest of humankind.

[3] Quid Gloriaris Latin: Why do you glory?

Think'st thou to bear it[1] so?
God shall displace thee;
God shall thee overthrow,
Crush thee, deface thee.

The just shall fearing see
These fearful chances,
And laughing shoot at thee
With scornful glances.

Lo, lo the wretched wight,° soul
Who, God disdaining,
His mischief made his might,
His guard his gaining.° profits

I as an olive tree
Still green shall flourish:
God's house the soil shall be
My roots to nourish.

My trust on his true love
Truly attending,
Shall never thence remove,
Never see ending.

Thee will I honour still,
Lord, for this justice;
There fix my hopes I will,
Where thy saints' trust is.

Thy saints trust in thy name,
Therein they joy them:
Protected by the same,
Naught can annoy° them. harm
—1823 (WRITTEN C. 1588–1601)

Psalm 58: Si Vere Utique[2]

And call ye this to utter what is just,
You that of justice hold the sov'reign throne?
And call ye this to yield, O sons of dust,
To wrongèd brethren ev'ry one his own?
O no: it is your long malicious will
Now to the world to make by practice known,
With whose oppression you the balance fill,
Just to yourselves, indiff'rent° else to none. impartial

But what could they, who ev'n in birth declined
From truth and right to lies and injuries?
To show the venom of their cankered mind
The adder's image scarcely can suffice.
Nay, scarce the aspic° may with them contend, asp
On whom the charmer all in vain applies
His skilful'st spells: ay missing of his end,
While she self-deaf and unaffected lies.

Lord crack their teeth, Lord crush these lions' jaws,
So let them sink as water in the sand:
When deadly bow their aiming fury draws,
Shiver the shaft ere past the shooter's hand.
So make them melt as the dishoused snail,
Or as the embryo, whose vital band
Breaks ere it holds, and formless eyes do fail
To see the sun, though brought to lightful land.

O let their brood, a brood of springing thorns,
Be by untimely rooting overthrown
Ere bushes waxed, they push with pricking horns,
As fruits yet green are oft by tempest blown.
The good with gladness this revenge shall see,
And bathe his feet in blood of wicked one:
While all shall say, the just rewarded be,
There is a God that carves to each his own.
—1823 (WRITTEN C. 1588–1601)

Psalm 74: Ut Quid, Deus[3]

O God, why hast thou thus Repulsed, and scattered us?
Shall now thy wrath no limits hold?
But ever smoke and burn?
Till it to ashes turn
The chosen flock of thy dear fold?

Ah! think with milder thought
On them, whom thou hast bought,

---

[1] bear it Carry it.

[2] Si Vere Utique Latin: If truly indeed.

[3] Ut Quid, Deus Latin: Why, oh God?

And purchased from endless days:
Think of thy birthright lot,
Of Zion, on whose plot
Thy sacred house supported stays.

Come, Lord, O come with speed,
This sacrilegious seed
Root quickly out, and headlong cast:
All that thy holy place
Did late adorn and grace,
Their hateful hands have quite defaced.

Their beastly trumpets roar,
Where heav'nly notes before
In praises of thy might did flow:
Within thy temple they
Their ensigns° eft° display, flags / oft
The ensigns which their conquest show.

As men with axe on arm
To some thick forest swarm,
To lop the trees which stately stand,
They to thy temple flock,
And spoiling, cut and knock
The curious works of carving hand.

Thy most, most holy seat
The greedy flames do eat,
And have such ruthless ruins wrought,
That all thy house is razed,
So razed, and so defaced,
That of that all remaineth naught.

Nay, they resolved are,
We all alike shall fare,
All of one cruel cup shall taste.
For not one house doth stand
Of God in all the land,
But they by fire have laid it waste.

We see the signs no more
We wont to see before,
Nor any now with spright° divine spirit
Amongst us more is found,
Who can to us expound,
What term these dolours° shall define. sorrows

How long, O God, how long
Wilt thou wink at the wrong
Of thy reviling railing foe?
Shall he that hates thy name,
And hatred paints with shame,
So do, and do for ever so?

Woe us! what is the cause
Thy hand his help withdraws?
That thy right hand far from us keeps?
Ah, let it once arise,
To plague thine enemies,
Which now, embosomed,[1] idly sleeps.

Thou art my God, I know,
My king, who long ago
Didst undertake the charge of me:
And in my hard distress
Didst work me such release,
That all the earth did wond'ring see.

Thou by thy might didst make
That seas in sunder brake,
And dreadful dragons which before
In deep, or swam, or crawled,
Such mortal strokes appalled,
They floated dead to ev'ry shore.

Thou crushed that monster's head
Whom other monsters dread,
And so his fishy flesh didst frame,
To serve as pleasing food
To all the ravening brood,
Who had the desert for their dame.[2]

Thou wondrously didst cause,
Repealing nature's laws,
From thirsty flint a fountain flow,
And of the rivers clear,

---

[1] embosomed Sheltered; pressed to one's bosom.

[2] for their dame I.e., for their mother, i.e., motherland: the desert "gave birth" to them.

The sandy beds appear,
So dry thou mad'st their channels grow.

The day arrayed in light,
The shadow-clothèd night,
Were made, and are maintained by thee.
The sun and sun-like rays,
The bounds of nights and days,
Thy workmanship no less they be.

To thee the earth doth owe,
That earth in sea doth grow,
And sea doth earth from drowning spare:
The summer's corny crown,[1]
The winter's frosty gown,
Naught but thy badge, thy livery[2] are.

Thou then still one, the same,
Think how thy glorious name
These brain-sick men's despite have borne,
How abject enemies
The Lord of highest skies
With cursèd taunting tongues have torn.

Ah! give no hawk the pow'r
Thy turtle° to devour, turtle-dove
Which sighs to thee with mourning moans:
Nor utterly out-raze
From tables of thy grace
The flock of thy afflicted ones.

But call thy league to mind,
For horror all doth blind,
No light doth in the land remain:
Rape, murder, violence,
Each outrage, each offence,
Each where doth range, and rage and reign.

Enough, enough we mourn:
Let us no more return
Repulsed with blame and shame from thee,
But succour us oppressed,
And give the troubled rest,
That of thy praise their songs may be.

Rise God, plead thine own case,
Forget not what disgrace
These fools on thee each day bestow:
Forget not with what cries
Thy foes against thee rise,
Which more and more to heav'n do grow.
—1823 (c. 1588–1601)

Psalm 120: Ad Dominum[3]

As to th'Eternal often in anguishes
Erst have I called, never unanswered,
Again I call, again I calling
Doubt not again to receive an answer.

Lord rid my soul from treasonous eloquence
Of filthy forgers craftily fraudulent,
And from the tongue where lodged resideth
Poisoned abuse, ruin of believers.

Thou that reposest vainly thy confidence
In wily wronging, say by thy forgery
What good to thee? What gain redoundeth?[4]
What benefit from a tongue deceitful?

Though like an arrow strongly delivered
It deeply pierce, though like to a juniper
It coals do cast which, quickly fired,
Flame very hot, very hardly quenching?

Ah God! too long here wander I banished,
Too long abiding barbarous injury,
With Kedar and with Mesech[5] harboured,
How? in a tent, in a houseless harbour.

Too long, alas, too long have I dwelled here
With friendly peace's furious enemies,

---

[1] corny crown I.e., the summer is characterized by the abundance of grain (corn).

[2] livery Uniform worn by servants.

[3] Ad Dominum Latin: To God.

[4] redoundeth Results; arises.

[5] Kedar ... Mesech Cf. Psalms 120.5.

Who when to peace I seek to call them,
Faster I find to the war they arm them.
—1823 (WRITTEN C. 1588–1601)

Even now that care[1]

Even now that care which on thy crown attends
And with thy happy greatness daily grows
Tells me, thrice-sacred Queen, my muse offends,
And of respect to thee the line outgoes.
One instant will, or willing can she lose
I say not reading, but receiving rhymes,
On whom in chief dependeth to dispose
What Europe acts in these most active times?

Yet dare I so, as humbleness may dare
Cherish some hope they shall acceptance find;
Not weighing less thy state, lighter thy care,
But knowing more thy grace, abler thy mind.
What heavenly powers thee highest throne assigned,
Assigned thee goodness suiting that degree,
And by thy strength thy burthen so defined,
To others toil, is exercise to thee.

Cares though still great, cannot be greatest still,
Business must ebb, though leisure never flow;
Then these the posts of duty and goodwill
Shall press to offer what their senders owe;
Which once in two, now in one subject go,
The poorer left, the richer reft° away:[2] stolen
Who better might (O might, ah word of woe)
Have given for me what I for him defray.

How can I name whom sighing sighs extend,
And not unstop my tears eternal spring?
But he did warp, I weaved this web to end;
The stuff not ours, our work no curious thing,
Wherein yet well we thought the Psalmist King[3]
Now English denizened, though Hebrew born,
Would to thy music undispleased sing,
Oft having worse, without repining° worn; complaining

And I the cloth in both our names present,
A livery robe to be bestowed by thee;
Small parcel of the undischarged rent,
From which nor pains nor payments can us free.
And yet enough to cause our neighbors see
We will our best, though scanted° in our will; lacking
And those nigh fields where sown thy favors be Unwealthy do, not else unworthy till.

For in our work what bring we but thine own?
What English is, by many names is thine.
There humble laurels, in thy shadows grown.
To garland others would themselves repine.° are discontent
Thy breast the cabinet, thy seat the shrine,
Where muses hang their vowed memories;
Where wit, where art, where all that is divine
Conceived best, and best defended lies.

Which if men did not (as they do) confess,
And wronging worlds would otherwise consent,
Yet here who minds so meet a patroness
For authors' state or writings' argument?
A King should only to a Queen be sent;
God's loved choice unto his chosen love;
Devotion to devotion's president;
What all applaud, to her whom none reprove.

And who sees aught, but sees how justly square
His haughty ditties to thy glorious days?
How well beseeming thee his triumphs are?
His hope, his zeal, his prayer, plaint,° and praise, plea
Needless thy person to their height to raise;
Less need to bend them down to thy degree;
These holy garments each good soul assays,
Some sorting° all, all sort to none but thee. fitting

---

[1] Even ... care This poem, frequently given the title "To the Thrice-Sacred Queen Elizabeth," prefaced Herbert's translation of the psalms, which she dedicated to the Queen. Because Elizabeth promoted efforts to disseminate vernacular scriptures, she was the frequent recipient of scriptural translations and works based on the Psalms.

[2] Which once ... away Reference to Herbert and her brother Sidney, the latter being the richer of the two.

[3] Psalmist King King David.

For even thy rule is painted in his reign;
Both clear in right, both nigh by wrong oppressed;[1]
And each at length (man crossing God in vain)
Possest of place, and each in peace possessed.
Proud Philistines did interrupt his rest,
The foes of heaven[2] no less have been thy foes;
He with great conquest, thou with greater[3] blest;
Thou sure to win, and he secure to lose.[4]

Thus hand in hand with him thy glories walk;
But who can trace them where alone they go?
Of thee two hemispheres[5] on honor talk,
And lands and seas thy trophies jointly show.
The very winds did on thy party blow,
And rocks in arms thy foemen eft° defy. again
But soft, my muse, thy pitch is earthly love;
Forbear this heaven, where only eagles fly.
Kings on a Queen enforced their states to lay,
Mainlands for empire waiting on an isle;
Men drawn by worth a woman to obey;
One moving all, herself unmoved the while;
Truth's restitution, vanity exile,
Wealth sprung of want, war held without annoy,° harm
Let subject be of some inspired style,
Till then the object of her subjects' joy.

Thy utmost can but offer to her sight
Her handmaids' task, which most her will endears;
And pray unto thy pains life from that light
Which lively lightsome Court and Kingdom cheers,
What wish she may (far past her living peers
And rival still to Judah's faithful King)
In more than he and more triumphant years,
Sing what God doth, and do what men may sing.
—1599

---

[1] both nigh … oppressed David by Saul, and Elizabeth by her sister Mary, who imprisoned her in the Tower of London for two months.

[2] foes of heaven I.e., the Spaniards.

[3] greater The defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588. Because this occurred with the help of a storm, many English believed the hand of God was behind their victory.

[4] secure to lose I.e., safe against loss.

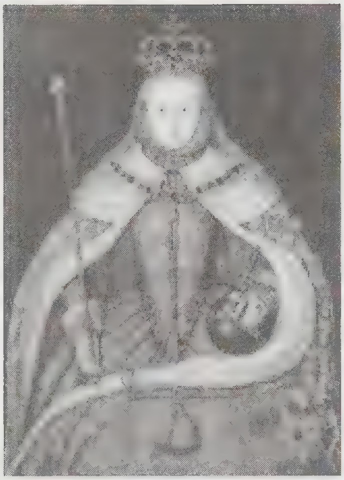
[5] two hemispheres The Old and New Worlds—Virginia had been claimed for the Queen.

ELIZABETH I, QUEEN OF ENGLAND

1533 – 1603



One of the most famous monarchs in European history, Queen Elizabeth I presided over a vigorous culture that saw notable accomplishments in the arts, voyages of discovery, the "Elizabethan settlement" that created the Church of England, and the defeat of military threats from Spain. Her shrewd political mind helped sustain her country in a time of occasional famine, widespread poverty, intermittent plague, and deep religious and political divisions; she also, if sometimes reluctantly, supported the beginnings of an empire that would flourish over the next 350 years. Elizabeth was also a precocious writer, penning translations even in her childhood and later composing poetry and speeches.

Elizabeth was the product of a controversial union, that of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. Some months before giving birth on 7 September 1533 Boleyn became the king's second wife. In 1534, Pope Clement VII, who had waffled for a few years, officially confirmed his refusal to annul Henry's marriage to his first wife, Catherine of Aragon. Henry responded by declaring himself head of the English Church, but many in and out of the government refused to recognize either his right to do this or the validity of his new marriage. A significant portion of the population therefore considered Elizabeth illegitimate, and throughout her reign many of those loyal to the Roman Catholic Church continued to dispute her right to the throne.

At first Henry designated Elizabeth as his heir. However, after her mother fell from favor and was executed in 1536, Elizabeth's political fortunes turned (much as they had for her older half-sister, Mary). Henry married Jane Seymour and had a son, Edward, who was named King after Henry died in 1547. Orphaned, Elizabeth was cared for by Henry's last wife, Catherine Parr, and her new husband, Thomas Seymour. Catherine made sure that Elizabeth received a fine education, hiring a number of prominent tutors, including the distinguished humanist Roger Ascham.

Young Edward VI proved to be sickly, dying in 1553 before his sixteenth birthday. Various political maneuvers ensued, but eventually Elizabeth's half-sister Mary was crowned Queen. Mary I was a staunch Catholic who wanted to undo the reforms of her father as well as the explicitly Protestant changes made by Edward, and she attempted to convince Elizabeth to convert to Catholicism. Whether from sincere reluctance or awareness that she was the Protestant hope, or both, Elizabeth was prudently ambiguous about her religious beliefs, so on 17 March 1554, fearful of plots against her throne, Mary had her imprisoned in the Tower of London.[1] There she stayed for two months before being transferred into custody at Woodstock Castle, a dilapidated hunting lodge in Oxfordshire, where she remained for almost a year.

When Mary died on 17 November 1558, childless in her marriage to Philip II of Spain, Elizabeth was named Queen. She was crowned on 15 January 1559, after elaborate London celebrations, in Westminster Abbey. As Queen, Elizabeth proved to be a strong and cunning leader. Early in her reign she worked hard to solidify her rule, thwarting assassination attempts and Catholic plots to install her cousin, Mary Stuart, as queen. Elizabeth took a more moderate approach to England's religious conflicts than had her predecessors. She reinstated the reforms instituted by her father and brother, but she eschewed Edward's Calvinist militancy as well as Mary's punitive conservatism. She also displayed her acumen in domestic politics, manipulating her advisors as a means of maintaining her own control and playing the Petrarchan mistress or virgin goddess to encourage her courtiers' and subjects' loyalty and affection. Internationally, although she did send money and men to help Henri IV to the French throne and to help the Dutch expel the Spanish, she largely withdrew England from costly involvement in foreign conflicts. Ireland was another matter, and Elizabeth's government engaged in an often bloody struggle to suppress Irish revolts against English rule.

---

[1] An excerpt from John Foxe's Acts and Monuments concerning Elizabeth I's imprisonment in the Tower of London is included in the website component of this anthology.

Throughout the first half of her reign, Elizabeth was under pressure from advisors and Parliament to marry and produce an heir. She resisted, no doubt aware that any spouse would exert considerable influence over her. She entertained many suitors, English and foreign, but declared that she preferred being married to England.

Elizabeth's writings provide glimpses into her mind, although as a princess or queen she knew she was always on stage and without real privacy. Her lines written on a window frame during her captivity at Woodstock (1555) cry for justice, for example, while "On Monsieur's Departure" (c. 1581; "Monsieur" is almost certainly her suitor the Duc d'Anjou, brother to the French king) shows her romantic side—or its political simulation. In her so-called "Golden Speech," her farewell speech to Parliament given on 30 November 1601, Elizabeth speaks frankly about the burdens of queenship: "to be a king and wear a crown is a thing more glorious to them that see it than it is pleasant to them that bear it." The queen also translated various works, including passages from Boethius' Consolation of Philosophy, and made the first English translation of Horace's "Art of Poetry."

Elizabeth overcame the uncertainty that surrounded her accession to become enormously popular, even with many Catholics; she came to be known to her subjects as "Good Queen Bess." She died on 24 March 1603 at almost seventy, having ruled England for nearly 45 years. She was buried in Westminster Abbey and was succeeded by James VI of Scotland, the Protestant son of Mary Stuart, who reigned as James I.

⁂

Written on a Wall at Woodstock[1]

Oh fortune, thy wresting[2] wavering state
Hath fraught with cares my troubled wit,
Whose witness this present prison late
Could bear, where once was joy's loan quit.[3]
Thou causedst the guilty to be loosed
From bands where innocents were enclosed,
And caused the guiltless to be reserved,
And freed those that death had well deserved.
But herein can be nothing wrought,
So God send to my foes as they have thought.
—c. 1554–55

---

[1] Wall This poem is variously noted as being written on a wall, a shutter, and a window frame. Writing poetry or proverbs on these surfaces was not uncommon in the period; Woodstock Elizabeth, under suspicion for involvement in Sir Thomas Wyatt the Younger's plots against Mary, was placed under house arrest at Woodstock.

[2] wresting Struggling, twisting.

[3] joy's loan quit The lease of joy repaid.

Written in Her French Psalter[1]

No crooked leg, no bleared eye,
No part deformed out of kind,
Nor yet so ugly half can be
As is the inward suspicious mind.
—1565

The Doubt of Future Foes[2]

The doubt of future foes exiles my present joy,
And wit me warns to shun such snares as threaten mine annoy,
For falsehood now doth flow, and subjects' faith doth ebb,
Which should not be if reason ruled or wisdom weaved the web.
But clouds of joys untried do cloak aspiring minds,
Which turn to rain of late repent by changed course of winds.
The top of hope supposed the root upreared shall be,
And fruitless all their grafted guile, as shortly ye shall see.
Their dazzled eyes with pride, which great ambition blinds,
Shall be unsealed by worthy wights° whose foresight falsehood finds. people
The daughter of debate[3] that discord aye doth sow
Shall reap no gain where former rule still peace hath taught to grow.
No foreign banished wight shall anchor in this port;
Our realm brooks° not seditious sects, let them elsewhere resort. tolerates
My rusty sword through rest[4] shall first his edge employ
To poll° their tops that seek such change or gape for future joy. crop or cut
—c. 1568–71

On Monsieur's Departure[5]

I grieve, and dare not show my discontent,
I love, and yet am forced to seem to hate,
I do, yet dare not say I ever meant,
I seem stark mute, but inwardly do prate.
I am and not, I freeze and yet am burned,
Since from myself another self I turned.

My care is like my shadow in the sun,
Follows me flying, flies when I pursue it,
Stands and lies by me, doth what I have done.
His too familiar care doth make me rue° it. regret
No means I find to rid him from my breast,
Till by the end of things it be suppressed.

Some gentler passion slide into my mind,
For I am soft and made of melting snow,
Or be more cruel, love, and so be kind.
Let me or float or sink, be high or[6] low,
Or let me live with some more sweet content,
Or die, and so forget what love ere meant.
—c. 1582

Poems Exchanged between Sir Walter Ralegh and Elizabeth I

Elizabeth frequently engaged in light-hearted exchanges of verse with members of her circle. This exchange (which survives in a number of manuscript copies) is believed to date from 1587, at which time the Earl of Essex was becoming more and more a favorite of the queen; the exchange reflects Ralegh's concern that he might therefore be losing in favor.

---

[1] Psalter Translation or version of the Book of Psalms. This poem is inscribed in the last leaf of Elizabeth's French psalter.

[2] Doubt Dread or fear; Future Foes This poem was written in response to the threat to Elizabeth's rule from Mary, Queen of Scots. Mary believed she had a legitimate claim to the throne of England and became the focal point of Catholic protests against Elizabeth. This was probably written shortly after Mary's flight from Scotland to England in 1568, as it appeared in commonplace books early in the 1570s, though the poem has been understood as a response to Mary's execution in 1587.

[3] The daughter of debate Mary, Queen of Scots.

[4] rusty sword through rest The sword is rusty because unused.

[5] On Monsieur's Departure This poem was written in response to the final departure of Elizabeth's French suitor, François, duc d'Anjou, in 1582.

[6] or … or Either … or.

[Ralegh to Elizabeth]

Fortune hath taken away my love,
My life's joy and my soul's heaven above.
Fortune hath taken thee away, my princess,
My world's joy and my true fantasy's mistress.

Fortune hath taken thee away from me;
Fortune hath taken all by taking thee.
Dead to all joys, I only live to woe:
So is Fortune become my fantasy's foe.

In vain, my eyes, in vain ye waste your tears;
In vain my sighs, the smoke of my despairs,
In vain you search the earth and heaven above.
In vain you search, for Fortune keeps my love.

Then will I leave my love in Fortune's hand:
Then will I leave my love in worldings' band,[1]
And only love the sorrows due to me—
Sorrow, henceforth, that shall my princess be—

And only joy that Fortune conquers kings.
Fortune, that rules the earth and earthly things,
Hath taken my love in spite of Virtue's might:
So blind a goddess did never Virtue right.[2]

With wisdom's eyes had but blind Fortune seen,
Then had my love, my love forever been.
But love, farewell—though Fortune conquer thee,
No fortune base° nor frail shall alter me. low

[Elizabeth to Ralegh]

Ah, silly Pug,[3] wert thou so sore afraid?
Mourn not, my Wat,° nor be thou so dismayed. Walter
It passeth° fickle Fortune's power and skill exceeds
To force my heart to think thee any ill.
No Fortune base, thou sayest, shall conquer thee?
And may so blind a witch so conquer me?
No, no, my Pug, though° Fortune were not blind, even if Assure thyself she could not rule my mind.
Fortune, I know, sometimes doth conquer kings,
And rules and reigns on earth and earthly things,
But never think Fortune can bear the sway
If virtue watch, and will her not obey.
Ne° chose I thee by fickle Fortune's rede,[4] nor
Ne she shall force me alter with such speed
But if to try this mistress' jest with thee.[5]

Pull up thy heart, suppress thy brackish tears,
Torment thee not, but put away thy fears.
Dead to all joys and living unto woe,
Slain quite by her that ne'er gave wise men blow,
Revive again and live without all dread,
The less afraid, the better thou shalt speed.[6]
—WRITTEN C. 1587

When I Was Fair and Young[7]

When I was fair and young, and favour graced me,
Of many was I sought their mistress for to be,
But I did scorn them all and answered them therefore,
"Go, go, go, seek some other where. Importune me no more."

How many weeping eyes I made to pine with woe,
How many sighing hearts I have no skill to show,
But I the prouder grew and still this spake therefore,

---

[1] in worldings' band Held by [others] on earth.

[2] So blind ... right So blind a goddess [as Fortune] has never done right by Virtue. (The goddess Fortuna was often portrayed wearing a blindfold.)

[3] Pug Term of endearment commonly used during this era; Elizabeth often employed it in addressing Ralegh.

[4] by fickle Fortune's rede As a result of any decision made by untrustworthy Fortune.

[5] But if ... with thee In their edition of Elizabeth's works, Leah S. Marcus, Janel Mueller, and Mary Beth Rose note that the line following this one is left blank in some (though not all) manuscripts of the poem. They suggest two possibilities: that a line may be missing, which would explain the absence of a rhyme for "thee" (line 15); or that Elizabeth may have intended a break between sections, in which case "thee" would have been intended as a near-rhyme with "rede" (line 13) and "speed" (line 14).

[6] The less ... speed The less afraid you are, the better you will do.

[7] When I Was Fair and Young The date of this poem is uncertain, and some editors have doubted its authenticity.

"Go, go, go, seek some other where. Importune me no more."

Then spake fair Venus' son,[1] that proud victorious boy,
Saying, "You dainty dame, for that you be so coy,
I will so pluck your plumes as you shall say no more,
'Go, go, go, seek some other where. Importune
me no more.'"

When he had spoke these words, such change grew in my breast
That neither night nor day since that I could take any rest.
Wherefore I did repent that I had said before,
"Go, go, go, seek some other where. Importune me no more."
—1589–90

To Our Most Noble and Virtuous Queen Katherine, Elizabeth Her Humble Daughter Wishes Perpetual Felicity and Everlasting Joy[2]

Not only knowing the affectionate will and fervent zeal which your highness hath toward all godly learning, as also my duty toward you (most gracious and sovereign princess), but knowing also that pusillanimity[3] and idleness are most repugnant unto a reasonable creature and that (as the philosopher[4] saith) even as an instrument of iron or of other metal waxeth soon rusty unless it be continually occupied,[5] even so shall the wit of a man or woman wax dull and unapt to do or understand anything perfectly unless it be always occupied upon some manner of study, which things considered hath moved so small a portion as God hath lent me to prove what I could do. And therefore have I as for assay[6] or beginning (so following the right noble saying of the proverb aforesaid) translated this little book out of French rhyme into English prose, joining the sentences together as well as the capacity of my simple wit and small learning could extend themselves. The which book is entitled, or named, The Mirror or Glass of the Sinful Soul, wherein is contained how she[7] (beholding and contemplating what she is) doth perceive how of herself and of her own strength she can do nothing that good is, or prevaileth for her salvation, unless it be through the grace of God, whose mother, daughter, sister, and wife by the scriptures she proveth herself to be. Trusting also that through His incomprehensible love, grace, and mercy she (being called from sin to repentance) doth faithfully hope to be saved. And although I know that as for my part which I have wrought in it (as well spiritual as manual) there is nothing done as it should be, nor else worthy to come in your grace's hands, but rather all unperfect and uncorrect, yet do I trust also that albeit it is like a work which is but new begun and shaped, that the file of your excellent wit and godly learning in the reading of it (if so it vouchsafe your highness to do) shall rub out, polish, and mend (or else cause to mend) the words (or rather the order of my writing), the which I know in many places to be rude, and nothing done as it should be. But I hope that after having been in your grace's hands there shall be nothing in it worthy of reprehension and that in the meanwhile no other (but your highness only) shall read it or see it, lest my faults be known of many. Then shall they be better excused (as my confidence is in your grace's accustomed benevolence) than if I should bestow a whole year in writing or inventing ways to excuse them.

Praying God almighty, the maker and creator of all things, to grant unto your highness this same New Year's day a lucky and prosperous year with prosperous issue and continuance of many years in good health and continual joy and all to His honour, praise, and glory.
—1548 (31 DECEMBER 1544)

---

[1] Venus' son Cupid.

[2] To Our Most … Joy This is the prefatory letter to Elizabeth's English translation of Marguerite de Navarre's Miroir de l'Ame Récheresse, given as a New Year's gift to Catherine Parr, Henry VIII's last wife.

[3] pusillanimity Lack of courage and strength of mind.

[4] the philosopher Aristotle, but the thought is proverbial.

[5] occupied Used.

[6] assay Attempt.

[7] she Marguerite de Navarre.

Speech to the House of Commons, 28 January 1563

Williams, I have heard by you the common request of my Commons,[1] which I may well term (me thinketh) the whole realm because they give, as I have heard, in all these matters of Parliament their common consent to such as be here assembled. The weight and greatness of this matter might cause in me, being a woman wanting both wit[2] and memory, some fear to speak and bashfulness besides, a thing appropriate to my sex. But yet the princely seat and kingly throne wherein God (though unworthy) hath constituted me maketh these two causes[3] to seem little in mine eyes, though grievous perhaps to your ears, and boldeneth me to say somewhat in this matter, which I mean only to touch but not presently to answer. For this so great a demand needeth both great and grave advice.

I read of a philosopher (whose deeds upon this occasion I remember better than his name) who always, when he was required to give answer in any hard question of school points, would rehearse over his alphabet before he would proceed to any further answer therein, not for that he could not presently have answered, but [so as to] have his wits the riper and better sharpened to answer the matter withal. If he, a common man, but in matters of school took such delay the better to show his eloquent tale, great cause may justly move me in this so great a matter, touching the benefit of this realm and the safety of you all, to defer mine answer till some other time, wherein I assure you the consideration of my own safety (although I thank you for the great care that you seem to have thereof) shall be little in comparison of that great regard that I mean to have of the safety and surety of you all.

And though God of late seemed to touch me rather like one that he chastised than one that he punished, and though death possessed almost every joint of me,[4] so I wished then that the feeble thread of life, which lasted methought all too long, might by Clotho's hand[5] have quietly been cut off; yet desired I not then life (as I have some witnesses here) so much for mine own safety as for yours. For I knew that in exchanging of this reign I should have enjoyed a better reign, where residence is perpetual.[6]

There needs no boding of my bane.[7] I know now as well as I did before that I am mortal. I know also that I must seek to discharge myself of that great burden that God hath laid upon me, for of them to whom much is committed, much is required.[8] Think not that I, that in other matters have had convenient[9] care of you all, will in this matter touching the safety of myself and you all be careless. For I know that this matter toucheth me much nearer than it doth you all, who, if the worst happen, can lose but your bodies. But if I take not the convenient care that it behooveth me to have therein, I hazard to lose both body and soul.

And though I am determined in this so great and weighty a matter to defer mine answer till some other time because I will not in so deep a matter wade with so shallow a wit, yet have I thought good to use these few words as well to show you that I am neither careless nor unmindful of your safety in this case, as I trust you likewise do not forget that by me you were delivered whilst you were hanging on the bough ready to fall into

---

[1] Williams … Commons This speech was a response by the Queen to a petition from the House of Commons that she marry; Parliament petitioned her in this way numerous times, including in 1559 (see the online component of this anthology), 1566 (see below), and 1576. Thomas Williams (1513?–66) served as Speaker of the House of Commons from 1563 to 1566.

[2] wanting both wit Lacking both intelligence.

[3] two causes Elizabeth I marrying, and the issue of succession. The latter was not only a matter of whether or not Elizabeth would herself have children; Parliament also wanted her to set out a clear order of succession in the event that she died without producing an heir.

[4] death possessed … of me Elizabeth had been seriously ill with smallpox a few months before.

[5] Clotho's hand Daughter of Zeus and Themis, Clotho is a mythical figure said to control fate.

[6] that in exchanging … perpetual I.e., that in giving up my reign here on earth I would enjoy the reign of God in heaven, where there is eternal life.

[7] There needs no boding of my bane There is no need to prophesy my demise and death.

[8] for of them … much is required See Luke 12.48.

[9] convenient Appropriate or befitting.

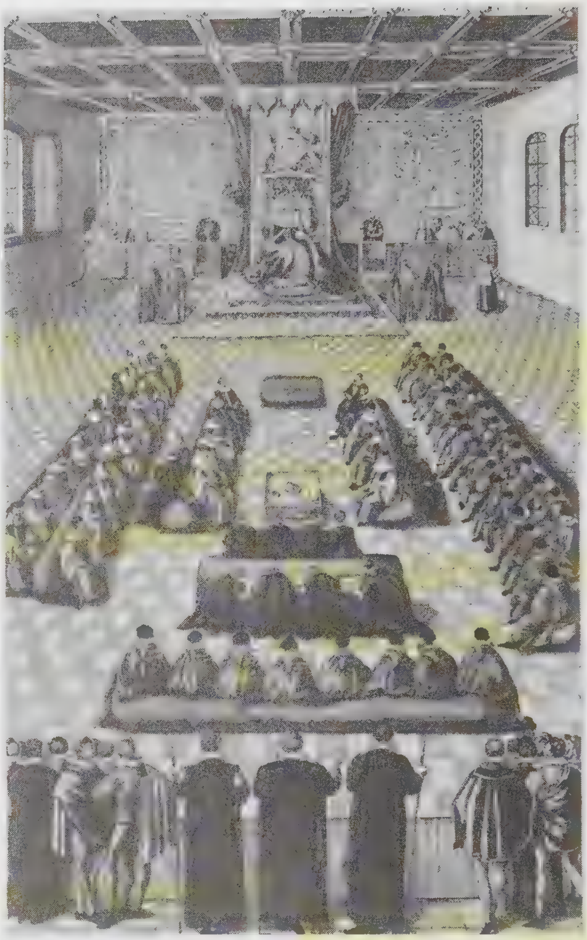
Attributed to William Scrots, painting of young Elizabeth I, c.1546–47. Elizabeth was a young teenager when this portrait was painted. It may initially have been intended as a gift for her father, who died early in 1547, but written records list it as belonging to her half-brother, King Edward VI.



Renold Elstracke, engraving of Elizabeth I presiding over the opening of parliament, from Nobilitas politica vel civilis by Robert Glover, 1608.

the mud—yea to be drowned in the dung;[1] neither yet the promise which you have here made concerning your duties and due obedience (wherewith I assure you, I mean to charge you), as further to let you understand that I neither mislike any of your requests herein nor the great care that you seem to have of the surety and safety of your help in this matter.

Lastly, because I will discharge[2] some restless heads in whose brains the needless hammers beat with vain[3] judgment that I should mislike this their petition, I say that of the matter and sum thereof I like and allow very well. As to the circumstances, if any be, I mean upon further advice further to answer. And so I assure you all that, though after my death you may have many stepdames,[4] yet shall you never have any a more[5] mother than I mean to be unto you all.

—28 JANUARY 1563

---

you were hanging ... in the dung Reference to the distressed condition of England (a weak economy, a weak military position, debilitating religious conflicts) during Mary I's reign.

discharge Relieve the anxieties of.

vain Empty, foolish.

[4] stepdames Stepmothers.

[5] any a more Anyone be more of a.

from Speech to a Parliamentary Delegation, 5 November 1566[1] [transcript from memory by one in attendance]

…[T]wo bishops, with their long orations, sought to persuade you, also with solemn matter, as though you, my lords, had not known that … dying without issue—what a danger it were to the whole state.…

Was I not born in the realm? Were my parents born in any foreign country? Is not my kingdom here? Whom have I oppressed? Whom have I enriched to others' harm? What turmoil have I made in this commonwealth that I should be suspected to have no regard to the same? How have I governed since my reign [began]? …

Well, the matter whereof they would have made their petition (as I am informed) consisteth in two points: in my marriage, and in the limitations of the succession of the crown, wherein my marriage was first placed, as for manners' sake. I did send them answer by my council [that] I would marry, although of mine own disposition I was not inclined thereunto. But that was not accepted nor credited.… And therefore I say again, I will marry as soon as I can conveniently,[2] if God take not him away with whom I mind to marry, or myself, or else some other great let happen.[3] I can say no more except the party were present.[4] And I hope to have children; otherwise I would never marry.…

The second point was for the limitation of the succession of the crown, wherein was nothing said for my safety, but only for themselves. A strange thing that the foot should direct the head in so weighty a cause.… I have conferred with those that are well learned, and have asked their opinions touching the limitation of succession.… They would have twelve or fourteen limited in succession and the more the better. And those shall be of such uprightness and so divine, as in them shall be divinity itself. Kings were wont to honour philosophers, but if I had such I would honour them as angels that should have such piety in them that they would not seek where they are the second to be the first, and where the third to be the second and so forth. It is said I am no divine. Indeed,[5] I studied nothing else but divinity till I came to the crown; and then I gave myself to the study of that which was meet[6] for government, and am not ignorant of stories wherein appeareth what hath fallen out for ambition of kingdoms—as in Spain, Naples, Portugal and at home; and what cocking hath been between the father and the son for the same. You would have a limitation of succession. Truly if reason did not subdue will in me, I would cause you to deal in it, so pleasant a thing it should be unto me. But I stay it for your benefit.…

I do not marvel [that certain bishops who were part of the delegation] … did so use themselves therein, since after my brother's death they openly preached and set forth that my sister and I were bastards. Well, I wish not the death of any man, but only this I desire, that they which have been the practisers herein may before their deaths repent the same, and show some open confession of their fault, whereby the scabbed sheep may be known from the whole. As for my own part I care not for death, for all men are mortal; and though I be a woman yet I have as good a courage answerable to my place as ever my father had. I am your anointed Queen. I will never be by violence constrained to do anything. I thank God I am indeed endowed with such qualities that if I were turned out of the realm in my petticoat I were able to live in any place in Christendom.

---

[1] Speech … 1566 Unlike her responses to the 1559 and 1563 Parliamentary petitions that she marry (see above), this 1566 response was to a delegation of 30 Lords and 30 members of the House of Commons. Elizabeth's tone is here much sharper than in the earlier responses. The transcriber is believed to have been a Member of Parliament who was part of the delegation; he declares in his preamble that this "followeth as I could carry away by remembrance." A very short fragment of a different version of the speech (in Elizabeth's own hand) has also come down to us.

[2] conveniently In a suitable way.

[3] let happen Hindrance occur.

[4] except the party were present Without the presence of the other person. (At the time, negotiations were underway regarding a possible marriage between Elizabeth and the Archduke Charles of Austria.)

[5] Indeed In point of fact. Elizabeth's claim here is not without foundation; she was the translator of several religious works.

[6] meet Fitting.

Attributed to Nicholas Hilliard, Queen Elizabeth I, c. 1575. In this painting, widely known as the "Phoenix Portrait," Elizabeth wears on her chest a medallion in the shape of a phoenix, a symbol she often incorporated into her jewelry and her portraits. The phoenix is a mythological bird that lives many centuries, then is consumed by fire and reborn from its own ashes; in the early modern period, it carried a wide range of connotations, including eternal life, chastity, beauty, and the rebirth of Christ. In a similar portrait painted around the same time, Elizabeth is also depicted wearing a medallion in the form of a pelican, a symbol connoting Christ's Passion, motherhood, and self-sacrifice.

Quentin Metsys the Younger, Elizabeth I (Sieve Portrait), 1583. This is one of several portraits that show the queen holding a sieve, probably in allusion to the classical story of the Vestal Virgin Tuccia, who miraculously carried water in a sieve to refute a false allegation against her chastity. Scholars such as Karen Green posit an alternative meaning for the sieve as a symbol of prudence, suggestive of a capacity to "sift" right from wrong. Metsys's painting also includes a column and a globe—imperial symbols that recur frequently in Elizabeth's portraiture—and the queen wears pearls, another symbol of virginity. The engravings on the column depict the story of Dido and Aeneas, in which Aeneas abandons his lover, Dido, to pursue his destiny as a founder of Rome; the implication is that, like Aeneas, Elizabeth will choose political achievement over married life.

Your petition is to deal in the limitation of the succession. At this present it is not convenient, nor never shall be without some peril unto you, and certain danger unto me. But as soon as there may be a convenient time and that it may be done with least peril unto you, although never without great danger unto me, I will deal therein for your safety and offer it unto you as your prince and head without requests. For it is monstrous that the feet should direct the head.

And therefore, this is my mind and answer, which I would have to be showed to the two Houses, and for the doing hereof, you, my lord chief justice, are meetest[1] to do it in the Upper House, and you, Lord Cecil, in the nether house.

—1566

from Speech to Parliament, 29 March 1586[2]

My lords and ye of the lower house, ... No prince[3] herein, I confess, can be surer tied or faster bound than I am with the link of your goodwill, ... Yet one matter touches me so near as I may not overskip; religion is the ground on which all other matters ought to take root, and being corrupted may mar all the tree; and that there be some fault finders with the order of the clergy, which so may make a slander to myself and the Church whose overruler God hath made me, whose negligence cannot be excused if any schisms or errors heretical were suffered. Thus much I must say that some faults and negligence may grow and be, as in all other great charges it happeneth; and what vocation without? All which if you, my Lords of the clergy,[4] do not amend, I mean to depose you. Look ye therefore well to your charges. I am supposed to have many studies, but most philosophical. I must yield this to be true, that I suppose few that be no professors have read more. And I need not tell you that I am so simple that I understand not, nor so forgetful that I remember not. And yet amidst so many volumes I hope God's book hath not been my seldomest lectures; in which we find that which by reason, for my part, we ought to believe—that seeing so great wickedness and griefs in the world in which we live but as wayfaring pilgrims, we must suppose that God would never have made us but for a better place and of more comfort than we find here. I know no creature that breatheth whose life standeth hourly in more peril for it than mine own; who entered not into my state without sight of manifold dangers of life and crown, as one that had the mightiest and the greatest to wrestle with. Then it followeth that I regarded it so much as I left myself behind my care. And so you see that you wrong me too much if any such there be as doubt my coldness in that behalf. For if I were not persuaded that mine were the true way of God's will, God forbid I should live to prescribe it to you. Take you heed lest Ecclesiastes say not too true; they that fear the hoary frost the snow shall fall upon them.[5]

I see many overbold with God Almighty making too many subtle scannings of His blessed will, as lawyers do with human testaments. The presumption is so great, as I may not suffer it. Yet mind I not hereby to animate Romanists (which what adversaries they be to mine estate is sufficiently well known) nor tolerate newfangledness. I mean to guide them both by God's holy true rule. In both parts be perils. And of the latter I must pronounce them dangerous to a kingly rule: to have every man according to his own censure, to make a doom[6] of a validity and privity of his Prince's government with a common veil and cover of God's word, whose followers must not be judged, but by private men's exposition. God defend you from such a ruler that so evil will guide you. Now I conclude that your love and care neither is nor

---

[1] meetest Most appropriate.

[2] Speech ... 1586 The parliament of 1584–86 was summoned after the discovery of a plot to assassinate Elizabeth and establish Mary on the throne. This parliament devoted itself largely to measures designed to shore up religious observance (including enforcing stricter observance of the Sabbath) and to curb abuses among members of the clergy. Elizabeth, desiring to maintain the delicate religious balance she had established in the realm, declared herself "greatly aggrieved" that Parliament was concerning itself to such a degree with religious matters. In this following speech (which closed the parliamentary session) she expresses that view to both houses of Parliament.

[3] prince Elizabeth often used the words "queen," king," and "prince" interchangeably.

[4] my Lords of the clergy I.e., those members of the House of Lords who are also bishops.

[5] they that ... upon them This quotation is in fact from Job 6.16.

[6] doom Judgment.

shall be bestowed upon a careless Prince, but such as but for your good will passeth[1] as little for this world as who careth least. With thanks for your free subsidy,[2] a manifest show of the abundance of your good wills, the which I assure you, but to be employed to your weal, I could be better pleased to return than receive.
—29 MARCH 1586

Elizabeth and Mary, Queen of Scots

Mary, Queen of Scots (not to be confused with Mary I, Queen of England) was considered a rival to Elizabeth; many Catholics regarded her as the legitimate heir to the English throne held by Elizabeth, and there was a long history of conflict between the two. For an overview of the conflict and of Mary's life, see the author entry for Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots elsewhere in this volume.

from Letter from Elizabeth I to Mary, Queen of Scots, 24 February 1567

Madame:

My ears have been so deafened and my understanding so grieved and my heart so affrighted to hear the dreadful news of the abominable murder of your mad husband and my killed cousin that I scarcely yet have the wits to write about it.[3] And inasmuch as my nature compels me to take his death in the extreme, he being so close in blood, so it is that I will boldly tell you what I think of it. I cannot dissemble that I am more sorrowful for you than for him. O madame, I would not do the office of faithful cousin or affectionate friend if I studied rather to please your ears than employed myself in preserving your honour. However, I will not at all dissemble what most people are talking about: which is that you will look through your fingers at the revenging of this deed, and that you do not take measures that touch those who have done as you wished, as if the thing had been entrusted in a way that the murderers felt assurance in doing it. Among the thoughts in my heart I beseech you to want no such touch to stick at this point. Through all the dealings of the world I never was in such miserable haste to lodge and have in my heart such a miserable opinion of any prince as this would cause me do. Much less will I have such of her to whom I wish as much good as my heart is able to imagine or as you were able a short while ago to wish. However, I exhort you, I counsel you, and I beseech you to take this thing so much to heart that you will not fear to touch even him whom you have nearest to you if the thing touches him,[4] and that no persuasion will prevent you from making an example out of this to the world: that you are both a noble princess and a loyal wife. I do not write so vehemently out of doubt that I have, but out of the affection that I bear you in particular. For I am not ignorant that you have no wiser counselors than myself. Thus it is that, when I remember that our Lord had one Judas out of twelve, and I assure myself that there could be no one more loyal than myself, I offer you my affection in place of this prudence.

[Here Elizabeth writes briefly about a longstanding dispute over the Treaty of Edinburgh.] … About other matters I will not trouble you with a longer letter except to put you in contact with this gentleman and to thank you by messenger for your good letters, which were and are very agreeable coming from your hands. Praying the Creator to give you the grace to recognize this traitor and protect yourself from him as from the ministers of Satan, with my very heartfelt recommendations to you, very dear sister. From Westminster February 24.

---

[1] passeth Cares.

[2] subsidy Quantity of funds given by Parliament toward the monarchy's expenses.

[3] dreadful news … about it Elizabeth had been informed of the murder of Henry Stuart (Lord Darnley), husband of Mary, Queen of Scots and second cousin to Elizabeth.

[4] even him … touches him Mary was close to (and later married) James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, who was later discovered to have been among those who conspired to murder Lord Darnley; as this letter suggests, Elizabeth already suspected he was involved.

Letter from Elizabeth I to Mary, Queen of Scots, 12 October 1586

To Mary, Queen of Scots,

12 October 1586[1]

You have in various ways and manners attempted to take my life and to bring my kingdom to destruction by bloodshed. I have never proceeded so harshly against you, but have, on the contrary, protected and maintained you like myself. These treasons will be proved to you and all made manifest. Yet it is my will, that you answer the nobles and peers of the kingdom as if I were myself present. I therefore require, charge, and command that you make answer for I have been well informed of your arrogance.

Act plainly without reserve, and you will sooner be able to obtain favour of me.

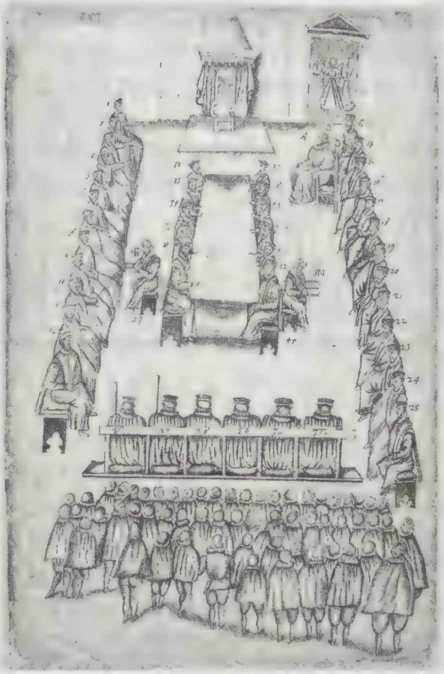
Elizabeth

Letter from Mary, Queen of Scots to Henry III, 8 February 1587

Queen of Scotland

8 February 1587[2]

Royal brother,[3] having by God's will, for my sins I think, thrown myself into the power of the Queen my cousin, at whose hands I have suffered much for almost twenty years, I have finally been condemned to death by her and her Estates. I have asked for my papers, which they have taken away, in order that I might make my will, but I have been unable to recover anything of use to me, or even get leave either to make my will freely or to have my body conveyed after my death, as I would wish, to your kingdom where I had the honour to be queen, your sister and old ally.



Sketch of the trial of Mary, Queen of Scots, 1586. This sketch, included in the trial records kept by Robert Beale, Clerk of the Privy Council, shows Mary standing trial in the Great Chamber of Fotheringhay Castle. The sketch shows Mary entering the room in the top right corner; she can be seen again, seated for trial, in the chair immediately below the room's entrance. Seated throughout the room are the thirty-six commissioners who conducted the trial and decided its verdict. As Elizabeth's empty chair in the top center of the room indicates, she was not present at the proceedings.

Tonight, after dinner, I have been advised of my sentence: I am to be executed like a criminal at eight in the morning. I have not had time to give you a full account of everything that has happened, but if you will listen to my doctor and my other unfortunate servants, you will learn the truth, and how, thanks be to God, I scorn death and vow that I meet it innocent of any crime, even if I were their subject. The Catholic faith and the assertion of my God-given right to the English crown are the two issues on which I am condemned, and yet I am not allowed to say that it is for the Catholic religion that I die, but for fear of interference with theirs. The proof of this is that they have taken away my chaplain, and although he is in the building, I have not been able to get permission for him to come and hear my confession and give me the last sacrament, while they have been most insistent that I receive the consolation and instruction of their minister, brought here for that purpose. The bearer of this letter and his companions, most of them your subjects, will testify to my conduct at my last hour. It remains for me to beg Your Most Christian Majesty, my brother-in-law and old ally, who have always protested your love for me, to give proof now of your goodness on all these points: firstly by charity, in paying my unfortunate servants the wages due them—this is a burden on my conscience that only you can relieve: further, by having prayers offered to God for a queen who has borne the title Most Christian, and who dies a Catholic, stripped of all her possessions. As for my son, I commend him to you in so far as he deserves, for I cannot answer for him. I have taken the liberty of sending you two precious stones, talismans against illness, trusting that you will enjoy good health and a long and happy life. Accept them from your loving sister-in-law, who, as she dies, bears witness of her warm feeling for you. Again I commend my servants to you. Give instructions, if it please you, that for my soul's sake part of what you owe me should be paid, and that for the sake of Jesus Christ, to whom I shall pray for you tomorrow as I die, I be left enough to found a memorial mass and give the customary alms.

---

[1] 12 October 1586 This letter was written in the days immediately before Mary's trial; she had refused to appear before the court, claiming that as a foreign queen she could not be tried for treason in England.

[2] 8 February 1587 The date of Mary's execution.

[3] Royal brother Henri III of France (1551–89), the brother of Mary's first husband, Francis II (1544–60).

Wednesday, at two in the morning.

Your most loving and most true sister,

Mari R

Letter from Elizabeth I to James VI, 14 February 1587

14 February 1587

My dear Brother,

I would you knew, though not felt, the extreme dolor that overwhelms my mind, for that miserable accident[1] which far contrary to my meaning hath befallen. I have now sent this kinsman of mine,[2] whom ere now it hath pleased you to favour, to instruct you truly of that which is too irksome for my pen to tell you. I beseech you that, as God and many more know how innocent I am in this case, so you will believe me, that if I had bid aught I would have bid by it. I am not so base minded that fear of any living creature or prince should make me so afraid to do that were just or, done, to deny the same. I am not of so base a lineage, nor carry so vile a mind; but, as not to disguise fits most a king, so will I never dissemble my actions but cause them show even as I meant them. Thus assuring yourself of me that, as I know this was deserved, yet if I had meant it I would never lay it on others' shoulders, no more will I not damnify myself that thought[3] it not. The circumstance it may please you to have of this bearer. And for your part, think you have not in the world a more loving kinswoman nor a more dear friend than myself; nor any that will watch more carefully to preserve you and your estate. And who shall otherwise persuade you, judge them more partial to others than you. And thus in haste I leave to trouble you, beseeching God to send you a long reign. The 14 of February, 1587.

Your most assured, loving sister and cousin,

Elizabeth R.

---

[1] that miserable accident I.e., the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots.

[2] kinsman of mine Robert Carey, 1st Earl of Monmouth (1560?–1639), Elizabeth's first cousin once removed.

[3] thought Determined.

To the Troops at Tilbury[1]

My loving people, we have been persuaded by some that are careful of our safety to take heed how we commit ourself to armed multitudes for fear of treachery, but I assure you, I do not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear. I have always so behaved myself that under God I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and good will of my subjects. And therefore I am come amongst you as you see at this time not for my recreation and disport, but being resolved in the midst and heat of the battle to live or die amongst you all, to lay down for God and for my kingdom and for my people my honour and my blood even in the dust. I know I have the body of a weak and feeble woman, but I have the heart and stomach of a king, and of a king of England too, and think foul scorn that Parma[2] or Spain or any prince of Europe should dare invade the borders of my realm, to which, rather than any dishonour shall grow by me, I myself will take up arms; I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field. I know already for your forwardness you have deserved rewards and crowns, and we do assure you in the word of a prince, they shall be duly paid you.

In the meantime my lieutenant-general[3] shall be in my stead, than whom never prince commanded a more noble or worthy subject. Not doubting but by your obedience to my general, by your concord in the camp and your valour in the field, we shall shortly have a famous victory over these enemies of God, of my kingdom, and of my people.

—1588

Two Letters from Elizabeth to Catherine de Bourbon, Sister of Henri IV of France[4]

Madame,

If my paper had the color of my heart, I would not dare to show it to you, the color black suiting too ill with the young. It is, I thank God, in no way for myself that I feel regret, but for him[5] for whom I wish the greatest good, [and] upon whom I see so many misfortunes fall that I feel them too much to [want to] be part of them. And in response to your desire to be able to serve me in place of [or perhaps "close to"] the king your brother, nothing you could do for me would so please me as to purchase for him so much honor and security that whatever harm he has wished to do to himself may not crush him through his forgetting the care of those of the true religion[6] who for so many years have consumed their means [and] poured out their blood to safeguard his cause. Not only does he owe this in good conscience, policy of state invites him to it, which is so uncertainly grounded on marshlands that he needs to grasp some very strong poles to get himself out. Remind him, Madam my good sister, in God's honor, that he must keep so much reputation even among his enemies that at no price should he abandon those devoted to him just to please wickedness. Rest assured that if you do this you will oblige me to remain

Your most faithful sister. ER.

—1593 (AUGUST 25)

---

[1] To the Troops at Tilbury In July 1588, the Spanish Armada sailed toward England intending to invade. As the Armada entered the English Channel it was attacked by an English fleet led by Sir Francis Drake. Although at this point in the fighting the Spanish ships had been dissipated, there were fears they would regroup; as preparations continued at Tilbury, one observer noted that Elizabeth "rode through all the squadrons of her army as armed Pallas attended by noble footmen" before she gave this speech.

[2] Parma Duke of Parma, who was regent of the Spanish Netherlands at the time.

[3] lieutenant-general Robert Dudley, the Earl of Leicester and Elizabeth's favorite, who would die a few months later.

[4] Henri IV of France Henri de Navarre became Henri IV, King of France, upon the assassination in 1589 of his childless cousin, Henri III. Because Navarre was the leader of the Huguenot (Protestant) side in a three-sided civil war among supporters of Henri III, Huguenots, and ultra-papist supporters of the Duc de Guise, his accession merely led to further fighting. To prevent more bloodshed and to strengthen his position, Navarre announced his conversion to Catholicism in the summer of 1593; his sincerity has been doubted, but perhaps unjustly, and there is in fact no firm evidence that he ever said "Paris is worth a mass." His conversion had been widely anticipated, but after hearing the news Elizabeth wrote to him in an anguish of reproach, making sure that the letter circulated widely. A little later she also wrote Henri's still Protestant sister, Catherine. Catherine was herself an experienced politician, having at times served her brother as regent in his ancestral domains.

[5] him Henri IV.

[6] those of the true religion Huguenots.

Madam,

As I am sending this gentleman[1] to the King, I have been unable to restrain my pen from revealing to you one of the urgent reasons for sending him at once: he must serve as tablets to remind him[2] of the important reasons why he must have consideration for those of the Religion,[3] not only for the danger to their lives, bodies, and goods when he was not too near his [current] dignity to reward them for it, but for his own salvation and the firm maintenance of his state. For if his enemies see him even slightly leaning on them, they make sport of him, knowing he has lost all other hope. Behold here, Madame, my boldness in minding somebody else's business: if this is a sin, I merit pardon for acknowledging it. Nevertheless, I beg you to add your urging [to mine]. And rest assured always to have in me

Your most faithful sister. ER.

—1593 (NOVEMBER)

Letter from Elizabeth I to Essex in Ireland,[4] 19 July 1599

19 July 1599

We have perceived by your letters to our council brought by Henry Carey[5] that you are arrived at Dublin after your journey into Munster, where though it seemeth by the words of your letter that you had spent divers days in taking an account of all that have passed since you left that place, yet have you in this dispatch given us small light either when or in what order you intend particularly to proceed to the northern action. Wherein, if you compare the time that is run on and the excessive charges that is spent with the effects of anything wrought by this voyage (howsoever we may remain satisfied with your own particular cares and travails of body and mind), yet you must needs think that we that have the eyes of foreign princes upon our actions and have the hearts of people to comfort and cherish—who groan under the burden of continual levies and impositions which are occasioned by these late actions—can little please ourself hitherto with anything that hath been effected.

For what can be more true (if things be rightly examined) than that your two months' journey hath brought in never a capital rebel against whom it had been worthy to have adventured one thousand men; for of their two coming-in that were brought unto you by Ormond[6] (namely Mountgarrett and Cahir[7]), whereupon ensued the taking of Cahir Castle, full well do we know that you would long since have scorned to have allowed it for any great matter in others to have taken an Irish hold from a rabble of rogues[8] with such forces as you had and with the help of the cannon, which were always able in Ireland to make his passage where it pleased. And therefore, more than that, you have now learned upon our expenses, by knowledge of the country, that those things are true which we have heretofore told you. If you would have believed us, how far different things would prove from your expectations! There is little public benefit made to us of any things happened in this action which the president[1] with any convenient addition to his numbers by you might not have effected, either now or hereafter, in a time more seasonable, when it should less have hindered the other enterprise on which depends our greatest expectation.

---

[1] gentleman Presumably a messenger or diplomat.

[2] him I.e., Henri.

[3] those of the Religion Huguenots.

[4] Letter ... in Ireland Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex (1565–1601), a favorite of Elizabeth, had been commissioned by the queen to put an end to the ongoing rebellion in Ireland. Essex set off in 1599 with an army of 16,000—the largest army England had ever sent to Ireland—but would return to London later that year after a string of military failures. Essex disregarded many of Elizabeth's directions while in Ireland; this, and what she and many others perceived as his mismanagement of the military forces, would result in his complete loss of her favor upon his return.

The rebellion, also known as The Nine Years' War, was led by Hugh O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone (1550–1616) and took place largely in the northern province of Ulster. It began in 1594 and ended in 1603 with the defeat of the Irish forces; it was followed by the colonization of Ulster by the English under James I.

[5] Henry Carey Brother of George Carey, 2nd Baron of Hunsdon (1547–1603), Elizabeth's Lord Chamberlain, and son of Henry Carey, 1st Baron of Hunsdon (1526–96), Elizabeth's previous Lord Chamberlain and first cousin.

[6] Ormond Thomas Butler, 10th Earl of Ormond (1531–1614), Lord Treasurer of Ireland and cousin to Elizabeth I.

[7] Mountgarrett and Cahir Richard Butler, 3rd Viscount Mountgarrett (1578–1651) and Thomas Butler, 2nd Baron of Cahir (1568–1626/27).

[8] taking of Cahir Castle ... rogues The siege of Cahir Castle, considered one of Ireland's strongest fortresses, was Essex's major success in Ireland; Elizabeth here suggests that he presented it as a greater achievement than it was.

Whereas we will add this one thing that doth more displease us than any charge or expense that happens, which is that it must be the Queen of England's fortune (who hath holden down the greatest enemy she had) to make a base bush kern[2] to be accounted so famous a rebel as to be a person against whom so many thousands of foot and horse, besides the force of all the nobility of that kingdom, must be thought too little to be employed. For we must now remember unto you that our cousin of Ormond, by his own relation when you arrived, assured us that he had delivered you a charge of a kingdom without either town maritime, or island, or hold possessed by traitors. But we did ever think that Tyrone would please himself to see such a portion of our fair army, and led by the person of our general, to be harassed out and adventured in encountering those base rogues who were no way strengthened by foreign armies, but only by such of his offal[3] as he was content to spare and let slip from himself, whiles he hath lived at his pleasure, hath spoiled all where our army should come, and preserved for himself what he thought necessary. Little do you know how he hath blazed in foreign parts the defeats of regiments, the death of captains, and loss of men of quality in every corner, and how little he seemeth to value their power who use it so as it is like to spend itself!

It is therefore apparent that all places require not one and the selfsame knowledge, and that drafts and surprises would have found better successes than public and notorious marches, though where the rebel attends you with greater forces, it is necessary that you carry our army in the form you use. But it doth sound hardly in the ears of the world that, in a time when there is a question to save a kingdom and in a country where experience giveth so great advantage to all enterprises, regiments should be committed to young gentlemen that rather desire to do well than know how to perform it,[4] a matter wherein we must note that you have made both us and our council so great strangers as to this day we know but by reports who they be that spend our treasure and carry places of note in our army. Wherein you know we did by our instructions direct you as soon as you should be arrived, seeing you used reasons why it could not be done so conveniently beforehand.

These things we would pass over but that we see your pen flatters you with phrases—that here you are deceived, that you are disgraced from hence in your friends' fortune, that poor Ireland suffers in you—still exclaiming against the effects of your own causes. For if it be not enough that you have all and more than that which was agreed on before you when concerning public service, but that you must by your voluntary actions there in particular things (which you know full well are contrary to our will and liking) raise an opinion that there is any person that dare displease us, either by experience of our former toleration or with a conceit to avoid blame by distinctions, then must we not hide from you, how much soever we do esteem you for those good things which are in you, but that our honour hath dwelt too long with us to leave the point now uncleared that, whosoever it be that you do clad with any honour or place (wherein the world may read the least suspicion of neglect or contempt of our commands),[5] we will never make dainty to set on such shadows as shall quickly eclipse any of these lusters.

And therefore, although by your letter we found your purpose to go northward, on which depends the main good of our service and which we expected long since should have been performed, yet because we do hear it bruited[6] (besides the words of your letter written with your own hand, which carries some such sense) that you who allege such weakness in our army by being travelled with you and find so great and importunate[1] affairs to digest at Dublin, will yet engage yourself personally in Offlay,[2] being our lieutenant, when you have there so many inferiors able enough to victual a fort or seek revenge of these that have lately prospered against our forces. And when we call to mind how far the sun hath run his course, what dependeth upon the timely plantation of garrisons in the north, and how great a scandal it would be to our honour to leave that proud rebel unassaulted when we have with so great an expectation of our enemies engaged ourself so far in this action, so as without that be done, all these former courses will prove like via navis in mare,[3] besides that our power, which hitherto hath been dreaded by potent enemies, will now even be held contemptible amongst our rebels, we must now plainly charge you, according to the duty you owe us, so to unite soundness of judgment to the zeal you have to do us service, and with all speed to pass thither in such order as the axe may be put to the root of that tree which hath been the treasonable stock from whence so many poisoned plants and grafts have been derived. By which proceedings of yours we may neither have cause to repent our employment of yourself for omitting these opportunities to shorten the war, nor receive in the eye of the world imputation of too much weakness in ourself to being a work without better foresight.

---

[1] president Sir Thomas Norris (1556–99), Lord President of Munster in Ireland, who had not been very successful in his military attempts to counter the rebellion.

[2] base bush kern Low Irish foot-soldier, here referring to the earl of Tyrone.

[3] offal Cast-offs, dregs.

[4] regiments … perform it Elizabeth disapproved of several key appointments Essex had made in Ireland, including those of Marshal and of General of the Horse.

[5] clad with … commands Essex knighted more than fifty people during the campaign, in defiance of Elizabeth I's orders.

[6] bruited Rumored.

What would be the end of our excessive charge, the adventure of our people's lives, and the holding-up of our own greatness against a wretch whom we have raised from the dust and who could never prosper if the charges we have been put to were orderly employed? For the matter of Southampton,[4] it is strange to us that his continuance or displacing should work so great an alteration either in yourself (valuing our commandments as you ought) or in the disposition of our army, where all the commanders cannot be ignorant that we not only not allowed of your desire to him, but did expressly forbid it. And being such a one whose counsel can be of so little and experience of less use, yea, such a one as, were he not lately fastened to yourself by an accident wherein for our usage of yours we deserve thanks, you would have used many of your old, lively arguments against him for any such ability or commandment. It is therefore strange to us that, we knowing his worth by your report and you our disposition from ourself in this point, will dare thus to value your own pleasing in things unnecessary, and think by your private arguments to carry for your own glory a matter wherein our pleasure to the contrary is made notorious. And where you say further that divers or the most of the voluntary gentlemen are so discouraged thereby as they begin to desire passports and prepare to return, we cannot as yet be persuaded but that the love of our service and the duty which they owe us have been as strong motives to these their travails and hazards as any affection to the Earl of Southampton or any other. If it prove otherwise, which we will not so much wrong as to suspect, we shall have the less cause either to acknowledge or reward it.

At the Court of Greenwich, the nineteenth of July, 1599.

—1599

The Golden Speech[5]

Mr. Speaker,[6] we have heard your declaration and perceive your care of our state, by falling into the consideration of a grateful acknowledgement of such benefits as you have received, and that your coming is to present thanks unto us, which I accept with no less joy than your loves can have desire to offer such a present.

---

[1] importunate Demanding.

[2] Offlay County in central Ireland.

[3] via navis in mare Latin: the way of a ship in the sea; i.e., as it passes out of sight.

[4] Southampton Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton (1573–1624), whom Essex had appointed General of the Horse despite the queen's vehement disapproval of him. Elizabeth directed Essex to dismiss him, but Essex initially refused; he would, however, cancel the appointment a week after she wrote this letter.

[5] The Golden Speech This text is based on a transcription by one of the members of parliament, Hayward Townshend. This parliamentary speech was Elizabeth's most celebrated, and in it she states her recognition of the people's right—and even duty—to raise grievances over royal policies. Here, Elizabeth addresses grievances raised over monopolies, which, because they favored certain individuals, were often economically detrimental to many.

[6] Mr. Speaker The speaker of the house at the time was Sir John Croke (1553–1620).

I do assure you that there is no prince that loveth his subjects better, or whose love can countervail[1] our love. There is no jewel, be it of never so rich a price, which I prefer before this jewel—I mean your love—for I do more esteem it than any treasure or riches: for that we know how to prize, but love and thanks I count inestimable. And though God has raised me high, yet this I count the glory of my crown: that I have reigned with your loves. This makes me that I do not so much rejoice that God hath made me to be a queen, as to be a queen over so thankful a people. Therefore I have cause to wish nothing more than to content the subjects, and that is a duty which I owe. Neither do I desire to live longer days than that I may see your prosperity, and that is my only desire. And as I am that person that still yet under God hath delivered you, so I trust by the almighty power of God that I still shall be His instrument to preserve you from envy, peril, dishonour, shame, tyranny, and oppression, partly by means of your intended helps, which we take very acceptably, because it manifests the largeness of your loves and loyalties unto your sovereign.

Of myself I must say this: I never was any greedy, scraping grasper, nor a strait,[2] fast-holding prince, nor yet a waster; my heart was never set on worldly goods, but only for my subjects' good. What you do bestow on me I will not hoard up, but receive it to bestow on you again. Yea, mine own properties I account yours, to be expended for your good. Therefore render unto them, I beseech you, Mr. Speaker, such thanks as you imagine my heart yieldeth, but my tongue cannot express.

Mr. Speaker, I would wish you and the rest to stand up, for I shall yet trouble you with longer speech.[3]

Mr. Speaker, you give me thanks, but I doubt me[4] I have more cause to thank you all than you me: and I charge you to thank them of the Lower House[5] from me, for had I not received a knowledge from you, I might have fallen into the lapse of an error only for lack of true information.

Since I was queen, yet never did I put my pen to any grant but that upon pretext and semblance made unto me that it was both good and beneficial to the subjects in general, though a private profit to some of my ancient servants who had deserved well. But the contrary being found by experience, I am exceedingly beholding to such subjects as would move the same at first. And I am not so simple to suppose but that there be some of the Lower House whom these grievances never touched, and from them I think they speak out of zeal to their countries[6] and not out of spleen or malevolent affection, as being parties grieved. And I take it exceedingly grateful from them, because it gives us to know that no respects or interests had moved them other than the minds they bear to suffer no diminution of our honour and our subjects' love unto us, the zeal of which affection, tending to ease my people and knit their hearts unto me, I embrace with a princely care.

Far above all earthly treasure I esteem my people's love, more than which I desire not to merit. That my grants should be grievous to my people and oppressions to be privileged under colour of our patents, our kingly dignity shall not suffer it. Yea, when I heard it, I could give no rest to my thoughts until I had reformed it. Shall they think to escape unpunished that have thus oppressed you and have been respectless of their duty and regardless of our honour? No, Mr. Speaker, I assure you, were it not more for conscience' sake than for any glory or increase of love that I desire, these errors, troubles, vexations, and oppressions done by these varlets[7] and lewd persons, not worthy the name of subjects, should not escape without condign[8] punishment. But I perceive they dealt with me like physicians who, ministering a drug, make it more acceptable by giving it a good aromatical savour, or, when they give pills, do gild[9] them all over.

---

[1] countervail Equal.

[2] strait Severe, strict.

[3] Mr. Speaker … longer speech Townshend's transcription here indicates that all listeners have been kneeling so far.

[4] doubt me Do not doubt.

[5] Lower House House of Commons.

[6] countries Counties.

[7] varlets Knaves, rogues.

[8] condign Appropriate, deserved.

[9] gild Cover with gold.

I have ever used to set the last judgement day before my eyes and so to rule as I shall be judged to answer before a higher judge. To whose judgement seat I do appeal that never thought was cherished in my heart that tended not unto my people's good. And if my kingly bounty have been abused and my grants turned to the hurt of my people, contrary to my will and meaning, or if any in authority under me have neglected or perverted what I have committed to them, I hope God will not lay their culps[1] and offenses to my charge. And though there were danger in repealing our grants, yet what danger would not I rather incur for your own good, than I would suffer them still to continue?

I know the title of a king is a glorious title, but assure yourself that the shining glory of princely authority hath not so dazzled the eyes of our understanding but we well know and remember that we also are to yield an account of our actions before the great judge. To be a king and wear a crown is a thing more glorious to them that see it than it is pleasant to them that bear it. For myself, I was never so much enticed with the glorious name of a king or royal authority of a queen as delighted that God hath made me His instrument to maintain His truth and glory, and to defend this kingdom, as I said, from peril, dishonour, tyranny, and oppression.

There will never queen sit in my seat with more zeal to my country or care to my subjects, and that will sooner with willingness venture her life for your good and safety than myself. For it is not my desire to live nor reign longer than my life and reign shall be for your good. And though you have had and may have many princes more mighty and wise sitting in this seat, yet you never had or shall have any that will be more careful and loving.

Should I ascribe anything to myself and my sexly weakness, I were not worthy to live then, and of all most unworthy of the mercies I have had from God, who hath ever yet given me a heart which never yet feared foreign or home enemies. I speak it to give God the praise as a testimony before you, and not to attribute anything unto myself. For I, O Lord, what am I, whom practices and perils past should not fear? Or what can I do? That I should speak for any glory, God forbid.

This, Mr. Speaker, I pray you deliver unto the House, to whom heartily recommend me. And so I commit you all to your best fortunes and further counsels. And I pray you, Mr. Comptroller, Mr. Secretary, and you of my Council, that before these gentlemen depart into their countries, you bring them all to kiss my hand.

—30 NOVEMBER 1601

---

[1] culps Guilt, sins.

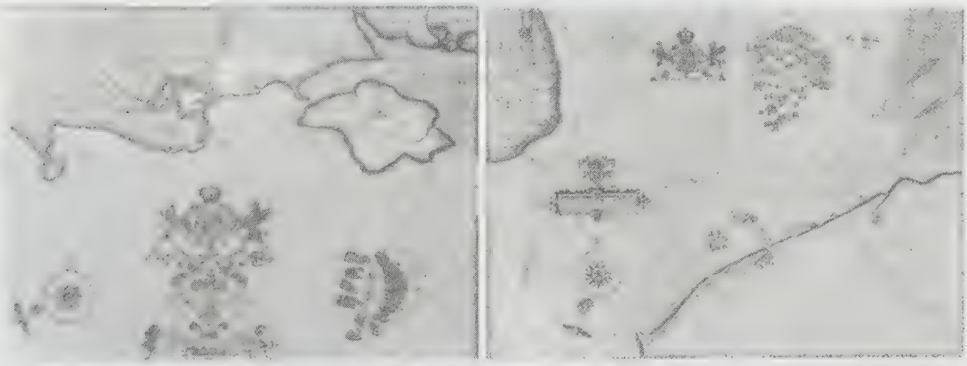
IN CONTEXT

The Defeat of the Spanish Armada

Tensions between England and Spain rose through the 1580s primarily as a result of raids on Spanish shipping and the looting of Spanish settlements in the Americas (largely by Sir Francis Drake), and religious differences between Catholic Spain and Protestant England. Finally, on 30 May 1588, Philip II of Spain launched an Armada of 130 ships, which, together with the army of Philip's nephew the Duke of Parma (then stationed across the English Channel in Flanders), was to invade and conquer England. The English fleet (under Lord Howard and Drake) of 197 smaller and more maneuverable ships engaged the Spanish in a battle that began on 29 July and extended over many days, culminating in a Spanish defeat at Gravesend and made more decisive by a gale that drove the remnants of the Spanish fleet north, up the English coast. Meanwhile an English army of 22,000 troops had gathered at Tilbury (east of London on the Thames). Under the command of Robert Dudley, the Earl of Leicester, it prepared to engage the army of the Duke of Parma—but with the defeat of the Armada was never called upon to fight. Leicester, the Queen's favorite, died of natural causes only 28 days later.



These engravings (by Augustine Ryther, based on illustrations by Robert Adams to the 1588 book Expeditionis Hispanorum), depict battles between the English fleet and the Spanish Armada on 4 August off the Isle of Wight (left) and on 8 August off Gravelines, Flanders (right).

Sir William Segar, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, c. 1583.

The Ark Royal, flagship of the English fleet, commanded by Lord Howard against the Armada in 1588.

Culture: A Portfolio

CONTEXTS

As in any period, the culture of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries was not monolithic and uniform: the "high" culture of the nobility was largely foreign to the rural laborers (although the élite was often familiar with popular culture), various cultural phenomena were peculiar to the citizens and merchants in the social class below the nobility and gentry, or to the yeomen in the social class above the laborers, and so on. It varied substantially by gender: the culture of women was different from that of men, and women were effectively excluded from participation in many activities. Culture varied too from place to place: the culture of London (and to a lesser extent that of other cities, such as Bristol and York) differed from that of the rural areas of England or that of smaller centers, and that of Scotland, of Wales, and of other regions was different again. Of necessity, then, the following can provide only limited impressions of the culture of Britain during this period.

⌘⌘⌘

Music

Over the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, home performance from printed or manuscript music began to play a much larger role in daily life than it had in earlier periods. The work of composers and musicians such as John Dowland (1563–1626), William Byrd (1539–1623), and Thomas Campion (1567–1620) was highly regarded, and their compositions, whether for stringed instruments such as the lute (in Dowland's case), or keyboard instruments such as the virginal and the harpsichord (as with Byrd) began to be printed and distributed. Among the common people music continued to play an integral part of daily life; most communities possessed shared knowledge of a body of popular song, as the excerpt below from Walton's Compleat Angler (1653) indicates.

from John Dowland, First Booke of Songs or Ayres, 1597.

The book of songs, each written for four-part singing, was printed to allow each of the four singers to face his or her own part.

PARTHENIA or
THE MAYDENHEAD of the first musicke that euer was printed for the VIRGINALLS.
COMPOSED
By three famous Masters: William Byrd, D^{r}: John Bull, & Orlando Gibbons, Gentilmen of his Ma^{tie}: most Illustrious Chappell.
Dedicated to all the Maisters and Louers of Musick Ingrauen
by William Hole.
for DORETHIE EUANS.
Cum Priuilegio.
Printed at LONDON by G: Lowe and are to be soulde at his howse in Loathberry.

Advertisement for William Byrd, Parthenia, a collection of songs by William Byrd and others, c. 1611.

from Izaak Walton, The Compleat Angler, or, The Contemplative Man's Recreation (1653)

PISCATOR.[1] I pray, do us a courtesy that shall stand you and your daughter in nothing, and yet we will think ourselves something in your debt. It is but to sing a song that was sung by your daughter when I last passed over this meadow, about eight or nine days since.

MILK-WOMAN. What song was it, pray? Was it "Come Shepherds, deck your herds"? or "As at noon Dulcina rested"? or "Phillida flouts me"? or "Chevy Chace"? or "Johnny Armstrong"? or "Troy Town"?

PISCATOR. No, it is none of those; it is a song that your daughter sung the first part, and you sung the answer to it.

MILK-WOMAN. Come, Maudlin, sing the first part to the gentleman with a merry heart; and I'll sing the second when you have done.

[The song that follows is Christopher Marlowe's "Come live with me and be my love."]

Painting

The emphasis throughout this period was on portraiture; in the sixteenth century, it was common for portraits to depict the subject's face naturalistically so as to suggest three dimensions, while the portrayal of the rest of the figure was rendered in a flatter, decorative fashion. (The portrait of Edward Alleyn below is a good example.)

Some of the best-known "English" paintings of the period were painted by leading artists from the Continent: Hans Holbein the Younger (1497–1543) became court painter to Henry VIII, and Anthony Van Dyck court painter to Charles I. Among sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century painters of English nationality, Nicholas Hilliard may have been the best known—for his Treatise Concerning the Art of Limning as well as for his miniature cameos and other portraits. ("Limning," as a later seventeenth-century definition explains, is an "Art whereby in Water Colours, we strive to resemble Nature in every thing to the life.")

The two passages ending this section present contrasting attitudes of the subjects of portraits as to how they should be painted. The quotation attributed to Oliver Cromwell is the source of the famous phrase "warts and all." (Cromwell did indeed have several warts on his face, and they are shown in the Lely portrait.)

---

[1] PISCATOR Latin: Fisher.

Rowland Lockey, copy of Hans Holbein the Younger, Sir Thomas More and His Family, detail, 1593, original c. 1527.

The original of this large portrait (the full picture includes eleven figures) is now lost; it is the first known example by a northern European artist of a large group portrait in which most of the figures are shown standing (rather than most or all being shown kneeling).

Nicholas Hilliard, A Youth Leaning Against a Tree Among Roses, c. 1590.

from Nicholas Hilliard, A Treatise Concerning the Art of Limning (1624)

I wish it were so that none should meddle with limning but gentlemen alone, for that it is a kind of gentle painting of less subjection than any other; for one may leave when he will, his colours nor his work taketh any harm by it. Moreover it is secret, a man may use it and scarcely be perceived of his own folk; it is sweet and cleanly to use, and it is a thing apart from all other painting or drawing, and tendeth not to common men's use, either for furnishing of houses or any patterns for tapestries, or building, or any other work whatsoever, and yet it excelleth all other painting whatsoever in sundry points, in giving the true lustre to pearl and precious stone, and worketh the metals gold or silver with themselves, which so enricheth and ennobleth the work that it seemeth to be the thing itself.

from A Letter to F.P. Verney from the Countess of Sussex (1639)

Sweet Mr. Verney, the picture came very well, many hearty thanks to you for it. The frame is a little hurt, the gilt being rubbed off. The picture is very ill favoured, makes me quite out of love with myself, the face is so big and so fat that it pleases me not at all. It looks like one of the winds puffing—but truly I think it is like the original. If ever I come to London before Sir Vandyck go, I will get him to mend my picture, for though I be ill favoured I think that makes me worse than I am.

Oliver Cromwell, Instructions to His Painter, as Reported by George Vertue, Notebooks (c. 1720)

Mr. Lilly,[1] I desire you would use all your skill to paint my picture truly like me and not flatter me at all but [pointing to his own face] remark all these roughnesses, pimples, warts and everything as you see me; otherwise I will never pay a farthing for it.

---

[1] Mr. Lilly I.e., Peter Lely (1618–80), later Sir Peter Lely.

Sir Peter Lely, Portrait of Oliver Cromwell, c. 1653.

Games and Pastimes

Considerable attention was paid to games and pastimes in the sixteenth century. Skill in archery was considered to be of particular importance to the defence of the realm—so much so that Henry VIII passed several statutes to enforce its practice and ensure that "every man having a man-child or men-children in his house, shall provide, ordain, and have in his house for every man-child being of the age of seven years and above, till he come to the age of seventeen years, a bow and two shafts to induce and learn them, and bring them up in shooting." The statutes appear to have been widely ignored, and it is probable that archery became slowly less popular over this period.

Sports, games, and entertainments pursued purely for pleasure, on the other hand, clearly gained in popularity. Bear-baiting is of special interest because of the surprising degree to which connections existed between bear-baiting and the theater in the late-sixteenth and early-seventeenth centuries. Philip Henslowe, a prominent theater manager, and Edward Alleyn, a leading actor, were from 1594 onwards two of the leading figures in the sport. For some years they controlled both the Bear Garden and the Paris Garden, the two sites for bear-baiting in London, and they eventually built a new theater, the Hope, designed to house both bear-baiting and stage plays. Both Elizabeth I and James I encouraged the practice, and royal exhibitions of bear-baiting (at venues such as Whitehall and Greenwich Park) to entertain foreign visitors were frequent occurrences; though the monarch is never recorded to have attended public performances of plays during this period, Elizabeth is known to have visited the Paris Garden in 1599.

Though most sports, games, and pastimes were heavily male-oriented, there are some exceptions among the more gentle pastimes. Queen Elizabeth is known to have played draughts (checkers) and chess with Roger Ascham, and Arthur Saul dedicated The Famous Game of Chess-Play (1614) to Lucy, Countess of Bedford.

Frontispiece, Gervase Markham, The Art of Archery, 1634. The woodcut depicts Charles I.

A Game of Tennis, early seventeenth century.

The early version of the game was played indoors with short-handled racquets and leather balls packed with hair. (The modern game of "lawn tennis" dates from the nineteenth century.)

THE NOBLE ARTE OF VENERIE OR HVNTING.

VVherein is handled and ſet out the Vertues, Nature, and Properties of fiuetene ſundrie Chaces togither, with the order and maner
how to Hunte and kill euery one of them.

Tranſlated and collected for the pleaſure of all Noblemen and Gentlemen, out of the beſt approued Authors, which haue written any thing concerning the ſame: And reduced into ſuch order and proper termes as are vſed here, in this noble Realme of England.

The Contentes vvhereof ſhall more playnely appeare in the Page next followyng.

Title page, George Turberville, The Noble Art of Venerie or Hunting, 1575.

The Booke of Faulconrie or HauKING,
FOR THE ONELY DElight
and pleaſure of all Noblemen and Gentlemen:
Collected out of the beſt aucthors, aſvvell Italians as Frenchmen, and ſome Engliſh practiſes withall concernyng Faulconrie, the contentes whereof are to be ſeene in the next page folowyng.
By George Turberuile Gentleman.
NOCET EMPTA DOLORE VOLVPTAS.

Imprinted at London for Chriſtopher Barker, at the ſigne of the Graſhopper in Paules Churchyarde. Anno. 1575.

Title page, George Turberville, The Book of Falconry or Hawking, 1575.

Anonymous, Edward Alleyn, detail (early seventeenth century).

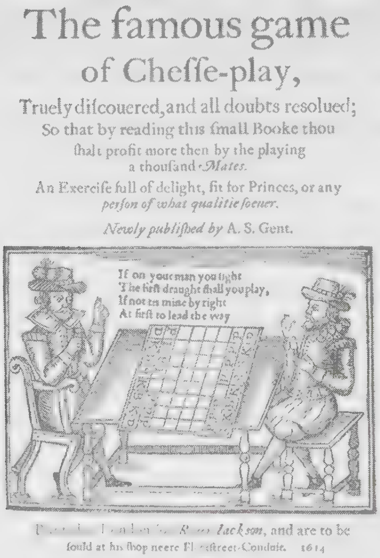
In addition to being one of the most important bear-baiting impresarios of the age, Alleyn (1566–1626) was widely considered to be the era's greatest actor. Among his leading parts were the title roles in Tamburlaine and Doctor Faustus; in 1592 Thomas Nashe wrote that no one "could ever perform more in action than famous Ned Allen."



The famous game
of Cheſſe-play,
Truely diſcouered, and all doubts resolued;
So that by reading this ſmall Booke thou ſhalt profit more then by the playing a thouſand Mates.
An Exerciſe full of delight, fit for Princes, or any perſon of what qualitie ſoeuer.
Newly publiſhed by A. S. Gent.

If on your man you light
The firſt draught ſhall you play,
If not tis mine by right
At firſt to lead the way

[illegible] Iackson, and are to be ſould at his ſhop neere Fleetſtreet-Conduit. 1614

Title page, The Famous Game of Chess-Play.

Food and Drink

In this as in many other things, the sixteenth and early-seventeenth century point of comparison was often Italy. The first of the passages below gives an early impression of the comparison from an Italian point of view, the second a seventeenth-century view from an English gentleman. Moryson's comment that the English eat "more flesh" than the Italians may be something of an understatement: the 1589 records preserved of the food and drink purchased for a well-off bachelor in London show a diet of almost nothing but meat. On May 11, for example, the following were purchased for the midday dinner:

a piece of beef	xviiid.
a loin of veal	iis.
2 chickens	xiiiid.
oranges	iid
for dressings ye veal & chickens & sauce	xiid

The following items were purchased for supper the same day:

a shoulder of mutton	xvid.
2 rabbits	xd.
for dressing ye mutton, rabbits & a pigges pettie toes	viiid.
cold beef	viiid.
cheese	iid.

The diet of commoners, in contrast, included a good deal of bread and cheese but relatively little meat through much of the year. Even in towns most families kept chickens (and sometimes pigs) and maintained a small plot of land. Animals were slaughtered in the late autumn, and salted or smoked meat was consumed in the winter. At all levels of society the Church requirement that fish be eaten on Fridays was observed; for those living at any significant distance from the sea, salt rather than fresh fish was usually the only option. Neither potatoes nor tomatoes were yet a part of the English diet, and green vegetables do not seem to have figured very prominently in most people's diet; fruit was common, however.

Many remarked on the liberal consumption of beer and ale throughout the sixteenth century and into the seventeenth, and clearly women as well as men were known to frequent taverns. Indeed, if the the catalogue of tavern types in John Skelton's account of "The Tunning of Elynour Rumming" (with its account of "wenches unlaced" and "housewives unbraced") is to be believed even in part, that was far from a rare occurrence. As the early seventeenth-century watercolor reproduced below illustrates, wine was often the preferred drink of the better-off classes of society. Beginning in the late 1560s the smoking of tobacco—described below by William Harrison—also became common. By the early 1600s there was also a strong reaction against the "stinking smoke" of tobacco—expressed most powerfully in James I's A Counterblast to Tobacco (an excerpt from which is included elsewhere in this anthology).

from An Anonymous Venetian Official Traveling in England, A Relation, or Rather a True Account, of the Island of England (1497)

The English are, for the most part, both men and women of all ages, handsome and well-proportioned; though not quite so much so, in my opinion, as it had been asserted to me, before your magnificence went to that kingdom; and I have understood from persons acquainted with these countries, that the Scotch are much handsomer; and that the English are great lovers of themselves, and of everything belonging to them; they think that there are no other men than themselves, and no other world but England; and whenever they see a handsome foreigner, they say that "he looks like an Englishman," and that "it is a great pity that he should not be an Englishman;" and when they partake of any delicacy with a foreigner, they ask him, "whether such a thing is made in their country?" They take great pleasure in having a quantity of excellent victuals, and also in remaining a long time at table, being very sparing of wine when they drink it at their own expense. And this, it is said, they do in order to induce their other English guests to drink wine in moderation also; not considering it any inconvenience for three or four persons to drink out of the same cup. Few people keep wine in their own houses, but buy it, for the most part, at a tavern; and when they mean to drink a great deal, they go to the tavern, and this is done not only by the men, but by ladies of distinction. The deficiency of wine, however, is amply supplied by the abundance of ale and beer, to the use of which these people are become so habituated, that, at an entertainment where there is plenty of wine, they will drink them in preference to it, and in great quantities.

from Fynes Moryson, Itinerary (1617)

England abounds in cattle of all kinds, and particularly hath very great oxen, the flesh whereof is so tender, as no meat is more desired … The flesh of hogs and swine is more savoury than in any other parts, excepting the bacon of Westphalia. … English husbandmen eat barley and rye brown bread, and prefer it to white bread as abiding longer in the stomach, and not so soon digested with their labour. …

The Italian Sansovino is much deceived, writing, that in general the English eat and cover the table at least four times in the day; for howsoever those that journey and some sickly men staying at home may perhaps take a small breakfast, yet in general the English eat but two meals (of dinner and supper) each day. And I profess for myself and other Englishmen, passing through Italy so famous for temperance, that we often observed, that, howsoever we might have a pullet and some flesh[1] prepared for us, eating it with a moderate proportion of bread, the Italians at the same time, with a charger[2] full of herbs for a salad, and with roots,[3] like meats of small price, would each of them eat two or three penny-worth of bread. And since all fulness is ill, and that of bread worst, I think we were more temperate in our diet, though eating more flesh, than they eating so much more bread than we did. …

I observed a custom in all those Italian cities and towns through which I passed that is not used in any other country that I saw in my travels, neither do I think that any other nation in Christendom use it, but only Italy. The Italians … do always at their meals use a little fork when they cut their meat.… The reason for this their curiosity[1] is because the Italian cannot endure by any means to have his dish touched by fingers, seeing that all men's fingers are not alike clean.

---

[1] a pullet and some flesh A chicken and some red meat.

[2] charger Large plate or dish.

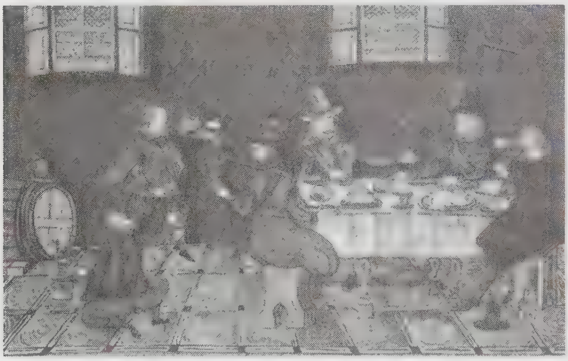
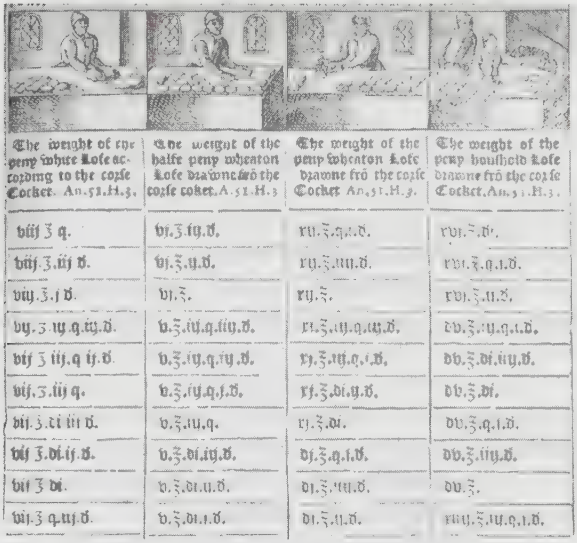
[3] roots I.e., root vegetables such as carrots, parsnips, or beetroot.



Anonymous, Miniature watercolor depicting eating and drinking, c. 1610.



The weight of the peny white Loſe according to the corſe Cocket. An.51.H.3.	The weight of the halfe peny wheaton Loſe drawne frō the corſe coket.A.51.H.3	The weight of the peny wheaton Loſe drawne frō the corſe Cocket An.51.H.3.	The weight of the peny houſhold Loſe drawne frō the corſe Cocket.An.51.H.3.
viij ʒ q.	vi.ʒ.iij.d.	xii.ʒ.q.j.d.	xvi.ʒ.vi.
viij.ʒ.iij d.	vi.ʒ.ij.d.	xij.ʒ.iiij.d.	xvi.ʒ.q.j.d.
viij.ʒ.j d.	vi.ʒ.	xij.ʒ.	xvi.ʒ.ij.d.
vij.ʒ.iij.q.iij.d.	v.ʒ.iij.q.iiij.d.	xi.ʒ.iij.q.iij.d.	xv.ʒ.iij.q.j.d.
vij ʒ iij.q ij.d.	v.ʒ.iij.q.iij.d.	xj.ʒ.iij.q.j.d.	xv.ʒ.vi.iiij.d.
vij.ʒ.iij q.	v.ʒ.iij.q.j.d.	xj.ʒ.vi.ij.d.	xv.ʒ.vi.
vij.ʒ.vi iii d.	v.ʒ.iij.q.	xj.ʒ.vi.	xv.ʒ.q.j.d.
vij ʒ.vi.ij.d.	v.ʒ.vi.iij.d.	vj.ʒ.q.j.d.	xv.ʒ.iiij.d.
vij ʒ vi.	v.ʒ.vi.ij.d.	vi.ʒ.iiij.d.	xv.ʒ.
vij.ʒ q.iij.d.	v.ʒ.vi.j.d.	vi.ʒ.ij.d.	xiiij.ʒ.iij.q.j.d.

The Assize of Bread, London, 1600. The chart sets out the prices to be charged for different sorts of loaves of bread, depending on the price of wheat at the time.

from Sarah Longe, Mrs. Sarah Longe Her Receipt Book (manuscript c. 1610)

Medieval recipes (or "receipts") are typically as vague as is Longe about cooking times, but many published recipes from the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries include references to time ("cook it a quarter of an hour … " etc.).

To make cherry marmalet

Take 5 pound of cherries, you must weigh them with their stones in them, after stone them, then take one pound of sugar such as you make marmalet with, and put your cherries and your sugar both together into the pan, or skillet which you will make it in, but beat your sugar very well, and so let it boil as you do other marmalets, and when you think it is boiled enough, put it into your boxes or glasses as fast as you can.

from William Harrison, Chronologie (1573)

In these days, the taking-in of the smoke of the Indian herb called tobacco by an instrument formed like a little ladle, whereby it passeth from the mouth into the head and stomach, is greatly taken up and used in England, against rheums and some other diseases engendered in the lungs.

Children and Education

There was little support for compulsory or state-supported education in the British Isles before the late-seventeenth century, except in Scotland, but with the tide of Protestantism came much greater interest in education. The Convocation of Canterbury in 1529 ordered all parish priests to teach children to read and write, and, while it is certain not all did so, it may be that close to half of the population were at least barely literate by the end of the sixteenth century. Under the Tudors, Parliament expressed its support for educational ideals, and acted to regulate grammar schools in such matters as the prescribing of textbooks. (Lily's Short Introduction of Grammar remained the standard for Latin grammar until well into the nineteenth century.) Boys from well-off families aged five to seven attended a Petty (from the French "petit," or small) School; they then attended a grammar school from ages seven through fourteen; only a few would follow on to one of the seven universities founded by 1600 (two in England, four in Scotland, and one in Ireland). Boys (and often girls) of noble birth were educated by a tutor at home; girls of other social classes were generally not provided with any formal education. Male children of laborers and poor townsfolk were also effectively denied an education for, although schools were officially open to all boys, in practice the fees that were charged (often a pound or more per year, even in the mid-sixteenth century) put education out of reach of those of modest means.

---

[1] curiosity Curious or unusual behavior.

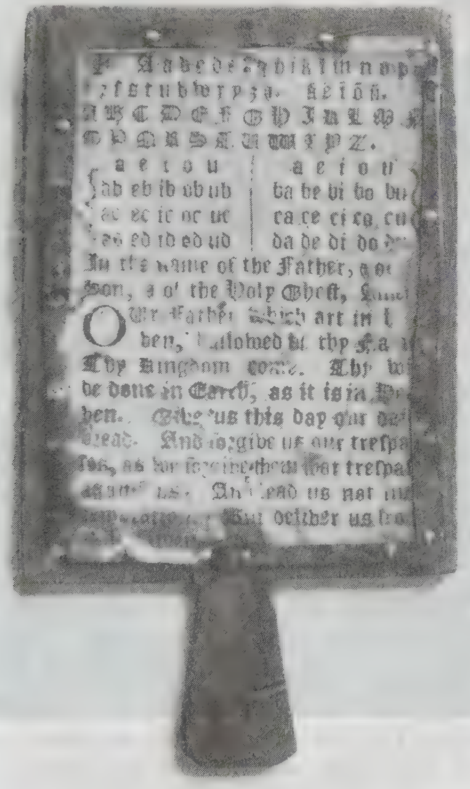
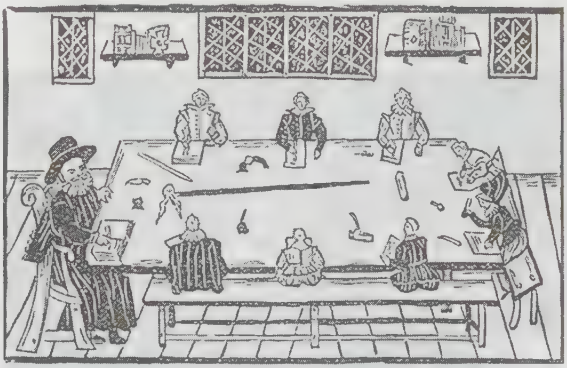
from John Baidon, New Book Containing All Sorts of Hands (revised edition 1611, first published c. 1570), woodcut, "How you ought to hold your pen."

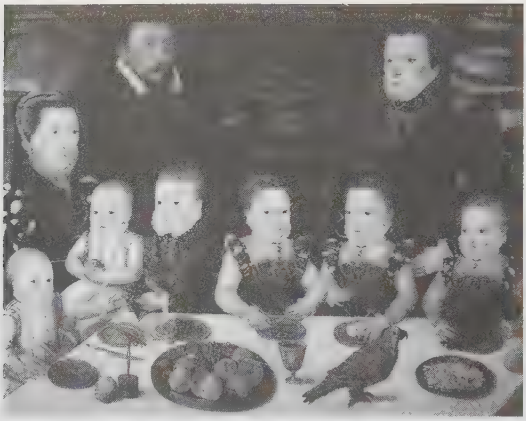


A hornbook from the early seventeenth century. Hornbooks typically included the letters of the alphabet and the text of the Lord's Prayer, framed in wood and covered by a thin layer of transparent horn.



Anonymous woodcut, a Petty School (early seventeenth century).

Edward IV Grammar School, Stratford-upon-Avon.



Attributed to the Master of the Countess of Warwick, Lord Cobham and His Family, 1567. Cobham's wife is shown opposite him; her sister is to the left. The age of each child is painted above the head.

Attributed to John de Critz, Henry Wriothesley, Third Earl of Southampton, 1603. Though the identity of the "fair youth" in Shakespeare's sonnets—if he was a real individual—is not known, one candidate frequently put forward by scholars is Henry Wriothesley. Both of Shakespeare's long poems, Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece, are dedicated to Wriothesley; some scholars suspect that he is also the secret dedicatee of the sonnets' first edition, which describes "Mr. W.H." (perhaps a reversal of "H.W.") as "the only begetter" of the poems.

In this portrait, Wriothesley is shown in the Tower of London, where he was imprisoned for participating in a failed rebellion against the queen in 1601. The rebellion's instigator, Wriothesley's friend the Earl of Essex, was executed, but Wriothesley received a life sentence, and was pardoned after Elizabeth's death. This portrait was commissioned soon after he left prison; on the right hand side, beneath a small picture of the Tower of London, the date of his release appears with the phrase "In Vinculis, Invicturs" (Latin: "in chains, unconquered"). Wriosthesley is shown wearing a sling—an indication of the impact imprisonment had on his health—and he has removed a glove to reveal slender fingers and gold ring, both signifiers of wealth. It is not clear whether the cat next to him has a symbolic as well as a literal significance; according to tradition it is Wriosthesley's favorite pet, who lived with him in the Tower.

Anthony Van Dyck, George and Francis Villiers, 1635. After their father, the Duke of Buckingham, was assassinated, these children were raised in the household of Charles I. Francis was killed in battle during the Civil War; following the Restoration George became a leading politician. (George is portrayed by John Dryden in "Absalom and Achitophel" in the character of Zimri, "stiff in opinions, always in the wrong.")

Sir Peter Lely, George Villiers, Second Duke of Buckingham, c. 1675.

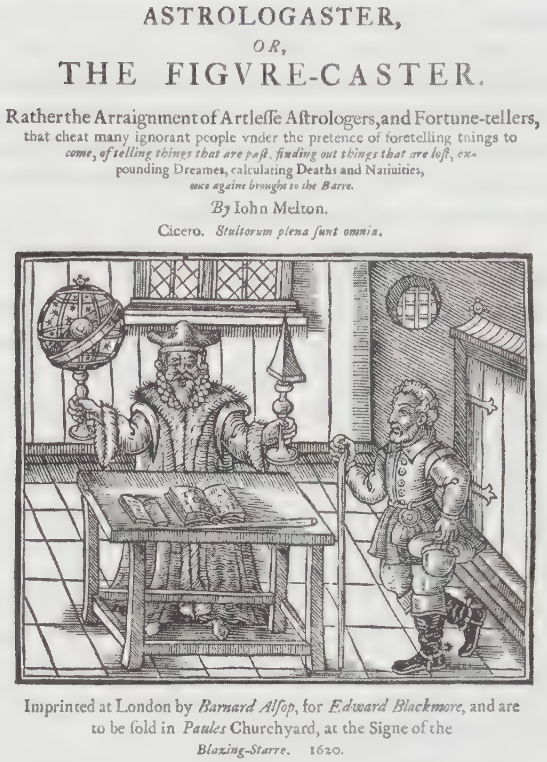
The Supernatural and the Miraculous

The supernatural was the subject of ongoing controversy in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Belief in astrology, in witchcraft, and in a wide range of supernatural or miraculous occurrences was widespread throughout society. Though repeated efforts were made by writers such as Joseph Hall to associate such "superstitions"[1] with the uneducated or simple of mind, Elizabeth I is known to have had her own astrologer, and (as the account below records) James I regarded witchcraft with the utmost seriousness. The writings on witchcraft of George Gifford, from which an excerpt appears below, give an almost anthropological analysis of how allegations of witchcraft took root and grew in a community.



ASTROLOGASTER,
OR,
THE FIGVRE-CASTER.

Rather the Arraignment of Artleſſe Aſtrologers, and Fortune-tellers, that cheat many ignorant people vnder the pretence of foretelling things to come, of telling things that are paſt, finding out things that are loſt, expounding Dreames, calculating Deaths and Natiuities, once againe brought to the Barre.

By Iohn Melton.

Cicero. Stultorum plena ſunt omnia.

Imprinted at London by Barnard Alſop, for Edward Blackmore, and are to be ſold in Paules Churchyard, at the Signe of the Blazing-Starre. 1620.

Title page, John Melton, Astrologastor, or, the Figurecaster, 1620. Included in the text of Melton's book is the following reference to the stage:

> Another [astrologer] will foretell of lightning and thunder that shall happen such a day, when there are no such inflammations seen, except[2] men go to the Fortune in Golding Lane, to see the tragedy of Doctor Faustus. There indeed a man may behold shag-haired devils run roaring over the stage with squibs[3] in their mouths, while drummers make thunder in the tiring-house,[4] and the twelve-penny hirelings make artificial lightning in their heavens.

---

[1] superstitions The word "superstition" first appeared in the fifteenth century, and it gained wide currency in the sixteenth; Richard Hooker in his Ecclesiastical Polity, 1597 defines it thus: "superstition is, when things are either abhorred or observed, with a zealous or fearful, but erroneous relation to God." As time went on the term started to be less and less frequently applied to perceived Christian heresies, and to become reserved more and more for denoting (and ridiculing) supernatural beliefs outside of a Christian context.

[2] except Unless.

[3] squibs Fireworks.

[4] tiring-house Room in which actors dressed for the stage.

from Reginald Scot, The Discovery of Witchcraft (1584)

Who they be that are called witches, with a manifest declaration of the cause that moveth men so commonly to think, and witches themselves to believe that they can hurt children, cattle, &c. with words and imaginations: and of cozening witches.

One sort of such as are said to be witches, are women which be commonly old, lame, blear-eyed, pale, foul, and full of wrinkles; poor, and sullen, superstitious, and papists; or such as know no religion: in whose drowsy minds the devil hath gotten a fine seat; so as, what mischief, mischance, calamity, or slaughter is brought to pass, they are easily persuaded the same is done by themselves; imprinting in their minds an earnest and constant imagination hereof. They are lean and deformed, showing melancholy in their faces, to the horror of all that see them. They are doting, scolds, mad, devilish; and not much differing from them that are thought to be possessed with spirits; so firm and steadfast in their opinions, as whosoever shall only have respect to the constancy of their words uttered, would easily believe they were true indeed.

These miserable wretches are so odious unto all their neighbors, and so feared, as few dare offend them, or deny them any thing they ask: whereby they take upon them; yea, and sometimes think, that they can do such things as are beyond the ability of human nature. These go from house to house, and from door to door for a pot full of milk, yeast, drink, pottage, or some such relief; without the which they could hardly live: neither obtaining for their service and pains, nor by their art, nor yet at the devil's hands (with whom they are said to make a perfect and visible bargain) either beauty, money, promotion, wealth, worship, pleasure, honor, knowledge, learning, or any other benefit whatsoever.

from George Gifford, A Discourse of the Subtle Practices of Devils by Witches and Sorcerers (1587)

> In a later text, A Dialogue Concerning Witches and Witchcraft (1593), Gifford summarized the purpose of the work from which the following excerpt is taken: "certain years now past … I published a small Treatise concerning witches, to lay open some of Satan's sleights, and subtle practices, lest the ignoranter sort should be carried awry and seduced more and more by them."

Some woman doth fall out bitterly with her neighbour: there followeth some great hurt, either that God hath permitted the devil to vex him: or otherwise. There is a suspicion conceived. Within few years after she is in some jar with an other. He is also plagued. This is noted of all. Great fame is spread of the matter. Mother W. is a witch. She hath bewitched goodman B. Two hogs which died strangely: or else he is taken lame. Well, mother W. doth begin to be very odious and terrible unto many. Her neighbours dare say nothing but yet in their hearts they wish she were hanged. Shortly after another falleth sick and doth pine, he can have no stomach unto his meat, now he can not sleep. The neighbours come to visit him. "Well, neighbour," sayeth one, "do ye not suspect some naughty dealing: did ye never anger mother W.?" "Truly neighbour" (sayth he), "I have not liked the woman a long time. I can not tell how I should displease her, unless it were this other day, my wife prayed her, and so did I, that she would keep her hens out of my garden. We spake her as fair as we could for our lives. I think verily she hath bewitched me." Every body sayeth now that mother W. is a witch in deed, and hath bewitched the good man E. He cannot eat his meat. It is out of all doubt: for there were (those) which saw a weasel run from her house-ward into his yard even a little before he fell sick. The sick man dieth, and taketh it upon his death that he is bewitched: then is mother W. apprehended, and sent to prison.

from Joseph Hall, Characters of Virtues and Vices (1608)

Joseph Hall (1574–1656) was a moral philosopher well known for his attempts to reconcile the ideas of the ancient Stoics with those of Christianity. In later life he was appointed Bishop of Exeter (in 1627) and became heavily embroiled in the conflicts between Anglican and Puritan factions.

Superstition is godless religion, devout impiety. The superstitious is fond in observation, servile in fear; he worships God but as he lists; he gives God what he asks not, more than he asks, and all but what he should give, and makes more sins than the Ten Commandments. This man dares not stir forth till his breast be crossed and his face sprinkled. If but an hare cross him the way, he returns; or if his journey began, unawares, on the dismal day; or, if he stumbled at the threshold. If he see a snake unkilled, he fears a mischief; if the salt fall towards him, he looks pale and red, and is not quiet till one of the waiters have poured wine on his lap; and when he sneezeth, thinks them not his friends that uncover not. In the morning, he listens whether the crow crieth even or odd, and by that token presages of the weather. If he hear but a raven croak from the next roof, he makes his will; or if a bittour[1] fly over his head by night: but if his troubled fancy shall second his thoughts with the dream of a fair garden, or green rushes, or the salutation of a dead friend, he takes leave of the world, and says he cannot live. He will never set to sea but on a Sunday.… When he lies sick on his deathbed, no sin troubles him so much, as that he did once eat flesh on a Friday: no repentance can expiate that; the rest need none. There is no dream of his without an interpretation, without a prediction; and if the event answer not his exposition, he expounds it according to the event.… Old wives and stars are his counsellors: his nightspell is his guard; and charms, his physicians.… This man is strangely credulous, and calls impossible things miraculous: if he hear that some sacred block speaks, moves, weeps, smiles, his bare feet carry him thither with an offering; and if a danger miss him in the way, his saint hath the thanks. Some ways he will not go, and some he dares not; either there are bugs, or he feigneth them; every lantern is a ghost, and every noise is of chains. He knows not why, but his custom is to go a little about, and to leave the cross still on the right hand. One event is enough to make a rule: out of these rules he concludes fashions, proper to himself; and nothing can turn him out of his own course.

from Sir John Harington, "Account of an Audience with King James I" (1604), as recorded in Nugae Antiquae

Soon upon this, the Prince his Highness did enter, and in much good humour asked if I was "cousin to Lord Harrington of Exton?" I humbly replied [that] His Majesty did me some honour in enquiring my kin to one whom he had so late honoured and made a baron; and moreover did add, "we were both branches of the same tree." Then he enquired much of learning, and showed me his own in such sort, as made me remember my examiner at Cambridge aforetime. He sought much to know my advances in philosophy, and uttered profound sentences of Aristotle, and such like writers, which I had never read, and which some are bold enough to say, others do not understand: but this I must pass by. The Prince did now press my reading to him part of a canto in Ariosto; praised my utterance, and said he had been informed of many, as to my learning, in the time of the Queen. He asked me what I thought pure wit was made of; and whom it did best become? Whether a King should not be the best clerk in his own country; and, if this land did not entertain good opinion of his learning and wisdom. His Majesty did much press for my opinion touching the power of Satan in matter of witchcraft; and asked me, with much gravity, if I did "truly understand, why the devil did work more with ancient women than others."

More serious discourse did next ensue, wherein I wanted room to continue, and sometime room to escape; for the Queen was not forgotten, nor Davison[2] neither. His Highness told me her death was visible in Scotland before it did really happen, being, as he said, "spoken of in secret by those whose power of sight presented to them a bloody head dancing in the air." He then did remark much on this gift, and said he had sought out of certain books a sure way to attain knowledge of future chances. Hereat, he named many books, which I did not know, nor by whom written; but advised me not to consult some authors which would lead me to evil consultations. I told his Majesty, "the power of Satan had, I much feared, damaged my bodily frame; but I had not farther will to court his friendship, for my soul's hurt." We next discoursed somewhat on religion, when at length he said: "Now, Sir, you have seen my wisdom in some sort, and I have pried into yours. I pray you, do me justice in your report, and in good season, I will not fail to add to your understanding, in such points as I may find you lack amendment." I made courtesy hereat, and withdrew down the passage, and out at the gate, amidst the many varlets and lordly servants who stood around.

---

[1] bittour Bittern (a species of large heron).

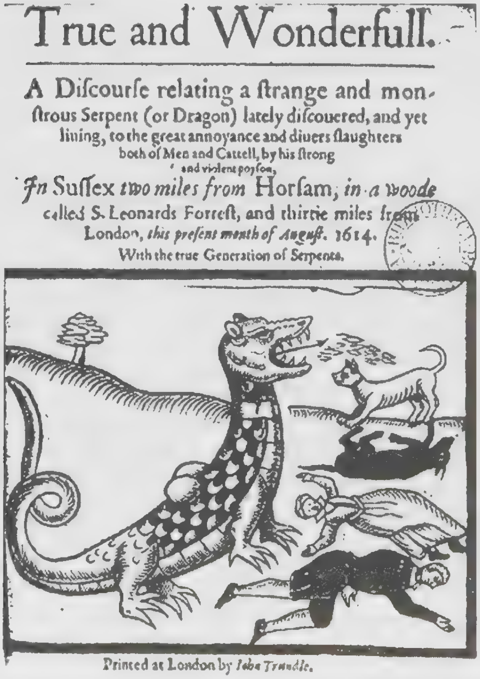
[2] Davison William Davison (c. 1541–1608), a courtier.



True and Wonderfull.

A Diſcourſe relating a ſtrange and mon-ſtrous Serpent (or Dragon) lately diſcouered, and yet liuing, to the great annoyance and diuers ſlaughters both of Men and Cattell, by his ſtrong and violent poyſon,
In Suſſex two miles from Horſam, in a woode called S. Leonards Forreſt, and thirtie miles from London, this preſent month of Auguſt. 1614.
With the true Generation of Serpents.

Printed at London by Iohn Trundle.

Title page, True and Wonderfull: A Discourse Relating a Strange and Monstrous Serpent (or Dragon) Lately Discovered, 1614.

Anonymous Broadsheet, "The Form and Shape of a Monstrous Child Born at Maidstone in Kent, the 24th of October, 1568"

At Maidstone in Kent there was one Margaret Mere, daughter to Richard Mere of the said town of Maidstone, who being unmarried, played the naughty pack,[1] and was gotten with child, being delivered of the same child the 24th day of October last past, in the year of our Lord 1568 at seven of the clock in the afternoon of the same day, being Sunday. Which child, being a man child, had first the mouth slitted on the right side like a leopard's mouth, terrible to behold, the left arm lying upon the breast, fast thereto joined, having as it were stumps on the hands, the left leg growing upward toward the head, and the right leg bending toward the left leg, the foot thereof growing into the buttock of the said left leg. In the middest of the back there was a broad lump of flesh in fashion like a rose, in the middest whereof was a hole, which voided like an issue. This said child was born alive, and lived 24 hours, and then departed this life. Which may be a terror as well to all such workers of filthiness and iniquity, as to those ungodly livers. Who (if in them any fear of God be) may move them to repentance and amendment of life. Which God for Christ's sake grant both to them and us. Amen.

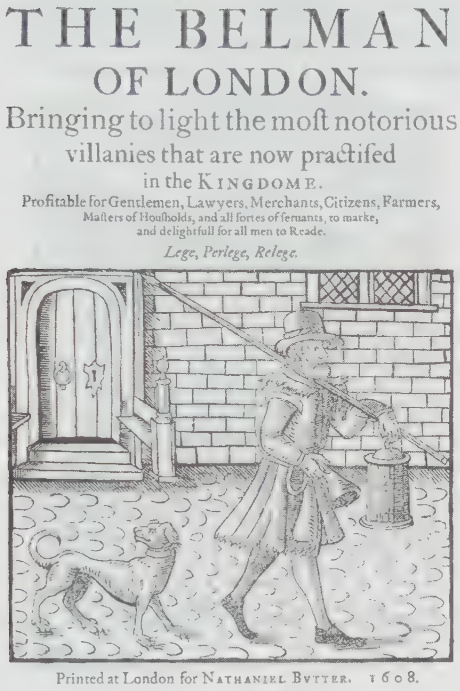
Witnesses hereof were these: William Plomer, John Squier Glasier, John Sadler Goldsmith, beside diverse other credible persons both men and women.

Crime

In the late sixteenth century many publications offered accounts of crimes. Some, such as Robert Greene's Notable Discovery of Coosenage, Now Daily Practised by Sundry lewd persons, called Connie-Catchers, and Cross-Biters (1593) aimed to warn the populace of the methods adopted by petty crooks and confidence tricksters. Others provided lurid accounts of violent crime. As the excerpt below from the pamphlet describing the murder of Richard Hobson illustrates, these were often colored with religious or political bias.

---

[1] played the naughty pack Engaged in immoral behavior (slang term of unknown origin).



THE BELMAN
OF LONDON.
Bringing to light the moſt notorious villanies that are now practiſed in the KINGDOME.
Profitable for Gentlemen, Lawyers, Merchants, Citizens, Farmers,
Maſters of Houſholds, and all ſortes of ſeruants, to marke, and delightfull for all men to Reade.
Lege, Perlege, Relege.

Printed at London for NATHANIEL BVTTER. 1608.

Title page, Thomas Dekker, The Belman[1] of London, 1608.

> With the temporary closing of the theaters in 1603 due to the plague, the playwright Thomas Dekker turned to writing pamphlets. In The Belman of London he promised to the reader that he would "bring to light a number of more notable enormities (daily hatched in this Realm) than ever have yet been published to the open eye of the world." (For more of Dekker's pamphlet writing, see pages 796.)

from "A True Report of the Late Horrible Murder Committed by William Sherwood, upon Richard Hobson, Gentleman, both Prisoners in the Queen's Bench, for the profession of Popery, the 18th of June, 1581"

I am the more loath at this time, to lay open unto the view of the whole world that late foul murder committed by Sherwood, because I would not speak much of them which be gone, and be thought to bite them by the back which are dead, and so be like unto those papists which being hot in cruelty did not only curse the dead continually, but did take up and burn the bones of diverse good men into ashes, to signify unto the world that no drink could cool their thirst but blood, no sacrifice could content them but the warm heart blood of martyrs and the death of the saints of God. But my intent is this: for as much as their scabs now break out, and that their cruelty seeketh no corners[2] but setteth itself upon a stage to be beheld of all men, to give all good Christians warning that as they shall hear of their naughtiness,[3] and see it so, they will learn to spew them out of their stomachs forever. …

But to be brief: the day grew on, which was the 28th of June about 8 of the clock in the morning, at which time he had determined to murder his fellow papist, and that the matter might more easy be brought to pass, he caused the night before the keeper to remove all Hobson's weapons, so that the next morning, as Hobson was coming down through Sherwood's chamber, from his prayers, Sherwood shutting his chamber door, assailed him with a knife, and a stool trestle, astonishing him, afterwards gave him a large wound, keeping him down and struggling till he bled to death, Hobson often crying, "Help, Father Throckmorton, he killeth me with his knife!" Master Throckmorton and others, hearing this noise, came upon Sherwood and by force broke up his doors, found the young man all to befouled in his own blood, and gasping for breath: who after a few faint words, yielded his soul into the hands of God. Sherwood perceived a great many busy about Hobson, began to practice to escape, but by heed taking of one Master Smith's man, he was brought to the marshal's hands, and imbrued in his fellow's blood: who being examined, he denied that manifest murder, which by witness was proved, and he being brought to the slain body, the blood which was settled, issued out afresh. Thus he slew this young man, in deed and cause miserably, in form and fashion cruelly and beastly.

Let us advisedly now weigh and consider what manner of razor this is that cutteth so sharp: if they be thus unable to master their passions, and thus like bloodsuckers do open them against their own fellow prisoners, what shall we look for at their hands? …

---

[1] Belman Man employed to walk the streets of a town making public announcements, or simply "calling the hours."

[2] corners I.e., places to hide.

[3] naughtiness Wickedness, evil.

Print and Manuscript Culture

Mechanical print technology originated in Germany in the mid-fifteenth century and the printing press was introduced to the British Isles by William Caxton in 1476. Despite their relative convenience and affordability, however, printed books did not altogether replace handwritten manuscripts, which coexisted alongside print as an important medium of publication throughout the early modern period. The illustrations that follow give some sense of the range of print and manuscript culture in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries beyond what is presented elsewhere in this anthology.[1] from Jan van der Straet, Nova Reperta. This engraving by a Flemish artist of a printing shop was one of a series published in Antwerp in the 1580s; no comparable illustration of the technology of printing from Elizabethan England is known.

There begynneth a newe tracte or treatyſe mooſt ꝓfytable for all huſbãde men/and very frutefull for all other perſones to rede/newly correcte & amended by the auctour/with dyuerſe other thynges added therunto.

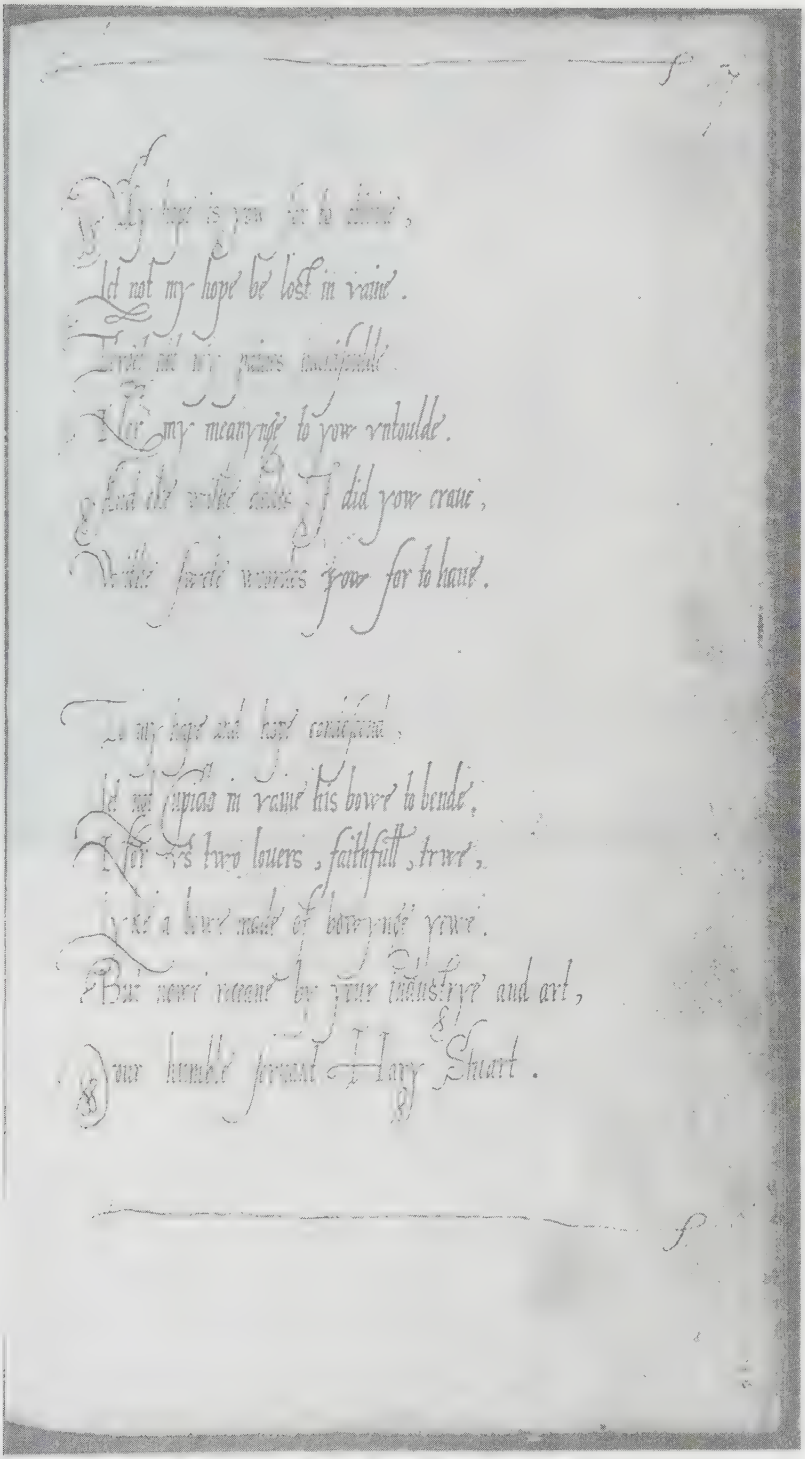
Huſbondrye

Title page, attributed to Anthony Fitzherbert, The Book of Husbandry, c. 1523.

In 1598 the eleventh edition of this work was published; it appears to have been one of the most popular books of the age. In all probability the primary audience for the work was the yeoman farmer; laborers were in most cases illiterate. The book offers advice on such matters as whether to plough with horses or oxen, how to sow oats or barley, how to make simple farm implements, and how to care for animals, including how to treat their diseases. Advice on highway repair is also included; throughout the sixteenth century husbandmen were required to devote several days per year to road work in their area. Gender roles were strictly differentiated; women are advised to clean the house, feed the animals, prepare meals, and make butter and cheese. In only a few areas are the roles allowed to overlap; the wife is advised to go to market if her husband is unable to do so, and to assist him in filling "the muck wain or dung cart." Each spouse is advised to provide an honest account to the other of money spent.

For a complete listing of images of printed and handwritten materials in this anthology, see "History of the Language and of Print Culture" on page xcix.



My hope is yow for to obtaine,
Let not my hope be lost in vaine.
Forget not my paines manifolde.
Nor my meanynge to yow vntoulde.
And eke with delaies I did yow craue,
With ſwete wordes yow for to haue.

To my hope and hart condiscend,
Let not Cupido in vaine his bowe to bende,
Nor vs two louers, faithfull, trewe,
Lyke a bowe made of bowynge yewe.
But nowe receaue by your industrye and art,
Your humble ſeruant Hary Stuart.

Calligraphy was regarded as a valued art throughout the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. This example is of a poem ascribed to Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley (second husband of Mary, Queen of Scots), and commonly thought to have been written around 1562, during his courtship of her. The poem is from the Devonshire Manuscript, a verse miscellany. Such collections, which were common in the sixteenth and especially seventeenth centuries, brought together full poems and selected passages from a wide range of poetic genres, either copied from other sources or composed for the miscellany. Though many miscellanies were created in handwritten form, some were mass printed.

n moſte humble and la mentable manner ſhew
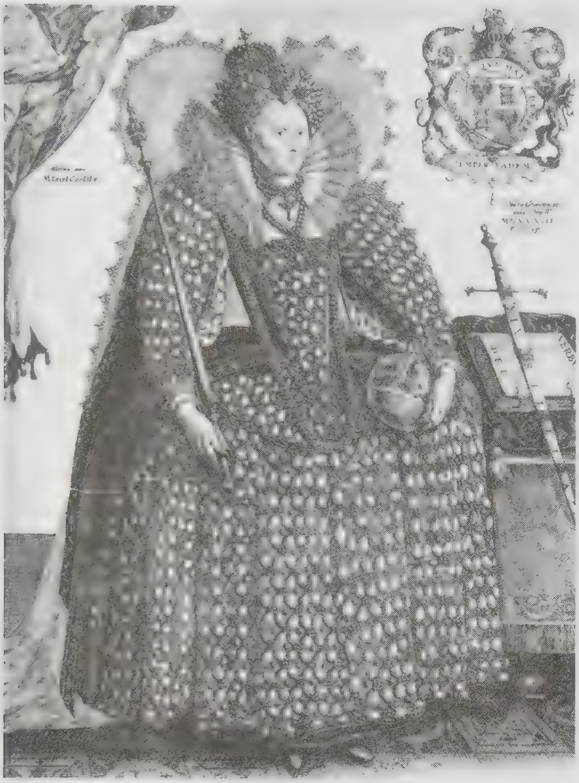
ithe and complaynith:

Among the earliest known calligraphy books in English is An Alphabet of Ornamental Capitals by John Scottowe (1592). The book presents each letter of the alphabet in an elaborate design often incorporating fantastical creatures, geometric patterns, plants, or human forms. Each capital letter begins a brief proverb or other text in English or Latin. This page, beginning with an ornamental letter "I," reads "In moste humble and lamentable manner shewithe and complaynith."



Crispin van de Passe the Elder, engraving after a drawing by Isaac Oliver, Queen Elizabeth, 1603. This engraving is thought to have been published in commemoration of the Queen's death.

THE NEWE
Teſtament of our Lord and Sauiour
IESVS CHRIST.

¶ Newly Tranſlated out of the Originall Greeke: and with the former Tranſlations diligently compared and reuiſed, by his Maieſties ſpeciall Commandement.

¶ IMPRINTED at London by Robert
Barker, Printer to the Kings moſt Excellent
Maieſtie.
ANNO DOM. 1611.

Title page, New Testament, King James Bible (first edition, 1611).

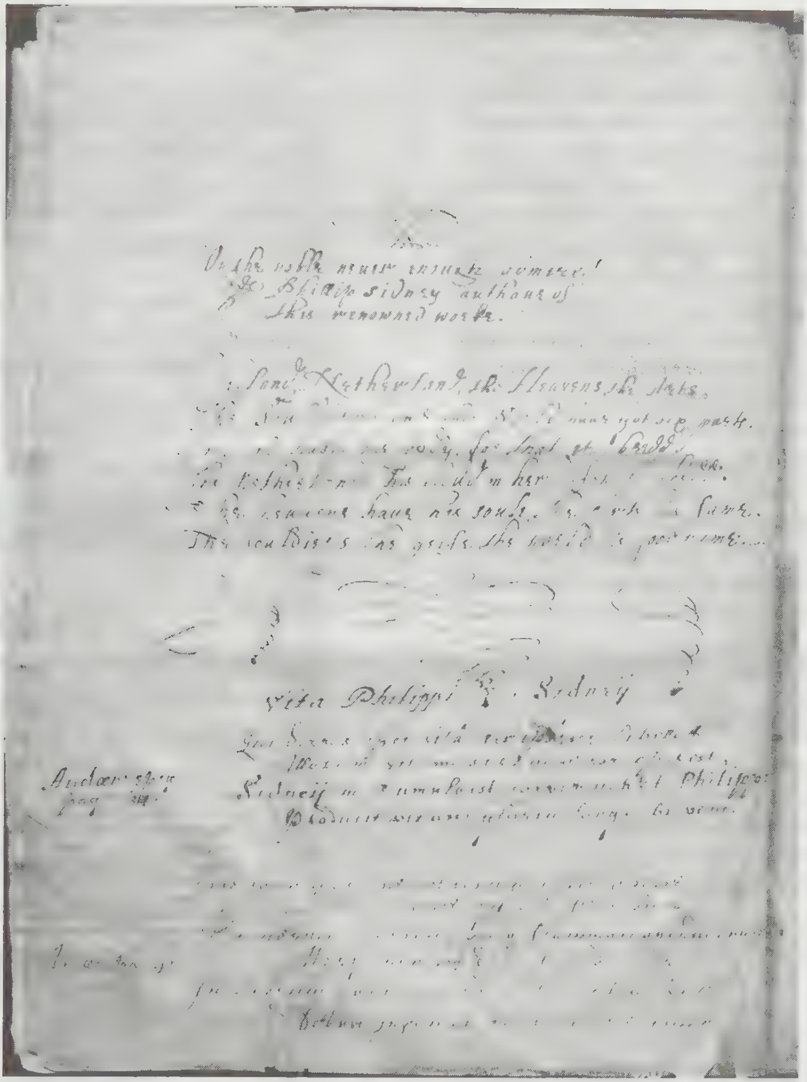
William Browne (1591–1643) wrote this elegy for Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke (1561–1621). An accomplished poet and a prominent literary patron, Mary (as the poem notes) was also the sister of Sir Philip Sidney and mother to William Herbert, third Earl of Pembroke. Written when the Countess died, Browne's elegy did not appear in print until the later seventeenth century. In manuscript, however, it was one of the most widely circulated poems of the 1620s and 1630s, copied into scores of manuscript miscellanies. This copy appears on a blank leaf at the front of a 1627 copy of Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia: the placement ensures that the elegy is the first text the reader encounters on opening the cover. Since the book was officially titled The Countesse of Pembrokes Arcadia (Sidney claims to have written the book for his sister), this manuscript elegy turns the book the reader is holding into a monument to the Countess on which the elegy is inscribed. (Reproduced with permission of the Centre for Reformation and Renaissance Studies, Victoria University in the University of Toronto.)



These three poems about Sir Philip Sidney (1554–86) were copied onto a blank page of a 1627 copy of his Arcadia (the reverse of the blank on which William Browne's elegy on Mary Sidney, above, was copied). The two Latin elegies are by John Owen (1563/4–1622?) and are copied from a printed edition of his works—an illustration of the fact that the traffic between print and manuscript texts moved in both directions. The English elegy derives from a French poem by Joachim du Bellay on a French statesman. The English version, with Sidney as its subject, first appeared as an anonymous manuscript posted in St. Paul's Cathedral and was noted down or reworked by several writers, including Sir Walter Ralegh. Some versions appeared in print; others circulated only in manuscript, with writers and copyists often revising or introducing changes to the text, a characteristic feature of manuscript culture. This version does not match those that appeared in print, and apparently derives from the context of manuscript circulation. (Reproduced with permission of the Centre for Reformation and Renaissance Studies, Victoria University in the University of Toronto.)

Emblems

A popular genre in sixteenth- and especially seventeenth-century Europe, emblems typically combine visual imagery with the written word in an allegorical expression of a complex idea. Most consist of three parts: an introductory title or motto, sometimes called the "inscriptio"; an image, sometimes called the "pictura"; and an accompanying text sometimes called the "subscriptio" or "epigram," written in prose or poetry and varying in length. In addition to appearing in print collections known as "emblem books," emblems graced both public and private architectural spaces, and decorated objects such as furniture, tapestries, silverware, and clothing. Ranging in subject matter from religion to philosophy to politics, they were appreciated by audiences of all classes; while highly educated readers enjoyed the emblems' classical and contemporary allusions, less literate viewers were offered a visual mystery to solve.

The genre is thought to have developed from a variety of literary and artistic forms, including Greek epigrams, medieval heraldry, and biblical imagery. Emblematum Liber, the first emblem book, was published in 1531; it combined text written in Latin by an Italian lawyer, Andrea Alciato, with images chosen by the book's German publisher. Over the next two centuries, it is estimated that more than six thousand different emblem books were printed throughout Europe. English emblems were strongly influenced by Continental emblem traditions; while emblem books in Latin and other languages circulated in Britain, many of the most popular English collections offered translations of emblems from elsewhere.

The process of creating an emblem was collaborative: usually a writer composed the text, then an illustrator designed the image, sometimes with direction from the publisher or the writer. Individual components of emblems—especially images, but sometimes epigrams or mottoes—were often reused from other works, so that the creative achievement lay in devising an original application for the allegorical parts. Each symbol used in an emblem might hold a range of different meanings dependant on context, so the particular significance of a given element could change when it was reinterpreted in a new whole.

from Geffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblems (1586)

Geffrey Whitney's A Choice of Emblems and Other Devices (1586) is considered one of the earliest and most influential English emblem books. For the most part, Whitney's collection is made up of images and mottos selected from previously published Continental books, accompanied by new English epigrams. While the collection depicts exemplary leaders from history and mythology, many emblems reference or are addressed to contemporary figures, including Elizabeth I and Whitney's patron, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester.

A CHOICE OF EMBLEMES,
AND OTHER DEVISES,
For the moſte parte gathered out of ſundrie writers,
Engliſhed and Moralized.
AND DIVERS NEWLY DEVISED,
by Geffrey Whitney.

A worke adorned with varietie of matter, both pleaſant and profitable: wherein thoſe that pleaſe, maye finde to fit their fancies: Bicauſe herein, by the office of the eie, and the eare, the minde maye reape dooble delighte throughe holſome preceptes, ſhadowed with pleaſant deuiſes: both fit for the vertuous, to their incoraging: and for the wicked, for their admoniſhing and amendment.

To the Reader.
Peruſe with heede, then frendlie iudge, and blaming raſhe refraine:
So maiſt thou reade vnto thy good, and ſhalt requite my paine.

Imprinted at LEYDEN,
In the houſe of Chriſtopher Plantyn,
by Francis Raphelengius.
M. D. LXXXVI.

Title page, Geffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblems and Other Devices (1586).

Te ſtante, virebo.

A MIGHTIE Spyre, whoſe toppe dothe pierce the ſkie,
An iuie greene imbraceth rounde about,
And while it ſtandes, the ſame doth bloome on highe,
But when it ſhrinkes, the iuie ſtandes in dowt:
The Piller great, our gratious Princes is:
The braunche, the Churche: whoe ſpeakes vnto hir this.

I, that of late with ſtormes was almoſte ſpent,
And bruſed ſore with Tirants bluddie bloes,
Whome fire, and ſworde, with perſecution rent,
nowe ſett free, and ouerlooke my foes,
And whiles thow raignſt, oh moſt renowmed Queene
By thie ſupporte my bloſſome ſhall bee greene.

A Qud

The above emblem, the first in Whitney's collection, employs a motto and image that first appeared in French author Claude Paradin's Devises heroïques (1557) with an epigram referencing Charles de Lorrain, an influential French cardinal. The image depicts a spire—an architectural feature commonly associated with religious buildings but also reminiscent of classical obelisks—mounted on a plinth, a stable base often used to support monuments and other civic structures. Ivy, which surrounds the spire, could suggest many different meanings for early modern audiences, such as faithfulness and everlasting life.

As Whitney wrote his Choice of Emblems, the English military was preparing to advance into the largely Protestant Dutch lowlands in the hopes of preventing Spain, a Catholic nation, from taking the territory; the book is commonly interpreted as an expression of patriotism in favor of this cause. The new text Whitney adds to this emblem reinterprets it as a tribute to Queen Elizabeth's leadership and the Protestant Church thriving under her rule. The violent conflict of the past, Mary I's persecution of Protestants, has given way to a stable present overseen by her successor, in which church and state together reach confidently higher. The motto and epigram read as follows:

Te stante, virebo[1]

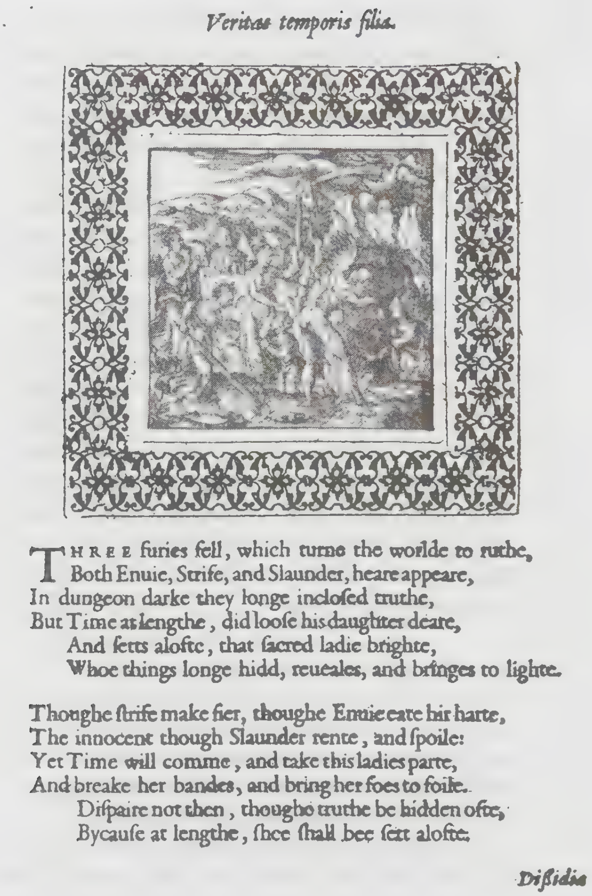
A mighty spire, whose top doth pierce the sky,
An ivy green embraceth round about,
And while it stands, the same doth bloom on high,
But when it shrinks, the ivy stands in doubt:
The pillar great, our gracious Princess[2] is:
The branch, the Church: who speaks unto her this.

I, that of late with storms was almost spent,
And bruised sore with Tyrant's bloody blows,
Whom fire, and sword, with persecution rent,
Am now set free, and overlook my foes
And whiles thou reignst, oh most renowned Queen
By thy support my blossom shall be green.

---

[1] Te stante, virebo Latin: With you standing, I will flourish.

[2] Princess Female ruler, in this case referring to Elizabeth I.



Veritas temporis filia.

THREE furies fell, which turne the worlde to ruthe,
Both Enuie, Strife, and Slaunder, heare appeare,
In dungeon darke they longe incloſed truthe,
But Time at lengthe, did looſe his daughter deare,
And ſetts alofte, that ſacred ladie brighte,
Whoe things longe hidd, reueales, and bringes to lighte.

Thoughe ſtrife make fier, thoughe Enuie eate hir harte,
The innocent though Slaunder rente, and ſpoile:
Yet Time will comme, and take this ladies parte,
And breake her bandes, and bring her foes to foile.
Diſpaire not then, thoughe truthe be hidden ofte,
Bycauſe at lengthe, ſhee ſhall bee ſett alofte.

Diſsidia

In this emblem, a winged, scythe-wielding Father Time pulls his daughter Truth from the cave in which Slander, Envy, and Strife have imprisoned her, showing that although lies may seem to bury the truth, Truth will eventually emerge into the light where all can see her. That time would bring more scientific and historical truth into view was the hope of such figures as Francis Bacon, but for the most part the suppression of truth by slander (not yet distinguished from libel) was a major concern in late sixteenth-century English law and culture; a person accused of slandering important figures, a crime called "scandalum magnatum," could be hauled before the royal "Star Chamber" and, if condemned, executed.

Slander figures in a number of Renaissance poems, including Spenser's Faerie Queene, in which "Sclaunder" appears as a character. It also occurs in many Renaissance plays; Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing and The Winter's Tale, most notably, stage the effect of suspicion and lies on young women who are concealed and then, like Truth, emerge to rejoin their families. Much Ado's Hero is supposedly buried in a tomb, recalling Truth in Whitney's emblem, while Winter's Tale's flower-loving Perdita ("Lost") is restored to her slandered mother after Time himself explains to us that years have passed. This archetype of the maiden restored is also reflected in the classical myth of Persephone, whose annual return from Hades brings about the arrival of spring.

A transcription of Whitney's motto and epigram is below.

Veritas temporis filia[1]

Three furies fell, which turn the world to ruth,
Both Envy, Strife, and Slander, here appear,
In dungeon dark they long enclosed truth,
But Time at length, did loose his daughter dear,
And sets aloft, that sacred lady bright,
Who things long hid, reveals, and brings to light.

Though strife make fire, though Envy eat her heart,
The innocent though Slander rend, and spoil:
Yet Time will come, and take his lady's part,
And break her bonds, and bring her foes to foil.
Despair not then, though truth be hidden oft,
Because at length, she shall be set aloft.

---

[1] Veritas temporis filia Latin: Truth is the daughter of time.

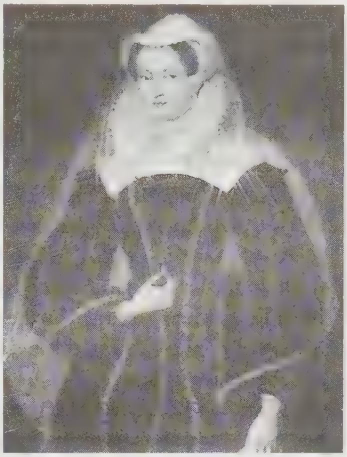
MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS

1542 – 1587

The life of Mary, Queen of Scots, also known as Mary I of Scotland and Mary Stuart, was the stuff of melodrama: violent, traumatic, and often shaped by forces beyond her control. In a time of fierce antagonism between traditional Catholics and Protestants (including most famously the Calvinist John Knox), Mary, although herself a Catholic, attempted to find a middle course and keep peace amongst her subjects. The task proved impossible, in part because she had also to deal with an ancient nobility and clan leaders who feared that a strong monarchy would diminish their own power. The poetry and letters of this embattled and sometimes imprudent queen portray a sorrowful woman trying desperately to bring peace to her life if also, her enemies insisted (rightly or more often wrongly), resorting on occasion to political and personal crime.



Mary was born in the castle of Linlithgow, in West Lothian, Scotland, on 8 December 1542, the only legitimate child of James V of Scotland and his French wife, Mary of Guise, whose family would soon lead the ultra-conservative Catholic faction in France's religious civil wars. On 14 December James V died, leaving his wife as regent and his daughter a six-day-old queen. In 1548, hoping to strengthen an alliance with France and thus help protect the realm against the English, the Regent and her government negotiated little Mary's betrothal to the French Crown Prince, himself only four. Mary went to live in France to be brought up at the dazzling court of Henry II, where she had a fine education and was tutored in poetry by Pierre de Ronsard, the most famous French poet of his generation (and who had briefly been in Scotland with Mary's mother). Mary seems to have gradually forgotten her native language and for the rest of her life spoke and wrote primarily in French. In 1558 she married Francis, who unexpectedly inherited the French throne when his father was killed in a jousting accident in 1559. Mary was now Queen of Scotland and Queen Consort of France, even if then and for many years the French government was effectively run by Mary's mother-in-law, Catherine de Medici. After young Francis II died of an infection in December of 1560, however, Mary found herself a seventeen-year-old widow and in 1561 she returned to Scotland.

In Scotland, Mary attempted to be a moderate leader, particularly in religious matters, and to promote the peace and prosperity of her realm. Although a devoted Catholic, she encouraged mutual tolerance, a policy that merely made her unpopular with the more militant members of both religious groups. She seems to have been liked, at first, by most of her subjects, but her efforts to consolidate the power of the throne infuriated many of the nobility.

Mary now attempted to arrange an advantageous match for herself, after several setbacks finally marrying her handsome English cousin, Henry Stewart, Lord Darnley, on 29 July 1565. The marriage was a disaster: Darnley proved to be self-centered, ruthless, and afflicted by syphilis. In March 1566, when Mary was six months pregnant, he was one of a group of nobles said to have broken into her supper-room at Holyrood Palace in Edinburgh and before her eyes stabbed to death her confidant and private secretary, David Riccio (or Rizzio). The lords, who resented this ugly but charming Italian musician for his influence over Mary, had encouraged Darnley to suspect an adulterous relationship for which there is in fact little convincing evidence. After Riccio's murder, Mary was for a time a virtual prisoner in her own palace. Her baby (named James) was born in June, but the addition to the family did little to reconcile Mary and Darnley; by the autumn she was considering divorcing him.

In February of 1567 a group of nobles hostile to Darnley conspired to blow up a house near Edinburgh where the young man was staying. Darnley tried to flee but was strangled on the grounds just as the house itself exploded. Understandably, Mary's enemies suspected her of having a hand in the assassination but again there is no evidence of her guilt. Soon afterward one noble, James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, who had assembled a small army, convinced the queen to marry him, possibly after raping her, and assured her that he would help her to keep her nobles in line. Terrified, and with an infant son to worry about, Mary thought she had no choice, and that May they were married. Fearing that Bothwell now had too much power, however, a group of other lords confronted Mary while she was traveling and told her to abandon him. She refused. Despite the presence of her own troops, Mary declined an armed battle and accompanied the lords to Edinburgh. Imprisoned in Lochleven Castle, she was now forced to abdicate. In July 1567 her one-year-old son became James VI of Scotland.

After ten months of captivity, Mary escaped. Attempting to regain her crown, she raised an army but was defeated near Glasgow. In May 1568 Mary fled south, hoping for help from her cousin Elizabeth, unaware that the English queen saw her as a danger to her own throne. Many English Catholics, who thought Elizabeth was not only a heretic but illegitimate, with no right to her throne, considered Mary the rightful heir. As soon as Mary arrived, Elizabeth had her imprisoned. She remained a prisoner for the next nineteen years and, despite her repeated pleas, she never saw Elizabeth face to face.

Mary's writings provide a personal parallel, or sometimes a counterpoint, to the external facts of her life (since she wrote in French, selections appear here in translation). Her letters reveal an articulate woman with some measure of political astuteness, yet her letter of 1 October 1569 to Elizabeth shows how badly she could misjudge her situation. Her poems—perhaps only seemingly more private, for queens have little personal life—provide a glimpse of tragedy's toll on their author.

In October 1586 Mary was sent to trial at Fotheringhay Castle, accused of complicity in plots against Elizabeth. The result was inevitable: she was allowed no witnesses on her behalf and was found guilty after two days. On 8 February 1587, after a long delay during which Elizabeth dithered (and apparently tried to arrange for an assassination), the Queen of Scots was beheaded. Sixteen years later her son became James I of England; in 1612 he had her remains reburied in Westminster Abbey. All English monarchs since the death of Elizabeth descend from Mary Stuart.

⌘⌘⌘

Sonnet to Elizabeth

A single thought that haunts me, day and night,
Bitter and sweet, torments my heart, without cease,
Between fear and hope it oppresses me
So that peace and rest flee me.
So, dear sister, if this paper reveals
The desire to see you that oppresses me,
That is because I live in pain and sadness,
So long as my suit[1] is not quickly granted.
I have seen a ship freed from constraint
On the high seas, near to entering a port,
And the calm sea turned to storms:
Likewise, I am troubled and in fear,
Not because of you, but because Fortune
Often wrongly rips sails and rigging.

Sonnets to Bothwell[2]

O gods, have of me compassion,
And show what certain proof
I may give, which shall not seem to him vain,
Of my love and fervent affection.
Alas, is he not already in possession
Of my body, of heart that refuses no pain,
Nor dishonour in this life uncertain,
Offence of friends, nor worse affliction?
For him I esteem all my friends less than nothing,
And I will have good hope of my enemies.
I have put in hazard for him both fame[3] and conscience,
I will die to set him forward.[4]
What remains to give proof of my constancy?

In his hands and in his full power,
I put my son, my honour, and my life,
My country, my subjects, my soul all subdued
To him, and have no other will

Une seul penser qui me profite le jour et la nuit
Amer et doux, change en mon coeur sans cesse,
Entre le doubte et l'espoir il m'oppresse
Tant que la paix et le repos me fuient.
Donc, chère soeur, si cette carte suit
L'affection de vous voir qui me presse,
C'est que je vis en peine et en tristesse,
Si promptement l'effect ne s'en ensuit.
J'ai vu la nef relâcher par contrainte
En haute mer proche d'entrer au port,
Et le serein se convertir en trouble.
Ainsi je suis en souci et en crainte,
Non pas de vous mais quant aux fois à tort Fortune rompe voile et cordage double.
—1568

O Dieux ayez de moy compassion,
Et m'enseignez quelle preuve certain
Je puis donner qui ne luy semble vain
De mon amour & ferme affection.
Las! n'est il pas ja en possession
Du corps, du coeur qui ne refuse paine
Ny dishonneur, en la vie incertaine,
Offense de parents, ne pire affliction?
Pour luy tous mes amis j'estime moins que rien
Et de mes ennemis je veux esperer bien.
J'ay hazardé pour luy & nom & conscience:
Je veux pour luy au monde renoncer:
Je veux mourir pour luy avancer.
Que reste il plus pour prouver ma constance?

Entre ses mains & en son plein pouvoir
Je metz mon filz, mon honneur, & ma vie,
Mon pais, mes subjectz, mon ame assubjectie
Est tout à luy, & n'ay autre voulloir

---

[1] my suit Plea. In 1568 Mary came to Elizabeth, seeking asylum.

[2] Sonnets to Bothwell The sonnets included here were published by George Buchanan in A Detection of the Doings of Mary, Queen of Scots, Touching the murder of her husband (1571). This anthology includes the sixteenth-century French "originals" of sonnets 1, 2, 6, and 7, as well as their modernized and anglicized Scottish translations. The authenticity of these poems is sometimes questioned.

[3] fame The French has "nom" (name) here: the royal name upon which all Mary's "fame" rests.

[4] I will … forward The twelfth line from the French is not translated in the original Scottish translation: "I will renounce the world for him."

For my scope,[1] which without deceit,
I will follow in spite of all envy
That may ensue. For I have no other desire
But to make him perceive my faithfulness;
For storm or fair weather that may come,
Never will it change dwelling or place.
Shortly I shall give of my truth such proof,
That he shall know my constancy without fiction,
Not by my weeping, or feigned obedience,
As others have done, but by other experience.

And now she[2] begins to see
That she was of very evil judgement,
To esteem the love of such a lover,
And would feign[3] deceive my love,
By writings and painted learning,
Which, not the less, did not breed in her brain,[4]
But borrowed from some feat° author, accomplished, successful
To feign one story and have none.
And for all that, her painted words,
Her tears, her plaints° full of dissimulation, complaints
And her high cries and lamentations
Have won that point: that you keep in store
Her letters and writings, to which you give trust,
Yea, and love and believe her more than me.

You believe her (alas) I perceive it too well,
And call in doubt my firm constancy
(O my only wealth, and my only hope)
And I cannot assure you of my truth.
I see that you esteem me light,
And be no way assured of me,
And do suspect (my heart) without any appearing cause,
Discrediting me wrangously.° wrongly
You do not know the love I bear to you.
You suspect that other love transports me.
You think my words be but wind.
You paint my very heart as it were of wax.
You imagine me a woman without judgment.
And all that encreases my burning.

Pour mon object que sans le decevoir
Suivre je veux malgré tout l'envie
Qu'issir en peult, car je n'ay autre envie
Que de ma foy, luy faire appercevoir
Que pour tempeste ou bonnace qui face,
Jamais ne veux changer demeure ou place.
Brief je feray de may foy telle preuve,
Qu'il cognoistra sans fainte ma constance,
Non par mes pleurs ou fainte obeyssance,
Comme autres ont fait, mais par divers espreuve.

Et maintenant elle commence à voir
Qu'elle estoit bien de mauvais jugement
De n'estimer l'amour d'un tel amant
Et voudroit bien mon amy decevoir,
Par les escriptz tout fardez de sçavoir
Qui pourtant n'est en son esprit croissant
Ains emprunté de quelque autheur luissant,
A faint tresbien un envoy sans l'avoir
Et toutefois ses parolles fardez,
Ses pleurs, ses plaincts remplis de fictions,
Et ses hauts cris & lamentations
Ont tant gaigné qui par vous sont gardez
Ses lettres escriptes ausquelles vous donnez foy
Et si l'aymez & croyez plus que moy.

Vous la croyez, las! trop je l'apperçoy
Et vous doutez de ma ferme constance,
O mon seul bien & mon seul esperance,
Et ne vous puis j'asseurer de ma foy
Vous m'estimez leger qui le voy,
Et si n'avez en moy nul asseurance
Et soupçonnez mon coeur sans apparence,
Vous deffiant à trop grand tort de moy.
Vous ignorez l'amour que je vous porte,
Vous soupçonnez qu'autre amour me transporte,
Vous estimez mes parolles du vent,
Vous depeignez de cire mon las coeur,
Vous me pensez femme sans jugement.
Et tout cela augmente mon ardeur.
—1571

---

[1] no other … scope No other desire for my object.

[2] she Bothwell's first wife. He divorced her very shortly before marrying Mary.

[3] would feign "Desires to," but this also plays with the meaning of "feign" as "pretend."

[4] Which … brain A somewhat confusing double negative, meaning "which her brain did not create."

Letters

In 1567, Mary's enemies seized from one of Bothwell's servants letters written by Mary to Bothwell that appeared to prove both her adultery and her complicity in the murder of her husband Darnley; they are known as the "casket letters" from the silver box in which they were ostensibly discovered. The originals were probably written in French—but the originals were never produced by officials at the time, and they are not extant; one theory has it that they were destroyed by James I. But contemporary copies, in manuscript and in print, exist in Latin, English, Scots, and French. Mary's defenders and detractors have debated the authenticity of these letters ever since, with her defenders arguing that the letters, or at least the more incriminating elements within them, were forgeries. Most scholars agree that at least four of the letters are undoubtedly Mary's, but that the versions that survive have possibly been tampered with.

from LETTER TWO

I went to my supper. The bearer of these letters[1] will inform you of my arrival. He[2] begged me to come back and I did so. He told me how ill he was and said that he would make no last will but simply leave everything to me; adding that I was the cause of his sickness because of his distress on account of my strangeness toward him. And then he said, "You ask me what were the cruelties which I mentioned in my letters? The reference was to you alone who will not accept my repentance or my promises. I admit that I have greatly offended but not in the matter which I have always denied. I have also sinned against some of your subjects and this you have forgiven."

"I am young."

"You will say that you have often forgiven me, and that I repeat my offences. May not a man of my age, lacking good counsel, fall twice or thrice and fail in his promises, and afterwards repent of his fault and chasten himself by experience? If I can win forgiveness, I promise not to offend hereafter. I will ask for nothing except that we may be at bed and board together as husband and wife; and if you do not consent to that, I shall never rise from this bed again. I beg you to let me hear your decision, for God knows what grief I have suffered by making you into a god and by thinking of nothing else but you: and should I at any time give you offence, you yourself will be the cause thereof; for if I knew that, when somebody offends against me, I had the refuge of being able to take my trouble to you, I would make no complaint to any other: but now if I hear anything I am compelled to keep it shut within my breast, since I am not on easy terms with yourself. This troubles me so direly that it deprives me of wisdom and good understanding."

I answered him all the time, but it would be a long business to write it all down. I asked him why he had considered going away in that English ship. This he denied under oath but admitted that he had talked with the English. Then I enquired about the interrogation of William Highgate.[3] This he also denied till I repeated the very words which he had uttered. He then said that Minto[4] had informed him that they said that one of the council had sent for my signature to letters which would put him in prison or, if he did not obey, would send him to death. And that he had addressed the same enquiries to Minto who answered that he thought this was true. As for the rest, concerning William Highgate, he has confessed to it, but not till the day after my arrival.

In the end he desired much that I would lodge in his lodging. I have refused, and told him that he must be disinfected and that this could not be done here. He said to me that he had heard that I had brought the litter[5] but would have liked much better to go with me. I believe he feared that I might take him prisoner. I answered that I would carry him away with me to Craigmillar[6] where the doctors and I could look after him without my being too far away from my son. He replied that he was ready to go wherever I wished, provided that I would assure him of what he had required of me.

---

[1] bearer of these letters Nicolas Hubert, a French page (d. 1569), who was also known as French Paris.

[2] He Darnley. Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley (1545–67), Mary's second husband.

[3] William Highgate Town Clerk of Glasgow, an ally of Mary's.

[4] Minto The Laird of Minto.

[5] litter Framework supporting a bed for transport of the sick.

[6] Craigmillar Castle near Edinburgh.

He wanted not to be seen by anybody. He gets angry whenever I speak of Walker, and says that he will pluck his ears from his head and that he lies: because I had asked him about that matter and also why he had complained of some of the lords and had threatened them. He denied it, and said that he liked all of them, and begged me not to believe anyone but himself; and that as for me, he would rather lose his life than give me displeasure.

At this point he employed so many little flatteries, so adroitly and with such weight, as would have astonished you. I had almost forgotten that he said he could not suspect me in the Highgate affair and will never believe that I, his own flesh and blood, would do him any injury, and that he knew well that I had refused to subscribe[1] to it. That if anybody aimed at his life, he would sell it dearly, but that he neither did nor would suspect anyone but would love all those whom I loved.

He would not let me go but wanted me to sit up with him. I pretended that it all seemed to me quite genuine, and said I would think it over, and when I had excused myself from staying up with him that night, he said that he cannot sleep. I have never known him to speak more mildly or to behave so well; and if I had not learned by experience that his will is as weak as wax, and that mine is hard as a diamond which no arrow could pierce unless it were shot by your hand, it might well have chanced that I should have pitied him. However, have no fears, this fortress will be held to the death: but look to it lest your own be surprised by that faithless nation which with no less pertinacity[2] will contend for it against you.

I think they[3] have been taught at the same school. The one here has always a tear or two in his eye; he greets everybody, down to the meanest,[4] and flatters them in a pitiable manner in order that he may prevail on them to be sorry for him. Today his father[5] bled at the nose and at the mouth, and you can guess the significance of that.[6] I have seen nothing of him[7] since, because he has remained in his room. The King requires that I should give him[8] his food with my own hands: but believe no more where you are than I do here.

There—that is the end of my first day's work. I hope to finish the rest tomorrow. I write everything down, no matter how unimportant, so that by choosing out the best you may be able to form your judgement. I am busy here with a task which is infinitely uncongenial: but would you not like to see how trimly[9] I lie or at least how well I dissimulate while speaking the truth? He has given away to me everything that is in the name of the Bishop[10] and of Sutherland,[11] although I have not spoken to him or said a single word of what you reported to me: so do I merely by the power of flattery and coaxing cause him to feel sure of me. And by complaining about the Bishop I have got everything from him, and the rest is taken for granted....

LETTER THREE

My Lord,

Whether the strain of your absence and your forgetfulness, added to the fear of danger threatening your beloved person from everybody, affords me much consolation I will leave you to judge, especially in view of the unhappiness which my cruel lot and continual misadventure seem to promise me on top of all those mischances and fears both recent and in bygone days of which you so well know. But for all that, I will not accuse you of remembering me so little or of caring so little, still less of your broken promises (or of the coldness in your writing), since what pleases you is acceptable to me and because my thoughts are so willingly subdued to yours that I take for granted that whatever proceeds from you does not really come from any of the causes which I have mentioned but from such as are just and reasonable and of a kind which I would myself desire. And that is the understanding upon which I have based my actions as coming from the only Sustainer of my life. And it is only for this that I want to preserve my life because without this I should desire nothing but a sudden death. And to show you how far I humble myself before your commandments, I have sent you—by Paris—as a token of my homage an ornament for the head, seeing that the head is the leader of the other members,[1] signifying thereby that by investing you with the spoils of that which is uppermost, the rest must necessarily be subject to you and with a consenting heart. In place of which, since you have it,[2] I send you a sepulchre of hard stone painted black and sown with tears and bones. This stone I liken to my heart which, like it, is carven into a safe tomb or receptacle for your commands and, above all, for your name and your memory which lie therein, just as my heart is enclosed within this ring, never to come forth from it until death enables you to use my bones as trophies. Just as the ring is filled up, so have you made complete conquest of me and my heart and even my bones, which will be left to you in remembrance of your victory and of my happy and willing defeat, so to be better bestowed than I deserve. The surrounding enamel is black, signifying the steadfastness of her who sends it. The tears are beyond numbering as are also my fears of displeasing you; tears for your absence and tears of vexation because I cannot be yours in outward show as I am unfeignedly in heart and soul, and rightly so even if my merits were greater than the greatest that I ever had, and were such as I wish they might be and which I shall strive to emulate in order that they may be worthy of your rule. Receive it, my only treasure, in good part as I with such extreme joy did accept our marriage which, until the marriage of our bodies be made public news, shall not go forth from my bosom as the essence of all that I hope or desire of happiness in this world. Now, fearing to displease you in the reading of this as much as I have enjoyed the writing of it, I will make an end, first having kissed your hands with such deep affection as I pray God (O you only Sustainer of my life!) to give you a long and happy life, and to me your good favour, as being the only good that I desire and for which I starve. I have told the bearer of this letter all that I have learned, relying upon him because I know how well he stands with you, as he does also with her who will be to you for ever a humble and obedient wife and your chosen friend, dedicating altogether to you her heart, her body, unalterably, as to him whom I made possessor of a heart whereof you may be certain that it will never change until death, nor shall evil or good have power to estrange it.

---

[1] subscribe Agree.

[2] pertinacity Stubborn adherence.

[3] they Darnley and Lady Bothwell.

[4] meanest Lowest, in terms of social status.

[5] his father Lennox. Matthew Stewart, fourth Earl of Lennox (1516–71), Mary's father-in-law.

[6] bled...that To "bleed at the nose" was also a sixteenth-century French euphemism for being afraid.

[7] him I.e., Lennox.

[8] him I.e., Darnley.

[9] trimly Cleverly.

[10] Bishop Perhaps the Bishop of Mondavi, the papal nuncio with whom Mary had recently consulted, or one of the Scottish bishops.

[11] Sutherland John Gordon, eleventh Earl of Sutherland (1525–67).

LETTER FOUR

I have sat up there[3] later than I would have done if it were not for drawing out that which the bearer will relate to you,—that I have found the best possible way of excusing your business. I have promised to bring him away tomorrow. If it seems to you good, therefore, see to it.

Now I have broken my promise that I would neither write nor send messages to you. But not in order to annoy you: and if you realised how much I am afraid just now you would not have so many contrary suspicions in your mind, suspicions which, all the same, I put up with and take in good part as coming from the thing which I most desire and most earnestly seek of all things under heaven, which is your good grace—which I will earn by my own behaviour. As for me, I will never despair of winning it, and I beg you to fulfil those promises which made me believe in your affection. Otherwise, I should consider that it had made for my unhappiness, and that the favour of the stars toward other women, who nonetheless have not a third part of the loyalty and obedience which I bear to you, must have won the advantage over me which the second love of Jason[4] won: not that I want to compare you with such an ill-fated person nor myself to such an entirely pitiless woman. However, you do cause me to be something like her in any matter that touches you or that may preserve you and keep you to her to whom alone you belong by right: if I may so appropriate to myself that which is won by having loved you loyally, having loved you only, as I say, and as I shall always do while I live, no matter what ills or perils may come. And for all these mishaps, of which you are the cause, give me a recompense—by keeping in mind the place which is close to here.

---

[1] members Parts of the body.

[2] it I.e., the heart.

[3] up there I.e., in Darnley's room.

[4] second … Jason In Greek mythology, Jason left his first wife, Medea, for Glauce. Glauce was killed when she touched a poisoned dress that Medea had sent her.

I do not ask that you keep your promise tomorrow. But let us be together and do not put any trust in those suspicions unless they are proved by experience to be facts. I ask nothing else of God but that you may realise that my heart is yours, and that He may guard you from all evils at least so long as I am alive, nor do I hold my life at all precious except insofar as it and I are pleasing to you. I am going to bed and will say goodnight. Let me know in good time to-morrow how you are faring, for I shall be anxious until I hear. As a bird escaped from the cage or the turtle who has no companion, I shall be alone, lamenting your absence howsoever short it may be. This letter will happily do something which I cannot do as I am afraid perchance that you may be asleep. I did not dare to write while Joseph, Sebastian and Joachim[1] were about, and they had only just gone when I began to write this letter.

LETTER SEVEN

As to the time and the place, I leave them to your brother and you. I will follow him, and there shall be no blunder on my part. He finds many difficulties. I think he has told you about them and about all that he requires for playing his part well. As for my own role, I realise that I must act in accordance with what has been arranged.

It seems to me that your long service, and the high opinion which the Lords have of you, ought to gain you forgiveness even if you should advance yourself beyond the status of a subject. You hazarded this venture[2] not in order to ravish me and to hold me captive but to be sure of a place near to me, nor can the arguments or remonstrances of other people stop me from consenting to that which you hope that your service to me will some day enable you to secure. In a word, it is for you to make sure of the Lords and to become free to marry: since for your own support you can, after such loyal service, reasonably proffer this humble request always accompanied by your persistency.

Make your excuses, therefore, and persuade them as best you may that you are compelled to chase your enemies. You will speak well enough if the matter and the theme are to your taste: and give Lethington[3] many fair words. If this does not seem good to you, let me know, and do not throw all the blame onto me.

LETTER EIGHT

My Lord, since my last letter, your brother-in-law, as he was, has asked my advice as to what he should do after tomorrow because there are many people here, including the Earl of Sutherland, who would sooner die, on account of the benefits which they have lately received from me, than suffer me to be carried away while they are acting as my bodyguard. On the other hand, he is afraid that if there is trouble it will be said that he was ungrateful in having betrayed me. I told him that he ought to have arranged for all that with you, and that he should get rid of all those whom he most mistrusts.

Following my advice he has decided to write to you about it; and I am astonished to see how irresolute he is in the hour of need. I say to myself that he will play the man; but I thought it would be well to let you know of his fear that he may be charged and accused of treason so that, without distrusting him, you may be the more careful and be the better equipped. Yesterday we had more than three hundred horse—his and Livingstone's. For the love of God, see that you are accompanied by more rather than by less; that, indeed, is my chief anxiety.

I must go to write my despatches, and I pray God that we may soon have a happy meeting. I write in haste so that you may be warned in good time.

—1571 (1947 THIS TRANSLATION)

---

[1] Joseph … Joachim Three of Mary's servants.

[2] this venture In early 1567, Mary was abducted, or possibly went away consensually, with Bothwell.

[3] Lethington William Maitland of Lethington (c. 1528–73), Mary's Secretary of State.

AEMILIA LANYER

1569 – 1645

Aemilia Lanyer published her one book of poetry at a time when it was unusual for an English woman to publish her writing, especially under her full name. It was even more unusual for a middle-class woman to approach publication as a means of making money; to choose herself female patrons; and to make carefully planned use of poems addressed to them in order to raise the status of her work. Lanyer did all of these things.

Because Lanyer was not born into the nobility, many of the details of her personal life are sketchy, cobbled together from court and church records, information gleaned from her poems, and the professional journals of Simon Forman, an astrologer whom she consulted in 1597. She was born to Baptista Bassano and Margaret Johnson, a couple in a common-law marriage, in January 1569. Her father was an Italian musician in the courts of Edward VI and Elizabeth I, so although Aemilia Bassano was not of noble birth, she had access to aristocratic circles and was probably educated along with the young ladies of the court, likely in classical literature and rhetoric.

At age 18, Aemilia Bassano became the mistress of Henry Carey, Lord Hunsdon, who was then serving as Lord Chamberlain to Queen Elizabeth. The affair continued for five years, until she became pregnant. To avoid embarrassment, Carey married her off to another court musician, Alfonso Lanyer, on 18 October 1592, and provided her with an annual stipend of £40. Lanyer bore a son in early 1593, and named him Henry. Lanyer's marriage to Alfonso was not happy: according to Simon Forman's journals, "her husband hath dealt hardly with her and spent and consumed her goods and she is now … in debt." The couple had one child together in December 1598, named Odillya, who died at the age of ten months.

Despite her domestic situation, Lanyer maintained her connection with aristocratic families, particularly with a circle of intellectual court women, to whom she later dedicated many poems. Some time before 1609, she stayed with Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland, and her daughter Anne at the estate where they were then living, Cookham Dean. The visit influenced Lanyer profoundly, as she relates in "The Description of Cooke-ham," the first "country house" poem published in English. While at Cookham Dean, she says, she experienced a spiritual awakening, inspired by the piety of the countess.

In 1611, at age 42, she published her volume of verse, Salve Deus Rex Judæorum (Hail, God, King of the Jews). Although the book focuses on virtue and religion, topics considered appropriate for a woman, it is nevertheless a radical (although not unprecedented) work for its time. Among its topics is the traditional and misogynistic maltreatment of women. The title poem, a lively narrative of the passion of Christ, interrupts its story once to argue that Eve, and, by extension, womankind, have been unjustly made to bear the chief responsibility for eating the fruit of the forbidden tree: that sin pales in comparison to the sin of the men who deliberately sentenced Christ to death. She commends the intervention of Pilate's wife and contrasts the behavior of Christ's male disciples, who forsook or denied him, with that of the women who stayed with him to the end.

After her husband died in 1613, Lanyer founded a school for the children of nobility and other wealthy families as a means of supporting herself. The only details concerning the remainder of her life come from court records, which indicate that she had considerable legal troubles, first concerning her school, then regarding the estate of her son, Henry, who died in October 1633. Lanyer died at age 76, and was buried 3 April 1645, at St. James Church, Clerkenwell.

⌘⌘⌘

To the Virtuous Reader[1]

Often have I heard that it is the property[2] of some women not only to emulate the virtues and perfections of the rest, but also by all their powers of ill-speaking to eclipse the brightness of their deserved fame; now contrary to this custom, which men I hope unjustly lay to their charge, I have written this small volume or little book, for the general use of all virtuous ladies and gentlewomen of this kingdom; and in commendation of some particular persons of our own sex, such as for the most part are so well known to myself and others, that I dare undertake fame dares not to call any better. And this have I done to make known to the world that all women deserve not to be blamed, though some forgetting they are women themselves, and in danger to be condemned by the words of their own mouths, fall into so great an error, as to speak unadvisedly against the rest of their sex; which if it be true, I am persuaded they can show their own imperfection in nothing more; and therefore could wish (for their own ease, modesties and credit) they would refer such points of folly to be practised by evil-disposed men, who forgetting they were born of women, nourished of women, and that if it were not by the means of women, they would be quite extinguished out of the world, and a final end of them all, do like vipers deface the wombs wherein they were bred,[3] only to give way and utterance to their want of discretion and goodness. Such as these, were they that dishonoured Christ, his apostles and prophets, putting them to shameful deaths. Therefore we are not to regard any imputations, that they undeservedly lay upon us, no otherwise than to make use of them to our own benefits, as spurs to virtue, making us fly all occasions that may colour their unjust speeches to pass current.[4] Especially considering that they have tempted even the patience of God himself, who gave power to wise and virtuous women to bring down their pride and arrogance. As was cruel Cesarius by the discreet counsel of noble Deborah,[5] judge and prophetess of Israel, and resolution of Jael,[6] wife of Heber the Kenite; wicked Haman, by the divine prayers and prudent proceedings of beautiful Hester;[7] blasphemous Holofernes, by the invincible courage, rare wisdom, and confident carriage of Judith;[8] and the unjust judges, by the innocence of chaste Susanna;[9] with infinite others, which for brevity's sake I will omit. As also in respect it pleased our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, without the assistance of man, being free from original and all other sins, from the time of his conception till the hour of his death, to be begotten of a woman, born of a woman, nourished of a woman, obedient to a woman; and that he healed women, pardoned women, comforted women, yea, even when he was in his greatest agony and bloody sweat, going to be crucified, and also in the last hour of his death, took care to dispose of a woman; after his resurrection, appeared first to a woman, sent a woman to declare his most glorious resurrection to the rest of his disciples. Many other examples I could allege of diverse faithful and virtuous women, who have in all ages not only been confessors, but also endured most cruel martyrdom for their faith in Jesus Christ. All which is sufficient to enforce all good Christians and honourable-minded men to speak reverently of our sex, and especially of all virtuous and good women. To the modest censures of both which I refer these my imperfect endeavours, knowing that according to their own excellent dispositions they will rather cherish, nourish, and increase the least spark of virtue where they find it, by their favourable and best interpretations, than quench it by wrong constructions. To whom I wish with all increase of virtue, and desire their best opinions.
—1611

---

[1] To the Virtuous Reader Printed as a preface to Lanyer's book Salve Deus Rex Judæorum, selections from which are included below.

[2] property Habit.

[3] vipers … bred It was thought that at birth the viper's young bit through the sides of the mother in order to be born, killing her.

[4] pass current Seem legitimate.

[5] Deborah Ruler of Israel who defeated the army of Sisera (Cesarius), a Canaanite general (see Judges 4).

[6] Jael Woman who killed Sisera by driving a tent peg through his head (see Judges 4).

[7] Hester Jewish queen (also called Esther) who saved the Jews from a genocidal plot concocted by Haman by appealing to Xerxes, King of Persia (see Esther 3–7).

[8] Judith Woman who killed the Babylonian general Holofernes by cutting off his head (see Judith 8–12).

[9] Susanna Woman who resisted the advances of two judges, who then unjustly charged her with adultery (see Daniel and Susanna 13).

from Salve Deus Rex Judæorum[1]

“Invocation”

Sith° Cynthia[2] is ascended to that rest since
Of endless joy and true eternity,
That glorious place that cannot be expressed
By any wight° clad in mortality, creature
In her almighty love so highly blest,
And crowned with everlasting sovereignty;
Where saints and angels do attend her throne,
And she gives glory unto God alone.

To thee, great Countess,[3] now I will apply
My pen, to write thy never dying fame;
That when to heaven thy blessed soul shall fly,
These lines on earth record thy reverend name:
And to this task I mean my muse to tie,
Though wanting skill I shall but purchase blame:
Pardon (dear Lady) want of woman’s wit
To pen thy praise, when few can equal it.

* * *

“Eve’s Apology in Defense of Women”

Now Pontius Pilate[4] is to judge the cause
Of faultless Jesus, who before him stands,
Who neither hath offended prince, nor laws,
Although he now be brought in woeful bands.
O noble governor, make thou yet a pause,
Do not in innocent blood inbrue° thy hands;[5] defile
But hear the words of thy most worthy wife,
Who sends to thee, to beg her Savior’s life.[6]

Let barb’rous cruelty far depart from thee,
And in true justice take affliction’s part;
Open thine eyes, that thou the truth may’st see.
Do not the thing that goes against thy heart,
Condemn not him that must thy Savior be;
But view his holy life, his good desert.° merit
Let not us women glory in men’s fall.[7]
Who had power given to overrule us all.

Till now your indiscretion sets us free.
And makes our former fault much less appear;
Our mother Eve, who tasted of the tree,[8]
Giving to Adam what she held most dear,
Was simply good, and had no power to see;
The after-coming harm did not appear:
The subtle serpent that our sex betrayed
Before our fall so sure a plot had laid.

That undiscerning ignorance perceived
No guile or craft that was by him intended;
For had she known of what we were bereaved,[9]
To his request she had not condescended.
But she, poor soul, by cunning was deceived;
No hurt therein her harmless heart intended:
For she alleged° God’s word, which he[10] denies, affirmed
That they should die, but even as gods be wise.

But surely Adam cannot be excused;
Her fault though great, yet he was most to blame;
What weakness offered, strength might have refused,
Being lord of all, the greater was his shame.
Although the serpent’s craft had her abused,
God’s holy word ought all his actions frame,° shape
For he was lord and king of all the earth,
Before poor Eve had either life or breath,

---

[1] Salve Deus Rex Judæorum The complete text of Lanyer’s book is available on the website component of this anthology.

[2] Cynthia Goddess of the moon, often identified with Queen Elizabeth I, who died in 1603.

[3] Countess Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland (1560–1616), Lanyer’s patroness.

[4] Pontius Pilate Roman governor of Judea, who presided over the trial of Jesus (see Matthew 27.11–26).

[5] Do … hands Reference to Matthew 27.24, in which Pilate washes his hands to demonstrate that he does not consider himself responsible for what happens to Jesus.

[6] hear … life Pilate received a message from his wife, urging him not to convict Jesus (see Matthew 27.19).

[7] men’s fall Fall into a sin, by crucifying Christ, greater than Eve’s “original” sin.

[8] Eve … tree According to Genesis 3.6, Eve ate the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. She shared the fruit with Adam, and as a consequence the two were banished from the Garden of Eden.

[9] bereaved Robbed (of eternal life).

[10] he I.e., the serpent (see Genesis 3.4–5).

Who being framed° by God's eternal hand formed
The perfectest man that ever breathed on earth;
And from God's mouth received that strait° command, strict
The breach whereof he knew was present death;
Yea, having power to rule both sea and land,
Yet with one apple won to lose that breath[1]
Which God had breathed in his beauteous face,
Bringing us all in danger and disgrace.

And then to lay the fault on Patience' back,
That we (poor women) must endure it all.
We know right well he did discretion lack,
Being not persuaded thereunto at all.
If Eve did err, it was for knowledge sake;
The fruit being fair persuaded him to fall:
No subtle serpent's falsehood did betray him;
If he would eat it, who had power to stay° him? stop

Not Eve, whose fault was only too much love,
Which made her give this present to her dear,
That what she tasted he likewise might prove,° experience
Whereby his knowledge might become more clear;
He never sought her weakness to reprove
With those sharp words which he of God did hear;
Yet men will boast of knowledge, which he took
From Eve's fair hand, as from a learned book.

If any evil did in her remain,
Being made of him,[2] he was the ground of all.
If one of many worlds[3] could lay a stain
Upon our sex, and work so great a fall
To wretched man by Satan's[4] subtle train,
What will so foul a fault amongst you all?
Her weakness did the serpent's words obey,
But you in malice God's dear Son betray,
Whom, if unjustly you condemn to die,
Her sin was small to what you do commit;
All mortal sins that do for vengeance cry
Are not to be compared unto it.
If many worlds would altogether try
By all their sins the wrath of God to get,
This sin of yours surmounts them all as far
As doth the sun another little star.[5]

Then let us have our liberty again,
And challenge° to yourselves no sovereignty. attribute
You came not in the world without our pain,
Make that a bar against your cruelty;
Your fault being greater, why should you disdain
Our being your equals, free from tyranny?
If one weak woman simply did offend,
This sin of yours hath no excuse nor end,

To which, poor souls, we never gave consent.
Witness, thy wife, O Pilate, speaks for all,
Who did but dream, and yet a message sent
That thou shouldest have nothing to do at all
With that just man[6] which, if thy heart relent,
Why wilt thou be a reprobate[7] with Saul[8]
To seek the death of him that is so good,
For thy soul's health to shed his dearest blood?
—1611

The Description of Cooke-ham[9]

Farewell (sweet Cooke-ham) where I first obtained
Grace from that grace where perfect grace remained;
And where the muses gave their full consent,
I should have power the virtuous to content;

---

[1] breath God breathed life into Adam (see Genesis 2.7).

[2] made … him According to Genesis 2.21–22, Eve was made from one of Adam's ribs.

[3] many worlds As the first man, Adam was the father of all humans. Human beings were sometimes likened to individual worlds in the literature of the time.

[4] Satan's Belonging to the serpent, traditionally identified with Satan.

[5] sun … star As the sun outshines the other stars in the sky, so the sin of killing Jesus is greater in magnitude. In earlier understandings of astronomy, the sun was thought to be much larger than the stars.

[6] just man I.e., Jesus.

[7] a reprobate Damned.

[8] Saul King of Israel, who tried to kill David (see 1 Samuel 19.9–24).

[9] Cooke-ham Cookham Dean, a country house in Berkshire, UK, leased by the brother of Lanyer's patroness, Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland.

Where princely palace willed me to indite° write
The sacred story of the soul's delight.[1]
Farewell (sweet place) where virtue then did rest,
And all delights did harbour in her breast;
Never shall my sad eyes again behold
Those pleasures which my thoughts did then unfold;
Yet you (great lady) mistress of that place,[2]
From whose desires did spring this work of grace,
Vouchsafe° to think upon these pleasures past are prepared
As fleeting, worldly joys that could not last,
Or as dim shadows of celestial pleasures,
Which are desired above all earthly treasures.
Oh how (methought) against you thither came
Each part did seem some new delight to frame!
The house received all ornaments to grace it,
And would endure no foulness to deface it.
The walks put on their summer liveries,° uniforms
And all things else did hold like similes:
The trees with leaves, with fruits, with flowers clad,
Embraced each other, seeming to be glad,
Turning themselves to beauteous canopies
To shade the bright sun from your brighter eyes;
The crystal streams with silver spangles graced,
While by the glorious sun they were embraced;
The little birds in chirping notes did sing,
To entertain both you and that sweet spring;
And Philomela[3] with her sundry lays,
Both you and that delightful place did praise.
Oh, how methought each plant, each flower, each tree
Set forth their beauties then to welcome thee;
The very hills right humbly did descend,
When you to tread upon them did intend.
And as you set your feet, they still did rise,
Glad that they could receive so rich a prize.
The gentle winds did take delight to be Among those woods that were so graced by thee
And in sad murmur uttered pleasing sound,
That pleasure in that place might more abound;
The swelling banks delivered all their pride,
When such a phoenix once they had espied.
Each arbour, bank, each seat, each stately tree
Thought themselves honoured in supporting thee.
The pretty birds would oft come to attend thee,
Yet fly away for fear they should offend thee;
The little creatures in the burrow by
Would come abroad to sport them in your eye;[4]
Yet fearful of the bow in your fair hand
Would run away when you did make a stand.
Now let me come unto that stately tree,
Wherein such goodly prospects you did see;
That oak that did in height his fellows pass,
As much as lofty trees, low-growing grass;
Much like a comely cedar, straight and tall,
Whose beauteous stature far exceeded all;
How often did you visit this fair tree,
Which seeming joyful in receiving thee,
Would like a palm tree spread his arms abroad,
Desirous that you there should make abode;
Whose fair green leaves much like a comely veil
Defended Phoebus[5] when he would assail;
Whose pleasing boughs did lend a cool fresh air,
Joying his happiness when you were there;
Where being seated, you might plainly see
Hills, vales and woods, as if on bended knee
They had appeared, your honour to salute,
Or to prefer° some strange unlooked-for suit;° proffer / request
All interlaced with brooks and crystal springs,
A prospect fit to please the eyes of kings;
And thirteen shires appear all in your sight,
Europe could not afford much more delight.
What was there then but gave you all content,
While you the time in meditation spent,
Of their creator's power, which there you saw
In all his creatures held a perfect law,
And in their beauties did you plain descry° discern
His beauty, wisdom, grace, love, majesty.
In these sweet woods how often did you walk
With Christ and his apostles there to talk;
Placing his holy writ° in some fair tree, scripture
To meditate what you therein did see;

---

[1] sacred … delight Salve Deus Rex Judeaeorum, to which this poem is appended.

[2] you … place Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland (1560-1616).

[3] Philomela Nightingale. In Greek mythology, Philomela was a woman who was changed into a nightingale.

[4] sport … eye Entertain you.

[5] Phoebus Sun. "Phoebus" is an epithet for Apollo, Greek and Roman god of the sun.

With Moses you did mount his holy hill,[1]
To know his pleasure and perform his will.
With lovely David you did often sing,
His holy hymns to heaven's eternal king.[2]
And in sweet music did your soul delight,
To sound his praises, morning, noon and night.
With blessed Joseph you did often feed
Your pined brethren when they stood in need.[3]
And that sweet lady sprung from Clifford's race,
Of noble Bedford's blood, fair stem of grace,
To honourable Dorset now espoused,[4]
In whose fair breast true virtue then was housed;
Oh, what delight did my weak spirits find
In those pure parts of her well-framed mind;
And yet it grieves me that I cannot be Near unto her, whose virtues did agree
With those fair ornaments of outward beauty,
Which did enforce from all both love and duty.
Unconstant fortune, thou art most to blame,
Who casts us down into so low a frame,° state
Where our great friends we cannot daily see,
So great a difference is there in degree.° social status
Many are placed in those orbs of state,
Parters° in honour, so ordained by fate, dividers
Nearer in show, yet farther off in love,
In which the lowest always are above.
But whither am I carried in conceit?° thought
My wit too weak to conster° of the great. understand
Why not? although we are but born of earth,
We may behold the heavens, despising death;
And loving heaven that is so far above,
May in the end vouchsafe° us entire love. grant
Therefore sweet memory, do thou retain
Those pleasures past, which will not turn again;
Remember beauteous Dorset's[5] summer sports,[6]
So far from being touched by ill reports;
Wherein myself did always bear a part,
While reverend love presented my true heart;
Those recreations let me bear in mind,
Which her sweet youth and noble thoughts did find;
Whereof deprived, I evermore must grieve,
Hating blind fortune, careless to relieve.
And you, sweet Cooke-ham, whom these ladies leave,
I now must tell the grief you did conceive
At their departure; when they went away,
How everything retained a sad dismay;
Nay long before, when once an inkling came,
Methought each thing did unto sorrow frame;
The trees that were so glorious in our view,
Forsook both flowers and fruit, when once they knew
Of your depart, their very leaves did wither,
Changing their colours as they grew together.
But when they saw this had no power to stay you,
They often wept, though speechless, could not pray you;
Letting their tears in your fair bosoms fall,
As if they said: "Why will ye leave us all?"
This being vain, they cast their leaves away,
Hoping that pity would have made you stay;
Their frozen tops, like age's hoary hairs,
Shows their disasters, languishing in fears;
A swarthy rivelled rine[7] all overspread
Their dying bodies, half-alive, half-dead.
But your occasions called you so away,
That nothing there had power to make you stay;
Yet did I see a noble, grateful mind,
Requiting each according to their kind;
Forgetting not to turn and take your leave
Of these sad creatures, powerless to receive
Your favour, when with grief you did depart,
Placing their former pleasures in your heart;
Giving great charge to noble memory,
There to preserve their love continually;
But specially the love of that fair tree,
That first and last you did vouchsafe to see;
In which it pleased you oft to take the air,
With noble Dorset, then a virgin fair;

---

[1] Moses ... hill In Exodus 24.9 Moses climbs Mount Sinai in order to see God.

[2] With ... king David was then supposed to be the author of most or all of Psalms, songs written in praise of God.

[3] With ... need Reference to Genesis 42.25, in which Joseph, as governor of Egypt, provides his deceitful brothers with food in order to save them from starvation.

[4] sweet lady ... espoused Margaret Clifford's daughter, Lady Anne Clifford (1589–1675), married Richard Sackville, Earl of Dorset (1589–1624). Lady Anne's maternal grandfather was Francis Russell, Earl of Bedford (1527–85). A selection from her diary is in this anthology.

[5] Dorset Lady Anne Clifford.

[6] summer sports E.g., country dances and outdoor games.

[7] rivelled rine Wrinkled bark.

Where many a learned book was read and scanned;
To this fair tree, taking me by the hand,
You did repeat the pleasures which had passed,
Seeming to grieve they could no longer last.
And with a chaste, yet loving kiss took leave,
Of which sweet kiss I did it soon bereave;° rob
Scorning a senseless creature should possess
So rare a favour, so great happiness.
No other kiss it could receive from me,
For fear to give back what it took of thee;
So I, ungrateful creature, did deceive it,
Of that which you vouchsafed in love to leave it.
And though it oft had giv'n me much content,
Yet this great wrong I never could repent;
But of the happiest made it most forlorn,
To show that nothing's free from fortune's scorn,
While all the rest with this most beauteous tree,
Made their sad consort sorrow's harmony.
The flowers that on the banks and walks did grow,
Crept in the ground, the grass did weep for woe.
The winds and waters seemed to chide together,
Because you went away, they knew not whither.
And those sweet brooks that ran so fair and clear,
With grief and trouble wrinkled did appear.
Those pretty birds that wonted° were to sing, accustomed
Now neither sing, nor chirp, nor use their wing;
But with their tender feet on some bare spray,° branch
Warble forth sorrow, and their own dismay.
Fair Philomela leaves her mournful ditty,
Drowned in dead sleep, yet can procure no pity;
Each arbour, bank, each seat, each stately tree
Looks bare and desolate now, for want of thee;
Turning green tresses° into frosty grey, hair
While in cold grief they wither all away.
The sun grew weak, his beams no comfort gave,
While all green things did make the earth their grave;
Each briar, each bramble, when you went away,
Caught fast your clothes, thinking to make you stay;
Delightful Echo,[1] wonted to reply
To our last words, did now for sorrow die;
The house cast off each garment that might grace it,
Putting on dust and cobwebs to deface it.
All desolation then there did appear,
When you were going whom they held so dear.
This last farewell to Cooke-ham here I give;
When I am dead thy name in this may live,
Wherein I have performed her noble hest,° command
Whose virtues lodge in my unworthy breast,
And ever shall, so long as life remains,
Tying my heart to her by those rich chains.
—1611

To the Doubtful Reader[2]

Gentle reader, if thou desire to be resolved,[3] why I give this title, Salve Deus Rex Judæorum,[4] know for certain, that it was delivered unto me in sleep many years before I had any intent to write in this manner, and was quite out of my memory, until I had written the Passion of Christ, when immediately it came into my remembrance, what I had dreamed long before; and thinking it a significant token, that I was appointed to perform this work, I gave the very same words I received in sleep as the fittest title I could devise for this book.
—1611

---

[1] Echo Nymph in Greek mythology who was prevented by a curse from saying anything other than what others said.

[2] To the Doubtful Reader Printed at the conclusion of Salve Deus Rex Judæorum; Doubtful Curious.

[3] be resolved Understand.

[4] Salve … Judæorum Latin: Hail, God, King of the Jews.

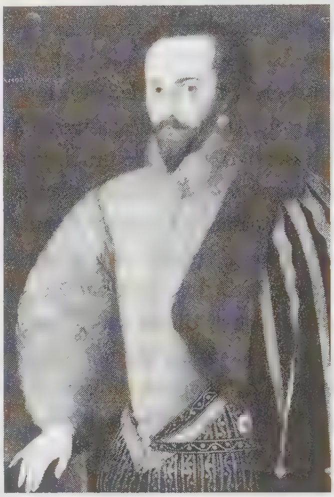
SIR WALTER RALEGH

1554 – 1618

Sir Walter Ralegh was one of the leading courtiers, adventurers, and literary figures of the Elizabethan era. Intermittently regarded as a hero and a traitor in his lifetime, Ralegh profited richly and suffered considerably from his proximity to Elizabeth I—but fared considerably worse after James I replaced Elizabeth on the throne. Known for his gallantry, for his fighting ability, for his effort at colonization in Virginia, and for bringing the practice of smoking tobacco into European culture, Ralegh was also the author of literary work that ranged from love poetry to exploration narratives to an unfinished history of the world.



Born into the lesser gentry at Hayes Barton, Devon, Ralegh went to France in 1569 to fight for the Huguenots in the French religious civil wars. By 1572, he was studying at Oriel College, Oxford, only to leave over a year later without a degree. Ralegh finished his education in the Inns of Court, including Lyon's Inn and the Middle Temple, and it was during these years that his first poem was probably printed. It is often difficult to date or even attribute Ralegh's poems accurately, for like many courtiers, Ralegh generally circulated his verses in manuscript.

Ralegh's poetry is characterized by an intensely personal treatment of such conventional themes as love, loss, beauty, and time. The majority of his poems are short lyrics—many of them occasional, written in response to particular events.

After embarking with his stepbrother, Humphrey Gilbert, on an unsuccessful colonizing expedition to North America in 1578, Ralegh spent a year and a half fighting in Ireland. He returned to England in 1581 and caught the Queen's attention, eventually emerging as her new favorite and reaping substantial rewards, including a monopoly over wine licences in 1583 and a knighthood in 1585. A grant of 42,000 Irish acres on which to establish English colonists, made in 1587, brought Ralegh back to Ireland several times, and he was responsible for bringing an acquaintance, Edmund Spenser, back to England and introducing him to the Queen in 1589.

Ralegh's rapid rise to prominence at Elizabeth I's court was abruptly halted in 1592 after the discovery of his secret marriage to Elizabeth Throckmorton, one of the Queen's attendants. The Queen had him imprisoned in the Tower of London for several months—the occasion for his long poem, The Ocean to Cynthia, Ralegh's lament over Elizabeth's displeasure. This, Ralegh's most ambitious and sprawling poem, is a work that exists only in fragments, the longest of them over five hundred lines long. Five years elapsed before Ralegh was again in the Queen's good graces, a period during which he traveled to Guiana (1595), published a report on his adventures entitled The Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana (1596), developed his Irish plantations, and participated in the attack on Cadiz (1596). Always critical of Spain's colonial and naval power, Ralegh never lost interest in North America, sponsoring reconnaissance and colonizing expeditions in the late 1580s to the areas now known as Virginia and the Carolinas.

Following James I's accession in 1603, Ralegh returned to the Tower of London for nearly thirteen years after a dubious treason conviction for allegedly supporting Arabella Stuart's claim to the throne. Rarely idle, Ralegh kept abreast of the political and intellectual climate during his imprisonment by entertaining numerous visitors (including James's son, Prince Henry), conducting scientific experiments, compounding drugs, and writing. His most notable work from this period is The Historie of the World (1614), a three-volume overview of world events from creation to the second century BCE. Ralegh was released in 1617 to make a second journey to Guiana in search of the gold mine that he claimed to have found on his first voyage. Returning empty-handed in 1618, he was imprisoned under his former sentence for disobeying James's orders to avoid any acts of violence against the Spanish, and then beheaded. Despite a reputation for unorthodoxy and even atheism, Ralegh made a pious if showy end and replied, when asked if he should not face east (toward Jerusalem), "What matter how the head lie, so the heart be right?"

[Please note that an exchange of poems between Sir Walter Ralegh and Elizabeth I appears with other writings by Elizabeth earlier in this volume.]

⌘⌘⌘

A Vision upon this Conceit of the Fairy Queen[1]

Methought I saw the grave where Laura[2] lay,
Within that temple where the vestal flame[3]
Was wont to burn: and, passing by that way,
To see that buried dust of living fame,
Whose tomb fair Love and fairer Virtue kept,
All suddenly I saw the Faery Queen,° Elizabeth I
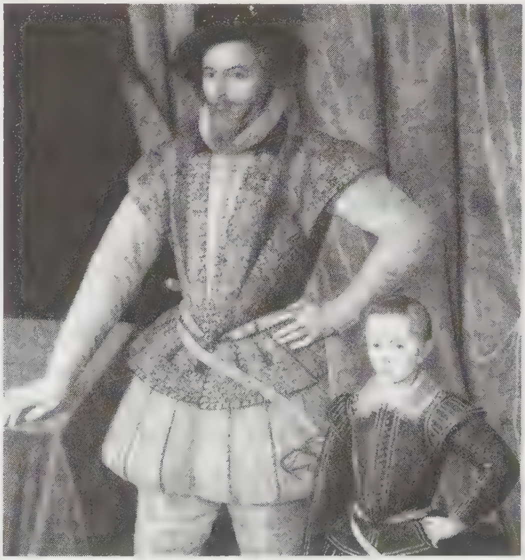
At whose approach the soul of Petrarch wept;
And from thenceforth those graces[4] were not seen,
For they this Queen attended; in whose stead
Oblivion laid him down on Laura's hearse.
Hereat the hardest stones were seen to bleed,
And groans of buried ghosts the heavens did pierce:
Where Homer's spright° did tremble all for grief, spirit
And cursed the access[5] of that celestial thief.[6]
—1590



Detail from a portrait of Sir Walter Ralegh and His Son, 1602 (artist unknown).

Sir Walter Ralegh to His Son[7]

Three things there be that prosper up apace° quickly
And flourish, whilst they grow asunder° far, apart
But on a day, they meet all in one place,
And when they meet, they one another mar;° damage

---

[1] A Vision ... Queen Ralegh's poem was printed in the first edition of Spenser's The Fairie Queene (1590).

[2] Laura The subject of Petrarch's love poems of the fourteenth century.

[3] vestal flame Reference to the Roman goddess of the hearth, Vesta, whose temple was maintained by vestal virgins guarding an eternal flame.

[4] those graces I.e., "fair Love and fairer Virtue."

[5] access To achieve an honor or office (accession).

[6] Homer's spright ... celestial thief The Queen has usurped Laura's reputation for purity and chastity, and Spenser has stolen Petrarch's artistic legacy and even threatened the place of Homer in the literary pantheon; Homer Author of The Iliad and The Odyssey.

[7] Sir Walter Ralegh to His Son Ralegh's son, Wat, had a reputation for being wild. He died during his father's second voyage to Guiana.

And they be these: the wood, the weed, the wag.[1]
The wood is that which makes the gallow tree;
The weed is that which strings the hangman's bag;
The wag, my pretty knave, betokeneth thee.
Mark well, dear boy, whilst these assemble not,
Green springs the tree, hemp grows, the wag is wild,
But when they meet, it makes the timber rot,
It frets the halter, and it chokes the child.
Then bless thee, and beware, and let us pray
We part not with thee at this meeting day.
—c. 1600

The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd[2]

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee and be thy love.

Time drives the flocks from field to fold
When rivers rage and rocks grow cold,
And Philomel[3] becometh dumb;
The rest complains of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton° fields unrestrained, unruly
To wayward winter reckoning yields;
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,° bitterness, rancor
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle,° and thy posies tunic or skirt
Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten—
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
All these in me no means can move
To come to thee and be thy love.

But could youth last and love still breed,
Had joys no date nor age no need,[4]
Then these delights my mind might move
To live with thee and be thy love.
—1600

The Lie

Go, soul, the body's guest,
Upon a thankless errand;
Fear not to touch the best;
The truth shall be thy warrant.
Go, since I needs must die,
And give the world the lie.

Say to the court, it glows
And shines like rotten wood;
Say to the church, it shows
What's good, and doth no good.
If church and court reply,
Then give them both the lie.

Tell potentates° they live powerful rulers
Acting by others' action;
Not loved unless they give,
Not strong but by a faction.
If potentates reply,
Give potentates the lie.

Tell men of high condition,
That manage the estate,° the state or body politic
Their purpose is ambition,
Their practice only hate.
And if they once reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell them that brave it most,[5]
They beg for more by spending,
Who, in their greatest cost,
Seek nothing but commending.
And if they make reply,
Then give them all the lie.

---

[1] wag Joker, mischievous boy.

[2] The Nymph's … Shepherd Response to Christopher Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love."

[3] Philomel I.e., the nightingale doesn't sing. In classical mythology, Philomela, the daughter of the King of Athens, was transformed into a nightingale after being pursued and raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, King of Thrace.

